To which is prefixed,

THE LIFE OF THE AUTHOR.

Beneath an awful gloom, a night of ſhade,
By ſilent darkneſs more majeſtic made,
I place thy volume, YOUNG, with reverence place;
Thy volume, worthy of a ſaint's embrace!
What goſpel-truths thy heavenly lines convey,
And ſteal us from mortality away!
Full on the ſoul thy tides of rapture flow,
Kindling we hear, and, while we read, we glow!
Exalted by thy theme, we mount on high,
We ſpurn at earth, we claim our native ſky.
Now let the unletter'd, or the letter'd man,
Deny the ſoul immortal, if he can:
A ſoul immortal in thy works we ſee;
Can duſt and aſhes think and write like thee?

THE LIFE OF YOUNG.

For the life of Young, the world is obliged to Mr. Herbert Croft, the Engliſh lexicographer, formerly a barriſter of Lincoln's-Inn, now a clergyman, who was the friend of his ſon, and wiſhed to vindicate him from ſome very miſtaken remarks to his prejudice. Mr. Croft's narrative, which exhibits a ſucceſsful imitation of Dr. Johnſon's ſtyle, was ſubjected to the reviſion of our great poetical biographer, who adopted it as an introduction to his critical examination of the genius and writings of Young.

The facts ſtated in the preſent account are chiefly taken from Mr. Croft's narrative, with the addition of ſuch particulars as ſubſequent reſearches, or caſual information, have ſupplied.

Edward Young was born at Upham, near Wincheſter, in June 1681. He was the ſon of Dr. Edward Young, at that time Fellow of Wincheſter College, and Rector of Upham. In 1682, he was collated to the prebend of Gillingham-Minor, in the church of Saliſbury, by Biſhop Ward. He was afterwards, in conſequence of his merit and reputation, or of the intereſt of Lord Bradford, to whom, in 1702, he dedicated two volumes of ſermons, appointed Chaplain to King William and Queen Mary, and preferred to the deanery of Saliſbury. Jacob, who wrote in 1720, ſays, "he was Chaplain and Clerk of the Cloſet to the late Queen, who honoured him, by ſtanding godmother to the poet." He died at Saliſbury, in 1705. Burnet preached his funeral ſermon, and beſtowed upon him a handſome eulogium.

He was placed on the foundation at Wincheſter College, where he remained till the election after his eighteenth birth-day, the period at which thoſe upon the foundation are ſuperannuated; when, not being choſen to New College, Oxford, he, on the 15th of October 1703, was entered an independent member of that ſociety, that he might live at little expence at the lodgings of the Warden, who was a particular friend of his father. In a few months, the Warden of New College died. He then removed to Corpus College. The preſident of this ſociety, from a regard alſo to his father, invited him thither, in order to leſſen his academical expences. In 1708, he was nominated to a law-fellowſhip at All Souls, by Archbiſhop Teniſon; into whoſe hands it came by devolution. Such repeated patronages, while it juſtifies Burnet's praiſe of the father, reflects credit on the conduct of the ſon. The manner in which it was exerted, ſeems to prove, that the father did not leave behind him much wealth.

It is reported, that when he firſt found himſelf independent, and his own maſter, at All Souls, he was not the ornament to religion and morality which he afterwards became.

Pope is ſaid, by Ruffhead, to have told Warburton, that "Young had paſſed a fooliſh youth, the ſport of peers; but his having a very good heart, enabled him to ſupport the clerical character, when he aſſumed it, with decency, and afterwards with honour."

The authority of his father, indeed, had ceaſed ſome time before by his death; and he was certainly not aſhamed to be patronized by the Duke of Wharton, "the ſcorn and wonder of his days."

His father had been well acquainted with Mrs. Anne Wharton, the firſt wife of Thomas Wharton, Eſq. afterwards Marquis of Wharton, a lady celebrated for her poetical talents, by Burnet and by Waller. The father of the Duke of Wharton, had been the friend of his father; and, after he became ennobled, did not drop the ſon of his old friend: In him, during the ſhort time he lived, Young found a patron, and in his eccentric and diſſolute deſcendent, a friend and a companion. But the duke, it is to be ſuppoſed, did not at once ſink into the depths of profligacy. That he had great and ſhining abilities, was acknowledged by his contemporaries, who entertained the greateſt hopes of his becoming an honour to his country. It is not unreaſonable to imagine, that the bare acquaintance with ſuch a man as Wharton proved to be, might give riſe to the report of his having relaxed, in early youth, from the ſtrict and rigid rules of virtue; of the truth of which, there is not ſufficient evidence.

The teſtimony of Tindal, who ſpent much of his time at All Souls, is an unqueſtionable authority in favour of Young's warmth and ability in the cauſe of religion, in the early part of his life. "The other boys," ſaid he, "I can always anſwer, becauſe I always know whence they have their arguments, which I have read a hundred times; but that fellow Young, is continually peſtering me with ſomething of his own."

In 1712, when Queen Anne called up to the Houſe of Lords the ſons of the Earls of Northampton and Ayleſbury, and added, in one day, ten others to the number of peers, he publiſhed An Epiſtle to the Right Honourable George Lord Lanſdown; in order to reconcile the people to one, at leaſt, of the new lords. It ſeems intended alſo to reconcile the public to the late peace.

The affectionate mention of the death of his friend Harriſon, of New College, at the cloſe of the poem, is an inſtance of his art, which diſplayed itſelf ſo wonderfully afterwards in the Night Thoughts, of making the public a party in his private ſorrow.

Of this poem, there is no appearance in his own edition of his works, in 4 vols, 8vo; and prefixed to an edition by Curll and Tonſon, in 1741, is a letter from Young to Curll, in which he adviſes its omiſſion. "I think," ſays he, in the preface to the Works of the Author of the Night Thoughts "the following pieces, in four volumes, to be the moſt excuſable of all that I have written; and I wiſh leſs apology was needful for theſe. As there is no recalling what is got abroad, the pieces here republiſhed I have reviſed and corrected, and rendered them as pardonable as it was in my power to do." It is but juſtice to diſtinguiſh what the author of the Night Thoughts deliberately rejected.

When Addiſon publiſhed "Cato," in 1713, Young prefixed to it a recommendatory copy of verſes. This is one of the pieces which he did not republiſh.

The Laſt Day was publiſhed the ſame year. The Vice-Chancellor's Imprimatur: for it was firſt printed at Oxford, is dated May 19. 1713. From the exordium, he appears to have ſpent ſome time in the compoſition of it. While other bards with Britain's hero ſet their ſouls on fire, he draws, he ſays, a deeper ſcene. This ſerious poem was finiſhed by him as early as 1710; for part of it is printed in the "Tatler." The "Engliſhman" of October 29. 1713, which was probably written by Addiſon, ſpeaks handſomely of it. It was inſcribed to the queen in a dedication; which, for ſome reaſon, he did not admit into his works. It tells her, that the only title to the great honour he now does himſelf, is the obligation which he formerly received from her royal indulgence.

Of this obligation nothing is now known, unleſs he alluded to her being his godmother. He is ſaid, indeed, to have been engaged at a ſettled ſtipend, as a writer for the court. In Swift's "Rhapſody on Poetry," are theſe lines, ſpeaking of the court:

> Whence Gay was baniſh'd in diſgrace,
> Where Pope will never ſhow his face,
> Where Y—— muſt torture his invention,
> To flatter knaves, or loſe his penſion.

That Y—— means Young, ſeems clear from four other lines in the ſame poem:

> Attend, ye Popes, and Youngs, and Gays,
> And tune your harps, and ſtrew your bays;
> Your panegyrics here provide;
> You cannot err on flattery's ſide.

Of the dedication, the complexion is clearly political. It ſpeaks in the higheſt terms of the peace of Utrecht. Mr. Croft doubts whether he had a right to withdraw the praiſe he had once given, and aſks, "Was he conſcious of the exaggeration of party? Then he ſhould not have written it. If it contained only the praiſe of truth, he ſhould not have omitted it in his works." Surely this is denying a man the privilege of becoming wiſer by his own experience! Young, in the warmth of party zeal, might very honeſtly and ſincerely write a panegyric, which time, and a clearer knowledge of characters, might convince him was undeſerved; all he could then do, was ſilently to ſuppreſs, as far as he was able, thoſe errors into which an upright heart had betrayed his judgment.

The poem itſelf, is not without a glance towards politics, notwithſtanding the ſubject. The cry, that the church was in danger, had not yet ſubſided. The Laſt Day, written by a layman, was much approved by the Tory miniſtry, and their friends.

The Force of Religion, or Vanquiſhed Love, was publiſhed before the queen's death. This poem is founded on the execution of Lady Jane Gray, and her huſband, Lord Guildford Dudley, 1554; a ſtory choſen for the ſubject of an epiſtle by Cawthorn, a tragedy by Smith, and wrought into tragedy by Rowe. The flattering dedication of it to the Countess of Salisbury, does not appear in his own edition.

On the 23d of April 1714, he took his degree of Bachelor of Civil Law; and, the same year, he published a poem on the Queen's death, and his Majesty's accession to the throne. It is inscribed to Addison, then Secretary to the Lords Justices. This poem he did not admit into his works.

In 1716, when the foundation of the Codrington Library was laid, he was appointed to speak the Latin Oration. In his letter to Curll, he says, "If you will take my advice, I would have you omit the Oration on Codrington. I think the collection will sell better without it." This oration he did not admit into his works.

In 1717, when Wharton, after his return from his travels, went to Ireland, it is not unlikely that Young accompanied his avowed friend and patron. From a passage relating to Swift, in his letter to Richardson, on original composition, it is clear he was, at some period of his life, in that country.

In 1719, he was received into the Earl of Exeter's family, as tutor to Lord Burleigh; which he soon quitted, upon the pressing solicitations of Wharton, and his promises of serving and advancing him in the world.

The same year, his Busiris, King of Egypt, was acted at the theatre in Drury-Lane, and met with success. The plot is of his own contrivance. The haughty message sent by Busiris to the Persian Ambassador, is copied from that returned by the Ethiopian Prince to Cambyses, in the third book of Herodotus. The dialogue contains many striking beauties of sentiment and description, but it is written in a glaring ambitious style; the pride of Busiris is such as no other man can have; and the whole is too remote from human life, to raise either grief, horror, or indignation. It was inscribed to the Duke of Newcastle, "because the late instances he had received of his Grace's undeserved and uncommon favour, in an affair of some consequence, foreign to the theatre, had taken from him the privilege of choosing a patron." The dedication he afterwards suppressed.

He took the degree of Doctor of Laws on the 10th of June 1719. The same year, he lamented the death of Addison, in a letter addressed to their common friend, Tickell. According to Spence's MSS, they used to "communicate to each other whatever verses they wrote, even to the least things."

The same year appeared A Paraphrase on part of the Book of Job, which he dedicated, in no common strain of flattery, to Lord Chancellor Parker. Of this work, his opinion may be known from his letter to Curll;—"You seem, in the collection you propose, to have omitted what I think may claim the first place in it; I mean, "A Translation from part of Job, printed by Mr. Tonson." The dedication was only suffered to appear in Tonson's edition.

In 1721, The Revenge, a tragedy, was acted at the theatre in Drury-Lane, and met with very great success. This is his best dramatic performance. It approaches much nearer to human practices and manners than Busiris, and therefore keeps possession of the stage. The first design seems suggested by "Othello" and "Abdelazar;" but he has, in some respects, greatly improved on both. The reflections, the incidents, and the diction, are original. The moral observations are so introduced and so expressed, as to have all the novelty that can be required.

He dedicated this famous tragedy to Wharton. "Your Grace," says the dedication, "has been pleased to make yourself accessary to the following scenes, not only by suggesting the most beautiful incident in them, but by making all possible provision for the success of the whole." That Wharton should have suggested the incident to which he alludes, is not unlikely, as his last mental exertion, in his quarters at Lerida in Spain, was some scenes of a tragedy, on the story of "Mary Queen of Scots;" to which Lady Mary Wortley Montague wrote an epilogue, which is preserved in Dodsley's "Collection."

He concludes his address to Wharton, whom he acknowledges not only as the defender of his poetry, but as the promoter of his fortune, thus: "My present fortune is his bounty, and my future his care; which, I will venture to say, will be always remembered to his honour; since he, I know, intended his generosity as an encouragement to merit; though, through his very pardonable partiality to one who bears him so sincere a duty and respect, I happen to receive the benefit of it." He excluded this dedication from his own edition of his works.

To the patronage of this unhappy character, he was certainly, however, indebted for something material. Wharton's regard for Young, added to his "luſt of praiſe," procured to All Souls College a donation, which was not forgotten when he dedicated The Revenge.

Two annuities were alſo granted by the Duke to Young; one of which was dated March 24. 1719, and accounted for his Grace's bounty in a ſtyle princely and commendable, if not legal:—"Conſidering that the public good is advanced by the enouragemcent of learning, and the polite arts, and being pleaſed therein with the attempts of Dr. Young; in conſideration thereof, and of the love I bear him, &c." The other was dated July 10. 1722.

When Lord Chancellor Hardwicke was to determine, March 14. 1740, whether theſe annuities were for legal conſiderations, Young, on his examination, ſwore, that he quitted the Exeter family, and refuſed an annuity of 100 l., which had been offered him for life, if he would continue tutor to Lord Burleigh, upon the ſolicitations of the Duke of Wharton, and his Grace's aſſurances of providing for him in a much more ample manner.

It alſo appeared, that the Duke had given him a bond for 600 l., dated March 15. 1721, in conſideration of his taking ſeveral journeys, and being at great expences, in order to be choſen Member of Parliament, at the Duke's deſire; and in conſideration of his not taking two livings of 200 l. and 400 l., in the gift of All Souls College, on his Grace's promiſes of ſerving and advancing him in the world.

The attempt to get into Parliament was at Cirenceſter, where Young ſtood a conteſted election, about 1721, in which he was unſucceſsful.

His Satires were originally publiſhed ſeparately, under the title of The Love of Fame, or The Univerſal Paſſion. The firſt appeared in 1725. The fifth was not publiſhed till 1727, and the ſixth not till 1728; when he gathered them into one publication, "corrected and enlarged," and prefixed a preface, deciſive in favour of laughing at the world; which he preſerved, without any palliation, in the collection of his works. They were inſcribed to the Duke of Dorſet, Mr. Dodington, afterwards Lord Melcombe, Mr. Spencer Compton, afterwards Lord Wilmington, Lady Elizabeth Germain, Sir Robert Walpole, &c.

By the Univerſal Paſſion, according to Mr. Croſt, he acquired more than three thouſand pounds. His ſon informed Dr. Johnſon and Mr. Boſwell, in 1781, "that his father had received ſeveral thouſand pounds of ſubſcription-money for his Univerſal Paſſion, but had loſt it in the South Sea. Dr. Johnſon thought this muſt be a miſtake; for he had never ſeen a ſubſcription-book."

It is related by Spence, in his MSS., on the authority of Mr. Rawlinſon, that Young, upon the publication of his Univerſal Paſſion, received from the Duke of Grafton two thouſand pounds; and that, when one of his friends exclaimed "two thouſand pounds for a poem," he ſaid it was the beſt bargain he ever made in his life; for the poem was worth four thouſand. This ſtory may be true; but it ſeems to have been raiſed from the two anſwers of Sidney and Lord Burleigh, reſpecting the "Faery Queene."

In 1726, he addreſſed a poem, called The Inſtallment, to Sir Robert Walpole, of which the title ſufficiently explains the intention. It is among the pieces he did not admit into the number of his pardonable writings.

At the acceſſion of George II., he publiſhed Ocean, An Ode, concluding with a Wiſh. The hint of it was taken from the Royal Speech; which recommended the increaſe and the encouragement of the ſeamen; that they might be invited, rather than compelled by force and violence, to enter into the ſervice of their country; a plan which humanity muſt lament that policy has not even yet been able or willing to carry into execution. Prefixed to the original publication, were An Ode to the King, Pater Patriæ, and an Eſſay on Lyric Poetry. He preſerved neither of them in his own edition. The Ode itſelf, which in the firſt edition, and in the laſt, conſiſts of ſeventy-three ſtanzas, in his own edition is reduced to fifty-nine. Among the omitted paſſages, is the Wiſh. The Eſſay on Lyric Poetry is ſo juſt and impartial, as to condemn himſelf.

Soon after the appearance of Ocean, when he was almoſt fifty, he entered into orders; and, in April 1728, not long after he put on the gown, he was appointed Chaplain to the King.

The tragedy of The Brothers, which was already in rehearſal, he immediately withdrew from the ſtage, as unbecoming his new profeſſion.

It is related by Ruffhead, that, when he determined on the church, he addreſſed himſelf to Pope; for inſtructions in theology; who, in a frolic, adviſed the diligent peruſal of Thomas Aquinas. With this treaſure, he retired from interruption, to an obſcure place in the ſuburbs. Pope hearing nothing of him during half a year, and apprehending he might have carried the jeſt too far, ſought after him, and found him juſt in time to prevent what Ruffhead calls "an irretrieveable derangement."

Not long after he took orders, he publiſhed, in proſe, A True Eſtimate of Human Life, 1728; dedicated to the Queen; and a Sermon, preached before the Houſe of Commons, January 30. 1729, intituled, An Apology for Princes, or the Reverence due to Government. The True Eſtimate of Human Life, exhibits only the dark ſide. Being aſked, why he did not give, as he promiſed, the bright repreſentation; he is ſaid to have replied, that he could not. By others it has been ſaid, that this was finiſhed; but that, before there exiſted any copy, it was torn in pieces by a lady's monkey.

In 1730, he relapſed to poetry, and publiſhed Imperium Pelagi, a Naval Lyric; written in imitation of Pindar's Spirit, occaſioned by his Majeſty's return from Hanover, September 1729, and the ſucceeding Peace. It is inſcribed to the Duke of Chandos. In the preface he obſerves, that the ode is the moſt ſpirited kind of poetry, and that the Pindaric is the moſt ſpirited kind of ode. "This I ſpeak," he adds; with ſufficient candour, "at my own very great peril. But truth has an eternal title to our confeſſion, though we are ſure to ſuffer by it." It was one of the pieces which he deliberately refuſed to own: It was ridiculed in Fielding's "Tom Thumb."

Not long after this Pindaric attempt, he publiſhed Two Epiſtles to Mr. Pope, concerning the Authors of the Age, 1730. In July the ſame year, he was preſented, by his college, to the rectory of Welwyn, in Hertfordſhire, worth above 500l a-year.

In May 1731, he married Lady Elizabeth Lee, daughter of the Earl of Litchfield, and widow of Colonel Lee, who left a ſon and two daughters. His connection with this lady, aroſe from his father's acquaintance with Mrs. Anne Wharton, who was the daughter and co-heireſs of Sir Henry Lee of Ditchley, in Oxfordſhire, and ſiſter of the Counteſs of Abingdon, celebrated by Dryden in a funeral panegyric, intituled, "Eleanora."

His next publication was The Sea-Piece, in two odes, with a poetical dedication to Voltaire, whom he had ſeen when he was in England, at Eaſtbury, the ſeat of Mr. Dodington, in Dorſetſhire, which Thomſon, in his "Autumn," calls the "Seat of the Muſes,"

Where in the ſecret bower, and winding walk,
For virtuous Young and thee they twine the bay.

He enjoys the credit of an extempore Epigram on the French poet, who ridiculed, in the company of the jealous Engliſh poet, Milton's "Allegory of Sin and Death."

You are ſo witty, profligate, and thin,
At once we think thee Milton, Death, and Sin.

From the following paſſage in the poetical dedication of The Sea-Piece, it ſeems that this extemporaneous reproof was ſomething more gentle than the diſtich now quoted.

No ſtranger, Sir, though born in foreign climes;
In Dorſet downs, when Milton's page
With Sin and Death provok'd thy rage,
Thy rage provok'd, who ſooth'd with gentle rhymes.

In 1734, he publiſhed The Foreign Addreſs, or the beſt Argument for Peace, occaſioned by the Britiſh Fleet, and the Poſture of Affairs, written in the character of a ſailor. It is not to be found in his own edition of his works.

In 1741, he was deprived of his wife. She brought him one child, Frederick, now living, to whom the Prince of Wales was godfather. The Night Thoughts, a ſpecies of poetry altogether his own, were begun immediately after the mournful event of 1741. The firſt Night appears in the books of the Company of Stationers, as the property of Dodſley, in 1742. The preface to Night ſeventh, is dated July 7. 1744.

In the ſhort preface to the Complaint, he tells us, "that the occaſion of the poem was real, not fictitious; and that the facts mentioned did naturally pour theſe reflections on the thought of the writer."

Whatever names belong to theſe facts, or if the names be thoſe generally ſuppoſed; whatever heightening a poet's ſorrow may have given the facts, it is generally underſtood, that he had really felt domeſtic grief; and that diſappointed proſpects afforded him an oſtenſible and ſufficient cauſe of complaint.

The paſſages reſpecting Philander, Narciſſa, Lucia, and Lorenzo, have been applied to his ſon-in-law, his daughter-in-law, his wife, and his ſon. It is probable, that he had his wife and daughter-in-law in view for the characters of Lucia and Narciſſa; but all the circumſtances relating to Philander, do not appear to ſuit his ſon-in-law. He thus deplores his loſs in an apoſtrophe to death.

Inſatiate archer! could not one ſuffice?
Thy ſhaft ſlew thrice, and thrice my peace was ſlain;
And thrice, ere thrice yon moon had fill'd her horn.

It is probable, from the following circumſtances, that, in theſe three contradictory lines, the poet complains more than the father-in-law, the friend, or the widower.

When Young married Lady Elizabeth Lee, ſhe had a ſon and two daughters living by her former huſband. The ſon was an officer; he married, and died ſoon after, leaving no child. The eldeſt daughter was married to Mr. Temple, ſon of Lord Palmerſton. She fell into a declining ſtate of health, and was accompanied by her mother, &c. to the ſouth of France, and died at Lyons, on her way to Nice, in 1736, within a year after her marriage, and only ſeventeen years old. It is more than poetically true, that Young accompanied her to the Continent.

I flew, I ſnatched her from the rigid north,
And bore her nearer to the ſun.

Her funeral was attended with the difficulties painted in ſuch animated colours in Night Third. She was ſecretly buried in the King's Garden at Montpelier. "The ſpot, a little gloomy grove, is known—I ſaw it," ſays Lord Gardenſtone; "it is indeed a doleful ſhade." After her death, the remainder of the party paſſed the enſuing winter at Nice. Mr. Temple married again, and left a ſon by his ſecond wife, a daughter of Sir John Barnard's, who, in 1757, ſucceeded to his grandfather's title. He died in 1740, and the poet's wife ſeven months after, in 1741. How could the inſatiate archer thrice ſlay his peace in theſe three perſons, "ere thrice the moon had fill'd her horn!"

From the great friendſhip which conſtantly ſubſiſted between Mr. Temple and Young, as well as from other circumſtances, Mr. Croft ſeems to be of opinion, that Mr. Temple was the perſon whom he lamented under the name of Philander. It is not, however, very probable, that ſo young a man as Mr. Temple muſt have been, ſhould have been the friend of twenty years, whom the poet mourned. Beſides, Philander died before Mrs. Temple.

Narciſſa follows ere his tomb is cloſ'd, &c.

Perhaps thoſe paſſages reſpecting Philander, which do not appear to ſuit Mr. Temple, may be found applicable to Mrs. Temple's brother, the officer, who died before her; and may, with more probability be reckoned the third victim over whom Young has hitherto been pitied, for having to pour the midnight ſorrows of his religious poetry.

Lady Elizabeth left her youngeſt daughter under the care of Young, with whom ſhe lived till her marriage with Major Haviland, whom ſhe accompanied to Ireland, and lived but a ſhort time after.

Mr. Croft has taken much pains to prove, that the character of Lorenzo, applied to the poet's ſon in the "Biographia," could not be meant for him; nor, indeed, does it ſeem poſſible. Mr. Frederick Young was not born till June 1733. In 1741, this Lorenzo, this finiſhed infidel, this father, to whoſe education vice had, for ſome years, put the laſt hand, was only eight years old. Lorenzo is evidently a feigned character; and the readers of the Night Thoughts are much indebted to Mr. Croft, "for diſcovering that no ſuch character ever yet diſgraced human nature, or broke a father's heart."

This report, ſo open to contradiction, and ſo impoſſible to be true, ſeems to have ariſen from an unhappy miſunderſtanding between Young and his ſon; whoſe boyiſh follies, it is ſaid, "caſt a gloom over the evening of his father's days," and, at laſt, brought "his gray hairs with ſorrow to the grave."

On this accuſation, and on the charge advanced in the "Biographia," of his having been forbidden his college at Oxford for miſbehaviour, Mr. Croft obſerves, "From juvenile follies who is free? But whatever the "Biographia" chooſe to relate, the ſon of Young experienced no diſmiſſion from his college, either laſting or temporary. Yet, were nature to indulge him with a ſecond youth, and to leave him, at the ſame time, the experience of that which is paſt, he would probably ſpend it differently—who would not? He would certainly be the occaſion of leſs uneaſineſs to his father. But, from the ſame experience, he would certainly, in the ſame caſe, be treated differently by his father.

"Young was a poet: poets, with reverence be it ſpoken, do not make the beſt parents. Fancy and imagination ſeldom deign to ſtoop from their heights; always ſtoop unwillingly to the low level of common duties.

"But the ſon of Young would ſooner, I know, paſs for a Lorenzo, than ſee himſelf vindicated at the expence of his father's memory; from follies which, if it may be thought blameable in a boy to have committed them, it is ſurely praiſeworthy in a man to lament, and certainly not only unneceſſary, but cruel in a biographer to record.

"The famous De mortuis nil niſi bonum, always appeared to me to ſavour more of female weakneſs than of manly reaſon. He that has too much feeling to ſpeak ill of the dead (who, if they cannot defend themſelves, are at leaſt ignorant of his abuſe), will not heſitate, by the moſt wanton calumny, to deſtroy the quiet, the reputation, and the fortune of the living. Yet cenſure is not heard beneath the tomb, any more than praiſe. De mortuis nil niſi verum——De vivis nil niſi bonum, would be nearer to the truth."

The elaborate zeal Mr. Croft exhibits in defence of his injured friend, does equal credit to his genius and humanity: but the traits and reſemblances in the picture of Lorenzo, were not ſufficiently ſtrong to render ſo much induſtry and effort neceſſary to prevent our miſtaking it for a family likeneſs.

Of the Night Thoughts, all, except the ſeventh and eighth, are inſcribed to great, or to growing names—Mr. Onſlow, Lord Wilmington, the Duke of Portland, the Earl of Litchfield, Mr. Pelham, and the Duke of Newcaſtle.

The fourth Night was addreſſed, by "a much-indebted muſe," to the Honourable Mr. Yorke, the late Lord Hardwicke, who meant to have laid the muſe under ſtill greater obligations, by the living of Shenfield in Eſſex, if it had become vacant.

The five firſt Nights have been peruſed, perhaps, more eagerly and more frequently than the reſt. Philander and Narciſſa, are often mentioned and often lamented. He ſeems, perhaps, to dwell with more melancholy on the death of Philander and Narciſſa, than of his wife. When he got as far as the ſixth or ſeventh, his original motive for taking up the pen was anſwered; his grief was naturally either diminiſhed or exhauſted. We ſtill find the ſame pious poet; but we hear leſs of Philander and Narciſſa, and leſs of the mourner whom he loved to pity.

By theſe extraordinary poems, written after he was ſixty, it was the deſire of Young to be principally known. He intituled the four volumes which he publiſhed himſelf, The Works of the Author of the Night Thoughts. From theſe he excluded many of his writings; but the rejected pieces contained nothing prejudicial to the cauſe of virtue, or of religion.

In them he would only appear, perhaps, in a leſs reſpectable light as a poet; and though deſpicable as a dedicator, he would not paſs for a worſe Chriſtian, or for a worſe man. This enviable praiſe, which cannot be claimed by every writer, is due to the author of the Night Thoughts.

Notwithſtanding the farewell which he ſeemed to have taken in the Night Thoughts, of ambition, he relapſed into politics. In 1745, he wrote Some Thoughts, occaſioned by the Preſent Juncture, inſcribed to the Duke of Newcaſtle. This political poem might be called a Night Thought. Indeed it was originally printed as the concluſion of the Night Thoughts, though he omitted it in his works.

Prefixed to the ſecond edition of "Rowe's Devout Meditations," is a letter from Young, addreſſed to Archibald Macaulay, Eſq., thanking him for the books; which, he ſays, "he ſhall never lay far out of his reach; for a greater demonſtration of a ſound head, and a ſincere heart, he never ſaw."

In 1753, his tragedy of The Brothers, when it had lain by him above thirty years, was acted at the theatre in Drury-Lane. The plot is taken from the hiſtory of Macedonia, in the reign of the laſt Philip. The two characters of Demetrius and Perſeus, are well drawn, and the conteſt before their father, in the third act, is a fine piece of oratory; but their ſpeeches are, in a great meaſure, tranſlations from Livy. The play itſelf, though the profits were generouſly beſtowed on the Society for the Propagation of the Goſpel, was but coldly received, being undrammatical in its conduct, and imperfect in its cataſtrophe. This latter defect is acknowledged in his own epilogue, which was never uſed; the place of it being ſupplied by one furniſhed by Mallet, at the inſtigation of Garrick. Some indelicate alluſions in it to the author's charity, gave juſt offence. Young was much offended by it; nor would he ſuffer it to be printed at the end of his piece.

The profits of The Brothers, he hoped, would amount to a thouſand pounds. In his calculation he was deceived; but, by the bad ſucceſs of his play, the ſociety was not a loſer. He made up the ſum he originally intended, from his own pocket. While it failed to increaſe his reputation for genius, it added to the character of his humanity.

His next publication was, The Centaur not fabulous, in ſix Letters to a Friend, on the Life in Vogue. In the third letter, is deſcribed the death-bed of the "gay, young, noble, ingenious, accompliſhed, and moſt wretched Altamont." His laſt words were: "My principles have poiſoned my friend, my extravagance has beggared my boy, and my unkindneſs has murdered my wife." The character of Altamont bears no little reſemblance, in the perfection of wickedneſs, to the Lorenzo of the Night Thoughts. Report has been accuſtomed to call Altamont Lord Euſton.

In 1756, Dr. Warton dedicated the firſt volume of his admirable "Eſſay on the Writings and Genius of Pope," to Young; who "appears," ſays Mr. Croft, "in his old age, to have bartered for a dedication an opinion entertained of his friend, through all that part of life, when he muſt have been beſt able to form opinions."

"I know not," ſays an intelligent writer in the "Gentleman's Magazine," Vol. LII. p. 71, "why it ſhould be ſuppoſed, becauſe Dr. Warton dedicated his "Eſſay" to Young, that, therefore, he muſt either have changed his opinion of Pope, or have bartered his opinion for a dedication. He was neither greedy of praiſe, nor was he reduced to the neceſſity of bartering any thing to procure it. The compliment paid him, I have no doubt, was a voluntary compliment."

In 1758, he again became a dedicator, and publiſhed A Sermon, preached before their Majeſties at Kenſington, addreſſed to the King. If he compoſed many ſermons, he did not oblige the public with many.

The following letter, from Secker to Young, dated July 8. 1758., given by Mr. Croft, ſerves to ſhow at what a late period of life the author of the Night Thoughts ſolicited preferment.

"I have long wondered, that more ſuitable notice of your great merit hath not been taken by perſons in power. But how to remedy the omiſſion, I ſee not. No encouragement hath ever been given me to mention things of this nature to his Majeſty; and, therefore, in all likelihood, the only conſequence of doing it, would be weakening the little influence, which elſe I may poſſibly have on ſome other occaſions. Your fortune and your reputation, ſet you above the need of advancement; and your ſentiments above that concern for it, on your own account, which, on that of the public, is ſincerely felt by your, &c."

The neglect of Young is, by ſome, aſcribed to his having attached himſelf to the Prince of Wales, and to his having preached an offenſive ſermon at St. James's. It is ſaid, however, that he had two hundred a-year in the late reign, by the patronage of Walpole; and that whenever any one reminded the King of Young, his only anſwer was, "he has a penſion."

One obſtacle muſt have ſtood not a little in the way of that preferment, after which his whole life ſeems to have panted. Though he took orders, he never entirely ſhook off politics. By this conduct, if he gained ſome friends, he made many enemies. Beſides, in the latter part of his life, he was fond of holding himſelf out for a man retired from the world. He who retires from the world, will find himſelf in reality deſerted as faſt, if not faſter, by the world. Young ſeems to have been taken at his word. Notwithſtanding his frequent complaints of being neglected, no hand was reached out to pull him from that retirement, of which he declared himſelf enamoured.

In 1759, he employed his pious pen for almoſt the laſt time, in doing juſtice to the death-bed of Addiſon, in a Letter, on Original Compoſition, addreſſed to Richardſon, the author of "Clariſſa." His chief inducement to write it, was, as he confeſſes, that he might "erect a monumental marble to the memory of an old friend." In this lively letter, Pope is ſeverely cenſured for his "fall from Homer's numbers, free as air, lofty and harmonious as the ſpheres, into childiſh ſhackles and tinkling ſounds; for putting Achilles into petticoats a ſecond time." But we are told, that our Engliſh Homer talked over an epic plan with Young a few weeks before his death. In the poſtſcript, he writes to Richardſon, that he will ſee, in his next, how far Addiſon is an original. But no other letter appears.

In 1761, his friend Lord Melcombe, not long before his death, ſent him an "Ode," which he called "The Muſe's Lateſt Spark," accompanied by a letter; in which he ſays, "if you are willing that our friendſhip ſhould be known when we are gone, you will be pleaſed to leave this among thoſe of your papers that may poſſibly ſee the light by a poſthumous publication."

At the acceſſion of his preſent Majeſty, his name was ſtruck out from the liſt of Court-Chaplains; but he was almoſt immediately after, upon the death of Dr. Hales, appointed Clerk of the Cloſet to the Princeſs-Dowager of Wales.

In 1762, he publiſhed Reſignation, in two parts, and A Poſtſcript to Mrs. B———, 4to. It was written at the requeſt of Mrs. Montague, the famous champion of Shakſpeare, and is addreſſed to the Hon. Mrs. Boſcawen, the Admiral's widow, to teach her reſignation under the affliction cauſed by the death of her huſband. Notwithſtanding he adminiſtered conſolation to his own grief in blank verſe—"verſe unfallen, uncurſt; verſe reclaimed, re-inthroned in the true language of the gods;" he comforted Mrs. Boſcawen in rhyme.

While the poet and the Chriſtian were applying this comfort, Young had himſelf occaſion for comfort, in conſequence of the ſudden death of Richardſon, who was engaged in printing the firſt edition of the poem. He laments him as a friend, and has given ſome ſketches of his genius.

To touch our paſſions' ſecret ſprings,
Was his peculiar care;
And deep his happy genius div'd
In boſoms of the fair.
Nature, which favours to the few,
All art beyond imparts,
To him preſented, at his birth,
The key of human hearts.

To Reſignation was prefixed an apology for its appearance; to which more credit is due, than to the generality of ſuch apologies, from Young's unuſual anxiety, that no more productions of his old age ſhould diſgrace his former fame.

"This was not intended for the public: there were many and ſtrong reaſons againſt it, and are ſo ſtill; but ſome extracts of it, from the few copies which were given away (a few copies were printed, and given to the author's friends), being got into the printed papers; it was thought neceſſary to publiſh ſomething, leſt a copy ſtill more imperfect than this ſhould fall into the preſs: and, it is hoped, that this unwelcome occaſion of publication may be ſome excuſe for it."

It muſt be owned, that the reaſons were ſufficient for reprinting the poem; but then it may be aſked, why did he ever ſuffer ſo imperfect a performance to paſs through the preſs? He ſhould have conſidered that true obſervation of Horace:

Semel emiſſum, volat irrevocabile verbum.

With great propriety, too, he might have anſwered the importunity of his friends, in the language of the ſame poet, who had not then ſeen many more than half the years of Young:

Spectatum ſatis, et donatum jam rude, quæris
Mæcenas iterum antiquo me includere ludo?
Non eadem eſt ætas, non mens——

The Reſignation was the laſt publication which Young gave to the world. From this time, the infirmities of age rendered him incapable of performing any duty; and he ſuffered himſelf to be in pupilage to his houſekeeper Mrs. Hallows, whoſe aſcendency in his family is ridiculed with more ill-nature than wit, in a novel publiſhed by Kidgell, in 1755, called "The Card," under the name of Mrs. Fuſby. Young is characteriſed under the name of Dr. Elwes.

Of Mrs. Hallows, the writer in the "Gentleman's Magazine," above quoted, tells us, that ſhe was the daughter of a Rector of All-Hallows, Hertford; and that, upon the marriage of Miſs Caroline Lee, ſhe was invited by Young, who knew her family, to his houſe; that ſhe had ſome fortune of her own, perhaps very ſmall, as her father left many children; that ſhe was advanced in years, and was a woman of piety, improved by reading; and that ſhe was always treated by him and by his gueſts, even thoſe of the higheſt rank, with the politeneſs and reſpect due to a gentlewoman.

"Of the domeſtic manners, and petty habits of the author of the Night Thoughts," Mr. Croſt writes Dr. Johnſon, September 1780.: "I hoped to have given you an account from the beſt authority; but who ſhall dare to ſay, to-morrow I will be wiſe or virtuous; or, to-morrow I will do a particular thing? Upon inquiring for his houſekeeper, I learned that ſhe was buried two days before I reached the town of her abode."

It appears from the epiſtolary correſpondence of Mr. Jones, his curate, and executor, printed in the Gentleman's Magazine, Vol. liii. p. 283. that the laſt years of his life were embittered by the unhappy economy of his family. The letters are well authenticated, and not incurious. If they diſcover the foibles of a great man, they illuſtrate a part of his perſonal hiſtory; and Mr. Croſt has well remarked that we ought to ſay De mortuis nil niſi verum—De vivis nil niſi bonum.

"The old gentleman here," ſays Mr. Jones, in a letter to his friend in London, dated Welwyn, July 25. 1762., "ſeems to me to be in a pretty odd way of late, moping, dejected, ſelf-willed, and as if ſurrounded with ſome perplexing circumſtances. There is much myſtery in almoſt all his temporal affairs, as well as in many other of his ſpeculative opinions. There is thought to be an irremoveable obſtruction to his happineſs within his walls, as well as another without them; but the former is the more powerful, and likely to continue ſo. He has this day been trying anew to engage me to ſtay with him. No lucrative views can tempt me to ſacrifice my liberty or my health to ſuch meaſures as are propoſed here."

"You remember," he writes his friend, St. Neots, Hunts, Auguſt 28. 1762., "what I ſuggeſted to you about my reſolution of leaving Welwyn, of which I had given very early notice to the worthy Doctor, that he might have ſufficient time to provide. After repeated trials, and repeated diſappointments, though ſeven or eight offered, he thought proper to apply to me anew; and though lucrative motives could not, earneſt importunities did prevail with me at laſt to cheer up his dejected heart, by promiſing to continue with him for ſome time longer at leaſt. By the way, I privately intimated to you, the Doctor is, in various reſpects, a very unhappy man. Few know ſo much of him as I do in theſe reſpects, and have often obſerved with concern. If he would be adviſed by ſome who wiſh him well, he might be happy, though his ſtate of health is lately much altered for the worſe."

"The miſmanagement too well known," he writes his friend, Welwyn, January 1. 1763., "unhappily continues, and, ſtill more unhappily, ſeems to be increaſing, to the grief of friends, and, I need not ſay, to the ridicule of others, who are not a few. Penuriouſneſs and obſtinacy are two bad things; and a diſregard to the general judgment and friendly wiſhes of the wiſer part of mankind, another. There ſeems to be no hope, ſo long as the aſcendency is ſo great."

"My ancient gentleman here," he writes his friend, Welwyn, September 4. 1764., "is ſtill full of troubles, which moves my concern, though it moves only the ſecret laughter of many, and ſome untoward ſurmiſes in diſfavour of him and his houſehold. The loſs of a very large ſum of money, 200 l., is talked of, whereof this vill and neighbourhood are full. Some diſbelieve, others ſay it is no wonder, where about eighteen, or more ſervants, are ſometimes taken and diſmiſſed in the courſe of a year. The gentleman himſelf, is allowed by all to be far more harmleſs and eaſy in his family than ſome one elſe, who hath too much the lead in it."

Of his laſt illneſs, the following account is given by Mr. Jones, in a letter to his friend, dated Welwyn, April 2. 1765.: "As ſoon as I got home, I inquired after Dr. Young, and found that he had gone through very great pains ſince I left him; and the pains return pretty frequently. Dr. Cotton of St. Albans, and Dr. Yates of Hertford, meet at his houſe every day, on conſultation. I find that opiates are frequently adminiſtered to him, I ſuppoſe to render him leſs ſenſible of his pain. His intellects, I am told, are ſtill clear; though what effect the frequent uſe of opiates may by degrees have upon him, I know not. I am pretty much of his ſon's ſentiments as to this, viz. that thoſe ingredients, if for ſome time longer continued, may have an ill effect upon the brain. Having mentioned this young gentleman, I would acquaint you next, that he came hither this morning, having been ſent for, as I am told, by the direction of Mrs. Hallows. Indeed, ſhe intimated to me as much herſelf. And, if this be ſo, I muſt ſay it is one of the moſt prudent acts ſhe ever did, or could have done, in ſuch a caſe as this, as it may prove a means of preventing much confuſion. I have had some little discourse with the son. He seems much affected, and, I believe, really is so. He earnestly wishes his father may be pleased to ask after him. For, you must know, he has not yet done this, nor is, in my opinion, likely to do it. And it has been said farther, upon a very late application made to him on the behalf of his son, he desired that no more might be said to him about it. Mrs. H. has fitted up a suitable apartment in the house for Mr. Young, where, I suppose, he will continue till some farther event. I heartily wish the ancient man's heart may grow tender towards his son; though, knowing him so well, I can scarce hope to hear such desirable news. He took to his bed yesterday, about eleven in the forenoon, and has not been up since. I called soon after my coming home, but did not see him: he was then in a dose."

Of his death, which happened April 5. 1765., in the eighty-fourth year of his age, the following account is given by Mr. Jones, in a letter to his friend, dated Welwyn, April 13. 1765.: "I have now the pleasure to acquaint you, that the late Dr. Young, though he had for many years kept his son at a distance, yet has now, at last, left him all his possessions, after the payment of certain legacies. So that the young gentleman, who bears a fair character, and behaves well, as far as I can hear or see, will, I hope, soon enjoy, and make a prudent use of a very handsome fortune. The father, on his death-bed, and since my return from London, was applied to, in the tenderest manner, by one of his physicians, and by another person, to admit the son into his presence, to make submission, entreat forgiveness, and obtain his blessing. As to an interview with his son, he intimated, he chose to decline it, as his spirits were then low, and his nerves weak: with regard to the next particular, he said, "I heartily forgive him;" and, upon mention of the last, he gently lifted up his hand, and gently letting it fall, pronounced these words—"God bless him!" After about a fortnight's illness, and bearing excessive pains, he expired a little before eleven of the clock, in the night of Good Friday last, the 5th instant, and was decently buried yesterday, about six in the afternoon, in the chancel of this church, close by the remains of his lady, under the communion-table. The clergy, who are the trustees for his charity-school, and one or two more, attending the funeral, the last office at interment being performed by me.

"I know it will give you pleasure to be farther informed, that he was pleased to make respectful mention of me in his will, expressing his satisfaction in my care of his parish, bequeathing to me a handsome legacy, and appointing me one of his executors, next after his sister's son [Mr. Harris], a clergyman of Hampshire, who this morning set out for London, in order to prove the will in Doctor's Commons. So that, much according to my wishes, I shall have little or nothing to do, in respect of executorship."

In his will, dated February 1760., he desires of his executors, in a particular manner, that all his manuscript-books, and writings whatever, might be burned, except his book of accounts. In a codicil, dated September 1764., he made it his dying entreaty to his housekeeper, to whom he left 1000*l*., "that all his manuscripts might be destroyed as soon as he was dead, which would greatly oblige her deceased friend." The legacy was not more than might be due to one whom he had never degraded by paying her wages. She did not, however, strictly comply with his last injunctions, in destroying his manuscripts. He left also a legacy to his "friend Henry Stephens, a hatter at the Temple-Gate," who went before him.

The same humility which had marked a hatter and a housekeeper for his friends, had before bestowed the same title on his footman, in an Epitaph in Welwyn Church-yard, upon James Barker, dated 1749.

The author of that Epitaph is not without a stone to mark the place of his dust. Though he inscribed no monument to the memory of his lamented wife, yet the piety of his son has erected a monument, in Welwyn church, to the memory of his parents, with the following inscription; which "contains," says Mr. Croft, "none of that praise, which no marble can make the bad or the foolish merit; which, without the direction of a stone or a turf, will find its way, sooner or later, to the deserving:"

In the edition of Young's works, publiſhed during his life, in 4 vols, 12mo, ſeveral pieces, which he judged to be of a temporary nature, or of inferior merit, were omitted. After his death, a fifth volume was publiſhed, with the deſign of completing his works. But ſeveral pieces, and ſome of conſiderable length, were omitted. Theſe were collected in an additional volume, making the ſixth, in 1778. The contents are—Epiſtle to Lord Lanſdowne, 1712; Imperium Pelagi, a Naval Lyric, 1730; The Foreign Addreſs, 1734; Reflections on the Public Situation of the Kingdom, 1745; Miſcellanies [in verſe]. viz. on Michael Angelo's famous piece of the Crucifixion; To Mr. Addiſon, on the Tragedy of Cato; A Letter to Mr. Tickell, on the Death of Mr. Addiſon, 1719; Epitaph on Lord Aubrey Beauclerc, killed at Carthagena, 1740; Miſcellanies in Proſe, viz. Epitaph on Mr. James Barker, 1749; Oratio de Bibliotheca Codringtoniana, habita in Sacello Coll. Omn. Amn. 1716; A Diſcourſe on Lyric Poetry; A Sermon preached before the King at Kenſington, June 1758; Preface to "Mrs. Rowe's Friendſhip on Death;" Dedications to the Laſt Day, to Vanquiſhed Love, to the Paraphraſe on Job, to Buſiris, and the Revenge. The Merchant, an Ode on the Britiſh Trade and Navigation, is mentioned alſo in the contents as a ſeparate poem, though it ſeems only a ſecond title to the Lyric, or, perhaps, only a part of it; and that more was intended, ſeems probable from its being ſtyled Ode the Firſt. The Epitaph on Lord Aubrey Beauclerc, is improperly dated 1740. Lord Aubrey was killed at Carthagena, March 24. 1740-1. The epitaph, therefore, could not be written, at ſooneſt, till the year after. The ſecond line of the ſecond couplet is, on the monument, expreſſed thus—O'er dauntleſs loyal, &c. The volume concludes with "ſome thoughts on reading Mr. Young's Laſt Day," in a letter to Mrs. Rowe, by Dr. Bowden, a worthy phyſician and ingenious poet of Frome, the friend of Mrs. Rowe, Lord Orrery, &c.

His Poetical Works have been frequently reprinted in 4 vols 12mo, and in 3 vols 8vo, 1792. Of the Night Thoughts, the editions are too numerous to be ſpecified. The edition in 8vo 1794, is ornamented with engravings, and illuſtrated with notes by Mr. de Coetlogon. A French tranſlation of the Night Thoughts, by M. le Tourneur, was publiſhed in 2 vols 8vo, 1769. "Obſervations on the Night Thoughts," by Mr. Pratt, appeared in 8vo, 1776.

Of the private habits, and domeſtic manners of Young, whoſe great genius, abilities, and piety, placed him in the foremoſt rank of literature for almoſt half a century, curioſity will require more ample information than is to be found in the few ſcattered notices which the diligence of his biographers has collected, or the zeal and veneration of his friends have ſupplied.

Singularity is ſaid to have predominated in his moſt juvenile practices. The late Dr. Ridley remembered a report current at Oxford, that, when he was compoſing, he would ſhut up his windows, and ſit by a lamp, even at mid-day; and that ſkulls, bones, and inſtruments of death, were among the ornaments of his ſtudy. Thus encouraging the habitual gloom that hung over his imagination, it ſoon became peopled with the phantoms of diſcontent. He indulged an early luxury in deſcribing the miſeries of a world, that did not immediately forward his deſigns and gratify his expectations. It has been ſaid, that if he had been a biſhop, he would never have written the Night Thoughts. But he was far advanced in the pathethic ſtrains of complaint, at a time when hope is warm in the boſom of other men; and had he attained the mitre, a diſappointment in the primacy might have produced the ſame effects on a mind which ſeems to have been endued with much ſenſibility, and to have been depreſſed with temporary obſtructions of his proſpects, which every man ſtruggling through life naturally expects to meet with; and, if he cannot ſurmount them, does not think himſelf juſtified in retiring to the cloiſter, or the hermitage. It cannot be ſuppoſed, that his diſpoſition brightened up when he had ſuffered from real diſappointments, and the weight of years ſat heavier upon him. His diſcourſe, even to the laſt, it is ſaid, was rather expreſſive of a reſtleſs than a ſettled mind. In the character of Young, much of that melancholy caſt of mind may be obſerved which is ever attendant upon genius, but at the ſame time ſo tempered by the ſober tints of ſcience and philoſophy, that it ſeldom breaks in upon the province of judgment and right ratiocination. The melancholy of Young was so repressed by the chastening hand of reason and education, as never to infringe upon the duties of life. The spirit, the energy of his soul, his rational and sublime piety, powerfully with-held the accession of a state of mind so inimical to the rights of society.

It is generally known that Young, after his first sleep, spent the greatest part of the night in meditation, and in the composition of his works; and that he had only to transcribe them when he rose, which was at an early hour. Every night he read prayers to his family, and every morning when there was no public service.

While his health permitted him to walk abroad, he preferred a solitary ramble in his churchyard, to exercise with a companion on a more cheerful spot. He was moderate in his meals, and rarely drank wine, except when he was ill; being (as he said) unwilling to waste the succours of sickness on the stability of health.

After a slight refreshment, he retired to bed at eight in the evening, although he might have guests in his house, who wished to prolong his stay among them to a later hour. He lived at a moderate expence, rather inclining to parsimony than profusion, and yet continued anxious for increase of preferment, after it could have added nothing to his enjoyments; for he expended annually little more than half of his income.

"He appeared," says the writer in the "Gentleman's Magazine," above quoted, Vol. LII, p. 72. "neither as a man of sorrow," nor yet as "a fellow of infinite jest." The dignity of a great and a good man appeared in all his actions and in all his words. He conversed on religious subjects with the cheerfulness of virtue. His piety was undebased by gloom or enthusiasm; he was regular in the performance of all its duties, both in public and in private. I have been told that, before his time, divine service was performed only on Sunday morning, but he likewise read prayers in the afternoon, and on Wednesdays, Fridays, and all holidays."

"In his domestic character, he was as amiable as he was venerable in the Christian. His politeness was such as I never saw equalled; it was invariable; to his superiors in rank, to his equals, and to his inferiors, it differed only in the degrees of elegance. I never heard him speak with roughness to his meanest servant; yet he well knew how to keep up his dignity, and, with all the majesty of superior worth, to repress the bold and the forward. In conversation upon lively subjects, he had a brilliancy of wit which was peculiar to himself. I know not how to describe it, but by saying, that it was both heightened and softened by the great and the amiable qualities of his soul. I have seen him ill, and in pain, yet the serenity of his mind remained unruffled: I never heard a peevish expression fall from his lips; nor was he, at such times, less kindly and politely attentive to those around him, than when in the company of strangers, who came only to visit him for the first time."

"Dr. Young," says Dr. Warton, who knew him well, "was one of the most amiable and benevolent of men; most exemplary in his life, and sincere in his religion: nobody ever said more brilliant things in conversation. The late Lord Melcombe informed me, that when he and Voltaire were on a visit to his Lordship at Eastbury, the English poet was far superior to the French, in the variety and novelty of his bon-mots and repartees: and Lord Melcombe was himself a good judge of wit and humour, of which he had a large portion."

Tscharner, a noble foreigner, in a letter to Count Haller, says, he has lately spent four days with Young at Welwyn, where he tastes all the ease and pleasure man can desire. "Every thing about him shows the man; each individual being placed by rule. All is neat without art. He is very pleasant in conversation, and extremely polite."

"That domestic grief," says Mr. Croft, "is, in the first instance, to be thanked for these ornaments to our language [The Night Thoughts], it is impossible to deny. Nor would it be common hardiness to contend, that worldly discontent had no hand in these joint productions of poetry and piety. Yet I am by no means sure that, at any rate, we should not have had something of the same colour from Young's pencil, notwithstanding the liveliness of his satires. In so long a life, causes for discontent, and occasions for grief, must have occurred. It is not clear to me that his muse was not sitting upon the watch for the first which happened. Night Thoughts were not uncommon to her, even when first she visited the poet; and, at a time when he himself was remarkable, neither for gravity nor gloominess. In his Last Day, almost his earliest poem, he calls her the melancholy maid;

——————— whom dismal scenes delight
Frequent at tombs, and in the realms of night.

" When Young was writing a tragedy, Grafton is said by Spence to have sent him a human skull with a candle in it as a lamp; and the poet is reported to have used it.

" Still, is it altogether fair to dress up the poet for the man, and to bring the gloominess of the Night Thoughts to prove the gloominess of Young; and, to show that his genius, like the genius of Swift, was, in some measure, the sullen inspiration of discontent?

" From them who answer in the affirmative, it should not be concealed, that, though Invisibilia non decipiunt appeared upon a deception in Young's grounds, and ambulantes in horto audierunt vocem Dei, in a building in his garden, his parish was indebted to the good humour of the author of the Night Thoughts, for an assembly and a bowling-green.

" Of Young, an anecdote which wanders among readers, it is not true, that he was Fielding's Parson Adams. The original of that famous painting was William Young, who was a clergyman, [author of the Latin and English Dictionary.] Yet, the facility with which this report has gained belief in the world, argues, were it not sufficiently known, that the author of the Night Thoughts, bore some resemblance to Adams. It is known, that, during some part of his life, Young was abroad; and, that he once wandered into the camp, with a classic in his hand, which he was reading intensely, and had some difficulty to prove that he was only an absent poet, and not a spy.

" The attention which Young bestowed upon the perusal of books, is not unworthy imitation. When any passage pleased him, he appears to have folded down the leaf. On those passages he bestowed a second reading. But the labours of man are too frequently vain. Before he returned to much of what he once approved, he died. Many of his books which I have seen, are, by those notes of approbation, so swelled beyond their real bulk, that they would hardly shut."

His extemporaneous wit and colloquial talents, have been much extolled; but, from the few specimens of his unpremeditated acuteness, and successful pleasantry which are preserved, it would seem, that his powers of delighting were, in great measure, confined to his pen. The following anecdotes are distinguished by their novelty and importance.

Young, walking in his garden at Welwyn, in company with two ladies (one of whom was Lady Elisabeth Lee), a servant came to tell him a gentleman wished to speak with him, " Tell him," says Young, " I am too happily engaged to change my situation." The ladies insisted upon it that he should go, as his visitor was a man of rank, his patron, his friend; and, as persuasion had no effect, one took him by the right arm, and the other by the left, and led him to the garden-gate, when, finding resistance was vain, he bowed, laid his hand upon his heart, and in that expressive manner for which he was so remarkable, spoke the following lines:

Thus Adam look'd, when from the garden driven,
And thus disputed orders sent from heaven:
Like him I go, and yet to go am loth;
Like him I go, for angels drove us both.
Hard was his fate, but mine still more unkind,
His Eve went with him, but mine stays behind.

Young, in the early part of his life, was fond of music, and touched the German flute with much taste. Being once on the Thames with some ladies, he played them several tunes, and then put the flute in his pocket. Some officers rowing by just as he ceased playing, one of them rudely asked why he left off, " For the same reason that I began;" replied Young, " to please myself." One of them immediately told him, that if he did not continue playing, he would directly throw him into the river. His female friends began to be much alarmed; and Young, on their account, played till they reached Vauxhall, where both parties spent the evening. Young had marked his man, and took an opportunity, in one of the dark walks, to tell the officer, that he expected him to meet him at such a place in the morning, to give him a gentleman's satisfaction; and, that he chose swords for the weapons. The officer was surprised on their meeting, to see Young advance towards him with a large horse pistol, with which he told him he would instantly shoot him through the head if he did not dance a minuet.

After ſome difficulties, he complied; the officer felt how impertinent he had been, and acknowledged the juſtice of the treatment he had met with.

One Sunday, preaching in office at St. James's, he found, that though he ſtrove to make his audience attentive, he could not prevail; upon which his pity for their folly got the better of all decorum, and he ſat back in the pulpit, and burſt into a flood of tears.

The writings of Young may be diſtinctly conſidered, as compriſing eſſays, plays, and poems. As an eſſayiſt, his Centaur not Fabulous and his Conjectures on Original Compoſition, are his moſt conſiderable productions. Of the one, it muſt be confeſſed, that though its general tendency is favourable to religion and morality, the pictures it exhibits of the life in vogue, are often overcharged, and the diction, though ſometimes animated and energetic, is commonly inflated and affected, or harſh and ſevere. Of the other, though the ſtyle is vitiated by affectation, and the expreſſion is ſometimes hyperbolical, the ſentiments are frequently bold, original, penetrating, brilliant, and ſublime. Though he deſpair "of breaking through the frozen ocean of age and care's incumbent cloud, into that flow of thought and brightneſs of expreſſion, which ſubjects ſo polite require;" yet it ſhows no marks of exhauſted genius. It is more like the production of untamed, unbridled youth, than of jaded fourſcore.

As a dramatiſt, he has not been ſucceſsful in imitating the beauties of art, with the energies of natural fire and ſpirit. He is, without doubt, ſuperior to his contemporaries, Rowe and Congreve, in ſtrength and warmth of conception; but he is inferior to them in elegance and neatneſs of diction, beauty of cadence, correctneſs, chaſtity, and regularity. None of his dramas, except The Revenge, are in poſſeſſion of the ſtage. Though they are animated, brilliant, and claſſical; though they paint, in glowing language, the fury of rage and revenge, and the agonies of jealouſy, love, and deſpair; yet, it muſt be confeſſed, their beauties are diſgraced by puerile rant and conceit, and, occaſionally, by fuſtian and bombaſt. In Carey's "Chrononhotonthologos," his dramatical eccentricities are pourtrayed in caricature, particularly the violent ſpeech on the blow, which furniſhed a plot to The Revenge. Bombardinian, the general, on receiving a box on the ear from his royal maſter, breaks out into the moſt furious hyperbole; calls on the ſun and moon to put themſelves into eclipſe; bids hills, dales, ſeas, and cities, run together, and into chaos pulverize the world, becauſe Bombardinian hath received a blow.

As a poet, his compoſitions diſcover more fancy than judgment, more originality and invention, than correctneſs of taſte and variety and extent of knowledge. He poſſeſſed, as Addiſon ſays of Lee, true poetic fire, though clouded and obſcured by thick volumes of ſmoke. But he has merit of the higheſt kind. He is an original, though an unequal writer. It would be difficult to point out a ſingle line or expreſſion that he has borrowed from any other Engliſh writer. His defects and beauties are alike his own. Of the epigrammatic tenor of his Satires, there is no example; nor was he indebted to any poet, ancient or modern, for the plan of his Night Thoughts. The lyric muſe has always been peculiarly unfavourable to him. He has ſome of the greateſt beauties, and ſome of the greateſt abſurdities which Engliſh poetry affords. The general character of his verſification is that of harſhneſs and ruggedneſs, though many paſſages may be produced as exceptions.

Of his earlier poetical productions, his Laſt Day, Vanquiſhed Love, and Paraphraſe on Job, have deſervedly obtained the greateſt popularity. They have all their brighter paſſages. In the Laſt Day, and the Paraphraſe in particular, there are ſome admirable lines. But they are in general ſtiff, unpleaſing, and incorrect. Inſtead of endeavouring to ſupport the glow of imagery, he ſeems rather ſedulous to gather the ornaments of wit; and thus, while he aims at the fancy, he miſſes the heart.

His Univerſal Paſſion was publiſhed before Pope's Satirical Epiſtles made their appearance; and has therefore the merit of giving the lead to that kind of writing. It contains much juſt ſatire, good verſe, and laughable humour. The country 'ſquire, who welcomes his friend with a thump upon the back; the coffee-houſe beau, who values himſelf upon the learning of his heels; and the lady on horſeback, who whiſtles ſweet her diuretic ſtrains, are juſtly conceived, and happily expreſſed. But its character is debility—it wants point and terſeneſs. The ſatiriſt, as Swift has juſtly ſaid, ſhould have either been more angry or more merry. He has the fault of Seneca, of Ovid, of Cowley; a profuſion and an unſeaſonable application of wit. A lover of originality, he did not regard models. Had he endeavoured to imitate Juvenal and Perſius, he would have avoided this fault.

Thofe great maſters were too much engroſſed by the importance of their ſubjects, to fall into the puerility of witticiſm. There is ſomething in the verſification, which a good ear does not approve.

For his Night Thoughts, that ſpecies of compoſition which he may be ſaid to have created, that maſs of the grandeſt and richeſt poetry which human genius has ever produced, the applauſe which he has received is unbounded. "The unhappy bard, whoſe griefs in melting numbers flow, and melancholy joys diffuſe around," has been ſung by the profane, as well as the pious. It is to this work, begun when

He long had buried what gives life to live,
Firmneſs of nerve, and energy of thought,

that he deſerves, and will continue to deſerve his reputation. He appears to have been conſcious of its merit, when he called his collected compoſitions The Works of the Author of the Night Thoughts. It may not improperly be conſidered as a good poetical contraſt to Thomſon's "Seaſons." One delighted as much to exhibit the gloomy, as the other the cheerful face of things. In the article of ſublimity, it may vie with "Paradiſe Loſt itſelf," though in every other reſpect it would be abſurd to attempt a compariſon between them. The beauties of the Night Thoughts are numerous, and its blemiſhes are not few. Among its diſtinguiſhing excellencies, are the ſpirit of ſublime piety and ſtrict morality, which breathes through the whole; dignity of thought and language, bold and lively deſcriptions, proper and well ſupported ſimiles, and ſtriking repetitions, or breaks in the expreſſion. Among its principal faults, are the unneceſſary repetition of the ſame ideas and images, redundancy of metaphor, bombaſt, and extravagant ideas and expreſſions; crowded and ill-choſen epithets, alluſions drawn out beyond their proper bounds; a puerile play on words, the uſe of groſs and inelegant images or terms, and negligence in the harmony of verſification. Its principal excellence, the preſent writer apprehends to be—elevation and dignity of thought and expreſſion; its capital defect—elevation and dignity purſued into extravagance or bombaſt. It abounds in unnatural flights of fancy, is often obſcure, and ſometimes unintelligible; and the poet, occaſionally, perplexes both himſelf and the reader, in a playſome purſuit of trifling figures, allegories, and alluſions, not always apt. Yet, with all its faults, it irreſiſtibly ſeizes the mind of the reader, arreſts his attention, and powerfully intereſts him in the midnight ſorrows of the plaintive bard; it has a merit which no production, but thoſe of real genius, ever poſſeſſes; with ſcarce any facts or incidents to awaken curioſity, it ſpeaks to the heart through the medium of the imagination; it inſtructs, but does not fatigue us; it amuſes, but never is languid.

The pathetic and ſublime paſſages in the Night Thoughts, are familiar to the general readers of poetry. Amidſt the profuſion of beauties which may be produced, his deſcription of Death from his ſecret ſtand, noting down the follies of a Bacchanalian ſociety, the epitaph upon the departed world; the iſſuing of Satan from his dungeon on the day of judgment, are diſtinguiſhed by great ſtrength and boldneſs of invention, and riſe, in many parts, to the terrible and ſublime. The ſimile of the traveller, with which The Conſolation opens, is highly pleaſing, ſtriking, and beautiful. His view of the nature and faculties of an immortal ſoul, of different natures, marvelloufly mixed, clogged by the finite and periſhable materials of its houſe of clay, is profound, ſtriking, comprehenſive, and, what in him is rare, cloſely comprehenſive. His arguments in favour of infinite duration in a future ſtate, though not logically concluſive, are beautifully poetic.

O ye bleſt ſcenes of permanent delight,——
Could ye ſo rich in rapture fear an end;
That ghaſtly thought would drink up all your joy,
And quite unparadiſe the realms of light.

Who does not regret, that ſuch a powerful though gloomy advocate for religion and morality, ſhould degrade himſelf by proſtituting his poetry to the ſervile purpoſes of adulation; or that his addiction to licentious flattery ſhould have induced him to dreſs up his patron in the attributes of a Being, whoſe greatneſs and whoſe goodneſs admit of no approximation!

Wits ſpare not heaven, O Wilmington! nor thee.

His Reſignation was repreſented on its firſt appearance, as a ſtriking inſtance of the feneſcence of genius. It has never obtained much popularity; though the ſentiments are ſtrongly characteriſtic of their author, and many of them are beautiful and new. The ſtyle alſo is like that of the author of the Night Thoughts, but the reſemblance is rather in its blemiſhes than its beauties. Here is the ſame fondneſs for antitheſes, the ſame hunting down of figures, and lowneſs of metaphors, that are to be found in his other poems, but little of their ſtrength or harmony remains. His exchanging the ſolemn plaintive ſpecies of verſe, peculiar to himſelf, for the eaſy meaſure of lyric poetry, was an unfortunate determination. Of his ſmaller poems, the Epiſtles to Pope, and the Epitaph on Lord Aubry Beauclerc, are entitled to particular commendation. Of thoſe puerile trifles, his Odes, Sea-Piece, &c. in which words over-power ideas, and loyalty triumphs at the expence of imagination, the preſent writer is no admirer.

Yet, excepting his licentious flattery, which appears in the body of his works, as well as in his fulſome dedications, a few of his tragical rants, his poetical flights into the obſcure, and the imbecilities of his age, which his friends ought to have ſuppreſſed, Young is entitled to the rare but important praiſe of not having left a line, which, for moral or religious reaſons, on his death-bed, he could wiſh to have eraſed.

"If the friendſhip, with which Dr. Young honoured me," ſays Dr. Warton, "does not miſlead me, I think I may affirm, that many high ſtrokes of character in his Zanga, many ſentiments and images in his Night Thoughts, and many ſtrong and forcible deſcriptions in his Paraphraſe on Job, mark him for a ſublime and original genius. Though, at the ſame time, I am ready to confeſs, that he is not a correct and equal writer, and was too often turgid and hyperbolical."

"Among moral and didactic poets, Dr. Young is of too great eminence," ſays Dr. Blair, "to be paſſed over without notice. In all his works, the marks of ſtrong genius appear. His Univerſal Paſſion poſſeſſes the full merit of that animated conciſeneſs of ſtyle, and lively deſcription of characters, which I mentioned, as particularly requiſite in ſatirical and didactic compoſitions. Though his wit may often be thought too ſparkling, and his ſentences too pointed, yet the vivacity of his fancy is ſo great as to entertain every reader. In his Night Thoughts, there is much energy of expreſſion; in the three firſt there are ſeveral pathetic paſſages, and ſcattered through them, all happy images and alluſions, as well as pious reflections occur; but the ſentiments are frequently over-ſtrained and turgid, and the ſtyle is too harſh and obſcure to be pleaſing."

"There is in the Night Thoughts," ſays Mr. Boſwell, "a power of the pathetic beyond almoſt any example that I have ſeen. He who does not feel his nerves ſhaken, and his heart moved by many paſſages in this extraordinary work, particularly by that moſt affecting one, which deſcribes the gradual torment ſuffered by the contemplation of an object of affectionate attachment, viſibly and certainly decaying into diſſolution, muſt be of a hard and obſtinate frame.

"To all the other excellencies of the Night Thoughts, let me add the great and peculiar one, that they contain not only the nobleſt ſentiments of virtue and the immortality of the ſoul; but the Chriſtian ſacrifice, the divine propitiation, with all its intereſting circumſtances and conſolations to "a wounded ſpirit," ſolemnly and poetically diſplayed in ſuch imagery and language, as cannot fail to exalt, animate, and ſooth the truly pious. No book whatever can be recommended to young perſons, with better hopes of ſeaſoning their minds with vital religion, than Young's Night Thoughts."

His poetical character is delineated by Dr. Johnſon with impartiality and preciſion.

"Of Young's poems it is difficult to give any general character; for he has no uniformity of manner: one of his pieces has no great reſemblance to another. He began to write early, and continued long; and at different times had different modes of poetical excellence in view. His numbers are ſometimes ſmooth, and ſometimes rugged; his ſtyle is ſometimes concatenated, and ſometimes abrupt; ſometimes diffuſive, and ſometimes conciſe. His plan ſeems to have ſtarted in his mind at the preſent moment, and his thoughts appear the effect of chance, ſometimes adverſe, and ſometimes lucky, with very little operation of judgment.

"He was not one of the writers whom experience improves, and who obſerving their own faults become gradually correct. His poem on the Laſt Day, his firſt great performance, has an equability and propriety, which he afterwards either never endeavoured or never attained. Many paragraphs are noble, and few are mean, yet the whole is languid; the plan is too much extended, and a ſucceſſion of images divides and weakens the general conception; but the great reaſon why the reader is diſappointed, is, that the Laſt Day makes every man more than poetical, by ſpreading over his mind a general obſcurity of ſacred horror, that oppreſſes diſtinction, and diſdains expreſſion.

"His ſtory of Jane Gray was never popular. It is written with elegance enough, but Jane is too heroic to be pitied.

" The Univerſal Paſſion is indeed a very great performance. It is ſaid to be a ſeries of epigrams: but if it be, it is what the author intended: his endeavour was at the production of ſtriking diſtichs and pointed ſentences; and his diſtichs have the weight of ſolid ſentiment, and his points the ſharpneſs of reſiſtleſs truth

" His characters are often ſelected with diſcernment, and drawn with nicety; his illuſtrations are often happy, and his reflections often juſt. His ſpecies of ſatire is between thoſe of Horace and Juvenal; and he has the gaiety of Horace without his laxity of numbers, and the morality of Juvenal with greater variation of images. He plays, indeed, only on the ſurface of life; he never penetrates the receſſes of the mind, and therefore the whole power of his poetry is exhauſted by a ſingle peruſal; his conceits pleaſe only when they ſurpriſe.

" To tranſlate he never condeſcended, unleſs his Paraphraſe on Job may be conſidered as a verſion; in which he has not, I think, been unſucceſsful; he indeed favoured himſelf, by chooſing thoſe parts which moſt eaſily admit the ornaments of Engliſh poetry.

" He had leaſt ſucceſs in his lyric attempts, in which he ſeems to have been under ſome malignant influence: he is always labouring to be great, and at laſt is only turgid.

" In his Night Thoughts he has exhibited a very wide diſplay of original poetry, variegated with deep reflections and ſtriking alluſions; a wilderneſs of thought, in which the fertility of fancy ſcatters flowers of every hue and of every odour. This is one of the few poems in which blank verſe could not be changed for rhyme but with diſadvantage. The wild diffuſion of the ſentiments, and the digreſſive ſallies of imagination, would have been compreſſed and reſtrained by confinement to rhyme. The excellence of this work is not exactneſs, but copiouſneſs; particular lines are not to be regarded; the power is in the whole, and in the whole there is a magnificence like that aſcribed to Chineſe plantation, the magnificence of vaſt extent and endleſs diverſity.

" His laſt poem was the Reſignation; in which he made, as he was accuſtomed, an experiment of a new mode of writing, and ſucceeded better than in his Ocean or his Merchant. It was very falſely repreſented as a proof of decaying faculties. There is Young in every ſtanza, ſuch as he often was in his higheſt vigour.

" It muſt be allowed of Young's poetry, that it abounds in thought, but without much accuracy or ſelection. When he lays hold of an illuſtration, he purſues it beyond expectation, ſometimes happily, as in his parallel of Quickſilver with Pleaſure, which is very ingenious, very ſubtle, and almoſt exact; but ſometimes he is leſs lucky, as when, in his Night Thoughts, having dropped it into his mind, that the orbs, floating in ſpace, might be called the cluſter of creation, he thinks on a cluſter of grapes, and ſays, that they all hang on the great vine, drinking the " nectareous juice of im-" mortal life."

" His conceits are ſometimes yet leſs valuable. In the Laſt Day, he hopes to illuſtrate the re-aſſembling of the atoms that compoſe the human body at the " Trump of Doom," by the collection of bees into a ſwarm at the tinkling of a pan.

" The Prophet ſays of Tyre, that " her Merchants are Princes." Young ſays in his Merchant

Her Merchants Princes, and each deck a Throne.

Let burleſque try to go beyond him.

" He has the trick of joining the turgid and familiar: to buy the alliance of Britain, " Climes " were paid down." Antitheſis is his favourite. " They for kindneſs hate;" and " becauſe ſhe's " right ſhe's ever in the wrong."

" His verſification is his own; neither his blank nor his rhyming lines have any reſemblance to thoſe of former writers; he picks up no hemiſtichs, he copies no favourite expreſſions; he ſeems to have laid up no ſtores of thought or diction, but to owe all to the fortuitous ſuggeſtions of the preſent moment. Yet I have reaſon to believe that, when once he had formed a new deſign, he then laboured it with very patient induſtry, and that he compoſed with great labour, and frequent reviſions.

" His verſes are formed by no certain model: for he is no more like himſelf in his different productions than he is like others. He ſeems never to have ſtudied proſody, nor to have had any direction but from his own ear. But with all his defects, he was a man of genius and a poet."

THE WORKS OF YOUNG.

VERSES TO THE AUTHOR.

Now let the Athieſt tremble; thou alone
Can bid his conſcious heart the Godhead own.
Whom ſhalt thou not reform? O thou haſt ſeen,
How God deſcends to judge the ſouls of men.
Thou heard'ſt the ſentence how the guilty mourn,
Driven out from God, and never muſt return.
Yet more, behold ten thouſand thunders fall,
And ſudden vengeance wrap the flaming ball:
When nature ſunk, when every bolt was hurl'd,
Thou ſaw'ſt the boundleſs ruins of the world.
When guilty Sodom felt the burning rain,
And ſulphur fell on the devoted plain;
The patriarch thus, the fiery tempeſt paſt,
With pious horror view'd the deſert waſte;
The reſtleſs ſmoke ſtill wav'd its curls around,
For ever riſing from the glowing ground.
But tell me, oh! what heavenly pleaſure tell,
To think ſo greatly, and deſcribe ſo well!
How waſt thou pleas'd the wondrous theme to try,
And find the thought of man could riſe ſo high?
Beyond this world the labour to purſue,
And open all eternity to view?
But thou art beſt delighted to rehearſe
Heaven's holy dictates in exalted verſe:
O thou haſt power the harden'd heart to warm,
To grieve, to raiſe, to terrify, to charm;
To fix the ſoul on God; to teach the mind
To know the dignity of human kind;
By ſtricter rules well-govern'd life to ſcan,
And practiſe o'er the angel in the man.

TO A LADY,

WITH THE LAST DAY.

MADAM,
HERE, ſacred truths, in lofty numbers told,
The proſpect of a future ſtate unfold:
The realms of night to mortal view diſplay,
And the glad regions of eternal day.
This daring author ſcorns, by vulgar ways
Of guilty wit, to merit worthleſs praiſe.
Full of her glorious theme, his towering muſe,
With gen'rous zeal, a nobler fame purſues:
Religion's cauſe her raviſh'd heart inſpires,
And with a thouſand bright ideas fires;
Tranſports her quick, impatient, piercing eye,
O'er the ſtrait limits of mortality,
To boundleſs orbs, and bids her fearleſs ſoar,
Where only Milton gain'd renown before;
Where various ſcenes alternately excite
Amazement, pity, terror, and delight.
Thus did the muſes ſing in early times,
Ere ſkill'd to flatter vice and varniſh crimes:
Their lyres were tun'd to virtuous ſongs alone,
And the chaſte poet, and the prieſt, were one.
But now, forgetful of their infant ſtate,
They ſoothe the wanton pleaſures of the great:
And from the preſs, and the licentious ſtage,
With luſcious poiſon taint the thoughtleſs age;
Deceitful charms attract our wondering eyes
And ſpecious ruin unſuſpected lies.
So the rich ſoil of India's blooming ſhores,
Adorn'd with laviſh nature's choiceſt ſtores, [ſight,
Where ſerpents lurk, by flowers conceal'd from
Hides fatal danger under gay delight.
Theſe purer thoughts from groſs alloys refin'd,
With heavenly raptures elevate the mind:
Not fram'd to raiſe a giddy ſhort-liv'd joy,
Whoſe falſe allurements, while they pleaſe deſtroy;
But bliſs reſembling that of ſaints above,
Sprung from the viſion of th' Almighty love:
Firm, ſolid bliſs, for ever great and new,
The more 'tis known, the more admir'd, like you;
Like you, fair nymph, in whom united meet
Endearing ſweetneſs, unaffected wit,
And all the glories of your ſparkling race,
While inward virtues heighten every grace.
By theſe ſecur'd, you will with pleaſure read
"Of future judgment, and the riſing dead; [thrown
"Of time's grand period, heaven and earth o'er-
"And gaſping nature's laſt tremendous groan."
Theſe, when the ſtars and ſun ſhall be no more,
Shall beauty to your ravag'd form reſtore,
Then ſhall you ſhine with an immortal ray,
Improv'd by death, and brighten'd by decay.

T. TRISTRAM.

TO THE AUTHOR,

ON HIS LAST DAY AND UNIVERSAL PASSION.

And muſt it be as thou haſt ſung,
Celeſtial bard, ſeraphic Young?
Will there no trace, no point be found
Of all this ſpacious glorious round?
Yon lamps of light, muſt they decay?
On nature's ſelf deſtruction prey?
Then fame, the moſt immortal thing
Ev'n thou canſt hope, is on the wing.
Shall Newton's ſyſtem be admir'd,
When time and motion are expir'd?
Shall ſouls be curious to explore
Who rul'd an orb that is no more?
Or ſhall they quote the pictur'd age,
From Pope's and thy corrective page,
When vice and virtue loſe their name
In deathleſs joy, or endleſs ſhame?
While wears away the grand machine,
The works of genius ſhall be ſeen:
Beyond, what laurels can there be,
For Homer, Horace, Pope, or thee?
Through life we chaſe, with fond purſuit,
What mocks our hope, like Sodom's fruit:
And ſure, thy plan was well deſign'd,
To cure this madneſs of the mind;
Firſt, beyond time our thoughts to raiſe;
Then laſh our love of tranſient praiſe.
In both, we own thy doctrine juſt;
And fame's a breath, and men are duſt.

THE LAST DAY.

IN THREE BOOKS.

" Venit ſumma dies." ——VIRG.

BOOK I.

" Ipſe pater, media nimborum in nocte, coruſca
" Fulmina molitur dextra. Quo maxima motu
" Terra tremit: fugère feræ! et mortalia corda
" Per gentes humilis ſtravit pavor." VIRG.

WHILE others ſing the fortune of the great;
Empire and arms, and all the pomp of ſtate;
With Britain's hero * ſet their ſouls on fire,
And grow immortal as his deeds inſpire;
I draw a deeper ſcene: a ſcene that yields
A louder trumpet, and more dreadful fields;
The world alarm'd, both earth and heav'n o'erthrown,
And gaſping nature's laſt tremendous groan;
Death's ancient ſceptre broke, the teeming tomb,
The righteous Judge, and man's eternal doom.
'Twixt joy and pain I view the bold deſign,
And aſk my anxious heart, if it be mine.
Whatever great or dreadful has been done
Within the ſight of conſcious ſtars or ſun,
Is far beneath my daring: I look down
On all the ſplendours of the Britiſh crown.
This globe is for my verſe a narrow bound;
Attend me, all ye glorious worlds around!
O! all ye angels, howſoe'er disjoin'd,
Of every various order, place, and kind,
Hear, and aſſiſt, a feeble mortal's lays;
'Tis our Eternal King I ſtrive to praiſe.

But chiefly Thou, great Ruler! Lord of all!
Before whoſe throne archangels proſtrate fall;
If at thy nod, from diſcord, and from night,
Sprang beauty, and yon ſparkling worlds of light,
Exalt e'en me; all inward tumults quell;
The clouds and darkneſs of my mind diſpel;
To my great ſubject thou my breaſt inſpire,
And raiſe my labouring ſoul with equal fire.

Man, bear thy brow aloft, view every grace
In God's great offspring, beauteous nature's face:
See ſpring's gay bloom; ſee golden autumn's ſtore;
See how earth ſmiles, and hear old ocean roar.
Leviathans but heave their cumberous mail,
It makes a tide, and wind-bound navies fail.
Here foreſts riſe, the mountain's awful pride;
Here, rivers meaſure climes, and worlds divide;
There, vallies fraught with gold's reſplendent feeds,
Hold kings, and kingdom's fortunes, in their beds:
There, to the ſkies, aſpiring hills aſcend,
And into diſtant lands their ſhades extend.
View cities, armies, fleets; of fleets the pride,
See Europe's law, in Albion's channel ride.
View the whole earth's vaſt landſkip unconfin'd,
Or view in Britain all her glories join'd.

Then let the firmament thy wonder raiſe;
'Twill raiſe thy wonder, but tranſcend thy praiſe.
How far from eaſt to weſt? The labouring eye
Can ſcarce the diſtant azure bounds deſcry:
Wide theatre! where tempeſts play at large,
And God's right hand can all its wrath diſcharge.
Mark how thoſe radiant lamps inflame the pole,
Call forth the ſeaſons, and the year controul:
They ſhine through time, with an unalter'd ray:
See this grand period riſe, and that decay:
So vaſt, this world's a grain; yet myriads grace,
With golden pomp, the throng'd ethereal ſpace;
So bright, with ſuch a wealth of glory ſtor'd,
'Twere ſin in heathens not to have ador'd.

How great, how firm, how ſacred all appears!
How worthy an immortal round of years!
Yet all muſt drop, as autumn's ſickleſt grain,
And earth and firmament be fought in vain:
The tract forgot where conſtellations ſhone,
Or where the Stuarts fill'd an awful throne;
Time ſhall be ſlain, all nature be deſtroy'd,
Nor leave an atom in the mighty void.

* The Duke of Marlborough.

Sooner, or later, in some future date,
(A dreadful secret in the book of fate!)
This hour, for aught all human wisdom knows,
Or when ten thousand harvests more have rose;
When scenes are chang'd on this revolving earth,
Old empires fall, and give new empires birth;
While other Bourbons rule in other lands,
And (if man's sins forbid not) other Annes;
While the still busy world is treading o'er
The paths they trod five thousand years before,
Thoughtless as those who now life's mazes run,
Of earth dissolv'd, or an extinguish'd sun;
(Ye sublunary worlds, awake, awake!
Ye rulers of the nation, hear, and shake)
Thick clouds of darkness shall arise on day;
In sudden night all earth's dominions lay;
Impetuous winds the scatter'd forests rend;
Eternal mountains, like their cedars bend;
The vallies yawn, the troubled ocean roar,
And break the bondage of his wonted shore;
A sanguine stain the silver moon o'erspread;
Darkness the circle of the sun invade;
From inmost heaven incessant thunders roll,
And the strong echo bound from pole to pole.
When, lo, a mighty trump, one half conceal'd
In clouds, one half to mortal eye reveal'd,
Shall pour a dreadful note; the piercing call
Shall rattle in the centre of the ball;
Th' extended circuit of creation shake,
The living die with fear, the dead awake.
Oh powerful blast! to which no equal sound
Did e'er the frighted ear of nature wound,
Though rival clarions have been strain'd on high,
And kindled wars immortal through the sky,
Though God's whole enginery discharg'd, and all
The rebel angels bellow'd in their fall.
Have angels sinn'd? and shall not man beware?
How shall a son of earth decline the snare?
Not folded arms, and slackness of the mind,
Can promise for the safety of mankind:
None are supinely good: through care and pain,
And various arts, the steep ascent we gain.
This is the scene of combat, not of rest,
Man's is laborious happiness at best;
On this side death his dangers never cease,
His joys are joys of conquest, not of peace.
If then, obsequious to the will of fate,
And bending to the terms of human state,
When guilty joys invite us to their arms,
When beauty smiles, or grandeur spreads her charms,
The conscious soul would this great scene display,
Call down th' immortal hosts in dread array,
The trumpet sound, the Christian banner spread,
And raise from silent graves the trembling dead;
Such deep impression would the picture make,
No power on earth her firm resolve could shake;
Engag'd with angels she would greatly stand,
And look regardless down on sea and land;
Nor proffer'd worlds her ardour could restrain,
And death might shake his threatening lance in vain!
Her certain conquest would endear the fight,
And danger serve but to exalt delight.
Instructed thus to shun the fatal spring,
Whence flows the terrors of that day I sing;
More boldly we our labours may pursue,
And all the dreadful image set to view.
The sparkling eye, the sleek and painted breast,
The burnish'd scale, curl'd train, and rising crest,
All that is lovely in the noxious snake,
Provokes our fear, and bids us flee the brake:
The sting once drawn, his guiltless beauties rise
In pleasing lustre, and detain our eyes;
We view with joy, what once did horror move,
And strong aversion softens into love.
Say then, my muse, whom dismal scenes delight,
Frequent at tombs, and in the realms of night;
Say, melancholy maid, if bold to dare
The last extremes of terror and despair;
Oh say, what change on earth, what heart in man,
This blackest moment since the world began.
Ah mournful turn! the blissful earth, who late
At leisure on her axle roll'd in state;
While thousand golden planets knew no rest,
Still onward in their circling journey prest;
A grateful change of seasons some to bring,
And sweet vicissitude of fall and spring:
Some through vast oceans to conduct the keel,
And some those watery worlds to sink, or swell:
Around her some their splendours to display,
And gild her globe with tributary day:
This world so great, of joy the bright abode,
Heaven's darling child, and favourite of her God,
Now looks an exile from her Father's care,
Deliver'd o'er to darkness and despair.
No sun in radiant glory shines on high;
No light, but from the terrors of the sky:
Fall'n are her mountains, her fam'd rivers lost,
And all into a second chaos tost:
One universal ruin spreads abroad;
Nothing is safe beneath the throne of God.
Such, earth, thy fate: what then canst thou afford
To comfort and support thy guilty lord?
Man, haughty lord of all beneath the moon,
How must he bend his soul's ambition down?
Prostrate, the reptile own, and disavow
His boasted stature, and assuming brow?
Claim kindred with the clay, and curse his form,
That speaks distinction from his sister worm?
What dreadful pangs the trembling heart invade!
Lord, why dost thou forsake whom thou hast made?
Who can sustain thy anger? Who can stand
Beneath the terrors of thy lifted hand?
It flies the reach of thought; oh save me, Power
Of powers supreme, in that tremendous hour!
Thou who beneath the frown of fate hast stood,
And in thy dreadful agony sweat blood;
Thou, who for me, through every throbbing vein,
Hast felt the keenest edge of mortal pain;
Whom death led captive through the realms below,
And taught those horrid mysteries of woe;
Defend me, O my God! Oh save me, Power
Of powers supreme, in that tremendous hour!
From east to west they fly, from pole to line,
Imploring shelter from the wrath divine;
Beg flames to wrap, or whelming sea to sweep,
Or rocks to yawn, compassionately deep:
Seas cast the monster forth to meet his doom,
And rocks but prison up for wrath to come.

So fares a traitor to an earthly crown;
While death fits threatening in his prince's frown,
His heart's diſmay'd; and now his fears command,
To change his native for a diſtant land:
Swift orders fly, the king's ſevere decree
Stands in the channel, and locks up the ſea;
The port he ſeeks, obedient to her lord,
Hurls back the rebel to his lifted ſword.
But why this idle toil to paint that day?
This time elaborately thrown away?
Words all in vain pant after the diſtreſs,
The height of eloquence would make it leſs;
Heavens! how the good man trembles!—
And is there a Laſt Day? and muſt there come
A ſure, a fix'd, inexorable doom!
Ambition ſwell, and, thy proud ſails to ſhow,
Take all the winds that vanity can blow:
Wealth on a golden mountain blazing ſtand,
And reach an India forth in either hand;
Spread all thy purple cluſters, tempting vine,
And thou, more dreaded foe, bright beauty, ſhine;
Shine all; in all your charms together riſe,
That all, in all your charms, I may deſpiſe,
While I mount upward on a ſtrong deſire,
Borne, like Elijah, in a car of fire.
In hopes of glory to be quite involv'd!
To ſmile at death! to long to be diſſolv'd!
From our decays a pleaſure to receive!
And kindle into tranſport at a grave!
What equals this? And ſhall the victor now
Boaſt the proud laurels on his loaded brow?
Religion! Oh thou cherub, heavenly bright!
Oh joys unmix'd, and fathomleſs delight!
Thou, thou art all; nor find I in the whole
Creation aught, but God and my own ſoul.
For ever then my ſoul, thy God adore,
Nor let the brute creation praiſe him more.
Shall things inanimate my conduct blame,
And fluſh my conſcious cheek with ſpreading ſhame?
They all for him purſue, or quit their end;
The mounting flames their burning power ſuſpend;
In ſolid heaps th' unfrozen billows ſtand,
To reſt and ſilence aw'd by his command:
Nay, the dire monſters that infeſt the flood,
By nature dreadful, and athirſt for blood,
His will can calm, their ſavage tempers bind,
And turn to mild protectors of mankind.
Did not the prophet this great truth maintain
In the deep chambers of the gloomy main;
When darkneſs round him all her horrors ſpread,
And the loud ocean bellow'd o'er his head?
When now the thunder roars, the lightning flies,
And all the warring winds tumultuous riſe;
When now the foaming ſurges, toſt on high,
Diſcloſe the ſands beneath, and touch the ſky;
When death draws near, the mariners aghaſt
Look back with terror on their actions paſt;
Their courage ſickens into deep diſmay,
Their hearts, through fear and anguiſh, melt away;
Nor tears, nor prayers, the tempeſt can appeaſe;
Now they devote their treaſure to the ſeas;
Unload their ſhatter'd barque, though richly fraught,
And think the hopes of life are cheaply bought
With gems and gold; but oh, the ſtorm ſo high!
Nor gems nor gold the hopes of life can buy.
The trembling prophet then, themſelves to ſave,
They headlong plunge into the briny wave;
Down he deſcends, and, booming o'er his head,
The billows cloſe; he's number'd with the dead.
(Hear, O ye juſt! attend, ye virtuous few!
And the bright paths of piety purſue)
Lo! the great Ruler of the world, from high,
Looks ſmiling down with a propitious eye,
Covers his ſervant with his gracious hand,
And bids tempeſtuous nature ſilent ſtand;
Commands the peaceful waters to give place,
Or kindly fold him in a ſoft embrace:
He bridles in the monſters of the deep:
The bridled monſters awful diſtance keep:
Forget their hunger, while they view their prey;
And guiltleſs gaze, and round the ſtranger play.
But ſtill ariſe new wonders; nature's Lord
Sends forth into the deep his powerful word,
And calls the great leviathan: the great
Leviathan attends in all his ſtate;
Exults for joy, and, with a mighty bound, ſound;
Makes the ſea ſhake, and heav'n and earth re-
Blackens the waters with the riſing ſand,
And drives vaſt billows to the diſtant land.
As yawns an earthquake, when impriſon'd air
Struggles for vent, and lays the centre bare,
The whale expands his jaws enormous ſize;
The prophet views the cavern with ſurpriſe;
Meaſures his monſtrous teeth, afar deſcry'd,
And rolls his wondering eyes from ſide to ſide:
Then takes poſſeſſion of the ſpacious ſeat,
And ſails ſecure within the dark retreat.
Now is he pleas'd the northern blaſt to hear,
And hangs on liquid mountains, void of fear;
Or falls immers'd into the depths below;
Where the dead ſilent waters never flow;
To the foundations of the hills convey'd,
Dwells in the ſhelving mountain's dreadful ſhade:
Where plummet never reach'd, he draws his breath,
And glides ſerenely through the paths of death.
Two wondrous days and nights through coral groves,
Through labyrinths of rocks and ſands he roves:
When the third morning with its level rays
The mountains gilds, and on the billows plays,
It ſees the king of waters riſe, and pour
His ſacred gueſt uninjur'd on the ſhore:
A type of that great bleſſing, which the muſe
In her next labour ardently purſues.

BOOK II.

——— Ἐκ γαίης ἐλπίζομεν ἐς φάος ἐλθεῖν
Λείψαν ἀποιχομένων· ὀπίσω δ' ἔσσονται ἀθάνατοι.
PHOCYL.

"——— We hope, that the departed will riſe
"again from the duſt: after which, like
"the gods, they will be immortal."

Now man awakes, and from his ſilent bed,
Where he has ſlept for ages, lifts his head;

Shakes off the ſlumber of ten thouſand years,
And on the borders of new worlds appears.
Whate'er the bold, the raſh, adventure coſt,
In wide eternity I dare be loſt.
The muſe is wont in narrow bounds to ſing,
To teach the ſwain, or celebrate the king.
I graſp the whole, no more to parts confin'd,
I liſt my voice, and ſing to human kind:
I ſing to men and angels; angels join, [mine.
While ſuch the theme, their ſacred ſongs with
Again the trumpet's intermitted ſound
Rolls the wide circuit of creation round,
An univerſal concourſe to prepare,
Of all that ever breath'd the vital air:
In ſome wide field, which active whirlwinds ſweep,
Drive cities, foreſts, mountains, to the deep,
To ſmooth and lengthen out th' unbounded ſpace,
And ſpread an area for all human race.

Now monuments prove faithful to their truſt,
And render back their long-committed duſt.
Now charnels rattle; ſcatter'd limbs, and all
The various bones, obſequious to the call,
Self-mov'd, advance; the neck perhaps to meet
The diſtant head, the diſtant legs the feet.
Dreadful to view, ſee through the duſky ſky
Fragments of bodies in confuſion fly,
To diſtant regions journeying, there to claim
Deſerted members, and complete the frame.

When the world bow'd to Rome's almighty ſword,
Rome bow'd to Pompey, and confeſs'd her lord.
Yet one day loſt, this deity below
Became the ſcorn and pity of his foe.
His blood a traitor's ſacrifice was made,
And ſmok'd indignant on a ruffian's blade.
No trumpet's ſound, no gaſping army's yell,
Bid, with due horror, his great ſoul farewell.
Obſcure his fall! all weltering in his gore,
His trunk was caſt to periſh on the ſhore!
While Julius frown'd the bloody monſter dead,
Who brought the world in his great rival's head.
This ſever'd head and trunk ſhall join once more,
Though realms now riſe between, and oceans roar.
The trumpet's ſound each fragrant mote ſhall hear,
Or fix'd in earth, or if afloat in air,
Obey the ſignal wafted in the wind,
And not one ſleeping atom lag behind.

So ſwarming bees, that on a ſummer's day
In airy rings and wild meanders play, [end,
Charm'd with the brazen ſound, their wanderings
And, gently circling, on a bough deſcend.

The body thus renew'd, the conſcious ſoul,
Which has perhaps been fluttering near the pole,
Or 'midſt the burning planets wondering ſtray'd,
Or hover'd o'er where her pale corpſe was laid:
Or rather coaſted on her final ſtate,
And fear'd, or wiſh'd for, her appointed fate;
This ſoul, returning with a conſtant flame,
Now weds for ever her immortal frame.
Life, which ran down before, ſo high is wound,
The ſprings maintain an everlaſting round.

Thus a frail model of the work deſign'd
Firſt takes a copy of the builder's mind,
Before the ſtructure firm with laſting oak,
And marble bowels of the ſolid rock,
Turns the ſtrong arch, and bids the columns riſe,
And bear the lofty palace to the ſkies;
The wrongs of time enabled to ſurpaſs,
With bars of adamant, and ribs of braſs.

That ancient, ſacred, and illuſtrious * dome,
Where ſoon or late fair Albion's heroes come,
From camps, and courts, though great, or wiſe, or juſt,
To feed the worm, and moulder into duſt;
That ſolemn manſion of the royal dead,
Where paſſing ſlaves o'er ſleeping monarch's tread,
Now populous o'erflows: a numerous race
Of riſing kings fill all th' extended ſpace:
A life well ſpent, not the victorious ſword,
Awards the crown, and ſtyles the greater lord.

Nor monuments alone, and burial-earth,
Labours with man to this his ſecond birth;
But where gay palaces in pomp ariſe,
And gilded threatres invade the ſkies,
Nations ſhall wake, whoſe unreſpected bones
Support the pride of their luxurious ſons.
The moſt magnificent and coſtly dome
Is but an upper chamber to a tomb.
No ſpot on earth but has ſupply'd a grave,
And human ſkulls the ſpacious ocean pave.
All's full of man; and, at this dreadful turn,
The ſwarm ſhall iſſue, and the hive ſhall burn.

Not all at once, nor in like manner, riſe:
Some lift with pain their ſlow unwilling eyes;
Shrink backward from the terror of the light,
And bleſs the grave, and call for laſting night.
Others, whoſe long-attempted virtue ſtood
Fix'd as a rock, and broke the ruſhing flood,
Whoſe firm reſolve nor beauty could melt down,
Nor raging tyrants from their poſture frown;
Such, in this day of horrors, ſhall be ſeen
To face the thunders with a godlike mien;
The planets drop, their thoughts are fix'd above;
The centre ſhakes, their hearts diſdain to move:
An earth diſſolving, and a heaven thrown wide,
A yawning gulf, and fiends on every ſide,
Serene they view, impatient of delay,
And bleſs the dawn of everlaſting day.

Here greatneſs proſtrate falls, there ſtrength gives place,
Here lazars ſmile, there beauty hides her face.
Chriſtians, and Jews, and Turks, and Pagans ſtand
A blended throng, one undiſtinguiſh'd band.
Some who, perhaps, by mutual wounds expir'd,
With zeal for their diſtinct perſuaſions fir'd,
In mutual friendſhip their long ſlumber break,
And hand in hand their Saviour's love partake.

But none are flush'd with brighter joy, or warm
With juſter confidence, enjoy the ſtorm,
Than thoſe whoſe pious bounties unconfin'd
Have made them public fathers of mankind.
In that illuſtrious rank, what ſhining light
With ſuch diſtinguiſh'd glory fills my ſight?
Bend down, my grateful muſe, that homage ſhow
Which to ſuch worthies thou art proud to owe.
Wickham! Fox! Chichley! hail, illuſtrious * names,
Who to far diſtant times diſpenſe your beams;

Beneath your shades, and near your crystal springs,
I first presum'd to touch the trembling strings.
All hail, thrice honour'd! 'Twas your great re-
To bless a people, and oblige a crown. [nown
And now you rise, eternally to shine,
Eternally to drink the rays divine.

Indulgent God! Oh, how shall mortal raise
His soul to due returns of grateful praise,
For bounty so profuse to human kind,
Thy wondrous gift of an eternal mind?
Shall I, who some few years ago was less
Than worm, or mite, or shadow, can express,
Was nothing; shall I live, when every fire
And every star shall languish and expire?
When earth's no more, shall I survive above,
And through the radiant files of angels move?
Or, as before the throne of God I stand,
See new worlds rolling from his spacious hand,
Where our adventures shall perhaps be taught,
As we now tell how Michael sung or fought;
All that has being in full concert join,
And celebrate the depths of love divine.

But oh! before this blissful state, before
Th' aspiring soul this wondrous height can soar,
The Judge, descending, thunders from afar,
And all mankind is summon'd to the bar.

This mighty scene I next presume to draw:
Attend, great Anna, with religious awe.
Expect not here the known successful arts
To win attention, and command our hearts:
Fiction, be far away; let no machine
Descending here, no fabled God, be seen;
Behold the God of Gods indeed descend,
And worlds unnumber'd his approach attend!

Lo! the wide theatre, whose ample space
Must entertain the whole of human race,
At heaven's all-powerful edict is prepar'd,
And fenc'd around with an immortal guard.
Tribes, provinces, dominions, worlds, o'erflow
The mighty plain, and deluge all below:
And every age and nation pours along;
Nimrod and Bourbon mingle in the throng:
Adam salutes his youngest son; no sign
Of all those ages which their births disjoin.

How empty learning, and how vain is art,
But as it mends the life, and guides the heart!
What volumes have been swell'd, what time been spent,
To fix a hero's birth-day or descent!
What joy must it now yield, what rapture raise,
To see the glorious race of ancient days;
To greet those worthies, who perhaps have stood
Illustrious on record before the flood!
Alas! a nearer care your soul demands.
Cæsar unnoted in your presence stands.

How vast the concourse! not in number more
The waves that break on the resounding shore,
The leaves that tremble in the shady grove,
The lamps that gild the spangled vaults above:
Those overwhelming armies, whose command
Said to one empire, fall, another, stand;
Whole rear lay wrapt in night, while breaking dawn
Rous'd the broad front, and call'd the battle on:
Great Xerxes' world in arms, proud Canuæ's field,
Where Carthage taught victorious Rome to yield,
(Another blow had broke the fate's decree,
And earth had wanted her fourth monarchy)
Immortal Blenheim, fam'd Ramillia's host,
They all are here, and here they all are lost:
Their millions swell to be discern'd in vain,
Lost as a billow in th' unbounded main.

This echoing voice now rends the yielding air,
"For judgment, judgment, sons of men prepare!"
Earth shakes anew; I hear her groans profound;
And hell through all her trembling realms resound.

Whoe'er thou art, thou greatest power of earth;
Blest with most equal planets at thy birth;
Whose valour drew the most successful sword,
Most realms united in one common lord;
Who, on the day of triumph, saidst, Be thine
The skies, Jehovah, all this world is mine:
Dare not to lift thine eye—Alas! my muse,
How art thou lost! what numbers canst thou choose?
A sudden blush inflames the waving sky,
And now the crimson curtains open fly;
Lo! far within, and far above all height,
Where heaven's great Sovereign reigns in world's of light,
Whence nature He informs, and with one ray
Shot from his eye, does all her works survey,
Creats, supports, confounds! Where time and place;
Matter, and form, and fortune, life, and grace,
Wait humbly at the footstool of their God,
And move obedient at his awful nod;
Whence he beholds us vagrant emmets crawl
At random on this air-suspended ball
(Speck of creation): if he pour one breath,
The bubble breaks, and 'tis eternal death.

Thence issuing I behold (but mortal sight Sustains not such a rushing sea of light)
I see, on an empyreal flying throne
Sublimely rais'd, Heaven's everlasting Son;
Crown'd with that majesty that form'd the world,
And the grand rebel flaming downward hurl'd,
Virtue, dominion, praise, omnipotence,
Support the train of their triumphant prince.
A zone, beyond the thought of angels bright,
Around him, like the zodiac, winds its light.
Night shades the solemn arches of his brows,
And in his cheek the purple morning glows.
Where'er serene he turns propitious eyes,
Or we expect, or find, a paradise:
But if resentment reddens their mild beams,
The Eden kindles, and the world's in flames.
On one hand, Knowledge shines in purest light;
On one, the sword of Justice, fiercely bright.
Now bend the knee in sport, present the reed;
Now tell the scourg'd Impostor he shall bleed!

Thus glorious through the courts of heaven, the source
Of life and death eternal bends his course;
Loud thunders round him roll, and lightnings play;
Th' angelic host is rang'd in bright array: [shell,
Some touch the string, some strike the sounding
And mingling voices in rich concert swell;
Voices seraphic; blest with such a strain,
Could Satan hear, he were a god again.

Triumphant King of Glory! Soul of Bliss!
What a stupendous turn of fate is this?
O! whither art thou rais'd above the scorn
And indigence of him in Beth'lem born;

A needleſs, helpleſs, unaccounted, gueſt,
And but a ſecond to the ſodder'd beaſt?
How chang'd from him, who meekly proſtrate laid,
Vouchſaf'd to waſh the feet himſelf had made?
From him who was betray'd, forſook, deny'd,
Wept, languiſh'd, pray'd, bled, thirſted, groan'd, and dy'd;
Hung pierc'd and bare, inſulted by the foe, [low?
All heaven in tears above, earth unconcern'd be-
And was't enough to bid the ſun retire?
Why did not nature at thy groan expire?
I ſee, I hear, I feel, the pangs divine;
The world is vaniſh'd—I am wholly thine.
Miſtaken Caiaphas! Ah! which blaſphem'd;
Thou, or thy priſoner? which ſhall be condemn'd?
Well might'ſt thou rend thy garments, well exclaim;
Deep are the horrors of eternal flame!
But God is good! 'Tis wond'rous all! Ev'n he
Thou gav'ſt to death, ſhame, torture, dy'd for thee.
Now the deſcending triumph ſtops its flight,
From earth full twice a planetary height.
There all the clouds condens'd, two columns raiſe,
Diſtinct with orient veins and golden blaze.
One fix'd on earth, and one in ſea, and round
Its ample foot the ſwelling billows ſound.
Theſe an immeaſurable arch ſupport,
The grand tribunal of this awful court.
Sheets of bright azure, from the pureſt ſky,
Stream from the cryſtal arch, and round the columns fly.
Death, wrapt in chains, low at the baſis lies,
And on the point of his own arrow dies.
Here high enthron'd th' Eternal Judge is plac'd,
With all the grandeur of his godhead grac'd;
Stars on his robes in beauteous order meet,
And the ſun burns beneath his awful feet.
Now an archangel eminently bright,
From off his ſilver ſtaff of wond'rous height,
Unfurls the Chriſtian flag, which waving flies,
And ſhuts and opens more than half the ſkies:
The croſs ſo ſtrong a red, it ſheds a ſtain,
Where'er it floats, on earth, in air, or main;
Fluſhes the hill, and ſets on fire the wood,
And turns the deep-dy'd ocean into blood.
Oh, formidable glory! dreadful bright!
Reſulgent torture to the guilty ſight.
Ah turn! unwary muſe, nor dare reveal
What horrid thoughts with the polluted dwell.
Say, (not to make the ſun ſhrink in his beam)
Dare not affirm, they wiſh it all a dream;
Wiſh, or their ſouls may with their limbs decay,
Or God be ſpoil'd of his eternal ſway.
But rather, if thou know'ſt the means, unfold
How they with tranſport might the ſcene behold.
Ah how! but by repentance, by a mind
Quick, and ſevere its own offence to find?
By tears, and groans, and never-ceaſing care,
And all the pious violence of prayer?
Thus then, with fervency till now unknown,
I caſt my heart before th' eternal throne,
In this great temple, which the ſkies ſurround,
For homage to its Lord, a narrow bound.
" O thou! whoſe balance does the mountains
" weigh,
Whoſe will the wild tumultuous ſeas obey,
" Whoſe breath can turn thoſe watery worlds to
" flame,
" That flame to tempeſt, and that tempeſt tame;
" Earth's meaneſt ſon, all trembling, proſtrate falls,
" And on the boundleſs of thy goodneſs calls.
" Oh! give the winds all paſt offence to ſweep,
" To ſcatter wide, or bury in the deep:
" Thy power, my weakneſs, may I ever ſee,
" And wholly dedicate my ſoul to thee:
" Reign'd o'er my will; my paſſions ebb and flow
" At thy command, nor human motive know!
" If anger boil, let anger be my praiſe,
" And ſin the graceful indignation raiſe.
" My love be warm to ſuccour the diſtreſs'd,
" And lift the burden from the ſoul oppreſs'd.
" Oh, may my underſtanding ever read
" This glorious volume, which thy wiſdom made!
" Who decks the maiden ſpring with flowery pride?
" Who calls forth ſummer, like a ſparkling bride?
" Who joys the mother autumn's bed to crown?
" And bids old winter lay her honours down!
" Not the great Ottoman, or greater Czar,
" Not Europe's abitreſs of peace and war.
" May ſea and land, and earth and heaven be join'd,
" To bring th' Eternal Author to my mind!
" When oceans roar, or awful thunders roll,
" May thoughts of thy dread vengeance ſhake my ſoul!
" When earth's in bloom, or planets proudly ſhine,
" Adore, my heart, the Majeſty Divine!
" Through every ſcene of life, or peace, or war,
" Plenty, or want, thy glory be my care!
" Shine we in arms? or ſing beneath our vine?
" Thine is the vintage, and the conqueſt thine:
" Thy pleaſure points the ſhaft, and bends the bow;
" The cluſter blaſts, or bids it brightly glow:
" 'Tis thou that lead'ſt our powerful armies forth,
" And giv'ſt great Anne thy ſceptre o'er the north.
" Grant I may ever, at the morning-ray,
" Open with prayer the conſecrated day;
" Tune thy great praiſe, and bid my ſoul ariſe,
" And with the mounting ſun aſcend the ſkies:
" As that advances, let my zeal improve,
" And glow with ardour of conſummate love;
" Nor ceaſe at eve; but with the ſetting ſun
" My endleſs worſhip ſhall be ſtill begun.
And, oh! permit the gloom of ſolemn night
" To ſacred thought may forcibly invite.
" When this world's ſhut, and awful planets riſe,
" Call on our minds, and raiſe them to the ſkies;
" Compoſe our ſouls with a leſs dazzling ſight,
" And ſhow all nature in a milder light;
" How every boiſterous thought in calms ſubſides!
" How the ſmooth'd ſpirit into goodneſs glides!
" O how divine! to tread the milky way,
" To the bright palace of the Lord of Day;
" His court admire, or for his favour ſue,
" Or leagues of friendſhip with his ſaints renew;
" Pleas'd to look down, and ſee the world aſleep,
" While I long vigils to its founder keep!
" Canſt thou not ſhake the centre? Oh! controul
" Subdue by force, the rebel in my ſoul:
" Thou, who canſt ſtill the raging of the flood,
" Reſtrain the various tumults of my blood;
" Teach me with equal firmneſs to ſuſtain
" Alluring pleaſure, and aſſaulting pain.

" O may I pant for thee in each deſire!
" And with ſtrong faith foment the holy fire!
" Stretch out my ſoul in hope, and graſp the prize,
" Which in eternity's deep boſom lies!
" At the great day of recompence behold,
" Devoid of fear, the fatal book unfold!
" Then wafted upward to the bliſsful ſeat,
" From age to age, my grateful ſong repeat;
" My light, my life, my God, my Saviour ſee,
" And rival angels in the praiſe of thee."

BOOK III.

" Eſſe quoque in fatis reminiſcitur, affore tempus,
" Quo mare, quo tellus, correptaque regia cœli
" Ardeat; et mundi moles operoſa laboret."
OVID. MET.

THE book unfolding; the reſplendent ſeat
Of ſaints and angels; the tremendous fate
Of guilty ſouls; the gloomy realms of woe;
And all the horrors of the world below;
I next preſume to ſing: What yet remains
Demands my laſt, but moſt exalted ſtrains.
And let the muſe or now affect the ſky,
Or in inglorious ſhades for ever lie.
She kindles, ſhe's inflam'd ſo near the goal;
She mounts, ſhe gains upon the ſtarry pole;
The world grows leſs as ſhe purſues her flight,
And the ſun darkens to her diſtant ſight.
Heaven opening, all its ſacred pomp diſplays,
And overwhelms her with the ruſhing blaze!
The triumph rings! archangels ſhout around!
And echoing nature lengthens out the ſound!
Ten thouſand trumpets now at once advance;
Now deepeſt ſilence lulls the vaſt expanſe:
So deep the ſilence, and ſo ſtrong the blaſt,
As nature dy'd, when ſhe had groan'd her laſt.
Nor man, nor angel, moves; the Judge on high
Looks round, and with his glory fills the ſky:
Then on the fatal book his hand he lays,
Which high to view ſupporting ſeraphs raiſe;
In ſolemn form the rituals are prepar'd,
The ſeal is broken, and a groan is heard.
And thou, my ſoul, (oh fall to ſudden prayer,
And let the thought ſink deep!) ſhalt thou be there?
See on the left (for by the great command
The throng divided falls on either hand;)
How weak, how pale, how haggard, how obſcene,
What more than death in every face and mien?
With what diſtreſs, and glarings of affright,
They ſhock the heart, and turn away the ſight?
In gloomy orbs their trembling eye-balls roll,
And tell the horrid ſecrets of the ſoul.
Each geſture mourns, each look is black with care,
And every groan is loaden with deſpair.
Reader, if guilty, ſpare the muſe, and find
A truer image pictur'd in thy mind.
Shouldſt thou behold thy brother, father, wife,
And all the ſoft companions of thy life,
Whoſe blended intereſts levell'd at one aim,
Whoſe mix'd deſires ſent up one common flame,
Divided far; thy wretched ſelf alone
Caſt on the left, of all whom thou haſt known;
How would it wound? What millions wouldſt thou give
For one more trial, one more day to live?
Flung back in time an hour, a moment's ſpace,
To graſp with eagerneſs the means of grace;
Contend for mercy with a pious rage,
And in that moment to redeem an age?
Drive back the tide, ſuſpend a ſtorm in air,
Arreſt the ſun; but ſtill of this deſpair.
Mark, on the right, how amiable a grace!
Their Maker's image freſh in every face!
What purple bloom my raviſh'd ſoul admires,
And their eyes ſparkling with immortal fires!
Triumphant beauty! charms that riſe above
This world, and in bleſt angels kindle love!
To the Great Judge with holy pride they turn,
And dare behold th' Almighty's anger burn;
Its flaſh ſuſtain, againſt its terror riſe,
And on the dread tribunal fix their eyes.
Are theſe the forms that moulder'd in the duſt?
Oh the tranſcendent glory of the juſt!
Yet ſtill ſome thin remains of fear and doubt,
Th' infected brightneſs of their joy pollute.
Thus the chaſte bridegroom, when the prieſt draws nigh,
Beholds his bleſſing with a trembling eye,
Feels doubtful paſſions throb in every vein,
And in his cheeks are mingled joy and pain,
Leſt ſtill ſome intervening chance ſhould riſe,
Leap forth at once, and ſnatch the golden prize;
Inflame his woe, by bringing it ſo late,
And ſtab him in the criſis of his fate.
Since Adam's family, from firſt to laſt,
Now into one diſtinct ſurvey is caſt;
Look round, vain-glorious muſe, and you whoe'er
Devote yourſelves to fame, and think her fair;
Look round, and ſeek the lights of human race,
Whoſe ſhining acts time's brighteſt annals grace;
Who founded ſects; crowns conquer'd, or reſign'd;
Gave names to nations; or fam'd empires join'd;
Who rais'd the vale, and laid the mountain low;
And taught obedient rivers where to flow;
Who with vaſt fleets, as with a mighty chain,
Could bind the madneſs of the roaring main:
All loſt? all undiſtinguiſh'd? no-where found?
How will this truth in Bourbon's palace ſound?
That hour, on which th' Almighty King on high
From all eternity has fix'd his eye,
Whether his right-hand favour'd, or annoy'd,
Continued, alter'd, threaten'd, or deſtroy'd;
Southern or eaſtern ſceptre downward hurl'd,
Gave north or weſt dominion o'er the world;
The point of time, for which the world was built,
For which the blood of God himſelf was ſpilt,
That dreadful moment is arriv'd---
Aloft, the ſeats of biſs their pomp diſplay
Brighter than brightneſs, this diſtinguiſh'd day;
Leſs glorious, when of old th' eternal Son
From realms of night return'd with trophies won;
Through heaven's high gates, when he triumphant rode,
And ſhouting angels hail'd the victor God.
Horrors, beneath, darkneſs in darkneſs, hell
Of hell, where torments behind torments dwell;

A furnace formidable, deep, and wide,
O'er-boiling with a mad fulphureous tide,
Expands its jaws, moft dreadful to furvey,
And roars outrageous for the deftin'd prey.
The fons of light fcarce unappall'd look down,
And nearer prefs heaven's everlafting throne.
Such is the fcene; and one fhort moment's fpace
Concludes the hopes and fears of human race.
Proceed who dares!---I tremble as I write;
The whole creation fwims before my fight:
I fee, I fee, the Judge's frowning brow;
Say not, 'tis diftant; I behold it now;
I faint, my tardy blood forgets to flow,
My foul recoils at the ftupendous woe;
That woe, thofe pangs, which from the guilty breaft,
In thefe, or words like thefe, fhall be expreft.
" Who burft the barriers of my peaceful grave?
" Ah! cruel death, that would no longer fave,
" But grudg'd me e'en that narrow dark abode,
" And caft me out into the wrath of God;
" Where fhrieks, the roaring flame, the rattling chain,
" And all the dreadful eloquence of pain,
" Our only fong; black fire's malignant light,
" The fole refreftment of the blafted fight.
" Muft all thofe powers, heaven gave me to fupply
" My foul with pleafure, and bring in my joy,
" Rife up in arms againft me, join the foe,
" Senfe, reafon, memory, increafe my woe?
" And fhall my voice, ordain'd on hymns to dwell,
" Corrupt to groans, and blow the fires of hell?
" Oh! muft I look with terror on my gain,
" And with exiftence only meafure pain?
" What! no reprieve, no leaft indulgence given,
" No beam of hope, from any point of heaven!
" Ah Mercy! Mercy! art thou dead above?
" Is love extinguifh'd in the fource of love?
" Bold that I am, did heaven ftoop down to hell?
" Th' expiring Lord of life my ranfom feal?
" Have I not been induftrious to provoke?
" From his embraces obftinately broke?
" Purfued, and panted for his mortal hate,
" Earn'd my deftruction, labour'd out my fate?
" And dare I on extinguifh'd love exclaim?
" Take, take full vengeance, roufe the flackening flame;
" Juft is my lot—but oh! muft it tranfcend
" The reach of time, defpair a diftant end?
" With dreadful growth fhoot forward, and arife,
" Where thought can't follow, and bold fancy dies! [found?
" NEVER! where falls the foul at that dread
" Down an abyfs how dark, and how profound?
" Down, down, (I ftill am falling, horrid pain!)
" Ten thoufand thoufand fathoms ftill remain;
" My plunge but ftill begun—And this for fin!
" Could I offend, if I had never been,
" But ftill increas'd the fenfelefs happy mafs,
" Flow'd in the ftream, or fhiver'd in the grafs?
" Father of mercies! why from filent earth
" Didft thou awake, and curfe me into birth,
" Tear me from quiet, raviſh me from night,
" And make a thankleſs preſent of thy light?
" Puſh into being a reverſe of thee,
" And animate a clod with miſery! [keep
" The beaſts are happy; they come forth, and
" Short watch on earth, and then lie down to ſleep.
" Pain is for man; and oh! how vaſt a pain
" For crimes, which made the Godhead bleed in vain?
" Annull'd his groans, as far as in them lay,
" And flung his agonies, and death, away?
" As our dire puniſhment for ever ſtrong,
" Our conſtitution too for ever young.
" Curs'd with returns of vigour, ſtill the ſame
" Powerful to bear, and ſatisfy the flame:
" Still to be caught, and ſtill to be purſued!
" To periſh ſtill, and ſtill to be renew'd!
" And this, my Help! my God! at thy decree?
" Nature is chang'd, and hell ſhould ſuccour me.
" And canſt thou then look down from perfect bliſs,
" And ſee me plunging in the dark abyſs?
" Calling thee Father, in a ſea of fire?
" Or pouring blaſphemies at thy deſire?
" With mortals anguiſh wilt thou raiſe thy name,
" And by my pangs omnipotence proclaim?
" Thou, who canſt toſs the planets to and fro,
" Contract not thy great vengeance to my woe;
" Cruſh worlds; in hotter flames fall'n angels lay;
" On me Almighty wrath is caſt away.
" Call back thy thunders, Lord, hold in thy rage,
" Nor with a ſpeck of wretchedneſs engage:
" Forget me quite, nor ſtoop a worm to blame;
" But loſe me in the greatneſs of thy name.
" Thou art all love, all mercy, all divine,
" And ſhall I make thoſe glories ceaſe to ſhine?
" Shall ſinful man grow great by his offence,
" And from its courſe turn back Omnipotence?
" Forbid it! and oh! grant, great God, at leaſt
" This one, this ſlender, almoſt no requeſt;
" When I have wept a thouſand lives away,
" When torment is grown weary of its prey,
" When I have rav'd ten thouſand years in fire,
" Ten thouſand thouſand, let me then expire."
Deep anguiſh! but too late; the hopeleſs ſoul
Bound to the bottom of the burning pool,
Though loth, and ever loud blaſpheming, owns
He's juſtly doom'd to pour eternal groans;
Incloſs'd with horrors, and tranſfix'd with pain,
Rolling in vengeance, ſtruggling with his chain:
To talk to fiery tempeſts; to implore
The raging flame to give its burnings o'er;
To toſs, to writhe, to pant beneath his load,
And bear the weight of an offended God.
The favour'd of their Judge in triumph move,
To take poſſeſſion of their thrones above;
Satan's accurs'd deſertion to ſupply,
And fill the vacant ſtations of the ſky;
Again to kindle long-extinguiſh'd rays,
And with new lights dilate the heavenly blaze;
To crop the roſes of immortal youth,
And drink the fountain-head of ſacred truth;
To ſwim in ſeas of bliſs, to ſtrike the ſtring,
And lift the voice to their Almighty King;
To loſe eternity in grateful lays,
And fill heaven's wide circumference with praiſe.

But I attempt the wondrous height in vain,
And leave unfiniſh'd the too lofty ſtrain:
What boldly I begin, let others end;
My ſtrength exhauſted, fainting I deſcend,
And chooſe a leſs, but no ignoble theme,
Diſſolving elements, and worlds, in flame.

The fatal period, the great hour, is come,
And nature ſhrinks at her approaching doom;
Loud peals of thunder give the ſign, and all
Heaven's terrors in array ſurround the ball;
Sharp lightnings with the meteors blaze conſpire
And, darted downward, ſet the world on fire;
Black riſing clouds the thicken'd ether choke,
And ſpiry flames dart through the rolling ſmoke,
With keen vibrations cut the ſullen night,
And ſtrike the darken'd ſky with dreadful light;
From heaven's four regions, with immortal force,
Angels drive on the wind's impetuous courſe,
T' enrage the flame: It ſpreads, it ſoars on high,
Swells in the ſtorm, and billows through the ſky:
Here winding pyramids of fire aſcend,
Cities and deſarts in one ruin blend;
Here blazing volumes wafted, overwhelm
The ſpacious face of a far diſtant realm;
There, undermin'd, down ruſh eternal hills,
The neighbouring vales the vaſt deſtruction fills.
Hear'ſt thou that dreadful crack? that ſound which broke
Like peals of thunder, and the centre ſhook?
What wonders muſt that groan of nature tell!
Olympus there, and mightier Atlas, fell;
Which ſeem'd above the reach of fate to ſtand,
A towering monument of God's right hand;
Now duſt and ſmoke, whoſe brow ſo lately ſpread
O'er ſhelter'd countries its diffuſive ſhade.

Show me that celebrated ſpot, where all
The various rulers of the ſever'd ball
Have humbly ſought wealth, honour, and redreſs,
That land which heaven ſeem'd diligent to bleſs,
Once call'd Britannia: Can her glories end?
And can't ſurrounding ſeas her realms defend?
Alas! in flames behold ſurrounding ſeas!
Like oil, their waters but augment the blaze.

Some angel, ſay where ran proud Aſia's bound?
Or where with fruits was fair Europa crown'd?
Where ſtretch'd waſte Libya? Where did India's ſtore
Sparkle in diamonds, and her golden ore?
Each loſt in each, their mingling kingdoms glow,
And all diſſolv'd, one fiery deluge flow:
Thus earth's contending monarchies are join'd,
And a full period of ambition find.

And now whate'er or ſwims, or walks, or flies,
Inhabitants of ſea, or earth, or ſkies;
All on whom Adam's wiſdom fix'd a name,
All plunge, and periſh in the conquering flame.

This globe alone would but defraud the fire,
Starve its devouring rage: the flakes aſpire,
And catch the clouds, and make the heavens their prey;
The ſun, the moon, the ſtars, all melt away;
All, all is loſt; no monument, no ſign,
Where once ſo proudly blaz'd the gay machine.
So bubbles on the foaming ſtream expire,
So ſparks that ſcatter from the kindling fire;
The devaſtations of one dreadful hour
The great Creator's ſix days work devour.
A mighty, mighty ruin! yet one ſoul
Has more to boaſt, and far outweighs the whole;
Exalted in ſuperior excellence,
Caſts down to nothing, ſuch a vaſt expence.
Have you not ſeen th' eternal mountains nod,
An earth diſſolving, a deſcending God?
What ſtrange ſurpriſes through all nature ran?
For whom theſe revolutions, but for man?
For him, Omnipotence new meaſures takes,
For him, through all eternity, awakes;
Pours on him gifts ſufficient to ſupply
Heaven's loſs, and with freſh glories fill the ſky.

Think deeply then, O man, how great thou art;
Pay thyſelf homage with a trembling heart;
What angels guard, no longer dare neglect,
Slighting thyſelf, affront not God's reſpect.
Enter the ſacred temple of thy breaſt,
And gaze, and wander there, a raviſh'd gueſt;
Gaze on thoſe hidden treaſures thou ſhalt find,
Wander through all the glories of thy mind.
Of perfect knowledge, ſee, the dawning light
Foretels a noon moſt exquiſitely bright!
Here, ſprings of endleſs joy are breaking forth!
There, buds the promiſe of celeſtial worth!
Worth, which muſt ripen in a happier clime,
And brighter ſun, beyond the bounds of time.
Thou, minor, canſt not gueſs thy vaſt eſtate,
What ſtores, on foreign coaſts, thy landing wait;
Loſe not thy claim, let virtue's path be trod;
Thus glad all heaven, and pleaſe that bounteous God,
Who, to light thee to pleaſures, hung on high
Yon radiant orb, proud regent of the ſky:
That ſervice done, its beams ſhall fade away,
And God ſhine forth in one eternal day.

THE FORCE OF RELIGION; OR, VANQUISHED LOVE.

IN TWO BOOKS.

" Gratior et pulchro veniens in corpore virtus."

VIRG.

BOOK I.

" ——Ad cœlum ardentia lumina tollens,
" Lumina; nam teneras arcebant vincula pal-
" mas."

VIRG.

FROM lofty themes, from thoughts that ſoar'd on high,
And open'd wondrous ſcenes above the ſky,
My muſe deſcend: indulge my fond deſire;
With ſofter thoughts my melting ſoul inſpire,
And ſmooth my numbers to a female's praiſe:
A partial world will liſten to my lays,
While Anna reigns, and ſets a female name
Unrival'd in the glorious liſts of fame.
Hear, ye fair daughters of this happy land,
Whoſe radiant eyes the vanquiſh'd world command,
Virtue is beauty: but when charms of mind
With elegance of outward form are join'd;
When youth makes ſuch bright objects ſtill more bright,
And fortune ſets them in the ſtrongeſt light:
'Tis all of heaven that we below may view,
And all, but adoration, is your due.
Fam'd female virtue did this iſle adorn,
Ere Ormond, or her glorious queen was born:
When now Maria's powerful arms prevail'd,
And haughty Dudley's bold ambition fail'd,
The beauteous daughter of great Suffolk's race,
In blooming youth adorn'd with every grace;
Who gain'd a crown by treaſon not her own,
And innocently fill'd another's throne;
Hurl'd from the ſummit of imperial ſtate,
With equal mind ſuſtain'd the ſtroke of fate.
But how will Guilford, her far dearer part,
With manly reaſon fortify his heart?
At once ſhe longs, and is afraid to know:
Now ſwift ſhe moves, and now advances ſlow,
To find her lord; and finding paſſes by,
Silent with fear, nor dares ſhe meet his eye;
Leſt that unmaſk'd, in ſpeechleſs grief, diſcloſe
The mournful ſecret of his inward woes.
Thus after ſickneſs doubtful of her face,
The melancholy virgin ſhuns the glaſs.
At length with troubled thought, but look ſerene,
And ſorrow ſoften'd by her heavenly mien,
She claſps her lord, brave, beautiful, and young,
While tender accents melt upon her tongue;
Gentle and ſweet, as vernal zephyr blows,
Fanning the lily or the blooming roſe.
" Grieve not, my lord; a crown indeed is loſt;
" What far outſhines a crown, we ſtill may boaſt;
" A mind compos'd; a mind that can diſdain
" A fruitleſs ſorrow for a loſs ſo vain.
" Nothing is loſs that virtue can improve
" To wealth eternal; and return above;
" Above, where no diſtinction ſhall be known
" 'Twixt him whom ſtorms have ſhaken from a throne,
" And him who baſking in the ſmiles of fate,
" Shone forth in all the ſplendor of the great:
" Nor can I find the difference here below;
" I lately was a queen; I ſtill am ſo,
" While Guilford's wife: thee rather I obey,
" Than o'er mankind extend imperial ſway.
" When we lie down in ſome obſcure retreat,
" Incens'd Maria may her rage forget;
" And I to death my duty will improve,
" And what you miſs in empire, add in love—
" Your god-like ſoul is open'd in your look,
" And I have faintly your great meaning ſpoke.
" For this alone I'm pleas'd I wore the crown,
" To find with what content we lay it down.
" Heroes may win, but 'tis a heavenly race
" Can quit a throne with a becoming grace."
Thus ſpoke the faireſt of her ſex, and cheer'd
Her drooping lord; whoſe boding boſom fear'd

A darker cloud of ills would burſt, and ſhed
Severer vengeance on her guiltleſs head:
Too juſt, alas, the terrors which he felt!
For, lo! a guard!—forgive him, if he melt—
How ſharp her pangs, when ſever'd from his ſide,
The moſt ſincerely lov'd, and loving bride,
In ſpace confin'd, the muſe forbears to tell;
Deep was her anguiſh, but ſhe bore it well.
His pain was equal, but his virtue leſs;
He thought in grief there could be no exceſs.
Penſive he ſat, o'ercaſt with gloomy care,
And often fondly claſp'd his abſent fair;
Now ſilent wander'd through his rooms of ſtate,
And ſicken'd at their pomp, and tax'd his fate;
Which thus adorn'd, in all her ſhining ſtore,
A ſplendid wretch, magnificently poor.
Now on the bridal-bed his eyes were caſt,
And anguiſh fed on his enjoyments paſt;
Each recollected pleaſure made him ſmart,
And every tranſport ſtabb'd him to the heart.

That happy moon, which ſummon'd to delight,
That moon which ſhone on his dear nuptial night,
Which ſaw him fold her yet untaſted charms
(Deny'd to princes) in his longing arms;
Now ſees the tranſient bleſſing fleet away,
Empire and love! the viſion of a day.

Thus, in the Britiſh clime, a ſummer-ſtorm
Will oft the ſmiling face of heaven deform;
The winds with violence at once deſcend, [bend;
Sweep flowers and fruits, and make the foreſt
A ſudden winter, while the ſun is near,
O'ercomes the ſeaſon and inverts the year.

But whither is the captive borne away,
The beauteous captive, from the cheerful day?
The ſcene is chang'd indeed; before her eyes
Ill-boding looks and unknown horrors riſe:
For pomp and ſplendor, for her guard and crown,
A gloomy dungeon, and a keeper's frown:
Black thoughts each morn invade the lover's breaſt,
Each night, a ruffian locks the queen to reſt.

Ah mournful change, if judg'd by vulgar minds!
But Suffolk's daughter its advantage finds.
Religion's force divine is beſt diſplay'd
In deep deſertion of all human aid:
To ſuccour in extremes, is her delight,
And cheer the heart, when terror ſtrikes the ſight.
We, diſbelieving our own ſenſes, gaze,
And wonder what a mortal's heart can raiſe
To triumph o'er misfortune's, ſmile in grief,
And comfort thoſe who come to bring relief:
We gaze; and as we gaze, wealth, fame, decay,
And all the world's vain glories fade away.
Againſt her cares ſhe rais'd a dauntleſs mind,
And with an ardent heart, but moſt reſign'd,
Deep in the dreadful gloom with pious heat,
Amid the ſilence of her dark retreat,
Addreſs'd her God—"Almighty power divine!
"'Tis thine to raiſe, and to depreſs is thine;
"With honour to light up the name unknown,
"Or to put out the luſtre of a throne.
"In my ſhort ſpan both fortunes I have prov'd,
"And though with ill frail nature will be mov'd,
"I'll bear it well: (O ſtrengthen me to bear!)
"And if my piety may claim thy care;
"If I remember'd, in youth's giddy heat,
"And tumult of a court, a future ſtate;
"O favour, when thy mercy I implore
"For one who never guilty ſceptre bore!
"'Twas I receiv'd the crown; my lord is free!
"If it muſt fall, let vengeance fall on me.
"Let him ſurvive, his country's name to raiſe,
"And in a guilty land to ſpeak thy praiſe!
"O may th' indulgence of a father's love,
"Pour'd forth on me, be doubled from above!
"If theſe are ſafe, I'll think my prayers ſucceed,
"And bleſs thy tender mercies, whilſt I bleed."

'Twas now the mournful eve before that day
In which the queen to her full wrath gave way;
Through rigid juſtice, ruſh'd into offence,
And drank in zeal the blood of innocence:
The ſun went down in clouds, and ſeem'd to mourn
The ſad neceſſity of his return;
The hollow wind, and melancholy rain,
Or did, or was imagin'd to complain:
The tapers caſt an inauſpicious light;
Stars there were none, and doubly dark the night.

Sweet innocence in chains can take her reſt;
Soft ſlumber gently creeping through her breaſt,
She ſinks; and in her ſleep is re-enthron'd,
Mock'd by a gaudy dream, and vainly crown'd.
She views her fleets and armies, ſeas and land,
And ſtretches wide her ſhadow of command:
With royal purple is her viſion hung;
By phantom hoſts are ſhouts of conqueſts rung;
Low at her feet the ſuppliant rival lies;
Our priſoner mourns her fate, and bids her riſe.

Now level beams upon the waters play'd,
Glanc'd on the hills, and weſtward caſt the ſhade;
The buſy trades in cities had began
To ſound, and ſpeak the painful life of man.
In tyrants breaſts the thoughts of vengeance rouſe,
And the fond bridegroom turns him to his ſpouſe.
At this firſt birth of light, while morning breaks,
Our ſpouſeleſs bride, our widow'd wife awakes;
Awakes, and ſmiles; nor night's impoſture blames;
Her real pomps were little more than dreams;
A ſhort-liv'd blaze, a lightning quickly o'er,
That dy'd in birth, that ſhone, and was no more:
She turns her ſide, and ſoon reſumes a ſtate
Of mind, well ſuited to her alter'd fate,
Serene, though ſerious; when dread tidings come
(Ah wretched Guilford!) of her inſtant doom.
Sun, hide thy beams: in clouds as black as night
Thy face involve; be guiltleſs of the ſight;
Or haſte more ſwiftly to the weſtern main;
Nor let her blood the conſcious day-light ſtain!

Oh! how ſevere! to fall ſo new a bride,
Yet bluſhing from the prieſt, in youthful pride;
When time had juſt matur'd each perfect grace,
And open'd all the wonders of her face!
To leave her Guilford dead to all relief,
Fond of his woe, and obſtinate in grief.
Unhappy fair! whatever fancy drew,
(Vain promis'd bleſſings) vaniſh from her view;
No train of cheerful days, endearing nights,
No ſweet domeſtic joys, and chaſte delights;
Pleaſures that bloſſom ev'n from doubts and fears;
And bliſs and rapture riſing out of cares;

No little Guilford, with paternal grace,
Lull'd on her knee, or ſmiling in her face;
Who, when her deareſt father ſhall return,
From pouring tears on her untimely urn,
Might comfort to his ſilver hairs impart,
And fill her place in his indulgent heart:
As where fruits fall, quick-riſing bloſſoms ſmile,
And the bleſt Indian of his care beguile.
In vain theſe various reaſons jointly preſs,
To blacken death, and heighten her diſtreſs;
She, through th' encircling terrors, darts her ſight
To the bleſs'd regions of eternal light,
And fills her ſoul with peace: to weeping friends
Her father, and her lord, ſhe recommends;
Unmov'd herſelf: her foes her air ſurvey,
And rage to ſee their malice thrown away.
She ſoars; now nought on earth detains her care—
But Guilford; who ſtill ſtruggles for his ſhare.
Still will his form importunately riſe,
Clog and retard her tranſport to the ſkies;
As trembling flames now take a feeble flight,
Now catch the brand with a returning light,
Thus her ſoul onward from the ſeats above
Falls fondly back, and kindles into love:
At length ſhe conquers in the doubtful field;
That heaven ſhe ſeeks will be her Guilford's ſhield.
Now death is welcome; his approach is ſlow;
'Tis tedious longer to expect the blow.
Oh! mortals, ſhort of ſight, who think the paſt
O'erblown misfortune ſtill ſhall prove the laſt:
Alas! misfortunes travel in a train,
And oft in life form one perpetual chain;
Fear buries fear, and ills on ills attend,
Till life and ſorrow meet one common end.
She thinks that ſhe has nought but death to fear,
And death is conquer'd. Worſe than death is near:
Her rigid trials are not yet complete;
The news arrives of her great father's fate.
She ſees his hoary head, all white with age,
A victim to th' offended monarch's rage.
How great the mercy, had ſhe breath'd her laſt,
Ere the dire ſentence on her father paſt!
A fonder parent nature never knew;
And as his age increas'd, his fondneſs grew.
A parent's love ne'er better was beſtow'd;
The pious daughter in her heart o'erflow'd.
And can ſhe from all weakneſs ſtill refrain?
And ſtill the firmneſs of her ſoul maintain?
Impoſſible! a ſigh will force its way;
One patient tear her mortal birth betray;
She ſighs and weeps! but ſo ſhe weeps and ſighs,
As ſilent dews deſcend, and vapours riſe.
Celeſtial patience! how doſt thou defeat
The foe's proud menace, and elude his hate?
While paſſion takes his part, betrays our peace;
To death and torture ſwells each ſlight diſgrace;
By not oppoſing, thou doſt ills deſtroy,
And wear thy conquer'd ſorrows into joy.
Now ſhe revolves within her anxious mind,
What woe ſtill lingers in reſerve behind.
Griefs riſe on griefs, and ſhe can ſee no bound,
While nature laſts, and can receive a wound.
The ſword is drawn: The queen to rage inclin'd,
By mercy, nor by piety, confin'd.
What mercy can the zealot's heart aſſuage,
Whoſe piety itſelf converts to rage?
She thought, and ſigh'd. And now the blood began
To leave her beauteous cheek all cold and wan.
New ſorrow dimm'd the luſtre of her eye,
And on her cheek the fading roſes die.
Alas! ſhould Guilford too—when now ſhe's brought
To that dire view, that precipice of thought,
While there ſhe trembling ſtands, nor dares look down,
Nor can recede, till heaven's decrees are known;
Cure of all ills, till now her lord appears—
But not to cheer her heart and dry her tears!
Not now, as uſual, like the riſing day,
To chaſe the ſhadows and the damps away:
But, like a gloomy ſtorm at once to ſweep
And plunge her to the bottom of the deep.
Black were his robes, dejected was his air,
His voice was frozen by his cold deſpair:
Slow, like a ghoſt, he mov'd with ſolemn pace;
A dying paleneſs ſat upon his face.
Back ſhe recoil'd, ſhe ſmote her lovely breaſt,
Her eyes the anguiſh of her heart confeſs'd;
Struck to the ſoul, ſhe ſtagger'd with the wound;
And ſunk, a breathleſs image, to the ground.
Thus the fair lily, when the ſky's o'ercaſt,
At firſt but ſhudders in the feeble blaſt;
But when the winds and weighty rains deſcend,
The fair and upright ſtem is forc'd to bend;
Till broke at length, its ſnowy leaves are ſhed,
And ſtrew with dying ſweets their native bed.

BOOK II.

"Hic pietatis honos? ſic nos in ſceptra reponis?"
VIRG.

Her Guilford claſps her, beautiful in death,
And with a kiſs recalls her fleeting breath,
To tapers thus, which by a blaſt expire,
A lighted taper, touch'd, reſtores the fire:
She rear'd her ſwimming eye, and ſaw the light,
And Guilford too, or ſhe had loath'd the ſight:
Her father's death ſhe bore, deſpis'd her own,
But now ſhe muſt, ſhe will, have leave to groan:
Ah! Guilford, ſhe began, and would have ſpoke;
But ſobs ruſh'd in, and every accent broke:
Reaſon itſelf, as guſts of paſſion blew,
Was ruffled in the tempeſt, and withdrew.
So the youth loſt his image in the well,
When tears upon the yielding ſurface fell:
The ſcatter'd features ſlid into decay,
And ſpreading circles drove his face away.
To touch the ſoft affections, and controul
The manly temper of the braveſt ſoul,
What with afflicted beauty can compare,
And drops of love diſtilling from the fair?
It melts us down; our pains delight beſtow;
And we with fondneſs languiſh o'er our woe.
This Guilford prov'd; and, with exceſs of pain,
And pleaſure too, did to his boſom ſtrain
The weeping fair: ſunk deep in ſoft deſire,
Indulg'd his love, and nurs'd the raging fire:
Then tore himſelf away; and, ſtanding wide,
As fearing a relapſe of fondneſs, cry'd,

With ill-diſſembled grief; " My life, forbear!
" You wound your Guilford with each cruel tear;
" Did you not chide my grief? Repreſs your own:
" Nor want compaſſion for yourſelf alone:
" Have you beheld, how, from the diſtant main,
" The thronging waves roll on, a numerous train,
" And foam, and bellow, till they reach the ſhore;
" There burſt their noiſy pride, and are no more;
" Thus the ſucceſſive flows of human race,
" Chas'd by the coming, the preceding chaſe;
" They ſound, and ſwell, their haughty heads they rear;
" Then fall, and flatten, break, and diſappear.
" Life is a forfeit we muſt ſhortly pay;
" And where's the mighty lucre of a day?
" Why ſhould you mourn my fate? 'Tis moſt unkind;
" Your own you bore with an unſhaken mind:
" And which, can you imagine, was the dart
" That drank moſt blood, ſunk deepeſt in my heart?
" I cannot live without you; and my doom
" I meet with joy, to ſhare one common tomb.—
" And are again your tears profuſely ſpilt!
" Oh! then, my kindneſs blackens to my guilt;
" It foils itſelf, if it recall your pain;
" Life of my life, I beg you to refrain!
" The load which fate impoſes, you increaſe;
" And help Maria to deſtroy my peace."
But, oh! againſt himſelf his labour turn'd;
The more he comforted, the more ſhe mourn'd:
Compaſſion ſwells our grief; words ſoft and kind
But ſoothe our weakneſs, and diſſolve the mind:
Her ſorrow flow'd in ſtreams; nor her's alone,
While that he blam'd, he yielded to his own.
Where are the ſmiles ſhe wore, when ſhe, ſo late,
Hail'd him great partner of the regal ſtate;
When orient gems around her temples blaz'd,
And bending nations on the glory gaz'd? [treat,
'Tis now the queen's command, they both re-
So weep with dignity, and mourn in ſtate:
The forms the decent miſery with joy,
And loads with pomp the wretch ſhe would deſtroy,
A ſpacious hall is hung with black; all light
Shut out, and noon-day darken'd into night.
From the mid-roof a lamp depends on high,
Like a dim creſcent in a clouded ſky:
It ſheds a quivering melancholy gloom,
Which only ſhows the darkneſs of the room.
A ſhining ax is on the table laid;
A dreadful ſight! and glitters through the ſhade.
In this ſad ſcene the lovers are confin'd;
A ſcene of terrors, to a guilty mind!
A ſcene that would have damp'd with riſing cares,
And quite extinguiſh'd every love but theirs.
What can they do? They fix their mournful eyes—
Then Guilford, thus abruptly; " I deſpiſe
" An empire loſt; I fling away the crown;
" Numbers have laid that bright deluſion down;
" But where's the Charles, or Diocleſian where,
" Could quit the blooming, wedded, weeping fair?
" Oh! to dwell ever on thy lip! to ſtand
" In full poſſeſſion of thy ſnowy hand!
" And, through th' unclouded cryſtal of thine eye,
" The heavenly treaſures of the mind to ſpy!
" Till rapture reaſon happily deſtroys,
" And my ſoul wanders through immortal joys!
" Give me the world, and aſk me, Where's my
" bliſs?
" I claſp thee to my breaſt, and anſwer, This.
" And ſhall the grave"—He groans, and can no
more;
But all her charms in ſilence traces o'er;
Her lip, her cheek, and eye, to wonder wrought;
And, wondering, ſees, in ſad preſaging thought,
From that fair neck, that world of beauty fall,
And roll along the duſt, a ghaſtly ball!
Oh! let thoſe tremble, who are greatly bleſs'd!
For who, but Guilford, could be thus diſtreſs'd?
Come hither, all you happy, all you great,
From flowery meadows, and from rooms of ſtate;
Nor think I call, your pleaſures to deſtroy,
But to refine, and to exalt your joy:
Weep not; but, ſmiling, fix your ardent care
On nobler titles than the brave or fair.
Was ever ſuch a mournful, moving ſight?
See, if you can, by that dull, trembling light:
Now they embrace; and, mix'd with bitter woe,
Like Iſis and her Thames, one ſtream they flow:
Now they ſtart wide; fix'd in benumbing care,
They ſtiffen into ſtatues of deſpair:
Now, tenderly ſevere, and fiercely kind,
They ruſh at once; they fling their cares behind,
And claſp, as if to death; new vows repeat;
And, quite wrapp'd up in love, forget their fate.
A ſhort deluſion! for the raging pain
Returns; and their poor hearts muſt bleed again."
Meantime, the queen new cruelty decreed;
But, ill content that they ſhould only bleed,
A prieſt is ſent; who, with inſidious art,
Inſtills his poiſon into Suffolk's heart;
And Guilford drank it: Hanging on the breaſt,
He from his childhood was with Rome poſſeſt.
When now the miniſters of death draw nigh,
And in her deareſt lord ſhe firſt muſt die,
The ſubtle prieſt, who long had watch'd to find
The moſt unguarded paſſes of her mind,
Beſpoke her thus: " Grieve not; 'tis in your " power
" Your lord to reſcue from this fatal hour."
Her boſom pants; ſhe draws her breath with pain;
A ſudden horror thrills through every vein;
Life ſeems ſuſpended, on his words intent;
And her ſoul trembles for the great event.
The prieſt proceeds: " Embrace the faith of " Rome,
" And ward your own, your lord's, and father's doom.
Ye bleſſed ſpirits! now your charge ſuſtain;
The paſt was eaſe; now firſt ſhe ſuffers pain.
Muſt ſhe pronounce her father's death? muſt ſhe
Bid Guilford bleed?—It muſt not, cannot, be.
It canact be! But 'tis the Chriſtian's praiſe,
Above impoſſibilities to raiſe
The weakneſs of our nature; and deride
Of vain philoſophy the boaſted pride.
What though our feeble ſinews ſcarce impart
A moment's ſwiftneſs to the feather'd dart;
Though tainted air our vigorous youth can break,
And a chill blaſt the hardy warrior ſhake,
Yet are we ſtrong: Hear the loud tempeſt roar;
From eaſt to weſt, and call us weak no more;

The lightning's unresisted force proclaims
Our might; and thunders raise our humble names;
'Tis our Jehovah fills the heavens; as long
As he shall reign Almighty, we are strong:
We, by devotion, borrow from his throne;
And almost make Omnipotence our own:
We force the gates of heaven, by fervent prayer;
And call forth triumph out of man's despair.
Our lovely mourner, kneeling, lifts her eyes
And bleeding heart, in silence, to the skies,
Devoutly sad—Then, brightening, like the day,
When sudden winds sweep scatter'd clouds away,
Shining in majesty, till now unkown;
And breathing life and spirit scarce her own;
She, rising, speaks: "If these the terms——"
Here, Guilford, cruel Guilford, (barbarous man!
Is this thy love?) as swift as lightning ran;
O'erwhelm'd her with tempestuous sorrow fraught,
And stifled, in its birth, the mighty thought;
Then bursting fresh into a flood of tears,
Fierce, resolute, delirious with his fears;
His fears for her alone: he beat his breast,
And thus the fervour of his soul express:
"Oh! let thy thought o'er our past converse rove,
"And shew one moment uninflam'd with love!
"Oh! if thy kindness can no longer last,
"In pity to thyself, forget the past!
"Else wilt thou never, void of shame and fear,
"Pronounce his doom, whom thou hast held so dear:
"Thou who hast took me to thy arms, and swore
"Empires were vile, and fate could give no more;
"That to continue, was its utmost power,
"And make the future like the present hour,
"Now call a ruffian; bid his cruel sword
"Lay wide the bosom of thy worthless lord;
"Transfix his heart (since you its love disclaim),
"And stain his honour with a traitor's name.
"This might perhaps be borne without remorse;
"But sure a father's pangs will have their force!
"Shall his good age, so near its journey's end,
"Through cruel torment to the grave descend?
"His shallow blood all issue at a wound,
"Wash a slave's feet, and smoke upon the ground?
"But he to you has ever been severe;
"Then take your vengeance"—Suffolk now drew near;
Bending beneath the burden of his care;
His robes neglected, and his head was bare;
Decrepit winter, in the yearly ring,
Thus slowly creeps, to meet the blooming spring:
Downward he cast a melancholy look;
Thrice turn'd, to hide his grief; then faintly spoke,
"Now deep in years, and forward in decay,
"That ax can only rob me of a day;
"For thee, my soul's desire! I can't refrain;
"And shall my tears, my last tears, flow in vain?
"When you shall know a mother's tender name,
"My heart's distress no longer will you blame."
At this, afar his bursting groans were heard;
The tears ran trickling down his silver beard:
He snatch'd her hand, which to his lips he prest,
And bid her plant a dagger in his breast;
Then, sinking, call'd her piety unjust,
And soil'd his hoary temples in the dust.
Hard-hearted men! will you no mercy know?
Has the queen brib'd you to distress her foe?
O weak deserters to misfortune's part,
By false affection thus to pierce her heart!
When she had soar'd, to let your arrows fly,
And fetch her bleeding from the middle sky!
And can her virtue, springing from the ground,
Her flight recover, and disdain the wound,
When cleaving love and human interest bind
The broken force of her aspiring mind;
As round the generous eagle, which in vain
Exerts her strength, the serpent wreathes his train,
Her struggling wings entangles, curling plies
His poisonous tail, and stings her as she flies!
While yet the blow's first dreadful weight she feels,
And with its force her resolution reels;
Large doors, unfolding with a mournful sound,
To view discover, weltering on the ground,
Three heedless trunks, of those whose arms maintain'd,
And in her wars immortal glory gain'd;
The lifted ax assur'd her ready doom,
And silent mourners sadden'd all the room.
Shall I proceed; or here break off my tale?
Nor truths, to stagger human faith, reveal.
She met this utmost malice of her fate
With Christian dignity, and pious state:
The beating storm's propitious rage she blest,
And all the martyr triumph'd in her breast:
Her lord and father, for a moment's space,
She strictly folded in her soft embrace!
Then thus she spoke, while angels heard on high,
And sudden gladness smil'd along the sky:
"Your over-fondness has not mov'd my hate;
"I am well pleas'd you make my death so great;
"I joy I cannot save you; and have given
"Two lives, much dearer than my own to heaven,
"If so the queen decrees* :—But I have cause
"To hope my blood will satisfy the laws;
"And there is mercy still, for you, in store:
"With me the bitterness of death is o'er.
"He shot his sting in that farewell embrace;
"And all, that is to come, is joy and peace.
"Then let mistaken sorrow be suppress,
"Nor seem to envy my approaching rest."
Then, turning to the ministers of fate,
She, smiling, says, "My victory's complete:
"And tell your queen, I thank her for the blow,
"And grieve my gratitude I cannot show:
"A poor return I leave in England's crown,
"For everlasting pleasure and renown:
"Her guilt alone allays this happy hour;
"Her guilt—the only vengeance in her power."
Not Rome, untouch'd with sorrow, heard her fate;
And fierce Maria pity'd her too late.

* Here she embraces them.

LOVE OF FAME, THE UNIVERSAL PASSION.

IN SEVEN CHARACTERISTICAL SATIRES.

" —— Fulgente trahit conſtrictos gloria curru
" Non minus ignotos generoſis."——Hor.

PREFACE.

These ſatires have been favourably received at home and abroad. I am not conſcious of the leaſt malevolence to any particular perſon through all the characters; though ſome perſons may be ſo ſelfiſh as to engroſs a general application to themſelves. A writer in polite letters ſhould be content with reputation; the private amuſement he finds in his compoſitions; the good influence they have on his ſeverer ſtudies; that admiſſion they give him to his ſuperiors; and the poſſible good effect they may have on the public; or elſe he ſhould join to his politeneſs ſome more lucrative qualification.

But it is poſſible, that ſatire may not do much good: men may riſe in their affections to their follies, as they do to their friends, when they are abuſed by others: It is much to be feared, that miſconduct will never be chaſed out of the world by ſatire; all therefore that is to be ſaid for it is, that miſconduct will certainly be never chaſed out of the world by ſatire, if no ſatires are written: nor is that term unapplicable to graver compoſitions. Ethics, Heathen and Chriſtian, and the Scriptures themſelves, are in a great meaſure a ſatire on the weakneſs and iniquity of men; and ſome part of that ſatire is in verſe too: nay, in the firſt ages, philoſophy and poetry were the ſame thing; wiſdom wore no other dreſs: ſo that I hope theſe ſatires will be the more eaſily pardoned that misfortune by the ſevere. If they like not the faſhion, let them take them by the weight; for ſome weight they have, or the author has failed in his aim. Nay, hiſtorians themſelves may be conſidered as ſatiriſts, and ſatiriſts moſt ſevere; ſince ſuch are moſt human actions, that to relate is to expoſe them.

No man can converſe much in the world, but at what he meets with, he muſt either be inſenſible, or grieve, or be angry, or ſmile. Some paſſion (if we are not impaſſive) muſt be moved; for the general conduct of mankind is by no means a thing indifferent to a reaſonable and virtuous man. Now to ſmile at it, and turn it into ridicule, I think moſt eligible; as it hurts ourſelves leaſt, and gives vice and folly the greateſt offence: and that for this reaſon; becauſe what men aim at by them, is generally public opinion and eſteem; which truth is the ſubject of the following ſatires; and joins them together, as ſeveral branches from the ſame root: an unity of deſign, which has not, I think, in a ſet of ſatires, been attempted before.

Laughing at the miſconduct of the world, will in a great meaſure eaſe us of any more diſagreeable paſſion about it. One paſſion is more effectually driven out by another, than by reaſon; whatever ſome may teach: For to reaſon we owe our paſſions: had we not reaſon, we ſhould not be offended at what we find amiſs: and the cauſe ſeems not to be the natural cure of any effect.

Moreover, laughing ſatire bids the faireſt for ſucceſs: the world is too proud to be fond of a ſerious tutor; and when the author is in a paſſion, the laugh generally, as in converſation, turns againſt him. This kind of ſatire only has any delicacy in it. Of this delicacy, Horace is the beſt maſter: he appears in good humour while he cenſures; and therefore his cenſure has the more weight, as ſuppoſed to proceed from judgment, not from paſſion. Juvenal is ever in a paſſion: He has little valuable but his eloquence and morality: The laſt of which I have had in my eye; but rather for emulation than imitation, through my whole work.

But though I comparatively condemn Juvenal in part of the ſixth ſatire (where the occaſion moſt required it), I endeavoured to touch on his manner; but was forced to quit it ſoon, as diſagreeable to the writer, and reader too. Boileau has joined both the Roman ſatiriſts with great ſucceſs; but has too much of Juvenal in his very ſerious Satire on Woman, which ſhould have been the gayeſt of all. An excellent critic of our own, commends Boileau's cloſeneſs, or, as he calls it, preſſneſs, particularly; whereas, it appears to me, that repetition is his fault, if any fault ſhould be imputed to him.

There are ſome proſe ſatiriſts of the greateſt delicacy and wit; the laſt of which can never, or ſhould never, ſucceed without the former. An author without it, betrays too great a contempt for mankind, and opinion of himſelf; which are bad advocates for reputation and ſucceſs. What a difference is there between the merit, if not the wit, of Cervantes and Rabelais! The laſt has a particular art of throwing a great deal of genius and learning into frolic and jeſt; but the genius and the ſcholar is all you can admire; you want the gentleman to converſe with in him: he is like a criminal who receives his life for ſome ſervices; you commend, but you pardon too. Indecency offends our pride, as men; and our unaffected taſte, as judges of compoſition: Nature has wiſely formed us with an averſion to it; and he that ſucceeds in ſpite of it, is * "aliena venia, quam ſua "providentia tutior."

Such wits, like falſe oracles of old (which were wits and cheats), ſhould ſet up for reputation among the weak, in ſome Bœotia, which was the land of oracles; for the wiſe will hold them in contempt. Some wits too, like oracles, deal in ambiguities; but not with equal ſucceſs: for though ambiguities are the firſt excellence of an impoſtor, they are the laſt of a wit.

Some ſatirical wits and humouriſts, like their father Lucian, laugh at every thing indiſcriminately; which betrays ſuch a poverty of wit, as cannot afford to part with any thing; and ſuch a want of virtue, as to poſtpone it to a jeſt. Such writers encourage vice and folly, which they pretend to combat, by ſetting them on an equal foot with better things: and while they labour to bring every thing into contempt, how can they expect their own parts ſhould eſcape? Some French writers particularly, are guilty of this in matters of the laſt conſequence; and ſome of our own. They that are for leſſening the true dignity of mankind, are not ſure of being ſucceſsful, but with regard to one individual in it. It is this conduct that juſtly makes a wit a term of reproach.

Which puts me in mind of Plato's fable of the Birth of Love: one of the prettieſt fables of all antiquity; which will hold likewiſe with regard to modern poetry. Love, ſays he, is the ſon of the Goddeſs of Poverty, and the God of Riches: he has ſent from his father his daring genius; his elevation of thought; his building caſtles in the air; his prodigality; his neglect of things ſerious and uſeful; his vain opinion of his own merit; and his affectation of preference and diſtinction: from his mother he inherits his indigence, which makes him a conſtant begger of favours; that importunity with which he begs; his flattery; his ſervility; his fear of being deſpiſed, which is inſeparable from him. This addition may be made, viz. That poetry, like love, is a little ſubject to blindneſs, which makes her miſtake her way to preferments and honours; that ſhe has her ſatirical quiver; and laſtly, that ſhe retains a dutiful admiration of her father's family; but divides her favours, and generally lives with her mother's relations.

However, this is not neceſſity, but choice: were wiſdom her governeſs, ſhe might have much more of the father than the mother; eſpecially in ſuch an age as this, which ſhows a due paſſion for her charms.

SATIRE I.

TO HIS GRACE THE DUKE OF DORSET.

" —— Tanto major Famæ ſitis eſt, quam
" Virtutis."——Juv. Sat. x.

My verſe is ſatire; Dorſet, lend your ear,
And patroniſe a muſe you cannot fear.
To poets ſacred is a Dorſet's name:
Their wonted paſſport through the gates of fame;
It bribes the partial reader into praiſe,
And throws a glory round the ſhelter'd lays:
The dazzled judgment fewer faults can ſee,
And gives applauſe to Blackmore, or to me.
But you decline the miſtreſs we purſue;
Others are fond of fame, but fame of you.

Inſtructive ſatire, true to virtue's cauſe!
Thou ſhining ſupplement of public laws!
When flatter'd crimes of a licentious age
Reproach our ſilence, and demand our rage;
When purchas'd follies, from each diſtant land,
Like arts, improve in Britain's ſkilful hand;
When the law ſhows her teeth, but dares not bite,
And South-ſea treaſures are not brought to light;
When churchmen Scripture for the claſſics quit,
Polite apoſtates from God's grace to wit;
When men grow great from their revenue ſpent,
And fly from bailiffs into parliament;
When dying ſinners, to blot out their ſcore,
Bequeath the church the leavings of a whore;
To chaſe our ſpleen, when themes like theſe increaſe,
Shall panegyric reign, and cenſure ceaſe?

Shall poeſy, like law, turn wrong to right,
And dedications waſh an Æthiop white,
Set up each ſenſeleſs wretch for nature's boaſt,
On whom praiſe ſhines, as trophies on a poſt?
Shall funeral eloquence her colours ſpread,
And ſcatter roſes on the wealthy dead?
Shall authors ſmile on ſuch illuſtrious days,
And ſatiriſe with nothing—but their praiſe?

Why ſlumbers Pope, who leads the tuneful train,
Nor hears that virtue, which he loves, complain?
Donne, Dorſet, Dryden, Rocheſter, are dead,
And guilt's chief foe, in Addiſon, is fled;
Congreve, who crown'd with laurels, fairly won,
Sits ſmiling at the goal, while others run,
He will not write; and (more provoking ſtill)
Ye gods! he will not write, and Mævius will.

Doubly diſtreſt, what author ſhall we find,
Diſcreetly daring, and ſeverely kind,
The courtly * Roman's ſhining path to tread,
And ſharply ſmile prevailing folly dead?

* Horace.

Will no ſuperior genius ſnatch the quill,
And ſave me, on the brink, from writing ill?
Though vain the ſtriſe, I'll ſtrive my voice to raiſe.
What will not men attempt for ſacred praiſe?
The love of praiſe, howe'er conceal'd by art,
Reigns, more or leſs, and glows, in every heart:
The proud, to gain it, toils on toils endure;
The modeſt ſhun it, but to make it ſure.
O'er globes, and ſceptres, now on thrones it ſwells;
Now, trims the midnight lamp in college cells:
'Tis Tory, Whig; it plots, prays, preaches, pleads,
Harangues in ſenates, ſqueaks in maſquerades.
Here, to Steele's humour makes a bold pretence;
There, bolder, aims at Pulteney's eloquence.
It aids the dancer's heel, the writer's head,
And heaps the plain with mountain's of the dead;
Nor ends with life; but nods in ſable plumes,
Adorns our herſe, and flatters on our tombs.

What is not proud? The pimp is proud to ſee
So many like himſelf in high degree:
The whore is proud her beauties are the dread
Of peeviſh virtue and the marriage-bed;
And the brib'd cuckold, like crown'd victims borne
To ſlaughter, glories in his gilded horn.

Some go to church, proud humbly to repent,
And come back much more guilty than they went:
One way they look, another way they ſteer,
Pray to the gods, but would have mortals hear;
And when their ſins they ſet ſincerely down,
They'll find that their religion has been one.

Others with wiſhful eyes on glory look,
When they have got their picture tow'rds a book:
Or pompous title, like a gaudy ſign,
Meant to betray dull ſots to wretched wine.
If at his title T——— had drop'd his quill,
T——— might have paſs'd for a great genius ſtill.
But T——— alas! (excuſe him, if you can)
Is now a ſcribbler, who was once a man.
Imperious ſome a claſſic fame demand,
For heaping up, with a laborious hand,
A waggon-load of meanings for one word,
While A's depos'd, and B with pomp reſtor'd.

Some, for renown, on ſcraps of learning doat,
And think they grow immortal as they quote.
To patch-work learn'd quotations are ally'd;
Both ſtrive to make our poverty our pride.

On gloſs how witty is a noble peer!
Did ever diamond coſt a man ſo dear?
Polite diſeaſes make ſome ideots vain;
Which, if unfortunately well, they feign.

Of folly, vice, diſeaſe, men proud we ſee;
And (ſtranger ſtill!) of blockheads' flattery;
Whoſe praiſe defames; as if a fool ſhould mean,
By ſpitting on your face, to make it clean.

Nor is't enough all hearts are ſwoln with pride,
Her power is mighty, as her realm is wide.
What can ſhe not perform? The love of fame
Made bold Alphonſus his Creator blame:
Empedocles hurl'd down the burning ſteep:
And (ſtronger ſtill!) made Alexander weep.
Nay, it holds Delia from a ſecond bed,
Though her lov'd lord has four half-months been bed.

This paſſion with a pimple have I ſeen
Retard a cauſe; and give a judge the ſpleen,
By this inſpir'd (O ne'er to be forgot!)
Some lords have learn'd to ſpell, and ſome to knot.
It makes Globoſe a ſpeaker in the houſe;
He hems, and is deliver'd of his mouſe.
It makes dear ſelf on well-bred tongues prevail,
And I the little hero of each tale.
Sick with the love of fame, what throngs pour in,
Unpeople court, and leave the ſenate thin?
My growing ſubject ſeems but juſt begun,
And, chariot-like, I kindle as I run.

Aid me, great Homer! with thy epic rules,
To take a catalogue of Britiſh fools.
Satire! had I thy Dorſet's force divine,
A knave or fool ſhould periſh in each line;
Though for the firſt all Weſtminſter ſhould plead,
And for the laſt all Greſham intercede.

Begin. Who firſt the catalogue ſhall grace?
To quality belongs the higheſt place.
My lord comes forward; forward let him come!
Ye vulgar! at your peril, give him room:
He ſtands for fame on his forefathers' feet,
By heraldry, prov'd valiant or diſcreet.
With what a decent pride he throws his eyes
Above the man by three deſcents leſs wiſe!
If virtues at his noble hands you crave,
You bid him raiſe his father's from the grave.
Men ſhould preſs forward in ſame's glorious chaſe;
Nobles look backward, and ſo loſe the race.

Let high birth triumph! What can be more great?
Nothing—but merit in a low eſtate.
To virtue's humbleſt ſon let none prefer
Vice, though deſcended from the conqueror.
Shall men, like figures, paſs for high, or baſe,
Slight, or important, only by their place?
Titles are marks of boneſt men, and wiſe;
The fool, or knave, that wears a title, lies.

They that on glorious anceſtors enlarge,
Produce their debt, inſtead of their diſcharge.
Dorſet, let thoſe who proudly boaſt their line,
Like thee, in worth hereditary, ſhine.

Vain as falſe greatneſs is, the muſe muſt own,
We want not fools to buy that Briſtol ſtone.
Mean ſons of earth, who, on a South-ſea tide
Of full ſucceſs, ſwam into wealth and pride.
Knock with a purſe of gold at Anſtis' gate,
And beg to be deſcended from the great.

When men of infamy to grandeur ſoar,
They light a torch to ſhow their ſhame the more.
Thoſe governments which curb not evils, cauſe!
And a rich knave's a libel on our laws.

Belus with ſolid glory will be crown'd;
He buys no phantom, no vain empty ſound;
But builds himſelf a name; and, to be great,
Sinks in a quarry an immenſe eſtate!
In coſt and grandeur, Chandos he'll out-do;
And Burlington, thy taſte is not ſo true.
The pile is finiſh'd; every toil is paſt;
And full perfection is arriv'd at laſt;
When, lo! my lord to ſome ſmall corner runs,
And leaves ſtate-rooms to ſtrangers and to duns.

The man who builds, and wants wherewith to pay
Provides a home from which to run away.
In Britain, what is many a lordly ſeat,
But a diſcharge in full for an eſtate?

In ſmaller compaſs lies Pygmalion's fame;
Not domes, but antique ſtatues, are his flame:
Not Fountaine's ſelf more Parian charms has known;
Nor is good Pembroke more in love with ſtone.
The bailiffs come (rude men profanely bold!)
And bid him turn his Venus into gold.
"No, ſirs, he cries; I'll ſooner rot in jail:
"Shall Grecian arts be truck'd for Engliſh bail?"
Such heads might make their very buſto's laugh:
His daughter ſtarves; but * Cleopatra's faſe.
Men, overloaded with a large eſtate,
May ſpill their treaſure in a nice conceit:
The rich may be polite; but, oh! 'tis ſad
To ſay you're curious, when we ſwear you're mad.
By your revenue meaſure your expence;
And to your funds and acres join your ſenſe.
No man is bleſs'd by accident or gueſs;
True wiſdom is the price of happineſs:
Yet few without long diſcipline are ſage;
And our youth only lays up ſighs for age.
But how, my muſe, canſt thou reſiſt ſo long
The bright temptation of the courtly throng,
Thy moſt inviting theme: The court affords
Much food for ſatire;—it abounds in lords.
"What lords are thoſe ſaluting with a grin?"
One is juſt out, and one as lately in.
"How comes it then to paſs we ſee preſide
"On both their brows an equal ſhare of pride?"
Pride, that impartial paſſion, reigns through all,
Attends our glory, nor deſerts our fall.
As in its home it triumphs in high place,
And frowns a haughty exile in diſgrace.
Some lords it bids admire their wands ſo white,
Which bloom, like Aaron's, to their raviſh'd ſight:
Some lords it bids reſign; and turns their wands,
Like Moſes', into ſerpents in their hands.
Theſe ſink, as divers, for renown; and boaſt,
With pride inverted, of their honours loſt.
But againſt reaſon ſure 'tis equal ſin,
The boaſt of merely being out, or in.
What numbers here, through odd ambition, ſtrive
To ſeem the moſt tranſported things alive?
As if by joy, deſert was underſtood:
And all the fortunate were wiſe and good.
Hence aching boſoms wear a viſage gay,
And ſtifled groans frequent the ball and play.
Completely dreſt by † Monteuil and grimace,
They take their birth-day ſuit and public face:
Their ſmiles are only part of what they wear.
Put off at night, with Lady B——'s hair.
What bodily fatigue is half ſo bad?
With anxious care they labour to be glad.
What numbers, here, would into fame advance,
Conſcious of merit, in the coxcomb's dance;
The tavern, park, aſſembly, maſk, and play,
Thoſe dear deſtroyers of the tedious day!
That wheel of ſops! that ſaunter of the town!
Call it diverſion, and the pill goes down.
Fools grin on fools, and, ſloic-like ſupport,
Without one ſigh, the pleaſures of a court.

* A famous ſtatue.

Courts can give nothing, to the wiſe and good,
But ſcorn of pomp, and love of ſolitude.
High ſtations tumult, but not bliſs, create:
None think the great unhappy, but the great:
Fools gaze, and envy; envy darts a ſting,
Which makes a ſwain as wretched as a king.
I envy none their pageantry and ſhow;
I envy none the gilding of their woe.
Give me, indulgent gods! with mind ſerene,
And guiltleſs heart, to range the ſylvan ſcene;
No ſplendid poverty, no ſmiling care,
No well-bred hate, or ſervile grandeur, there:
There pleaſing objects uſeful thoughts ſuggeſt;
The ſenſe is raviſh'd, and the ſoul is bleſt;
On every thorn delightful wiſdom grows;
In every rill a ſweet inſtruction flows.
But ſome, untaught, o'erhear the whiſpering rill,
In ſpite of ſacred leiſure, blockheads ſtill:
Nor ſhoots up folly to a nobler bloom
In her own native ſoil, the drawing-room.
The ſquire is proud to ſee his courſers ſtrain,
Or well-breath'd beagles ſweep along the plain.
Say, dear Hippolytus (whoſe drink is ale,
Whoſe erudition is a Chriſtmas-tale,
Whoſe miſtreſs is ſaluted with a ſmack,
And friend receiv'd with thumps upon the back)
When thy ſleek gelding nimbly leaps the mound,
And Ringwood opens on the tainted ground,
Is that thy praiſe? Let Ringwood's fame alone;
Juſt Ringwood leaves each animal his own;
Nor envies, when a gypſy you commit,
And ſhake the clumſy bench with country wit;
When you the dulleſt of dull things have ſaid,
And then aſk pardon for the jeſt you made.
Here breathe, my muſe! and then thy taſk renew!
Ten thouſand fools unſung are ſtill in view.
Fewer lay-atheiſts made by church debates;
Fewer great beggars fam'd for large eſtates;
Ladies, whoſe love is conſtant as the wind;
Cits, who prefer a guinea to mankind;
Fewer grave lords to Scrope diſcreetly bend;
And fewer ſhocks a ſtateſman gives his friend.
Is there a man of an eternal vein,
Who lulls the town in winter with his ſtrain,
At Bath, in ſummer, chants the reigning laſs,
And ſweetly whiſtles as the waters paſs?
Is there a tongue, like Delia's o'er her cup,
That runs for ages without winding-up?
Is there, whom his tenth epic mounts to fame?
Such, and ſuch only, might exhauſt my theme:
Nor would theſe heroes of the taſk be glad,
For who can write ſo faſt as men run mad?

SATIRE II.

My muſe, proceed, and reach thy deſtin'd end;
Though toils and danger the bold taſk attend.
Heroes and Gods make other poems fine;
Plain ſatire calls for ſenſe in every line:
Then, to what ſwarms thy faults I dare expoſe!
All friends to vice and folly are thy foes.
When ſuch the foe, a war eternal wage;
'Tis moſt ill-nature to repreſs thy rage;

And if theſe ſtrains ſome nobler muſe excite,
I'll glory in the verſe I did not write.
So weak are human-kind by nature made,
Or to ſuch weakneſs by their vice betray'd,
Almighty vanity! to thee they owe
Their zeſt of pleaſure, and their balm of woe.
Thou, like the ſun, all colours doſt contain,
Varying, like rays of light, on drops of rain.
For every ſoul finds reaſons to be proud,
Though hiſs'd and hooted by the pointing crowd.
Warm in purſuit of foxes and renown,
* Hippolytus demands the ſylvan crown;
But Florio's fame the product of a ſhower,
Grows in his garden, an illuſtrious flower!
Why teems the earth? Why melt the vernal ſkies?
Why ſhines the ſun? To make Paul † Diack riſe.
From morn to night has Florio gazing ſtood,
And wonder'd how the gods could be ſo good;
What ſhape! What hue! Was ever nymph ſo fair?
He doats! he dies! he too is rooted there.
O ſolid bliſs! which nothing can deſtroy,
Except a cat, bird, ſnail, or idle boy.
In fame's full bloom lies Florio down at night,
And wakes next day a moſt inglorious wight;
The tulip's dead! See thy fair ſiſter's fate
O C——! and be kind ere 'tis too late.
Nor are thoſe enemies I mention'd, all;
Beware, O Floriſt, thy ambition's fall.
A friend of mine indulg'd this noble flame;
A Quaker ſerv'd him, Adam was his name;
To one lov'd tulip oft the maſter went,
Hung o'er it, and whole days in rapture ſpent;
But came and miſs'd it one ill-fated hour:
He rag'd! he roar'd! "What dæmon cropt my flower?"
Serene, quoth Adam, "Lo! 'twas cruſh'd by me;
"Fall'n is the Baal to which thou bow'dſt thy knee."
But all men want amuſement; and what crime
In ſuch a paradiſe to fool their time?
None: but why proud of this? To fame they ſoar;
We grant they're idle, if they'll aſk no more.
We ſmile at floriſts, we deſpiſe their joy,
And think their hearts enamour'd of a toy:
But are thoſe wiſer whom we moſt admire,
Survey with envy, and purſue with fire?
What's he who ſighs for wealth, or fame, or power?
Another Florio doating on a flower!
A ſhort-liv'd flower; and which has often ſprung
From ſordid arts, as Florio's out of dung.
With what, O Codrus! is thy fancy ſmit?
The flower of learning, and the bloom of wit.
The gaudy ſhelves with crimſon bindings glow,
And Epictetus is a perfect beau.
How fit for thee, bound up in crimſon too,
Gilt, and, like them, devoted to the view!
Thy books are furniture. Methinks 'tis hard
That ſcience ſhould be purchas'd by the yard;
And Tonſon, turn'd upholſterer, ſend home
The gilded leather to fit up thy room.
If not to ſome peculiar end deſign'd,
Study's the ſpecious trifling of the mind;
Or is at beſt a ſecondary aim,
A chaſe for ſport alone, and not for game.
If ſo, ſure they who the mere volume prize,
But love the thicket where the quarry lies.
On buying books Lorenzo long was bent,
But found at length that it reduc'd his rent;
His farms were flown; when, lo! a ſale comes on,
A choice collection! what is to be done?
He ſells his laſt; for he the whole will buy;
Sells ev'n his houſe; nay, wants whereon to lie:
So high the generous ardour of the man
For Romans, Greeks, and Orientals ran.
When terms were drawn, and brought him by the clerk,
Lorenzo ſign'd the bargain—with his mark.
Unlearned men of books aſſume the care,
As eunuch's are the guardians of the fair.
Not in his authors' liveries alone
Is Codrus' erudite ambition ſhown:
Editions various, at high prices bought,
Inform the world what Codrus would be thought;
And to this coſt another muſt ſucceed,
To pay a ſage, who ſays that he can read;
Who titles knows, and indexes has ſeen;
But leaves to Cheſterfield what lies between;
Of pompous books who ſhuns the proud expence,
And humbly is contented with their ſenſe.
O Stanhope, whoſe accompliſhments make good
The promiſe of a long-illuſtrious blood,
In arts and manners eminently grac'd,
The ſtricteſt honour! and the fineſt taſte!
Accept this verſe; if ſatire can agree
With ſo conſummate an humanity.
By your example would Hilario mend;
How would it grace the talents of my friend,
Who, with the charms of his own genius ſmit,
Conceives all virtues are compris'd in wit!
But time his fervent petulence may cool;
For though he is a wit, he is no fool.
In time he'll learn to uſe, not waſte, his ſenſe;
Nor make a frailty of an excellence.
He ſpares nor friend nor foe; but calls to mind,
Like doom's-day, all the faults of all mankind.
What though wit tickles? tickling is unſafe,
If ſtill 'tis painful while it makes us laugh.
Who, for the poor renown of being ſmart,
Would leave a ſting within a brother's heart?
Parts may be prais'd, good-nature is ador'd;
Then draw your wit as ſeldom as your ſword;
And never on the weak; or you'll appear
As there no hero, no great genius here.
As in ſmooth oil the razor beſt is whet,
So wit is by politeneſs ſharpeſt ſet:
Their want of edge from their offence is ſeen;
Both pain us leaſt when exquiſitely keen.
The fame men give is for the joy they find;
Dull is the jeſter, when the joke's unkind.
Since Marcus, doubtleſs, thinks himſelf a wit,
To pay my compliment, what place ſo fit?
His moſt facetious * letters came to hand,
Which my firſt ſatire ſweetly reprimand:
If that a juſt offence to Marcus gave,
Say, Marcus, which art thou, a fool, or knave?

* This refers to the firſt ſatire.
† The name of a tulip.

* Letters ſent to the author, ſigned Marcus.

For all but such with caution I forbore;
That thou was either, I ne'er knew before:
I knew thee now, both what thou art, and who;
No mask so good, but Marcus must shine through:
False names are vain, thy lines their author tell;
Thy best concealment had been writing well:
But thou a brave neglect of fame hast shown,
Of others' fame, great genius! and thy own.
Write on unheeded; and this maxim know,
The man who pardons, disappoints his foe.

In malice to proud wits, some proudly lull
Their peevish reason; vain of being dull;
When some home joke has stung their solemn souls,
In vengeance they determine—to be fools;
Through spleen, that little nature gave, make less,
Quite zealous in the ways of heavines;
To lumps inanimate a fondness take;
And disinherit sons that are awake.
These, when their utmost venom they would spit,
Most barbarously tell you—"He's a wit."
Poor negroes, thus, to show their burning spite
To cacodemons, say, they're devilish white.

Lampridius, from the bottom of his breast,
Sighs o'er one child; but triumphs in the rest.
How just his grief! one carries in his head
A less proportion of the father's lead;
And is in danger, without special grace,
To rise above a justice of the peace.
The dunghill-breed of men a diamond scorn,
And feel a passion for a grain of corn;
Some stupid, plodding, money-loving wight,
Who wins their hearts by knowing black from white,
Who with much pains, exerting all his sense,
Can range aright his shillings, pounds, and pence.

The booby father craves a booby son;
And by heaven's blessing thinks himself undone,
Wants of all kinds are made to fame a plea;
One learns to lisp; another, not to see:
Miss D——, tottering, catches at your hand:
Was ever thing so pretty born to stand? [pride,
Whilst these, what nature gave, disown, through
Others affect what nature has deny'd;
What nature has deny'd, fools will pursue:
As apes are ever walking upon two.

Crassus, a grateful sage, our awe and sport!
Supports grave forms; for forms the sage support.
He hems; and cries, with an important air,
"If yonder clouds withdraw, it will be fair:"
Then quotes the Stagyrite, to prove it true;
And adds, "The learn'd delight in something new."
Is't not enough the blackhead scarce can read,
But must he wisely look, and gravely plead?
As far a formalist from wisdom sits,
In judging eyes, as libertines from wits.

These subtle wights (so blind are mortal men,
Though satire couch them with her keenest pen)
For ever will hang out a solemn face,
To put off nonsense with a better grace:
As pedlars with some hero's head make bold,
Illustrious mark! where pins are to be sold.
What's the bent brow, or neck in thought reclin'd?
The body's wisdom to conceal the mind.
A man of sense can artifice disdain;
As men of wealth may venture to go plain;
And be this truth eternal ne'er forgot,
Solemnity's a cover for a sot.
I find the fool, when I behold the screen;
For 'tis the wise man's interest to be seen.

Hence, Chesterfield, that openness of heart,
And just disdain for that poor mimic art;
Hence (manly praise!) that manner nobly free,
Which all admire, and I commend, in thee.

With generous scorn how oft hast thou survey'd
Of court and town the noontide masquerade;
Where swarms of knaves the vizor quite disgrace,
And hide secure behind a naked face?
Where nature's end of language is declin'd,
And men talk only to conceal the mind;
Where generous hearts the greatest hazard run,
And he who trusts a brother, is undone?

These all their care expend on outward show
For wealth a fame; for fame alone, the beau.
Of late at White's was young Florello seen!
How blank his look! how discompos'd his mien!
So hard it proves in grief sincere to feign!
Sunk were his spirits; for his coat was plain.

Next day his breast regain'd its wonted peace;
His health was mended with a silver lace.
A curious artist, long inur'd to toils
Of gentler sort, with combs, and fragrant oils,
Whether by chance, or by some god inspir'd,
So touch'd his curls, his mighty soul was fir'd.
The well-sworn ties an equal homage claim,
And either shoulder has its share of fame;
His sumptuous watch case, though conceal'd it lies,
Like a good conscience, solid joy supplies.
He only thinks himself (so far from vain!)
Stanhope in wit, in breeding Deloraine.
Whene'er, by seeming chance, he throws his eye
On mirrors that reflect his Tyrian dye,
With how sublime a transport leaps his heart!
But fate ordains that dearest friends must part.
In active measures, brought from France, he wheels,
And triumphs, conscious of his learned heels.

So have I seen, on some bright summer's day,
A calf of genius, debonnair and gay,
Dance on the bank, as if inspir'd by fame,
Fond of the pretty fellow in the stream.

Morose is sunk with shame, whene'er surpris'd
In linen clean, or peruke undisguis'd.
No sublunary chance his vestments fear;
Valued, like leopards, as their spots appear.
A fam'd surtout he wears, which once was blue,
And his foot swims in a capacious shoe;
One day his wife (for who can wives reclaim?)
Level'd her barbarous needle at his fame:
But open force was vain; by night she went,
And, while he slept, surpris'd the darling rent:
Where yawn'd the frieze is now become a doubt;
"And glory, at one entrance, quite shut out*."

He scorns Florello, and Florello him;
This hates the filthy creature, that the prim:
Thus in each other both these fools despise
Their own dear selves, with undiscerning eyes;
Their methods various, but alike their aim;
The lown and the fopling are the same.

* Milton.

Ye whigs and tories! thus it fares with you,
When party-rage too warmly you purſue;
Then both club nonſenſe and impetuous pride,
And folly joins whom ſentiments divide,
You vent your ſpleen as monkies when they paſs,
Scratch at the mimic monkey in the glaſs;
While both are one: and henceforth be it known,
Fools of both ſides ſhall ſtand for fools alone.
" But who art thou?" methinks Florello cries:
" Of all thy ſpecies art thou only wiſe?"
Since ſmalleſt things can give our ſins a twitch,
As croſſing ſtraws retard a paſſing witch,
Florello, thou my monitor ſhalt be;
I'll conjure thus ſome profit out of thee.
O thou myſelf! abroad our counſels roam,
And, like ill huſbands, take no care at home:
Thou too art wounded with the common dart,
And love of fame lies throbbing at thy heart;
And what wiſe means to gain it haſt thou choſe?
Know fame and fortune both are made of proſe.
Is thy ambition ſweating for a rhyme,
Thou unambitious fool, at this late time?
While I a moment name, a moment's paſt;
I'm nearer death in this verſe than the laſt:
What then is to be done? Be wiſe with ſpeed;
A fool at forty is a fool indeed.
And what ſo fooliſh as the chaſe of fame?
How vain the prize! how impotent our aim!
For what are men who graſp at praiſe ſublime,
But bubbles on the rapid ſtream of time,
That riſe, and fall, that ſwell, and are no more,
Born, and forgot, ten thouſand in an hour?

SATIRE III.

TO THE RIGHT HON. MR. DODINGTON.

Long, Dodington, in debt, I long have ſought
To eaſe the burden of my grateful thought;
And now a poet's gratitude you ſee;
Grant him two favours, and he'll aſk for three:
For whoſe the preſent glory or the gain?
You give protection, I a worthleſs ſtrain.
You love and feel the poet's ſacred flame,
And know the baſis of a ſolid fame;
Though prone to like, yet cautious to commend,
You read with all the malice of a friend;
Nor favour my attempts that way alone,
But, more to raiſe my verſe, conceal your own.
An ill-tim'd modeſty! turn ages o'er,
When wanted Britain bright examples more?
Her learning, and her genius too, decays;
And dark and cold are her declining days;
As if men now were of another caſt,
They meanly live on alms of ages paſt.
Men ſtill are men; and they who boldly dare,
Shall triumph o'er the ſons of cold deſpair;
Or, if they fail, they juſtly ſtill take place
Of ſuch who run in debt for their diſgrace;
Who borrow much, then fairly make it known,
And damn it with improvements of their own.
We bring ſome new materials, and what's old
New caſt with care, and in no borrow'd mould;
Late times the verſe may read, if theſe refuſe;
And from four critics vindicate the muſe.
" Your work is long," the critics cry. 'Tis true,
And lengthens ſtill, to take in fools like you:
Shorten my labour, if its length you blame;
For, grow but wiſe, you rob me of my game;
As hunted hags, who, while the dogs purſue,
Renounce their four legs, and ſtart up on two.
Like the bold bird upon the banks of Nile,
That picks the teeth of the dire crocodile,
Will I enjoy (dread feaſt!) the critic's rage,
And with the fell deſtroyer feed my page.
For what ambitious fools are more to blame
Than thoſe who thunder in the critic's name?
Good authors damn'd, have their revenge in this,
To ſee what wretches gain the praiſe they miſs.
Balbutius, muffled in his fable cloak,
Like an old druid from his hollow oak,
As ravens ſolemn, and as boding, cries,
" Ten thouſand worlds for the three unities!"
Ye doctors ſage, who through Parnaſſus teach,
Or quit the tub, or practiſe what you preach.
One judges as the weather dictates; right
The poem is at noon, and wrong at night:
Another judges by a ſurer gauge,
An author's principles, or parentage;
Since his great anceſtors in Flanders fell,
The poem doubtleſs muſt be written well.
Another judges by the writer's look;
Another judges, for he bought the book;
Some judge, their knack of judging wrong to keep;
Some judge, becauſe it is too ſoon to ſleep.
Thus all will judge, and with one ſingle aim,
To gain themſelves, not give the writer, fame.
The very beſt ambitiouſly adviſe,
Half to ſerve you, and half to paſs for wiſe.
Critics on verſe, as ſquibs on triumphs wait,
Proclaim the glory, and augment the ſtate;
Hot, envious, noiſy, proud, the ſcribbling fry
Burn, hiſs, and bounce, waſte paper, ſtink, and die.
Rail on, my friends! what more my verſe can crown
Than Compton's ſmile, and your obliging frown?
Not all on books their criticiſm waſte:
The genius of a diſh ſome juſtly taſte,
And eat their way to fame; with anxious thought
The ſalmon is refus'd, the turbot bought.
Impatient art rebukes the ſun's delay,
And bids December yield the fruits of May;
Their various cares in one great point combine
The buſineſs of their lives, that is—to dine.
Half of their precious day they give the feaſt;
And to a kind digeſtion ſpare the reſt.
Apicius, here, the taſter of the town,
Feeds twice a week, to ſettle their renown.
Theſe worthies of the palate guard with care
The ſacred annals of their bills of fare;
In thoſe choice books their panegyrics read,
And ſcorn the creatures that for hunger feed.
If man by feeding well commences great,
Much more the worm to whom that man is meat.
To glory ſome advance a lying claim,
Thieves of renown, and pilferers of fame:
Their front ſupplies what their ambition lacks;
They know a thouſand lords, behind their backs.
Cottil is apt to wink upon a peer,
When turn'd away, with a familiar leer;

And Harvey's eyes, unmercifully keen,
Have murder'd fops, by whom she ne'er was seen.
Niger adopts stray libels; wisely prone
To covet shame still greater than his own.
Bathyllus, in the winter of threescore,
Belies his innocence, and keeps a whore.
Absence of mind Brabantio turns to fame,
Learns to mistake, nor knows his brother's name;
Has words and thoughts in nice disorder set,
And takes a memorandum to forget.
Thus vain, not knowing what adorns or blots,
Men forge the patents that create them sots.
As love of pleasure into pain betrays,
So most grow infamous through love of praise.
But whence for praise can such an ardour rise,
When those, who bring that incense, we despise?
For such the vanity of great and small,
Contempt goes round, and all men laugh at all.
Nor can even Satire blame them; for 'tis true,
They have most ample cause for what they do.
O fruitful Britain! doubtless thou wast meant
A nurse of fools, to stock the continent.
Though Phœbus and the Nine for ever mow,
Rank folly underneath the scythe will grow.
The plenteous harvest calls me forward still,
Till I surpass in length my lawyer's bill;
A Welsh descent, which well-paid heralds damn;
Or, longer still, a Dutchman's epigram.
When cloy'd, in fury I throw down my pen,
In comes a coxcomb, and I write again.
See, Tityrus, with merriment possest,
Is burst with laughter, ere he hears the jest:
What need he stay? for when the joke is o'er,
His teeth will be no whiter than before.
Is there of these, ye fair! so great a dearth,
That you need purchase monkies for your mirth?
Some, vain of paintings, bid the world admire;
Of houses some; nay, houses that they hire:
Some (perfect wisdom!) of a beautcous wife;
And boast, like Cordeliers, a scourge for life.
Sometimes, through pride, the sexes change their airs;
My lord has vapours, and my lady swears;
Then, stranger still! on turning of the wind,
My lord wears breeches, and my lady's kind.
To show the strength, and infamy of pride,
By all 'tis follow'd, and by all deny'd.
What numbers are there, which at once pursue
Praise, and the glory to contemn it, too?
Vincenna knows self-praise betrays to shame,
And therefore lays a stratagem for fame;
Makes his approach in modesty's disguise,
To win applause; and takes it by surprise.
"To err," says he, "in small things, is my fate."
You know your answer, "he's exact in great."
"My style," says he, "is rude and full of faults."
"But oh! what sense! what energy of thoughts!"
That he wants algebra, he must confess;
"But not a soul to give our arms success."
"Ah! That's an hit indeed," Vincenna cries;
"But who in heat of blood was ever wise? [back,
"I own 'twas wrong, when thousands call'd me
"To make that hopeless, ill-advis'd, attack;
"All say, 'twas madness; nor dare I deny;
"Sure never fool so well deserv'd to die."
Could this deceive in others, to be free,
It ne'er, Vincenna, could deceive in thee;
Whose conduct is a comment to thy tongue,
So clear, the dullest cannot take thee wrong.
Thou on one sleeve wilt thy revenues wear;
And haunt the court, without a prospect there.
Are these expedients for renown? Confess
Thy little self, that I may scorn thee less.
Be wise, Vincenna, and the court forsake;
Our fortunes there, nor thou, nor I, shall make.
Even men of merit, ere their point they gain,
In hardy service make a long campaign;
Most manfully besiege the patron's gate,
And oft repuls'd, as oft attack the great
With painful art, and application warm,
And take, at last, some little place by storm;
Enough to keep two shoes on Sunday clean,
And starve upon discreetly, in Sheer-Lane.
Already this thy fortune can afford;
Then starve without the favour of my lord.
'Tis true, great fortunes some great men confer:
But often, even in doing right, they err:
From caprice, not from choice, their favours come:
They give, but think it toil to know to whom:
The man that's neareſt, yawning, they advance:
'Tis inhumanity to bless by chance.
If merit sues, and greatness is so loth
To break its downy trance, I pity both.
I grant at court, Philander, at his need,
(Thanks to his lovely wife) finds friends indeed.
Of every charm and virtue she's possest:
Philander! thou art exquisitely blest;
The public envy! now then, 'tis allow'd,
The man is found, who may be justly proud:
But, see! how sickly is ambition's taste!
Ambition feeds on trash, and lothes a feast;
For, lo! Philander, of reproach afraid,
In secret loves his wife, but keeps her maid.
Some nymphs sell reputation; others buy;
And love a market where the rates run high:
Italian music's sweet, because 'tis dear;
Their vanity is tickled, not their ear:
Their tastes would lessen if the prices fell,
And Shakspeare's wretched stuff do quite as well;
Away the disenchanted fair would throng,
And own, that English is their mother tongue.
To show how much our northern tastes refine,
Imported nymphs our peeresses outshine;
While tradesmen starve, these Philomels are gay;
For generous lords had rather give than pay.
Behold the masquerade's fantastic scene!
The legislature join'd with Drury-Lane!
When Britain calls, th' embroider'd patriots run,
And serve their country—if the dance is done.
"Are we not then allow'd to be polite?"
Yes, doubtless; but first set your notions right.
Worth of politeness is the needful ground;
Where that is wanting, this can ne'er be found.
Triflers not ev'n in trifles can excel;
'Tis solid bodies only polish well.
Great, chosen prophet! for these latter days,
To turn a willing world from righteous ways!
Well, Heydegger, dost thou thy master serve;
Well has he seen his servant should not starve,

Thou to his name haſt ſplendid temples rais'd;
In various forms of worſhip ſeen him prais'd,
Gaudy devotion, like a Roman, ſhown,
And ſung ſweet anthems in a tongue unknown.
Inferior offerings to thy god of vice
Are duly paid, in fiddles, cards, and dice;
Thy ſacrifice ſupreme, an hundred maids!
That ſolemn rite of midnight maſquerades!
If maids the quite exhauſted town denies,
An hundred head of cuckolds may ſuffice.
Thou ſmil'ſt, well pleas'd with the converted land,
To ſee the fifty churches at a ſtand.
And that thy miniſter may never fail,
But what thy hand has planted ſtill prevail,
Of minor prophets a ſucceſſion ſure
The propagation of thy zeal ſecure.
See commons, peers, and miniſters of ſtate,
In ſolomn council met, and deep debate!
What godlike enterpriſe is taking birth?
What wonder opens on th' expecting earth?
'Tis done! with loud applauſe the council rings!
Fix'd is the fate of whores and fiddle-ſtrings!
Though bold theſe truths, thou, muſe, with truths like theſe,
Wilt none offend, whom 'tis a praiſe to pleaſe:
Let others flatter to be flatter'd, thou,
Like juſt tribunals, bend an awful brow,
How terrible it were to common ſenſe,
To write a Satire which gave none offence?
And, ſince from life I take the draughts you ſee,
If men diſlike them, do they cenſure me!
The fool and knave, 'tis glorious to offend,
And godlike an attempt the world to mend;
The world, where lucky throws to blockheads fall,
Knaves know the game, and honeſt men pay all.
How hard for real worth to gain its price!
A man ſhall make his fortune in a trice,
If bleſt with pliant, though but ſlender, ſenſe,
Feign'd medeſty, and real impudence:
A ſupple knee, ſmooth tongue, an eaſy grace,
A curſe within, a ſmile upon his face;
A beauteous ſiſter, or convenient wife,
Are prizes in the lottery of life;
Genius and virtue they will ſoon defeat,
And lodge you in the boſom of the great.
To merit, is but to provide a pain
For men's refuſing what you ought to gain.
May, Dodington, this maxim fail in you,
Whom my preſaging thoughts already view
By Walpole's conduct fir'd, and friendſhip grac'd,
Still higher in your prince's favour plac'd;
And lending, here, thoſe awful councils aid,
Which you, abroad, with ſuch ſucceſs obey'd!
Bear this from one, who holds your friendſhip dear;
What moſt we wiſh, with eaſe we fancy near.

SATIRE IV.

TO THE RIGHT HON. SIR SPENCER COMPTON.

Round ſome fair tree th' ambitious woodbine grows,
And breathes her ſweets on the ſupporting boughs:
So ſweet the verſe, th' ambitious verſe ſhould be,
(O! pardon mine) that hopes ſupport from thee;
Thee, Compton, born o'er ſenates to preſide,
Their dignity to raiſe, their councils guide;
Deep to diſcern, and widely to ſurvey,
And kingdoms fates without ambition weigh;
Of diſtant virtues nice extremes to blend,
The crown's aſſerter, and the people's friend:
Nor doſt thou ſcorn, amid ſublimer views,
To liſten to the labours of the muſe;
Thy ſmiles protect her, while thy talents fire,
And 'tis but half thy glory to inſpire.
Vex'd at a public fame, ſo juſtly won,
The jealous Chremes is with ſpleen undone;
Chremes, for airy penſions of renown,
Devotes his ſervice to the ſtate and crown;
All ſchemes he knows, and, knowing, all improves,
Though Britain's thankleſs, ſtill this patriot loves:
But patriots differ; ſome may ſhed their blood,
He drinks his coffee, for the public good;
Conſults the ſacred ſteam, and there foreſees
What ſtorms, or ſun-ſhine, providence decrees;
Knows, for each day, the weather of our fate;
A Quidnunc is an almanack of ſtate.
You ſmile, and think this ſtateſman void of uſe;
Why may not time his ſecret worth produce;
Since apes can roaſt the choice Caſtanian Nut,
Since ſteeds of genius are expert at Put;
Since half the ſenate "Not content" can ſay,
Geeſe nations ſave, and puppies plots betray.
What makes him model realms, and counſel kings?
An incapacity for ſmaller things:
Poor Chremes can't conduct his own eſtate,
And thence has undertaken Europe's fate.
Gehenno leaves the realm to Chremes' ſkill,
And boldly claims a province higher ſtill:
To raiſe a name, th' ambitious boy has got,
At once, a Bible, and a ſhoulder-knot;
Deep in the ſecret, he looks through the whole,
And pities the dull rogue that ſaves his ſoul;
To talk with reverence you muſt take good heed,
Nor ſhock his tender reaſon with the Creed:
Howe'er well-bred, in public he complies,
Obliging friends alone with blaſphemies.
Peerage is poiſon, good eſtates are bad
For this diſeaſe; poor rogues run ſeldom mad.
Have not attainders brought unhop'd relief,
And falling ſtocks quite cur'd an unbelief?
While the ſun ſhines, Blunt talks with wondrous force;
But thunder mars ſmall beer, and weak diſcourſe.
Such uſeful inſtruments the weather ſhow,
Juſt as their mercury is high or low:
Health chiefly keeps an Atheiſt in the dark:
A fever argues better than a Clarke:
Let but the logic in his pulſe decay,
The Grecian he'll renounce, and learn to pray;
While C—— mourns, with an unfeigned zeal,
Th' apoſtate youth, who reaſon'd once ſo well.
C——, who makes merry with the Creed,
He almoſt thinks he diſbelieves indeed;
But only thinks ſo; to give both their due,
Satan, and he, believe, and tremble too.
Of ſome for glory ſuch the boundleſs rage,
That they're the blackeſt ſcandal of their age.

Narciſſus the Tartarian club diſclaims;
Nay, a free-maſon, with ſome terror, names;
Omits no duty; nor can envy ſay,
He miſs'd, theſe many years, the church, or play:
He makes no noiſe in parliament, 'tis true;
But pays his debts, and viſit, when 'tis due;
His character and gloves are ever clean,
And then, he can out-bow the bowing dean;
A ſmile eternal on his lip he wears,
Which equally the wiſe and worthleſs ſhares.
In gay fatigues, this moſt undaunted chief,
Patient of idleneſs beyond belief,
Moſt charitably lends the town his face,
For ornament, in every public place;
As ſure as cards, he to th' aſſembly comes,
And is the furniture of drawing-rooms:
When ombre calls, his hand and heart are free,
And, join'd to two, he fails not—to make three:
Narciſſus is the glory of his race;
For who does nothing with a better grace?
To deck my liſt, by nature were deſign'd
Such ſhining expletives of human kind,
Who want, while through blank life they dream along,
Senſe to be right, and paſſion to be wrong.
To counterpoiſe this hero of the mode,
Some for renown are ſingular and odd;
What other men diſlike, is ſure to pleaſe,
Of all mankind, theſe dear antipodes;
Through pride, not malice, they run counter ſtill,
And birth-days are their days of dreſſing ill.
Arbuthnot is a fool, and F—— a ſage,
S—ly will fright you, E—— engage;
By nature ſtreams run backward, flame deſcends,
Stones mount, and Suſſex is the worſt of friends;
They take their reſt by day, and wake by night,
And bluſh, if you ſurpriſe them in the right;
If they by change blurt out, ere well aware,
A ſwan is white, or Queenſberry is fair.
Nothing exceeds in ridicule, no doubt,
A fool in faſhion, but a fool that's out.
His paſſion for abſurdity's ſo ſtrong,
He cannot bear a rival in the wrong;
Though wrong the mode, comply; more ſenſe is ſhown
In wearing others' follies, than your own.
If what is out of faſhion moſt you prize,
Methinks you ſhould endeavour to be wiſe.
But what in oddneſs can be more ſublime
Than Sloane the foremoſt toyman of his time?
His nice ambition lies in curious fancies,
His daughter's portion a rich ſhell enhances,
And Aſhmole's baby houſe is, in his view,
Britannia's golden mine, a rich Peru!
How his eyes languiſh! how his thoughts adore
That painted coat, which Joſeph never wore!
He ſhows, on holidays, a ſacred pin,
That touch'd the ruff, that touch'd Queen Beſs's chin.
"Since that great dearth our chronicles deplore,
"Since that great plague that ſwept as many more,
"Was ever year unbleſt as this? he'll cry,
"It has not brought us one new butterfly!"
In times that ſuffer ſuch learn'd men as theſe,
Unhappy l——y! how came you to pleaſe?

Not gaudy butterflies are Lico's game;
But, in effect, his chaſe is much the ſame:
Warm in purſuit, he levées all the great,
Staunch to the foot of title and eſtate:
Where'er their lordſhips go, they never find
Or Lico, or their ſhadows, lag behind;
He ſets them ſure, where'er their lordſhips run,
Cloſe at their elbows, as a morning-dun;
As if their grandeur, by contagion wrought,
And fame was like a fever, to be caught:
But after ſeven years dance, from place to place,
The * Dane is more familiar with his grace.
Who'd be a cruteh to prop a rotten peer;
Or living pendant dangling at his ear,
For ever whiſpering ſecrets, which were blown
For months before, by trumpets, through the town?
Who'd be a glaſs, with flattering grimace,
Still to reflect the temper of his face;
Or happy pin to ſtick upon his ſleeve,
When my lord's gracious, and vouchſafes it leave;
Or cuſhion, when his heavineſs ſhall pleaſe
To loll, or thump it, for his better eaſe;
Or a vile butt, for noon, or night, beſpoke,
When the peer raſhly ſwears he'll club his joke?
Who'd ſhake with laughter, though he could not find
His lordſhip's jeſt; or, if his noſe broke wind,
For bleſſings to the gods profoundly bow,
That can cry, "Chimney ſweep," or drive a plough?
With terms like theſe, how mean the tribe that cloſe!
Scarce meaner they, who terms like theſe impoſe.
But what's the tribe moſt likely to comply?
The men of ink, or ancient authors lie;
The writing tribe, who ſhameleſs auctions hold
Of praiſe, by inch of candle to be ſold:
All men they flatter, but themſelves the moſt,
With deathleſs fame, their everlaſting boaſt:
For fame no cully makes ſo much her jeſt,
As her old conſtant ſpark, the bard profeſt.
"Boyle ſhines in council, Mordaunt in the fight,
"Pelham's magnificent; but I can write,
"And what to my great ſoul like glory dear?"
Till ſome god whiſpers in his tingling ear,
That fame's unwholeſome taken without meat,
And life is beſt ſuſtain'd by what is eat:
Grown lean, and wiſe, he curſes what he writ,
And wiſhes all his wants were in his wit.
Ah! what avails it, when his dinner's loſt,
That his triumphant name adorns a poſt?
Or that his ſhining page (provoking fate!)
Defends ſirloins, which ſons of dulneſs eat?
What foe to verſe without compaſſion hears,
What cruel proſe-man can refrain from tears,
When the poor muſe, for leſs than half a crown,
A proſtitute on every bulk in town,
With other whores undone, though not in print,
Clubs credit for Geneva in the Mint?
Ye bards! why will you ſing, though uninſpir'd?
Ye bards! why will you ſtarve, to be admir'd?
Defunct by Phœbus' laws beyond redreſs,
Why will your ſpectres haunt the frighted preſs?
Bad metre, that excreſcence of the head,
Like hair, will ſprout, although the poet's dead.

* A Daniſh Jig of the Duke of Argyll.

All other trades demand, verse-makers beg;
A dedication is a wooden leg;
A barren Labeo, the true mumper's fashion,
Exposes borrow'd brats to move compassion.
Though such myself, vile bards I discommend;
Nay more, though gentle Damon is my friend.
" Is 't then a crime to write?"—If talent rare
Proclaim the god, the crime is to forbear:
For some, though few, there are, large-minded men,
Who watch unseen the labours of the pen;
Who know the muse's worth, and therefore court,
Their deeds her theme, their bounty her support;
Who serve, unask'd, the least pretence to wit;
My sole excuse, alas! for having writ.
Argyll true wit is studious to restore;
And Dorset smiles, if Phœbus smil'd before;
Pembroke in years the long-lov'd arts admires,
And Henrietta like a muse inspires.
But, ah! not inspiration can obtain
That fame, which poets languish for in vain.
How mad their aim, who thirst for glory, strive
To grasp, what no man can possess alive!
Fame's reversion, in which men take place
(O late reversion!) at their own decease.
This truth sagacious Lintot knows so well,
He starves his authors, that their works may sell.
That fame is wealth, fantastic poets cry;
That wealth is fame, another clan reply;
Who know no guilt, no scandal, but in rags;
And swell in just proportion to their bags.
Not only the low born, deform'd, and old,
Think glory nothing but the beams of gold;
The first young lord, which in the Mall you meet,
Shall match the veriest hunks in Lombard-street,
From rescued candles' ends, who rais'd a sum,
And starves, to join a penny to a plumb.
A beardless miser! 'Tis a guilt unknown
To former times, a scandal all our own.
Of ardent lovers, the true modern band
Will mortgage Celia to redeem their land.
For love, young, noble, rich, Castalio dies;
Name but the fair, love swells into his eyes.
Divine Monimia, thy fond fears lay down;
No rival can prevail—but half a crown.
He glories to late times to be convey'd,
Not for the poor he has reliev'd, but made:
Not such ambition his great fathers fir'd,
When Harry conquer'd, and half France expir'd:
He'd be a slave, a pimp, a dog, for gain:
Nay, a dull sheriff for his golden chain.
" Who'd be a slave?" the gallant Colonel cries,
While love of glory sparkles from his eyes:
To deathless fame he loudly pleads his right—
Just is his title—for he will not fight:
All soldiers valour, all divines have grace,
As maids of honour beauty—by their place:
But, when indulging on the last campaign,
His lofty terms climb o'er the hills of slain;
He gives the foes he slew, at each vain word,
A sweet revenge, and half absolves his sword.
Of boasting more than of a bomb afraid,
A soldier should be modest as a maid:
Fame is a bubble the reserv'd enjoy;
Who strive to grasp it, as they touch, destroy:
'Tis the world's debt to deeds of high degree;
But if you pay yourself, the world is free.
Were there no tongue to speak them but his own,
Augustus' deeds in arms had ne'er been known.
Augustus' deeds! if that ambiguous name
Confounds my reader, and misguides his aim,
Such is the prince's worth, of whom I speak;
The Roman would not blush at the mistake.

SATIRE V.

ON WOMEN.

" O fairest of creation! last and best! [cell'd,
" Of all God's works! Creature in whom ex-
" Whatever can to sight, or thought, be form'd
" Holy, divine, good, amiable, or sweet!
" How art thou lost!"— MILTON.

Nor reigns ambition in bold man alone;
Soft female hearts the rude invader own:
But there, indeed, it deals in nicer things,
Than routing armies, and dethroning kings:
Attend, and you discern it in the fair
Conduct a finger, or reclaim a hair;
Or roll the lucid orbit of an eye;
Or, in full joy, elaborate a sigh. [blame;
The sex we honour, though their faults we
Nay, thank their faults for such a fruitful theme:
A theme, fair———! doubly kind to me,
Since satirizing those is praising thee;
Who wouldst not bear, too modestly refin'd,
A panegyric of a grosser kind.
Britannia's daughters, much more fair, than nice,
Too fond of admiration, lose their price;
Worn in the public eye, give cheap delight
To throngs, and tarnish to the fated sight:
As unreserv'd, and beauteous as the sun,
Through every sign of vanity they run;
Assemblies, parks, coarse feasts in city halls,
Lectures, and trials, plays, committees, balls,
Wells, bedlams, executions, Smithfield scenes,
And fortune-tellers caves, and lions dens,
Taverns, exchanges, bridewells, drawing-rooms,
Installments, pillories, coronations, tombs,
Tumblers, and funerals, puppet-shows, reviews,
Sales, races, rabbits, (and, still stranger!) pews.
Clarinda's bosom burns, but burns for fame;
And love lies vanquish'd in a nobler flame;
Warm gleams of hope she, now, dispenses; then,
Like April suns, dives into clouds again:
With all her lustre, now, her lover warms;
Then, out of ostentation, hides her charms:
'Tis, next, her pleasure sweetly to complain,
And to be taken with a sudden pain;
Then, she starts up, all ecstasy and bliss,
And is, sweet soul! just as sincere in this:
O how she rolls her charming eyes in spight!
And looks delightfully with all her might!
But, like our heroes, much more brave than wise,
She conquers for the triumph, not the prize.
Zara resembles Ætna crown'd with snows;
Without she freezes, and within she glows:
'Twice ere the sun descends, with zeal inspir'd,
From the vain converse of the world retir'd,

She reads the pſalms and chapters for the day,
In — Cleopatra, or the laſt new play.
Thus gloomy Zara, with a ſolemn grace,
Deceives mankind, and hides behind her face.
Nor far beneath her in renown is ſhe,
Who through good-breeding is ill company;
Whoſe manners will not let her larum ceaſe,
Who thinks you are unhappy, when at peace;
To find you news, who racks her ſubtle head,
And vows—" that her great-grandfather is dead."
A dearth of words a woman need not fear;
But 'tis a taſk indeed to learn—to bear:
In that the ſkill of converſation lies;
That ſhows, or makes you both polite and wiſe.
Xantippe cries, " Let nymphs who nought can ſay
" Be loſt in ſilence and reſign the day;
" And let the guilty wife her guilt confeſs,
" By tame behaviour, and a ſoft addreſs!"
Through virtue, ſhe refuſes to comply
With all the dictates of humanity;
Through wiſdom, ſhe refuſes to ſubmit
To wiſdom's rules, and raves to prove her wit;
Then, her unblemiſh'd honour to maintain,
Rejects her huſband's kindneſs with diſdain:
But if by chance an ill-adapted word
Drops from the lip of her unwary lord,
Her darling china, in a whirlwind ſent,
Juſt intimates the lady's diſcontent.
Wine may indeed excite the meekeſt dame;
But keen Xantippe, ſcorning borrow'd flame,
Can vent her thunders, and her lightnings play,
O'er cooling gruel, and compoſing tea:
Nor reſts by night, but, more ſincere than nice,
She ſhakes the curtains with her kind advice:
Doubly like echo, ſound is her delight,
And the laſt word is her eternal right.
Is 't not enough plagues, wars, and famines, riſe
To laſh our crimes, but muſt our wives be wiſe?
Famine, plague, war, and an unnumber'd throng
Of guilt-avenging ills, to man belong:
What black, what ceaſeleſs cares beſiege our ſtate!
What ſtrokes we feel from fancy, and from fate!
If fate forbears us, fancy ſtrikes the blow;
We make misfortune; ſuicides in woe.
Superfluous aid! unneceſſary ſkill!
Is nature backward to torment, or kill?
How oft the noon, how oft the midnight bell,
(That iron tongue of death!) with ſolemn knell,
On folly's errands as we vainly roam, [home?
Knocks at our hearts, and finds our thoughts from Men drop ſo faſt, ere life's mid ſtage we tread,
Few know ſo many friends alive, as dead.
Yet, as immortal, in our up-hill chaſe,
We preſs coy fortune with unſlacken'd pace;
Our ardent labours for the toys we ſeek,
Join night to day, and Sunday to the week:
Our very joys are anxious, and expire
Between ſatiety and fierce deſire.
Now what reward for all this grief and toil?
But one; a female friend's endearing ſmile;
A tender ſmile, our ſorrows' only balm,
And, in life's tempeſt, the ſad ſailor's calm.
How have I ſeen a gentle nymph draw nigh,
Peace in her air, perſuaſion in her eye;
Victorious tenderneſs! it all o'ercame,
Huſbands look'd mild, and ſavages grew tame.
The ſylvan race our active nymphs purſue;
Man is not all the game they have in view:
In woods and fields their glory they complete;
There maſter Betty leaps a five-barr'd gate;
While fair Miſs Charles to toilets is confin'd,
Nor raſhly tempts the barbarous ſun and wind.
Some nymphs affect a more heroic breed,
And volt from hunters to the managl'd ſteed;
Command his prancings with a martial air,
And Fobert has the forming of the fair.
More than one ſteed muſt Delia's empire feel,
Who ſits triumphant o'er the flying wheel;
And as ſhe guides it through th' admiring throng;
With what an air ſhe ſmacks the ſilken thong!
Graceful as John, ſhe moderates the reins,
And whiſtles ſweet her diuretic ſtrains:
Seſoſtris like, ſuch charioteers as theſe
May drive ſix harneſs'd monarchs, if they pleaſe:
They drive, row, run, with love of glory ſmit,
Leap, ſwim, ſhoot flying, and pronounce on wit.
O'er the belle-lettres lovely Daphne reigns;
Again the god Apollo wears her chains:
With legs toſs'd high, on her ſophee ſhe ſits,
Vouchſafing audience to contending wits:
Of each performance ſhe's the final teſt;
One act read o'er, ſhe propheſies the reſt;
And then, pronouncing with deciſive air,
Fully convinces all the town—ſhe's fair.
Had lovely Daphne Hecateſſa's face,
How would her elegance of taſte decreaſe:
Some ladies' judgment in their features lies,
And all their genius ſparkles from their eyes.
But hold, ſhe cries, lampooner! have a care;
Muſt I want common ſenſe, becauſe I'm fair?
O no: ſee Stella: her eyes ſhine as bright,
As if her tongue was never in the right;
And yet what real learning, judgment, fire!
She ſeems inſpir'd, and can herſelf inſpire:
How then (if malice rul'd not all the fair)
Could Daphne publiſh, and could ſhe forbear?
We grant that beauty is no bar to ſenſe,
Nor is 't a ſanction for impertinence.
Sempronia lik'd her man; and well ſhe might
The youth in perſon, and in parts, was bright;
Poſſeſs'd of every of virtue, grace, and art,
That claims juſt empire o'er the female heart:
He met her paſſion, all her ſighs return'd,
And, in full rage of youthful ardour burn'd:
Large his poſſeſſions, and beyond her own;
Their bliſs the theme and envy of the town:
The day was fix'd, when, with one acre more,
In ſtepp'd deform'd, debauch'd, diſeas'd, three-ſcore.
The fatal ſequel I, through ſhame, forbear:
Of pride and avarice who can cure the fair?
Man's rich with little, were his judgment true;
Nature is frugal, and her wants are few;
Thoſe few wants anſwer'd, bring ſincere delights;
But fools create themſelves new appetites:
Fancy and pride ſeek things at vaſt expenſe,
Which reliſh not to reaſon, nor to ſenſe.
When ſurfeit, or unthankfulneſs, deſtroys,
In nature's narrow ſphere, our ſolid joys,

In fancy's airy land of noiſe and ſhow,
Where nought but dreams, no real pleaſures grow;
Like cats in air-pumps, to ſubſiſt we ſtrive
On joys too thin to keep the ſoul alive.
Lemira's ſick; make haſte; the doctor call:
He comes; but where's his patient? At the ball.
The doctor ſtares; her woman curt'ſies low,
And cries, "My Lady, Sir, is always ſo:
"Diverſions put her maladies to flight;
"True, ſhe can't ſtand, but ſhe can dance all night:
"I've known my lady (for ſhe loves a tune)
"For fevers take an opera in June:
"And, though perhaps you'll think the practice bold,
"A midnight park is ſovereign for a cold:
"With colics, breakfaſts of green fruit agree;
"With indigeſtions, ſupper juſt at three."
A ſtrange alternative, replies Sir Hans,
Muſt women have a doctor, or a dance?
Though ſick to death, abroad they ſafely roam,
But droop and die, in perfect health, at home:
For want—but not of health, are ladies ill;
And tickets cure beyond the doctor's bill.
Alas, my heart! how languiſhingly fair
Yon lady lolls! with what a tender air!
Pale as a young dramatic author, when,
O'er darling lines, fell Cibber waves his pen.
Is her lord angry, or has * Veny chid?
Dead is her father, or the maſk forbid?
"Late ſitting-up has turn'd her roſes white."
Why went ſhe not to bed? "Becauſe 'twas night."
Did ſhe then dance, or play? "Nor this, nor that."
Well night ſoon ſteals away in pleaſing chat.
"No, all alone, her prayers ſhe rather choſe;
"Than be that wretch to ſleep till morning roſe."
Then Lady Cynthia, miſtreſs of the ſhade,
Goes with the faſhionable owls, to bed:
This her pride covets, this her health denies;
Her ſoul is ſilly, but her body's wiſe.
Others, with curious arts, dim charms revive,
And triumph in the bloom of fifty-five.
You, in the morning, a fair nymph invite;
To keep her word, a brown one comes at night:
Next day ſhe ſhines in gloſſy black; and then
Revolves into her native red again:
Like a dove's neck, ſhe ſhifts her tranſient charms,
And is her own dear rival in your arms.
But one admirer has the painted laſs;
Nor finds that one, but in her looking-glaſs:
Yet Laura's beautiful to ſuch exceſs,
That all her art ſcarce makes her pleaſe us leſs.
To deck the female cheek, he only knows,
Who paints leſs fair the lily and the roſe.
How gay they ſmile! ſuch bleſſings nature pours,
O'erſtock'd mankind enjoy but half her ſtores:
In diſtant wilds, by human eyes unſeen,
She rears her flowers, and ſpreads her velvet green:
Pure gurgling rills the lonely deſert trace,
And waſte their muſic on the ſavage race.
Is nature then a niggard of her bliſs?
Repine we guiltleſs in a world like this?

But our lewd taſtes her lawful charms refuſe,
And painted art's deprav'd allurements chooſe.
Such Fulvia's paſſion for the town; freſh air
(An odd effect!) gives vapours to the fair;
Green fields, and ſhady groves, and cryſtal ſprings,
And larks, and nightingales, are odious things;
But ſmoke, and duſt, and noiſe, and crowds, delight;
And to be preſs'd to death, tranſports her quite;
Where ſilver rivulets play through flowery meads,
And woodbines give their ſweets, and limes their ſhades,
Black kennels' abſent odours ſhe regrets,
And ſtops her noſe at beds of violets.
Is ſtormy life preferr'd to the ſerene?
Or is the public to the private ſcene?
Retir'd, we tread a ſmooth and open way; [ſtray;
Through briars and brambles in the world we
Stiff oppoſition, and perplex'd debate,
And thorny care, and rank and ſtinging hate,
Which choke our paſſage, our career controul,
And wound the firmeſt temper of our ſoul.
O ſacred ſolitude! divine retreat!
Choice of the prudent! envy of the great!
By thy pure ſtream, or in thy waving ſhade,
We court fair wiſdom, that celeſtial maid:
The genuine offſpring of her lov'd embrace,
(Strangers on earth!) are innocence and peace:
There, from the ways of men laid ſafe aſhore,
We ſmile to hear the diſtant tempeſt roar;
There, bleſs'd with health, with buſineſs unperplex'd,
This life we reliſh, and inſure the next;
There too the muſes ſport; theſe numbers free,
Pierian Eaſtbury! I owe to thee.
There ſport the muſes; but not there alone:
Their ſacred force Amelia feels in town.
Nought but a genius can a genius fit;
A wit herſelf, Amelia weds a wit:
Both wits! though miracles are ſaid to ceaſe.
Three days, three wondrous days! they liv'd in peace;
With the fourth ſun a warm diſpute aroſe,
On Durfey's poeſy, and Bunyan's proſe:
The learned war both wage with equal force,
And the fifth morn concluded the divorce.
Phœbe, though ſhe poſſeſſes nothing leſs,
Is proud of being rich in happineſs:
Laboriouſly purſues deluſive toys,
Content with pains, ſince they're reputed joys.
With what well-acted tranſport will ſhe ſay,
"Well, ſure, we were ſo happy yeſterday!
"And then that charming party for to-morrow!"
Though, well ſhe knows, 'twill languiſh into ſorrow:
But ſhe dares never boaſt the preſent hour;
So groſs that cheat, it is beyond her power:
For ſuch is or our weakneſs, or our curſe,
Or rather ſuch our crime, which ſtill is worſe,
The preſent moment, like a wife, we ſhun,
And ne'er enjoy, becauſe it is our own.
Pleaſures are few, and fewer we enjoy;
Pleaſure, like quickſilver, is bright and coy;
We ſtrive to graſp it with our utmoſt ſkill,
Still it eludes us, and it glitters ſtill;

* Lap dog.

If seiz'd at last, compute your mighty gains;
What is it, but rank poison in your veins?
As Flavia in her glass an angel spies,
Pride whispers in her ear pernicious lies;
Tells her, while she surveys a face so fine,
There's no satiety of charms divine:
Hence, if her lover yawns, all chang'd appears
Her temper, and she melts (sweet soul!) in tears:
She, fond and young, last week her wish enjoy'd,
In soft amusement all the night employ'd;
The morning came, when Strephon, waking, found
(Surprising sight!) his bride in sorrow drown'd.
"What miracle (says Strephon) makes thee weep?
"Ah, barbarous man! (she cries) how could you
"—sleep?"
Men love a mistress, as they love a feast;
How grateful one to touch, and one to taste!
Yet sure there is a certain time of day,
We wish our mistress and our meat away:
But soon the sated appetites return,
Again our stomachs crave, our bosoms burn:
Eternal love let man then never swear;
Let women never triumph, nor despair;
Nor praise, nor blame too much the warm or chill;
Hunger and love are foreign to the will.
There is indeed a passion more refin'd,
For those few nymphs whose charms are of the mind:
But not of that unfashionable set
Is Phyllis; Phyllis and her Damon met.
Eternal love exactly hits her taste;
Phyllis demands eternal love at least.
Embracing Phyllis with soft-smiling eyes,
Eternal love I vow, the swain replies:
But say, my all, my mistress, and my friend!
What day next week th' eternity shall end?
Some nymphs prefer astronomy to love;
Elope from mortal man, and range above.
The fair philosopher to Rowley flies,
Where in a box the whole creation lies:
She sees the planets in their turns advance,
And scorns, Poitier, thy sublunary dance:
Of Desaguliers she bespeaks fresh air;
And Whiston has engagements with the fair.
What vain experiments Sophronia tries!
'Tis not in air-pumps the gay colonel dies.
But though to-day this rage of science reigns,
(O fickle sex!) soon end her learned pains.
Lo! Pug from Jupiter her heart has got,
Turns out the stars, and Newton is a sot.
To —— turn; she never took the height
Of Saturn, yet is ever in the right.
She strikes each point with native force of mind,
While puzzled learning blunders far behind,
Graceful to sight, and elegant to thought,
The great are vanquish'd, and the wise are taught.
Her breeding finish'd, and her temper sweet,
When serious, easy; and when gay, discreet;
In glittering scenes o'er her own heart severe;
In crowds, collected; and in courts, sincere;
Sincere and warm, with zeal well understood,
She takes a noble pride in doing good;
Yet not superior to her sex's cares,
The modes she fixes by the gown she wears;
Of silks and china she's the last appeal;
In these great points she leads the commonweal;
And if disputes of empire rise between
Mechlin the queen of lace, and Colberteen,
'Tis doubt! 'tis darkness! till suspended fate
Assumes her nod, to close the grand debate.
When such her mind, why will the fair express
Their emulation only in their dress?
But oh! the nymph that mounts above the skies,
And gratis clears religious mysteries,
Resolv'd the church's welfare to ensure,
And make her family a fine-cure:
The theme divine at cards she'll not forget,
But takes in texts of Scripture at picquet;
In those licentious meetings acts the prude,
And thanks her Maker that her cards are good.
What angels would those be, who thus excel
In theologics, could they sew as well!
Yet why should not the fair her text pursue?
Can she more decently the doctor woo?
'Tis hard, too, she who makes no use but chat
Of her religion, should be barr'd in that.
Isaac, a brother of the canting strain,
When he has knock'd at his own skull in vain,
To beauteous Marcia often will repair
With a dark text, to light it at the fair.
O! how his pious soul exults to find
Such love for holy men in womankind!
Charm'd with her learning, with what rapture he Hangs on her bloom, like an industrious bee;
Hums round about her, and with all his power
Extracts sweet wisdom from so fair a flower!
The young and gay declining, Appia flies
At nobler game, the mighty and the wise:
By nature more an eagle than a dove,
She impiously prefers the world to love.
Can wealth give happiness? look round, and see
What gay distress! what splendid misery!
Whatever fortune lavishly can pour,
The mind annihilates, and calls for more.
Wealth is a cheat; believe not what it says;
Like any lord it promises—and pays.
How will the miser startle, to be told
Of such a wonder, as insolvent gold!
What nature wants has an intrinsic weight;
All more is but the fashion of the plate,
Which, for one moment, charms the fickle view;
It charms us now; anon we cast anew;
To some fresh birth of fancy more inclin'd:
Then wed not acres, but a noble mind.
Mistaken lovers, who make worth their care,
And think accomplishments will win the fair:
The fair, 'tis true, by genius should be won,
As flowers unfold their beauties to the sun;
And yet in female scales a fop out-weighs,
And wit must wear the willow and the bays.
Nought shines so bright in vain Liberia's eye
As riot, impudence, and perfidy;
The youth of fire, that has drunk deep, and play'd,
And kill'd his man, and triumph'd o'er his maid;
For him, as yet unhang'd, she spreads her charms,
Snatches the dear destroyer to her arms;
And amply gives (though treated long amiss)
The man of merit his revenge in this.
If you resent, and wish a woman ill,
But turn her o'er one moment to her will.
The languid lady next appears in state,
Who was not born to carry her own weight;

She lolls, reels, ſtaggers, till ſome foreign aid
To her own ſtature lifts the feeble maid.
Then, if ordain'd to ſo ſevere a doom,
She, by juſt ſtages, journeys round the room:
But, knowing her own weakneſs, ſhe deſpairs
To ſcale the Alps—that is, aſcend the ſtairs.
My fan! let others ſay, who laugh at toil;
Fan! hood! glove! ſcarf! is her laconic ſtyle;
And that is ſpoke with ſuch a dying fall,
That Betty rather ſees, than hears the call:
The motion of her lips, and meaning eye,
Piece out th' idea her faint words deny.
O liſten with attention moſt profound!
Her voice is but the ſhadow of a ſound.
And help, oh help! her ſpirits are ſo dead,
One hand ſcarce lifts the other to her head.
If there a ſtubborn pin it triumphs o'er,
She pants! ſhe ſinks away! and is no more.
Let the robuſt and the gigantic carve,
Life is not worth ſo much, ſhe'd rather ſtarve:
But chew ſhe muſt herſelf! ah cruel fate!
That Roſalinda can't by proxy eat.
An antidote in female caprice lies
(Kind heaven!) againſt the poiſon of their eyes.
Thaleſtris triumphs in a manly mien;
Loud is her accent, and her phraſe obſcene.
In fair and open dealing where's the ſhame?
What nature dares to give, ſhe dares to name.
This honeſt fellow is ſincere and plain,
And juſtly gives the jealous huſband pain.
(Vain is the taſk to petticoats aſſign'd,
If wanton language ſhows a naked mind.)
And now and then, to grace her eloquence,
An oath ſupplies the vacancies of ſenſe.
Hark! the ſhrill notes tranſpierce the yielding air,
And teach the neighbouring echoes how to ſwear.
By Jove, is faint, and for the ſimple ſwain;
She, on the the Chriſtian ſyſtem, is profane.
But though the volley rattles in your ear,
Believe her dreſs, ſhe's not a grenadier.
If thunder's awful, how much more our dread,
When Jove deputes a lady in his ſtead?
A lady? pardon my miſtaken pen,
A ſhameleſs woman is the worſt of men.
Few to good-breeding make a juſt pretence;
Good-breeding is the bloſſom of good-ſenſe;
The laſt reſult of an accompliſh'd mind.
With outward grace, the body's virtue, join'd.
A violated decency now reigns;
And nymphs for failings take peculiar pains.
With Chineſe painters modern taſts agree,
The point they aim at is deformity:
They throw their perſons with a hoyden air
Acroſs the room, and toſs into the chair.
So far their commerce with mankind is gone,
They, for our manners, have exchang'd their own.
The modeſt look, the caſtigated grace,
The gentle movement, and ſlow-meaſur'd pace,
For which her lovers dy'd, her parents pay'd,
Are indecorums with the modern maid.
Stiff forms are bad; but let not worſe intrude,
Nor conquer art and nature, to be rude.
Modern good-breeding carry to its height,
And Lady D——'s ſelf will be polite.
Ye riſing fair! ye bloom of Britain's iſle!
When high-born Anna, with a ſoften'd ſmile,
Leads on your train, and ſparkles at your head,
What ſeems moſt hard, is not to be well-bred.
Her bright example with ſucceſs purſue,
And all, but adoration, is your due.
But adoration! give me ſomething more,
Cries Lycé, on the borders of threeſcore:
Nought treads ſo ſilent as the foot of time;
Hence we miſtake our autumn for our prime;
'Tis greatly wiſe to know, before we're told,
The melancholy news, that we grow old.
Autumnal Lycé carries in her face
Memento mori to each public place.
O! how your beating breaſt a miſtreſs warms,
Who looks through ſpectacles to ſee your charms!
While rival undertakers hover round,
And with his ſpade the ſexton marks the ground,
Intent not on her own, but others' doom,
She plans new conqueſts, and defrauds the tomb.
In vain the cock has ſummon'd ſprites away,
She walks at noon, and blaſts the bloom of day.
Gay rainbow ſilks her mellow charms infold,
And nought of Lycé but herſelf is old.
Her grizzled locks aſſume a ſmirking grace,
And art has levell'd her deep furrow'd face.
Her ſtrange demand no mortal can approve,
We'll aſk her bleſſing, but can't aſk her love.
She grants, indeed, a lady may decline
(All ladies but herſelf) at ninety-nine.
O! how unlike her was the ſacred age
Of prudent Portia! Her gray hairs engage;
Whoſe thoughts are ſuited to her life's decline:
Virtue's the paint that can with wrinkles ſhine.
That, and that only, can old age ſuſtain;
Which yet all wiſh, nor know they wiſh for pain.
Not numerous are our joys, when life is new;
And yearly ſome are falling of the few;
But when we conquer life's meridian ſtage,
And downward tend into the vale of age,
They drop apace; by nature ſome decay,
And ſome the blaſts of fortune ſweep away;
Till, naked quite of happineſs, aloud
We call for death, and ſhelter in a ſhroud.
Where's Portia now?—But Portia left behind
Two lovely copies of her form and mind.
What heart untouch'd their early grief can view,
Like bluſhing roſe-buds dipp'd in morning dew?
Who into ſhelter takes their tender bloom,
And forms their minds to flee from ills to come?
The mind, when turn'd adrift, no rules to guide,
Drives at the mercy of the wind and tide;
Fancy and paſſion toſs it to and fro;
A while torment, and then quite ſink in woe.
Ye beauteous orphans, ſince in ſilent duſt
Your beſt example lies, my precepts truſt.
Life ſwarms with ills; the boldeſt are afraid;
Where then is ſafety for a tender maid?
Unfit for conflict, round beſet with woes,
And man, whom leaſt ſhe fears, her worſt of foes!
When kind, moſt cruel; when oblig'd the moſt,
The leaſt obliging; and by favours loſt.
Cruel by nature, they for kindneſs hate;
And ſcorn you for thoſe ills themſelves create.
If on your fame our ſex a blot has thrown,
'Twill ever ſtick, through malice of your own.
Moſt hard! in pleaſing your chief glory lies;
And yet from pleaſing your chief dangers riſe:

Then please the Best; and know, for men of sense,
Your strongest charms are native innocence.
Arts on the mind, like paint upon the face,
Fright him, that's worth your love, from your embrace.
In simple manners all the secret lies;
Be kind and virtuous, you'll be blest and wise.
Vain show and noise intoxicate the brain,
Begin with giddiness, and end in pain.
Affect not empty fame, and idle praise,
Which, all those wretches I describe, betrays.
Your sex's glory 'tis, to shine unknown;
Of all applause, be fondest of your own.
Beware the fever of the mind! that thirst
With which the age is eminently curst:
To drink of pleasure, but inflames desire;
And abstinence alone can quench the fire;
Take pain from life, and terror from the tomb;
Give peace in hand; and promise bliss to come.

SATIRE VI.

ON WOMEN.

Inscribed to the Right Honourable
THE LADY ELIZABETH GERMAIN.

"Interdum tamen & tollit comœdia vocem." HOR.

I SOUGHT a patroness, but sought in vain.
Apollo whisper'd in my ear—"Germain."—
I know her not.—"Your reason's somewhat odd;
"Who knows his patron, now?" reply'd the god.
"Men write, to me, and to the world, unknown;
"Then steal great names, to shield them from the town:
"Detected worth, like beauty disarray'd,
"To covert flies, of praise itself afraid:
"Should she refuse to patronize your lays,
"In vengeance write a volume in her praise.
"Nor think it hard so great a length to run;
"When such the theme, 'twill easily be done."
Ye fair! to draw your excellence at length,
Exceeds the narrow bounds of human strength;
You, here, in miniature your picture see;
Nor hope from Zinck more justice than from me.
My portraits grace your mind, as his your side;
His portraits will inflame, mine quench, your pride:
He's dear, you frugal; choose my cheaper lay;
And be your reformation all my pay.
Lavinia is polite, but not profane;
To church as constant as to Drury-lane.
She decently, in form, pays heaven its due;
And makes a civil visit to her pew.
Her lifted fan, to give a solemn air,
Conceals her face, which passes for a prayer:
Curt'sies to curt'sies, then, with grace, succeed;
Not one the fair omits, but at the Creed.
Or if she joins the service, 'tis to speak;
Through dreadful silence the pent heart might break;
Untaught to bear it, women talk away
To God himself, and fondly think they pray.
But sweet their accent, and their air refin'd;
For they're before their Maker—and mankind:
When ladies once are proud of praying well,
Satan himself will toll the parish bell.

Acquainted with the world, and quite well bred
Drusa receives her visitants in bed;
But, chaste as ice, this Vesta, to defy
The very blackest tongue of calumny.
When from the sheets her lovely form she lifts,
She begs you just would turn you, while she shifts.
Those charms are greatest which decline the sight,
That makes the banquet poignant and polite.
There is no woman, where there's no reserve;
And 'tis on plenty your poor lovers starve.
But with a modern fair, meridian merit
Is a fierce thing, they call a nymph of spirit.
Mark well the rollings of her flaming eye;
And tread on tiptoe, if you dare draw nigh,
"Or if you take a lion by the beard *,
"Or dare defy the fell Hyrcanian bard,
"Or arm'd rhinoceros, or rough Russian bear;"
First make your will, and then converse with her.
This lady glories in profuse expence;
And thinks distraction is magnificence.
To beggar her gallant, is some delight;
To be more fatal still, is exquisite;
Had ever nymph such reason to be glad?
In duel fell two lovers; one run mad.
Her foes their honest execrations pour;
Her lovers only should detest her more.
Flavia is constant to her old gallant,
And generously supports him in his want.
But marriage is a fetter, is a snare,
A hell, no lady so polite can bear.
She's faithful, she's observant, and with pains
Her angel-brood of bastards she maintains.
Nor least advantage has the fair to plead,
But that of guilt, above the marriage-bed.
Amasia hates a prude, and scorns restraint;
Whate'er she is, she'll not appear a saint:
Her soul superior flies formality;
So gay her air, her conduct is so free,
Some might suspect the nymph not over-good—
Nor would they be mistaken, if they should.
Unmarried Abra puts on formal airs; [ers.
Her cushion's threadbare with her constant pray-
Her only grief is, that she cannot be
At once engag'd in prayer and charity.
And this, to do her justice, must be said,
"Who would not think that Abra was a maid?"
Some ladies are too beauteous to be wed;
For where's the man that's worthy of their bed?
If no disease reduce her pride before,
Lavinia will be ravish'd at threescore.
Then she submits to venture in the dark;
And nothing now is wanting—but her spark.
Lucia thinks happiness consists in state;
She weds an idiot, but she eats in plate.
The goods of fortune, which her soul possess,
Are but the ground of unmade happiness;
The rude material: wisdom add to this,
Wisdom, the sole artificer of bliss;
She from herself, if so compell'd by need,
Of thin content can draw the subtle thread;
But (no detraction to her sacred skill)
If she can work in gold, 'tis better still.

* Shakspeare.

If Tullia had been bleſt with half her ſenſe,
None could too much admire her excellence:
But ſince ſhe can make error ſhine ſo bright,
She thinks it vulgar to defend the right.
With underſtanding ſhe is quite o'er-run;
And by too great accompliſhments undone:
With ſkill ſhe vibrates her eternal tongue,
For ever moſt divinely in the wrong.
Naked in nothing ſhould a woman be;
But veil her very wit with modeſty:
Let man diſcover, let not her diſplay,
But yield her charms of mind with ſweet delay.
For pleaſure form'd, perverſely ſome believe,
To make themſelves important, men muſt grieve.
Leſbia the fair, to fire her jealous lord,
Pretends, the fop ſhe laughs at, is ador'd.
In vain ſhe's proud of ſecret innocence;
The fact ſhe feigns were ſcarce a worſe offence.
Mira endow'd with every charm to bleſs,
Has no deſign, but on her huſband's peace:
He lov'd her much; and greatly was he mov'd
At ſmall inquietudes in her he lov'd.
"How charming this!"—The pleaſure laſted long;
Now every day the fits come thick and ſtrong:
At laſt he found the charmer only feign'd;
And was diverted when he ſhould be pain'd.
What greater vengeance have the gods in ſtore!
How tedious life, now ſhe can plague no more!
She tries a thouſand arts; but none ſucceed:
She's forc'd a fever to procure—indeed;
Thus ſtrictly prov'd this virtuous, loving wife,
Her huſband's pain was dearer than her life.
Anxious Melania riſes to my view,
Who never thinks her lover pays his due:
Viſit, preſent, treat, flatter, and adore;
Her majeſty, to-morrow, calls for more.
His wounded ears complaints eternal fill,
As unoil'd hinges, querulouſly ſhrill.
"You went laſt night with Celia to the ball."
You prove it falſe. "Not go! that's worſt of all."
Nothing can pleaſe her, nothing not inflame;
And arrant contradictions are the ſame.
Her lover muſt be ſad, to pleaſe her ſpleen;
His mirth is an inexpiable ſin:
For of all rivals that can pain her breaſt,
There's one, that wounds far deeper than the reſt;
To wreck her quiet, the moſt dreadful ſhelf
Is if her lover dares enjoy himſelf.
And this, becauſe ſhe's exquiſitely fair:
Should I diſpute her beauty, how ſhe'd ſtare?
How would Melania be ſurpris'd to hear
She's quite deform'd? And yet the caſe is clear;
What's female beauty, but an air divine,
Through which the mind's all-gentle graces ſhine?
They, like the ſun, irradiate all between;
The body charms becauſe the ſoul is ſeen.
Hence, men are often captives of a face,
They know not why, of no peculiar grace: [bear;
Some forms, though bright, no mortal man can
Some, none reſiſt though not exceeding fair.
Arpaſia's highly born, and nicely bred,
Of taſte refin'd, in life and manners read;
Yet reaps no fruit from her ſuperior ſenſe,
But to be tir'd by her own excellence.

"Folks are ſo awkward! things ſo unpolite!"
She's elegantly pain'd from morn till night.
Her delicacy's ſhock'd where'er ſhe goes;
Each creature's imperfections are her woes.
Heaven by its favour has the fair diſtreſt,
And pour'd ſuch bleſſings—that ſhe can't be bleſt.
Ah! why ſo vain, though blooming in thy ſpring?
Thou ſhining, frail, ador'd, and wretched thing;
Old age will come; diſeaſe may come before;
Fifteen is full as mortal as threeſcore.
Thy fortune, and thy charms, may ſoon decay:
But grant theſe fugitives prolong their ſtay,
Their baſis totters, their foundation ſhakes;
Life, that ſupports them, in a moment breaks;
Then wrought into the ſoul let virtues ſhine;
The ground eternal, as the work divine.
Julia's a manager; ſhe's born for rule;
And knows her wiſer huſband is a fool;
Aſſemblies holds, and ſpins the ſubtle thread
That guides the lover to his fair-one's bed:
For difficult amours can ſmooth the way,
And tender letters dictate, or convey.
But, if depriv'd of ſuch important cares,
Her wiſdom condeſcends to leſs affairs.
For her own breakfaſt ſhe'll project a ſcheme,
Nor take her tea without a ſtratagem;
Preſides o'er trifles with a ſerious face;
Important, by the virtue of grimace.
Ladies ſupreme among amuſements reign;
By nature born to ſoothe, and entertain.
Their prudence in a ſhare of folly lies:
Why will they be ſo weak as to be wiſe?
Syrena is for ever in extremes.
And with a vengeance ſhe commends, or blames,
Conſcious of her diſcernment, which is good,
She ſtrains too much to make it underſtood.
Her judgment juſt, her ſentence is too ſtrong;
Becauſe ſhe's right, ſhe's ever in the wrong.
Brunetta's wiſe in actions, great, and rare:
But ſcorns on trifles to beſtow her care.
Thus every hour Brunetta is to blame,
Becauſe th' occaſion is beneath her aim.
Think nought a trifle, though it ſmall appear;
Small ſands the mountain, moments make the year,
And trifles life. Your care to trifles give,
Or you may die, before you truly live.
Go breakfaſt with Alicia, there you'll ſee,
Simplex munditiis, to the laſt degree:
Unlac'd her ſtays, her night-gown is unty'd,
And what ſhe has of head-dreſs, is aſide.
She draws her words, and waddles in her pace;
Unwaſh'd her hands, and much beſnuff'd her face.
A nail uncut, and head uncomb'd ſhe loves;
And would draw on jack-boots, as ſoon as gloves.
Gloves by queen Beſs's maidens might be miſt;
Her bleſſed eyes ne'er ſaw a female fiſt.
Lovers, beware! to wound how can ſhe fail
With ſcarlet finger, and long jetty nail?
For Harvey, the firſt wit ſhe cannot be,
Nor, cruel Richmond, the firſt toaſt, for thee.
Since full each other ſtation of renown,
Who would not be the greateſt trapes in town?
Women were made to give our eyes delight;
A female ſleven is an odious ſight.

Fair Iſabella is ſo fond of fame,
That her dear ſelf is her eternal theme;
Through hopes of contradiction, oft ſhe'll ſay,
" Methinks I look ſo wretchedly to day!"
When moſt the world applauds you, moſt beware;
'Tis often leſs a bleſſing than a ſnare.
Diſtruſt mankind; with your own heart confer;
And dread even there to find a flatterer.
The breath of others raiſes our renown;
Our own as ſurely blows the pageant down.
Take up no more than you by worth can claim,
Leſt ſoon you prove a bankrupt in your fame.
But own I muſt, in this perverted age,
Who moſt deſerve, can't always moſt engage.
So far is worth from making glory ſure,
It often hinders what it ſhould procure.
Whom praiſe we moſt? the virtuous, brave, and wiſe?
No; wretches whom in ſecret we deſpiſe.
And who ſo blind, as not to ſee the cauſe?
No rivals rais'd by ſuch diſcreet applauſe;
And yet, of credit it lays in a ſtore,
By which our ſpleen may wound true worth the more.
Ladies there are who think one crime is all:
Can women, then, no way but backward fall?
So ſweet is that one crime they don't purſue,
To pay its loſs, they think all others few.
Who hold that crime ſo dear, muſt never claim
Of injur'd modeſty the ſacred name.
But Clio thus: " What! railing without end?
" Mean taſk! how much more generous to com-
" mend!"
Yes, to commend as you are wont to do,
My kind inſtructor, and example too.
" Daphnis," ſays Clio, " has a charming eye:
" What pity 'tis her ſhoulder is awry!
" Aſpaſia's ſhape indeed—But then her air—
" The man has parts who finds deſtruction there.
" Almeria's wit has ſomething that's divine;
" And wit's enough—how few in all things ſhine!
" Selina ſerves her friends, relieves the poor—
" Who was it ſaid Selina's near threeſcore?
" At Lucia's match I from my ſoul rejoice;
" The world congratulates ſo wiſe a choice;
" His lordſhip's rent-roll is exceeding great—
" But mortgages will ſap the beſt eſtate.
" In Shirley's form might cherubims appear;
" But then—ſhe has a freckle on her ear."
Without a but, Hortenſia ſhe commends,
The firſt of women, and the beſt of friends;
Owns her in perſon, wit, fame, virtue, bright:
But how comes this to paſs?—She dy'd laſt night.
Thus nymphs commend, who yet at ſatire rail:
Indeed that's needleſs, if ſuch praiſe prevail.
And whence ſuch praiſe? our virulence is thrown
On other's fame, through fondneſs for our own.
Of rank and riches proud, Cleora frowns;
For are not coronets a-kin to crowns?
Her greedy eye, and her ſublime addreſs,
The height of avarice and pride confeſs.
You ſeek perfections worthy of her rank;
Go, ſeek for her perfections at the bank.
By wealth unquench'd, by reaſon uncontroul'd,
For ever burns her ſacred thirſt of gold.
As fond of five-pence, as the verieſt cit;
And quite as much deteſted as a wit.

Can gold calm paſſion, or make reaſon ſhine?
Can we dig peace, or wiſdom, from the mine?
Wiſdom to gold prefer; for 'tis much leſs
To make our fortune, than our happineſs.
That happineſs which great ones often ſee.
With rage and wonder, in a low degree:
Themſelves unbleſt. The poor are only poor;
But what are they who droop amid their ſtore?
Nothing is meaner than a wretch of ſtate;
The happy only are the truly great.
Peaſants enjoy like appetites with kings;
And thoſe beſt ſatisfied with cheapeſt things.
Could both our Indies buy but one new ſenſe,
Our envy would be due to large expenſe.
Since not, thoſe pomps which to the great belong,
Are but poor arts to mark them from the throng.
See how they beg an alms of flattery!
They languiſh! oh ſupport them with a lie!
A decent competence we fully taſte;
It ſtrikes our ſenſe, and gives a conſtant feaſt:
More, we perceive by dint of thought alone;
The rich muſt labour to poſſeſs their own.
To feel their great abundance; and requeſt
Their humble friends to help them to be bleſt;
To ſee their treaſures, hear their glory told,
And aid the wretched impotence of gold.
But ſome, great ſouls! and touch'd with warmth divine,
Give gold a price, and teach its beams to ſhine.
All hoarded treaſures they repute a load;
Nor think their wealth their own, till well beſtow'd.
Grand reſervoirs of public happineſs,
Through ſecret ſtreams diffuſively they bleſs;
And, while their bounties glide, conceal'd from view,
Relieve our wants, and ſpare our bluſhes too.
But ſatire is my taſk; and theſe deſtroy
Her gloomy province, and malignant joy.
Help me, ye miſers! help me to complain,
And blaſt our common enemy, Germain:
But our invectives muſt deſpair ſucceſs;
For, next to praiſe, ſhe values nothing leſs.
What picture's yonder, looſen'd from its frame?
Or is 't Aſturia, that affected dame?
The brighteſt forms, through affectation, fade
To ſtrange new things, which nature never made.
Frown not, ye fair! ſo much your ſex we prize,
We hate thoſe arts that take you from our eyes.
In Albucinda's native grace is ſeen
What you, who labour at perfection mean.
Short is the rule, and to be learn'd with eaſe,
Retain your gentle ſelves, and you muſt pleaſe.
Here might I ſing of Memmia's mincing mien,
And all the movements of the ſoft machine:
How two red lips affected zephyrs blow,
To cool the bohea, and inflame the beau:
While one white finger and a thumb conſpire
To lift the cup, and make the world admire.
Tea! how I tremble at thy fatal ſtream!
As Lethe, dreadful to the love of fame.
What devaſtations on thy banks are ſeen!
What ſhades of mighty names which once have been!
An hecatomb of characters ſupplies
Thy painted altars daily ſacrifice.
H——, P——, B——, aſpers'd by thee, decay,
As grains of fineſt ſugars melt away,

And I recommend the more to mortal taste;
Scandal's the sweetner of a female feast.
But this inhuman triumph shall decline,
And thy revolting naiads call for wine;
Spirits no longer shall serve under thee;
But reign in thy own cup, exploded tea!
Citronia's nose declares thy ruin nigh,
And who dares give Citronia's nose the lie!
The ladies long at men of drink exclaim'd,
And what impair'd both health and virtue, blam'd;
At length, to rescue man, the generous lass
Stole from her consort the pernicious glass.
As glorious as the British queen renown'd,
Who fuck'd the poison from her husband's wound.
Nor to the glass alone are nymphs inclin'd,
But every bolder vice of bold mankind.
O Juvenal! for thy severer rage,
To lash the ranker follies of our age.
Are there, among the females of our isle,
Such faults, at which it is a fault to smile?
There are. Vice, once by modest nature chain'd
And legal ties, expatiates unrestrain'd;
Without thin decency held up to view,
Naked she stalks o'er law and gospel too.
Our matrons lead such exemplary lives,
Men sigh in vain for none but for their wives;
Who marry to be free, to range the more,
And wed one man, to wanton with a score.
Abroad too kind, at home 'tis stedfast hate,
And one eternal tempest of debate.
What foul eruptions, from a look most meek!
What thunders bursting, from a dimpled cheek!
Their passions bear it with a lofty hand!
But then, their reason is at due command.
Is there whom you detest, and seek his life?
Trust no foul with the secret—but his wife.
Wives wonder that their conduct I condemn,
And ask, what kindred is a spouse to them?
What swarms of amorous grandmothers I see!
And misses, ancient in iniquity!
What blasting whispers, and what loud declaiming!
What lying, drinking, bawding, swearing, gaming!
Friendship so cold, such warm incontinence;
Such griping avarice, such profuse expence;
Such dead devotion, such a zeal for crimes;
Such licens'd ill, such masquerading times;
Such venal faith, such misapply'd applause;
Such flatter'd guilt, and such inverted laws;
Such dissolution through the whole I find,
'Tis not a world, but chaos of mankind.
Since Sundays have no balls, the well-dress'd belle Shines in the pew, but smiles to hear of hell;
And casts an eye of sweet disdain on all,
Who listen less to Collins than St. Paul.
Atheists have been but rare; since nature's birth,
Till now, she-atheists ne'er appear'd on earth.
Ye men of deep researches, say, whence springs
This daring character, in timorous things?
Who start at feathers, from an insect fly,
A match for nothing—but the Deity.
But, not to wrong the fair, the muse must own,
In this pursuit they court not fame alone;
But join to that a more substantial view,
From thinking free, to be free agents too."

They strive with their own hearts, and keep them down,
In complaisance to all the fools in town.
O, how they tremble at the name of prude!
And die with shame at thought of being good!
For what will Artimis the rich and gay,
What will the wits, that is, the coxcombs, say?
They heaven defy, to earth's vile dregs a slave;
Through cowardice, most execrably brave.
With our own judgments durst we to comply,
In virtue should we live, in glory die.
Rise then, my muse, in honest fury rise;
They dread a satire, who defy the skies.
Atheists are few: most nymphs a godhead own;
And nothing but his attributes dethrone.
From Atheists far, they stedfastly believe
God is, and is Almighty—to forgive.
His other excellence they'll not dispute;
But mercy, sure, is his chief attribute.
Shall pleasures of a short duration chain
A lady's soul in everlasting pain?
Will the great author us poor worms destroy,
For now and then a sip of transient joy?
No, he's for ever in a smiling mood;
He's like themselves; or how could he be good?
And they blaspheme, who blacker schemes suppose—
Devoutly thus Jehovah they depose,
The pure! the just! and set up in his stead
A deity that's perfectly well bred.
" Dear Tillotson! be sure the best of men;
" Nor thought he more, than thought great Origen;
" Though once upon a time he misbehav'd;
" Poor Satan! doubtless he'll at length be sav'd.
" Let priests do something for their one in ten;
" It is their trade; so far they're honest men.
" Let them cant on, since they have got the knack,
" And dress their notions, like themselves, in black;
" Fright us with terrors of a world unknown,
" From joys of this, to keep them all their own.
" Of earth's fair fruits, indeed, they claim a fee;
" But then they leave our unfith'd virtue free.
" Virtue's a pretty thing to make a show:
" Did ever mortal write like a Rochefoucault?"
Thus pleads the devil's fair apologist,
And, pleading, safely enters on his list.
Let angel-forms angelic truths maintain;
Nature disjoins the beauteous and profane.
For what's true beauty, but fair virtue's face?
Virtue made visible in outward grace?
She then that's haunted with an impious mind,
The more she charms, the more she shocks mankind.
But charms decline: the fair long vigils keep:
They sleep no more! Quadrille has * murder'd sleep.
" Poor K—p! cries Livia! I have not been there
" These two nights; the poor creature will despair.
" I hate a crowd—but to do good, you know—
" And people of condition should bestow."
Convinc'd, o'ercome, to K—p's grave matrons run;
Now set a daughter, and now stake a son;
Let health, fame, temper, beauty, fortune, fly;
And beggar half their race—through charity.

* Shakspeare.

Immortal were we, or else mortal quite,
I less should blame this criminal delight:
But since the gay assembly's gaye'r room
Is but an upper story to some tomb,
Methinks, we need not our short being shun,
And, thought to fly, contrived to be undone.
We need not buy our ruin with our crime,
And give eternity to murder time.
The love of gaming is the worst of ills;
With ceaseless storms the blacken'd soul it fills:
Inweighs at Heaven, neglects the ties of blood;
Destroys the power and will of doing good;
Kills health, pawns honour, plunges in disgrace,
And what is still more dreadful—spoils your face.
See yonder set of thieves that live on spoil,
The scandal and the ruin of our isle!
And see (strange sight!), amid that ruffian band,
A form divine high wave her snowy hand;
That rattles loud a small enchanted box,
Which, loud as thunder, on the board she knocks.
And as fierce storms, which earth's foundation shook,
From Æolus's cave impetuous broke,
From this small cavern a mix'd tempest flies,
Fear, rage, convulsion, tears, oaths, blasphemies!
For men, I mean—the fair discharges none;
She (guiltless creature!) swears to Heaven alone.
See her eyes start: cheeks glow! and muscles swell!
Like the mad maid in the Cumean cell.
Thus that divine one her soft nights employs!
Thus tunes her soul to tender nuptial joys!
And when the cruel morning calls to bed,
And on her pillow lays her aching head,
With the dear images her dreams are crown'd,
The die spins lovely, or the cards go round;
Imaginary ruin charms her still;
Her happy lord is cuckoll'd by spadille:
And if she's brought to bed, 'tis ten to one,
He marks the forehead of her darling son.
O! scene of horror, and of wild despair,
Why is the rich Atrides splendid heir,
Constrain'd to quit his ancient lordly seat,
And hide his glories in a mean retreat?
Why that drawn sword? and whence that dismal cry?
Why pale distraction through the family?
See my lord threaten, and my lady weep,
And trembling servants from the tempest creep.
Why that gay son to distant regions sent?
What fiends that daughter's destin'd match prevent?
Why the whole house in sudden ruin laid?
O nothing, but last night—my lady play'd.
But wanders not my satire from her theme!
Is this too owing to the love of fame?
Though now your hearts on lucre are bestow'd,
'Twas first a vain devotion to the made;
Nor cease we here, since 'tis a vice so strong;
The torrent sweeps all womankind along.
This may be said in honour of our times,
That none now stand distinguish'd by their crimes.
If sin you must, take nature for your guide;
Love has some soft excuse to soothe your pride:
Ye fair apostates from love's ancient power!
Can nothing ravish, but a golden shower?
Can cards alone your glowing fancy seize;
Must Cupid learn to punt, e'er he can please?
When you're enamour'd of a lift or cast,
What can the preacher more, to make us chaste?
Why must strong youths unmarry'd pine away?
They find no woman disengag'd—from play.
Why pine the marry'd?—O severer fate!
They find from play no disengag'd—mate.
Flavia, at lovers false, wetouch'd, and hard,
Turns pale, and trembles at a cruel card.
Nor Arria's Bible can secure her age;
Her threescore years are shuffling with her page.
While death stands by, but till the game is done,
To sweep that stake, in justice, long his own;
Like old cards ting'd with sulphur, she takes fire;
Or, like snuffs sunk in sockets, blazes higher.
Ye gods! with zeal delights inspire the fair;
Or give us sons, and save us from despair.
Sons, brothers, fathers, husbands, tradesmen, close
In my complaint, and brand your sins in prose:
Yet I believe, as firmly as my creed,
In spite of all our wisdom, you'll proceed:
Our pride so great, our passion is so strong,
Advice to right confirms us in the wrong.
I hear you cry, "This fellow's very odd."
When you chastise, who would not kiss the rod?
But I've a charm your anger shall controul,
And turn your eyes with coldness on the sole.
The charm begins! to yonder flood of light,
That bursts o'er gloomy Britain, turn your sight.
What guardian power o'erwhelms your souls with awe?
Her deeds are precepts, her example law;
'Midst empire's charms, how Carolina's heart
Glows with the love of virtue, and of art!
Her favour is diffus'd to that degree,
Excess of goodness! it has dawn'd on me:
When in my page, to balance numerous faults,
Or godlike deeds were shown, or generous thoughts,
She smil'd, indefirous to be pleas'd, nor knew
From whom my pen the borrow'd lustre drew.
Thus * the majestic mother of mankind,
To her own charms most amiably blind,
On the green margin innocently stood,
And gaz'd indulgent on the crystal flood;
Survey'd the stranger in the painted wave,
And, smiling, prais'd the beauties which she gave.

SATIRE VII.

TO THE RIGHT HON. SIR ROBERT WALPOLE.

"Carmina tum melius, cum venerit ipse, canemus."
VIRG.

On this last labour, this my closing strain,
Smile, Walpole, or the Nine inspire in vain:
To thee, 'tis due; that verse how justly thine,
Where Brunswick's glory crowns the whole design?
That glory, which thy counsels make so bright;
That glory, which on thee reflects a light.
Illustrious commerce, and but rarely known;
To give, and take, a lustre from the throne.
Nor think that thou art foreign to my theme;
The fountain is not foreign to the stream.

* Milton.

How all mankind will be surpris'd to see
This flood of British folly charg'd on thee!
Say, Britain! whence this caprice of thy sons,
Which through their various ranks with fury runs?
The cause is plain, a cause which we must bless;
For caprice is the daughter of success,
(A bad effect, but from a pleasing cause!)
And gives our rulers undesign'd applause;
Tells how their conduct bids our wealth increase,
And lulls us in the downy lap of peace.
While I survey the blessings of our isle,
Her arts triumphant in the royal smile,
Her public wounds bound up, her credit high,
Her commerce spreading sails in every sky,
The pleasing scene recalls my theme again,
And shows the madness of ambitious men,
Who, fond of bloodshed, draw the murdering sword,
And burn to give mankind a single lord.

The follies past are of a private kind;
Their sphere is small; their mischief is confin'd:
But daring men there are (awake, my muse,
And raise thy verse!) who bolder phrenzy choose;
Who, stung by glory, rave, and bound away;
The world their field, and humankind their prey.

The Grecian chief, th' enthusiast of his pride,
With rage and terror stalking by his side,
Raves round the globe; he soars into a god!
Stand fast, Olympus! and sustain his nod.
The pest divine in horrid grandeur reigns,
And thrives on mankind's miseries and pains.
What slaughter'd hosts! what cities in a blaze!
What wasted countries! and what crimson seas!
With orphans tears his impious bowl o'erflows,
And cries of kingdoms lull him to repose.

And cannot thrice ten hundred years unpraise
The boisterous boy, and blast his guilty bays?
Why want we then encomiums on the storm,
Or famine, or volcano? They perform
Their mighty deeds; they, hero like, can slay,
And spread their ample desarts in a day.
O great alliance! O divine renown!
With dearth, and pestilence, to share the crown.
When men extol a wild destroyer's name,
Earth's Builder and Preserver they blaspheme.

One to destroy, is murder by the law;
And gibbets keep the lifted hand in awe;
To murder thousands, takes a specious name,
War's glorious art, and gives immortal fame.

When, after battle, I the field have seen [men;
Spread o'er with ghastly shapes, which once were
A nation crush'd, a nation of the brave!
A realm of death! and on this side the grave!
Are there, said I, who from this sad survey,
This human chaos, carry smiles away?
How did my heart with indignation rise!
How honest nature swell'd into my eyes!
How was I shock'd to think the hero's trade
Of such materials, fame and triumph, made!

How guilty these! yet not less guilty they,
Who reach false glory by a smoother way:
Who wrap destruction up in gentle words,
And bows, and smiles, more fatal than their swords;
Who stifle nature, and subsist on art;
Who coin the face, and petrify the heart;
All real kindness for the show discard,
As marble polish'd, and as marble hard;
Who do for gold what Christians do through grace,
"With open arms their enemies embrace;"
Who give a nod when broken hearts repine;
"The thinnest food on which a wretch can dine:"
Or, if they serve you, serve you disinclin'd,
And, in their height of kindness, are unkind.
Such courtiers were, and such again may be,
Walpole, when men forget to copy thee.

Here cease, my muse! the catalogue is writ;
Nor one more candidate for fame admit,
Though disappointed thousands justly blame
Thy partial pen, and boast an equal claim:
Be this their comfort, fools, omitted here,
May furnish laughter for another year.
Then let Crispino, who was ne'er refus'd
The justice yet of being well abus'd,
With patience wait: and be content to reign
The pink of puppies in some future strain.

Some future strain, in which the muse shall tell
How science dwindles, and how volumes swell.

How commentators each dark passage shun,
And hold their farthing candle to the sun.

How tortur'd texts to speak our sense are made,
And every vice is to the scripture laid.

How misers squeeze a young voluptuous peer;
His sins to Lucifer not half so dear.

How Versus is less qualify'd to steal
With sword and pistol, than with wax and seal.

How lawyers fees to such excess are run,
That clients are redress'd till they're undone.

How one man's anguish is another's sport;
And even denials cost us dear at court.

How man eternally false judgments makes,
And all his joys and sorrows are mistakes.

This swarm of themes that settles on my pen,
Which I, like summer flies, shake off again,
Let others sing; to whom my weak essay
But sounds a prelude, and points out their prey:
That duty done, I hasten to complete
My own design; for Tonson's at the gate.

The love of fame in its effects survey'd,
The muse has sung! he now the cause display'd:
Since so diffusive, and so wide its sway,
What is this power, whom all mankind obey?

Shot from above, by heaven's indulgence, came
This generous ardour, this unconquer'd flame,
To warm, to raise, to deify, mankind,
Still burning brightest in the noblest mind.
By large-soul'd men, for thirst of fame renown'd,
Wise laws were fram'd, and sacred arts were found;
Desire of praise first broke the patriot's rest:
And made a bulwark of the warrior's breast;
It bids Argyll in fields and senate shine.
What more can prove its origin divine?

But, oh! this passion planted in the soul,
On eagle's wings to mount her to the pole,
The flaming minister of virtue meant,
Set up false gods, and wrong'd her high descent.

Ambition, hence, exerts a doubtful force,
Of blots, and beauties, an alternate source;
Hence Gi'don rails, that raven of the pit,
Who thrives upon the carcases of wit;

And in art-loving Scarborough is seen
How kind a pattern Pollia might have been.
Purſuit of fame with pedants fills our ſchools,
And into coxcombs burniſhes our fools;
Purſuit of fame makes ſolid learning bright,
And Newton lifts above a mortal height;
That key of nature, by whoſe wit ſhe clears
Her long, long ſecrets of five thouſand years.
Would you then fully comprehend the whole,
Why, and in what degrees, pride ſways the ſoul?
(For, though in all not equally, ſhe reigns)
Awake to knowledge, and attend my ſtrains.
Ye doctors! hear the doctrine I diſcloſe,
As true, as if 'twere writ in dulleſt proſe;
As if a letter'd dunce had ſaid, "'Tis right,"
And imprimatur uſher'd it to light.
Ambition in the truly noble mind,
With ſiſter-virtue is for ever join'd;
As in fam'd Lucrece, who, with equal dread,
From guilt and ſhame, by her laſt conduct, fled:
Her virtue long rebell'd in firm diſdain,
And the ſword pointed at her heart in vain;
But, when the ſlave was threaten'd to be laid
Dead by her ſide, her love of fame obey'd.
In meaner minds ambition works alone;
But with ſuch art puts virtue's aſpect on,
That not more like in feature and in mien,
The God and mortal in the comic ſcene *.
Falſe Julius, ambuſh'd in this fair diſguiſe,
Soon made the Roman liberties his prize.
No maſk in baſeſt minds ambition wears,
But in full light pricks up her aſs's ears:
All I have ſung are inſtances of this,
And prove my theme unfolded not amiſs.
Ye vain! deſiſt from your erroneous ſtrife;
Be wiſe, and quit the falſe ſublime of life.
The true ambition there alone reſides,
Where juſtice vindicates, and wiſdom guides;
Where inward dignity joins outward ſtate;
Our purpoſe good, as our atchievement great;
Where public bleſſings public praiſe attend;
Where glory is our motive, not our end.
Would'ſt thou be fam'd? Have thoſe high deeds in view
Brave men would act, though ſcandal ſhould enſue.
Behold a prince! whom no ſwoln thoughts inflame;
No pride of thrones, no fever after fame:
But when the welfare of mankind inſpires,
And death in view to dear-bought glory fires,
Proud conqueſts then, then regal pomps delight;
Then crowns, then triumphs, ſparkle in his ſight;
Tumult and noiſe are dear, which with them bring
His people's bleſſings to their ardent king:
But, when thoſe great heroic motives ceaſe,
His ſwelling ſoul ſubſides to native peace;
From tedious grandeur's faded charms withdraws,
A ſudden foe to ſplendor and applauſe;
Greatly deferring his arrears of fame,
Till men and angels jointly ſhout his name.
O pride celeſtial! which can pride diſdain;
O bleſt ambition! which can ne'er be vain.
From one fam'd Alpine hill, which props the ſky,
In whoſe deep womb unfathom'd waters lie,
Here burſt the Rhone and ſounding Po; there ſhine,
In infant rills, the Danube and the Rhine;
From the rich ſtore one fruitful urn ſupplies,
Whole kingdoms ſmile, a thouſand harveſts riſe.
In Brunſwick ſuch a ſource the muſe adores,
Which public bleſſings through half Europe pours.
When his heart burns with ſuch a godlike aim,
Angels and George are rivals for the fame;
George, who in foes can ſoft affections raiſe,
And charm envenom'd ſatire into praiſe.
Nor human rage alone his power perceives,
But the mad winds, and the tumultuous waves *.
Ev'n ſtorms (death's fierceſt miniſters!) forbear,
And, in their own wild empire, learn to ſpare.
Thus, nature's ſelf, ſupporting man's decree,
Styles Britain's ſovereign, ſovereign of the ſea.
While ſea and air, great Brunſwick! ſhook our ſtate,
And ſported with a king's and kingdom's fate,
Depriv'd of what ſhe lov'd, and preſs'd by fear
Of ever loſing what ſhe held moſt dear,
How did Britannia, like Achilles, weep,
And tell her ſorrows to the kindred deep!
Hang o'er the floods, and, in devotion warm,
Strive, for thee, with the ſurge, and fight the ſtorm!
What felt thy Walpole, pilot of the realm!
Our Palinurus ſlept not at the helm;
His eye ne'er clos'd; long ſince inur'd to wake,
And out-watch every ſtar for Brunſwick's ſake;
By thwarting paſſions toſs'd, by cares oppreſt,
He found the tempeſt pictur'd in his breaſt:
But, now, what joys that gloom of heart deſpel,
No powers of language—but his own, can tell;
His own, which nature and the graces form,
At will, to raiſe, or huſh, the civil ſtorm.

* Amphitryon.

OCEAN; AN ODE.

OCCASIONED BY HIS MAJESTY'S ROYAL ENCOURAGEMENT OF THE SEA SERVICE.

TO WHICH IS PREFIXED

AN ODE TO THE KING; AND A DISCOURSE ON ODE.

I THINK myſelf obliged to recommend to you a conſideration of the greateſt importance; and I ſhould look upon it as a great happineſs, if, at the beginning of my reign, I could ſee the foundation laid of ſo great and neceſſary a work, as the increaſe and encouragement of our ſeamen in general; that they may be invited, rather than compelled by force and violence, to enter into the ſervice of their country, as oft as occaſion ſhall require it: A conſideration worthy the repreſentatives of a people great and flouriſhing in trade and navigation. This leads me to mention to you the caſe of Greenwich Hoſpital, that care may be taken, by ſome addition to that fund, to render comfortable and effectual that charitable proviſion for the ſupport and maintenance of our ſeamen, worn out, and become decrepit by age and infirmities, in the ſervice of their country.

[SPEECH, Jan. 27. 1727-8.]

TO THE KING.

OLD Ocean's praiſe
Demands my lays;
A truly-Britiſh theme I ſing;
A theme ſo great,
I dare complete,
And join with Ocean, Ocean's king.

To gods and kings,
The poet ſings;
To kings and gods the muſe is dear;
The muſe inſpires
With all her fires;
Begin, my ſoul! thy bold career.

From awful ſtate,
From high debate,
From morning-ſplendors of a crown,
From homage pay'd,
From empires weigh'd
From plans of bleſſings and renown;

Great monarch! bow
Thy beaming brow;
othee I ſtrike the ſounding lyre,
With proud deſign
In verſe to ſhine;
To rival Greek and Roman fire.

The Roman ode
Majeſtic flow'd;
Its ſtream divinely clear and ſtrong;
In ſenſe, and ſound,
Thebes roll'd profound;
The torrent roar'd, and foam'd along.

Let Thebes, nor Rome,
So fam'd, preſume
To triumph o'er a northern iſle;
Late time ſhall know
The north can glow,
If dread Auguſtus deign to ſmile.

The work is done!
The diſtant ſun
His ſmile ſupplies! exalts my voice!
Through earth's wide bound
Shall George reſound,
My theme, by duty, and by choice.

The naval crown
Is all his own!
Our fleet, if war or commerce call,
His will performs
Through waves and ſtorms,
And rides in triumph round the ball.

Since then the main
Sublimes my ſtrain,
To whom ſhould I addreſs my ſong?
To whom but thee?
The boundleſs ſea,
And grateful muſe to George belong.

Hail, mighty theme!
Rich mine of fame!
If gods invok'd extend their aid;
Hail ſubject new!
As Britain's dye,
Reſerv'd by the Pierian maid.

Durſt Homer's muſe,
Or Pindar's, chooſe
To pour the billows on his ſtring?
No, both defraud
The tuneful god;
Scarce more ſublime, when Jove they ſing.

No former race,
With ſtrong embrace,
This theme to raviſh durſt aſpire;
With virgin charms
My ſoul it warms,
And melts melodious on my lyre.

Now low, now high,
My fingers fly,
Now pauſe, and now freſh muſic ſpring;
Now dance, now creep,
Now dive, now ſweep,
And fetch the ſound from every ſtring.

Now numbers riſe,
Like virgin's ſighs;
The ſoft Favonians melt away;
As from the north
Now ruſhes forth
A blaſt, that thunders in my lay.

My lays I file
With curious toil;
Ye graces! turn the glowing lines;
On anvils neat
Your ſtrokes repeat;
At every ſtroke the work refines!

How muſic charms!
How metre warms!
Parent of actions good and brave!
How vice it tames!
And worth inflames!
And holds proud empire o'er the grave!

Jove mark'd for man
A ſcanty ſpan,
But lent him wings to fly his doom;
Wit ſcorns the grave;
To wit he gave
The life of gods! immortal bloom!

Since years will fly,
And pleaſures die,
Day after day, as years advance;
Since, while life laſts,
Joy ſuffers blaſts
From frowning fate, and fickle chance;

Nor life is long;
But ſoon we throng,
Like autumn leaves, death's pallid ſhore;
We make, at leaſt,
Of bad the beſt,
If in life's phantom, fame, we ſoar.

Our ſtrains divide
The laurel's pride;
With thoſe we liſt to life, we live;
By fame enroll'd
With heroes bold,
And ſhare the bleſſings which we give.

What hero's praiſe
Can fire my lays,
Like his, with whom my lay begun?
" Juſtice ſincere,
" And courage clear,
" Riſe the two columns of his throne.

" How form'd for ſway!
" Who look, obey;
" They read the monarch in his port.
" Their love and awe
" Supply the law;
" And his own luſtre makes the court;

" But ſhines ſupreme,
" Where heroes flame;
" In war's high-hearted pomp he prides!
" By godlike arts
" Enthron'd in hearts,
" Our boſom-lord o'er wills preſides."

Our factions end!
The nations bend!
For when Britannia's ſons, combin'd
In fair array,
All march one way;
They march the terror of mankind.

If equal all
Who tread the ball,
Our bounded proſpect, here, would end;
But heroes prove
As ſteps to Jove,
By which our thoughts, with eaſe, aſcend.

From what we view
We take the clue,
Which leads from great, to greater things;
Men doubt no more,
But gods adore,
When ſuch reſemblance ſhines in kings.

On yonder height,
What golden light
Triumphant ſhines, and ſhines alone?
Unrivall'd blaze!
The nations gaze!
'Tis not the ſun, 'tis Britain's throne.

Our monarch, there,
Rear'd high in air,
Should tempeſts riſe, diſdains to bend;
Like Britiſh oak,
Derides the ſtroke;
His blooming honours far extend!

Beneath them lies,
With liſted eyes,
Fair Albion, like an amorous maid;
While intereſt wings
Bold foreign kings
To fly, like eagles, to his ſhade.

At his proud foot
The ſea pour'd out,
Immortal nouriſhment ſupplies;
Thence wealth and ſtate,
And power, and—Fate,
Which Europe reads in George's eyes.

ON LYRIC POETRY.

How imperfect ſoever my own compoſition may be, yet am I willing to ſpeak a word or two of the nature of Lyric Poetry; to ſhow that I have, at leaſt, ſome idea of perfection in that kind of poem in which I am engaged; and that I do not think myſelf poet enough entirely to rely on inſpiration for my ſucceſs in it.

To our having, or not having this idea of perfection in the poem we undertake, is chiefly owing the merit or demerit of our performances, as alſo the modeſty or vanity of our opinions concerning them. And in ſpeaking of it I ſhall ſhow how it unavoidably comes to paſs, that bad poets, that is, poets in general, are eſteemed, and really are, the moſt vain, the moſt irritable, and moſt ridiculous ſet of men upon earth. But poetry in its own nature is certainly

" —Non hos quæſitum munus in uſus."
VIRG.

He that has an idea of perfection in the work he undertakes may fail in it; he that has not, muſt: and yet he will be vain. For every little degree of beauty, how ſhort or improper ſoever, will be looked on fondly by him; becauſe it is all pure gains, and more than he promiſed to himſelf; and becauſe he has no teſt, or ſtandard in his judgment, with which to chaſtiſe his opinion of it.

Now this idea of perfection is, in poetry, more refined than in other kinds of writing; and becauſe more refined, therefore more difficult, and becauſe more difficult, therefore more rarely attained; and the non-attainment of it is, as I have ſaid, the ſource of our vanity. Hence the poetic clan are more obnoxious to vanity than others. And from vanity conſequentially flows that great ſenſibility of diſreſpect, that quick reſentment, that tinder of the mind that kindles at every ſpark, and juſtly marks them out for the " genus irritabile" among mankind. And from this combuſtible temper, this ſerious anger for no very ſerious things, things looked on by moſt as foreign to the important points of life, as conſequentially flows that inheritance of ridicule, which devolves on them, from generation to generation. As ſoon as they become authors, they become like Ben Jonſon's angry boy, and learn the art of quarrel.

" —Concordes animæ—dum nocte prementur;
" Heu! quantum inter ſe bellum, ſi lumina vitæ
" Attigerint, quantas acies, ſtragemque ciebunt!
" Qui Juvenes! quantas oſtentant, aſpice, vires.
" Ne, pueri! ne tanta animis aſſueſcite bella.
" Tuque prior, tu parce, genus qui ducis Olympo,
" Syderio flagrans clypeo, et cœleſtibus armis,
" Projice tela manu, ſanguis meus!
" Nec te ullæ facies, non terruit ipſe Typhœus
" Arduus, arma tenens; non te Meſſapus et Uſens,
" Contemptorque Deûm Mezentius." VIRG.

But to return. He that has this idea of perfection in the work he undertakes, however ſucceſsful he is, will yet be modeſt; becauſe to riſe up to that idea, which he propoſed for his model, is almoſt, if not abſolutely, impoſſible.

Theſe two obſervations account for what may ſeem as ſtrange, as it is infallibly true; I mean, they ſhow us why good writers have the loweſt, and bad writers the higheſt, opinion of their own performances. They who have only a partial idea of this perfection, as their proportionable degrees of modeſty or conceit.

Nor, though natural good underſtanding makes a tolerably juſt judgment in things of this nature, will the reader judge the worſe, for forming to himſelf a notion of what he ought to expect from the piece he has in hand, before he begins his peruſal of it.

The ode, as it is the eldeſt kind of poetry, ſo it is more ſpirituous, and more remote from proſe than any other, in ſenſe, ſound, expreſſion, and conduct. Its thoughts ſhould be uncommon, ſublime, and moral; its numbers full, eaſy, and moſt harmonious; its expreſſion pure, ſtrong, delicate, yet unaffected; and of a curious felicity beyond other poems; its conduct ſhould be rapturous, ſomewhat abrupt, and immethodical to a vulgar eye. That apparent order, and connection, which gives form and life to ſome compoſitions, takes away the very ſoul of this. Fire, elevation, and ſelect thought, are indiſpenſable; an humble, tame, and vulgar ode is the moſt pitiful error a pen can commit.

" Muſa dedit Fidibus divos, puerosque Deorum."

And as its ſubjects are ſublime, its writer's genius ſhould be ſo too; otherwiſe it becomes the meaneſt thing in writing, viz. an involuntary burleſque.

It is the genuine character, and true merit of the ode, a little to ſtartle ſome apprehenſions. Men of cold complexions are very apt to miſtake a want of vigour in their imaginations, for a delicacy of taſte in their judgments; and, like perſons of a tender ſight, they look on bright objects, in their natural luſtre, as too glaring; what is moſt delightful to a ſtronger eye, is painful to them. Thus Pindar, who has as much logic at the bottom as Ariſtotle or Euclid, to ſome critics has appeared as mad; and muſt appear ſo to all who enjoy no portion of his own divine ſpirit. Dwarf-underſtandings, meaſuring others by their own ſtandard, are apt to think they ſee a monſter, when they ſee a man.

And indeed it ſeems to be the amends which nature makes to thoſe whom ſhe has not bleſſed with an elevation of mind, to indulge them in the comfortable miſtake, that all is wrong, which falls not within the narrow limits of their own comprehenſions and reliſh.

Judgment, indeed, that maſculine power of the mind, in ode, as in all compoſitions, ſhould bear the ſupreme ſway; and a beautiful imagination, as its miſtreſs, ſhould be ſubdued to its dominion. Hence, and hence only, can proceed the faireſt offſpring of the human mind.

But then in ode, there is this difference from other kinds of poetry; that, there, the imagination, like a very beautiful miſtreſs, is indulged in the appearance of domineering; though the judgment, like an artful lover, in reality carries its point; and the leſs it is ſuſpected of it, it ſhows the more maſterly conduct, and deſerves the greater commendation.

It holds true in this province of writing, as in war, "The more danger, the more honour." It muſt be very enterpriſing; it muſt, in Shakſpeare's ſtyle, have hair-breadth 'ſcapes; and often tread the very brink of error: nor can it ever deſerve the applauſe of the real judge, unleſs it renders itſelf obnoxious to the miſapprehenſions of the contrary.

Such is Caſimire's ſtrain among the moderns, whoſe lively wit, and happy fire, is an honour to them. And Buchanan might juſtly be much admired, if any thing more than the ſweetneſs of his numbers, and the purity of his diction, were his own: his original, from which I have taken my motto, through all the diſadvantages of a northern proſe tranſlation, is ſtill admirable; and, Cowley ſays, as preferable in beauty to Buchanan, as Judæa is to Scotland.

Pindar, Anacreon, Sappho, and Horace, are the great maſters of Lyric poetry among Heathen writers. Pindar's muſe, like Sachariſſa, is a ſtately, imperious, and accompliſhed beauty; equally diſdaining the uſe of art, and the fear of any rival; ſo intoxicating that it was the higheſt commendation that could be given an ancient, that he was not afraid to taſte of her charms;

"Pindarici fontis qui non expalluit hauſtus;"

a danger which Horace delares he durſt not run.

Anacreon's muſe is like Amoret, moſt ſweet, natural, and delicate; all over flowers, graces, and charms; inſpiring complacency, not awe; and ſhe ſeems to have good-nature enough to admit a rival, which ſhe cannot find.

Sappho's muſe, like Lady ——, is paſſionately tender, and glowing; like oil ſet on fire, ſhe is ſoft, and warm, in exceſs. Sappho has left us a few fragments only; time has ſwallowed the reſt; but that little which remains, like the remaining jewel of Cleopatra, after the other was diſſolved at her banquet, may be eſteemed (as was that jewel) a ſufficient ornament for the goddeſs of beauty her ſelf.

Horace's muſe (like one I ſhall not preſume to name) is correct, ſolid, and moral; ſhe joins all the former, in the juſteſt proportions and degrees; ſuperadding a felicity of dreſs entirely her own. She moreover is diſtinguiſhable by this particularity, That ſhe abounds in hidden graces, and ſecret charms, which none but the diſcerning can diſcover; nor are any capable of doing full juſtice, in their opinion, to her excellencies, without giving the world, at the ſame time, an inconteſtable proof of refinement in their own underſtandings.

But, after all, to the honour of our own country I muſt add, that I think Mr. Dryden's Ode on St. Cecilia's Day inferior to no compoſition of this kind. Its chief beauty conſiſts in adapting the numbers moſt happily to the variety of the occaſion. Thoſe by which he has choſen to expreſs Majeſty, (viz.)

Aſſumes the God,
Affects to nod,
And ſeems to ſhake the ſpheres,

are choſen in the following Ode, becauſe the ſubject of it is great.

For the more harmony likewiſe, I choſe the frequent return of rhyme; which laid me under great difficulties. But difficulties overcome give grace and pleaſure. Nor can I account for the pleaſure of rhyme in general (of which the moderns are too fond) but from this truth.

But then the writer muſt take care that the difficulty is overcome. That is, he muſt make rhyme conſiſtent with as perfect ſenſe, and expreſſion, as could be expected if he was free from that ſhackle. Otherwiſe, it gives neither grace to the work, nor pleaſure to the reader, nor, conſequently, reputation to the poet.

To ſum the whole: Ode ſhould be peculiar, but not ſtrained; moral, but not flat; natural, but not obvious; delicate, but not affected; noble, but not ambitious; full, but not obſcure; fiery, but not mad; thick, but not loaded in its numbers, which ſhould be moſt harmonious, without the leaſt ſacrifice of expreſſion, or of ſenſe. Above all, in this, as in every work of genius, ſomewhat of an original ſpirit ſhould be, at leaſt, attempted; otherwiſe the poet, whoſe character diſclaims mediocrity, makes a ſecondary praiſe his ultimate ambition; which has ſomething of a contradiction in it. Originals only have true life, and differ as much from the beſt Imitations, as men from the moſt animated pictures of them. Nor is what I ſay at all inconſiſtent with a due deference for the great ſtandards of antiquity; nay, that very deference is an argument for it; for doubtleſs their example is on my ſide in this matter. And we ſhould rather imitate their example in the general motives and fundamental methods of their working, than in their works themſelves. This is a diſtinction, I think, not hitherto made, and a diſtinction of conſequence. For the firſt may make us their equals; the ſecond muſt pronounce us their inferiors even in our utmoſt ſucceſs. But the firſt of theſe prizes is not ſo readily taken by the moderns; as valuables too maſſy for eaſy carriage are not ſo liable to the thief.

The ancients had a particular regard to the choice of their ſubjects; which were generally national and great. My ſubject is, in its own nature, noble; moſt proper for an Engliſhman; never more proper than on this occaſion; and (what is ſtrange) hitherto unſung.

If I ſtand not abſolutely condemned by my own rules; if I have hit the ſpirit of ode in general; if I cannot think with Mr. Cowley, that "Muſic "alone, ſometimes, makes an excellent ode,"

"Verſus inopes rerum, nugæque canoræ;"

if there is any thought, enthuſiaſm, and picture, which are as the body, ſoul, and robe of poetry; in a word, if in any degree I have provided rather food for men, than air for wits; I hope ſmaller faults will meet indulgence for the ſake of the deſign, which is the glory of my country and my king.

And indeed, this may be ſaid, in general, that great ſubjects are above being nice; that dignity and ſpirit ever ſuffer from ſcrupulous exactneſs; and that the minuter cares effeminate a compoſition. Great maſters of poetry, painting, and ſtatuary, in their nobler works, have even affected the contrary: and juſtly; for a truly-maſculine air partakes more of the negligent, than of the neat, both in writings, and in life—

" Grandis oratio haberet majeſtatis ſuæ pondus."
PETRON.

A poem, like a criminal, under too ſevere correction, may loſe all its ſpirit, and expire. We know it was Faber imus, that was ſuch an artiſt at a hair or a nail. And we know the cauſe was

" Quia ponere totum
" Neſcius." HOR.

To cloſe; If a piece of this nature wants an apology, I muſt own, that thoſe who have ſtrength of mind ſufficient profitably to devote the whole of their time to the ſeverer ſtudies, I deſpair of imitating, I can only envy and admire. The mind is relieved and ſtrengthened by variety; and he that ſometimes is ſporting with his pen, is only taking the moſt effectual means of giving a general importance to it. This truth is clear from the knowledge of human nature, and of hiſtory; from which I could cite very celebrated inſtances, did I not fear that, by citing them, I ſhould condemn myſelf, who am ſo little qualified to follow their example in its full extent.

OCEAN;

AN ODE.

CONCLUDING WITH A WISH.

" Let the ſea make a noiſe, let the floods clap their " hands." PSAL. xcviii.

SWEET rural ſcene!
Of flocks and green!
At careleſs eaſe my limbs are ſpread;
All nature ſtill,
But yonder rill;
And liſtening pines nod o'er my head:

In proſpect wide,
The boundleſs tide!
Waves ceaſe to foam, and winds to roar;
Without a breeze,
The curling ſeas
Dance on, in meaſure, to the ſhore.

Who ſings the ſource
Of wealth and force?
Vaſt field of commerce and big war;
Where wonders dwell!
Where terrors ſwell!
And Neptune thunders from his car?

Where? where are they,
Whom Pæan's ray
Has touch'd, and bid divinely rave?
What, none aſpire?
I ſnatch the lyre,
And plunge into the foaming wave.

The wave reſounds!
The rock rebounds!
The Nereids to my ſong reply!
I lead the choir,
And they conſpire
With voice and ſhell to liſt it high;

They ſpread in air
Their boſoms fair;
Their verdant treſſes pour behind.
The billows beat
With nimble feet,
With notes triumphant ſwell the wind.

Who love the ſhore,
Let thoſe adore
The god Apollo, and his Nine,
Parnaſſus' hill,
And Orpheus' ſkill;
But let Arion's harp be mine.

The main! the main!
Is Britain's reign;
Her ſtrength, her glory, is her fleet;
The main! the main!
Be Britons' ſtrain;
As Tritons' ſtrong, as Syrens' ſweet.

Through nature wide,
Is nought deſcry'd
So rich in pleaſure, or ſurpriſe;
When all ſerene,
How ſweet the ſcene!
How dreadful, when the billows riſe.

And ſtorms deface
The fluid glaſs,
In which ere-while Britannia fair
Look'd down with pride,
Like Ocean's bride,
Adjuſting her majeſtic air.

When tempeſts ceaſe,
And huſh'd in peace
The flatten'd ſurges ſmoothly ſpread,
Deep ſilence keep,
And ſeem to ſleep
Recumbent on their oozy bed;

With what a trance
The level glance,
Unbroken, ſhoots along the ſeas!
Which tempt from ſhore
The painted oar;
And every canvas courts the breeze!

When ruſhes forth
The frowning North
On blackening billows, with what dread
My ſhuddering ſoul
Beholds them roll,
And hears their roarings o'er my head;

With terror mark
Yon flying bark!
Now, centre-deep deſcend the brave;

Now, toſs'd on high
It takes the ſky,
A feather on the towering wave!

Now, ſpins around
In whirls profound;
Now, whelm'd; now, pendant near the clouds;
Now, ſtunn'd, it reels
Midſt thunder's peals;
And, now, fierce lightning fires the ſhrouds.

All ether burns!
Chaos returns!
And blends once more the ſeas and ſkies;
No ſpace between
Thy boſom green,
O deep! and the blue concave, lies.

The northern blaſt,
The ſhatter'd maſt,
The ſyrt, the whirlpool, and the rock,
The breaking ſpout,
The ſtars gone out,
The boiling ſtreight, the monſters ſhock.

Let others fear;
To Britain dear
Whate'er promotes her daring claim;
Thoſe terrors charm,
Which keep her warm
In chaſe of honeſt gain or fame.

The ſtars are bright
To cheer the night,
And ſhed, through ſhadows temper'd fire;
And Phœbus flames
With burniſh'd beams,
Which ſome adore, and all admire.

Are then the ſeas
Outſhone by theſe?
Bright Thetis! thou art not outſhone;
With kinder beams,
And ſofter gleams,
Thy boſom wears them as thy own.

There, ſet in green,
Gold-ſtars are ſeen,
A mantle rich! thy charms to wrap;
And when the ſun
His race has run,
He falls enamour'd in thy lap.

Thoſe clouds, whoſe dyes
Adorn the ſkies,
That ſilver ſnow, that pearly rain;
Has Phœbus ſtole
To grace the pole,
The plunder of th' invaded main!

The gaudy bow,
Whoſe colours glow,
Whoſe arch with ſo much ſkill is bent,
To Phœbus' ray,
Which paints ſo gay,
By thee the watery woof was lent.

In chambers deep,
Where waters ſleep,
What unknown treaſures pave the floor!
The pearl in rows
Pale luſtre throws;
The wealth immenſe, which ſtorms devour.

From Indian mines,
With proud deſigns,
The merchant, ſwoln, digs golden ore.
The tempeſts riſe,
And ſeize the prize,
And toſs him breathleſs on the ſhore.

His ſon complains
In pious ſtrains
"Ah! cruel thirſt of gold!" he cries;
Then ploughs the main,
In zeal for gain,
The tears yet ſwelling in his eyes.

Thou watery waſt
What mounds are caſt
To bar thy dreadful flowings o'er?
Thy proudeſt foam
Muſt know its home;
But rage of gold diſdains a ſhore.

Gold pleaſure buys;
But pleaſure dies,
Too ſoon the groſs fruition cloys:
Though raptures court,
The ſenſe is ſhort;
But virtue kindles living joys;

Joys felt alone!
Joys aſk'd of none!
Which time and fortune's arrows miſs;
Joys that ſubſiſt,
Though fates reſiſt,
And unprecarious endleſs bliſs!

The ſoul refin'd
Is moſt inclin'd
To every moral excellence;
All vice is dull,
A knave's a fool;
And virtue is the child of ſenſe.

The virtuous mind
Nor wave, nor wind,
Nor civil rage, nor tyrant's frown,
The ſhaken ball,
Nor planets fall,
From its firm baſis can dethrone.

This Britain knows,
And therefore glows
With generous paſſions, and expends
Her wealth and zeal
On public weal,
And brightens both by godlike ends.

What end ſo great,
As that which late
Awoke the genius of the main,
Which towering roſe
With George to cloſe,
And rival great Eliza's reign?

A voice has flown
From Britain's throne
To reinflame a grand deſign;

That voice ſhall rear
Yon fabric fair*,
As nature's roſe at the divine.

When nature ſprung,
Bleſt angels ſung,
And ſhouted o'er the riſing ball;
For ſtrains as high
As man's can fly,
Theſe ſea-devoted honours call.

From boiſterous ſeas,
The lap of eaſe
Receives our wounded and our old;
High domes aſcend!
Stretch'd arches bend!
Proud columns ſwell! wide gates unfold!

So ſleeps the grain,
In foſtering rain,
And vital beams, till Jove deſcend;
Then burſts the root!
The verdures ſhoot!
And earth enrich, adorn, defend!

Here, ſoft-reclin'd
From wave, from wind,
And fortune's tempeſt ſafe aſhore,
To cheat their care,
Of former war
They talk the pleaſing ſhadows o'er.

In lengthen'd tales,
Our fleet prevails;
In tales the lenitives of age!
And, o'er the bowl,
They fire the ſoul
Of liſtening youth to martial rage.

The ſtory done,
Their ſetting ſun,
Serenely ſmiling down the weſt,
In ſoft decay,
They drop away;
And honour leads them to their reſt.

Unhappy they!
And falſely gay!
Who baſk for ever in ſucceſs;
A conſtant feaſt
Quite palls the taſte,
And long enjoyment is diſtreſs.

What charms us moſt,
Our joy, our boaſt,
Familiar, loſes all its gloſs;
And gold refin'd
The fated mind
Faſtidious turns to perfect droſs.

When, after toil,
His native ſoil
The painting mariner regains,
What tranſport flows
From bare repoſe!
We reap our pleaſure from our pains.

Ye warlike ſlain!
Beneath the main,
Wrapt in a watery winding ſheet;
Who bought with blood
Your country's good,
Your country's full-blown glory greet.

What powerful charm
Can death diſarm?
Your long, your iron ſlumbers break?
By Jove, by Fame,
By George's name,
Awake! awake! awake!

Our joy ſo proud,
Our ſhout ſo loud,
Without a charm the dead might hear:
And ſee, they rouſe!
Their awful brows,
Deep-ſcar'd, from oozy pillows rear!

With ſpiral ſhell,
Full-blaſted, tell
That all your watery realms ſhould ring;
Your pearl alcoves,
Your coral groves,
Should echo theirs and Britain's king.

As long as ſtars
Guide mariners,
As Carolina's virtues pleaſe,
Or ſuns invite
The raviſh'd ſight,
The Britiſh flag ſhall ſweep the ſeas.

Peculiar both!
Our ſoil's ſtrong growth,
And our bold natives hardy mind;
Sure Heaven beſpoke
Our hearts, and oak,
To give a maſter to mankind.

That nobleſt birth
Of teeming earth,
Of foreſts fair that daughter proud,
To foreign coaſts
Our grandeur boaſts,
And Britain's pleaſure ſpeaks aloud.

Now big with war
Sends fate from far,
If rebel realms their fate demand;
Now ſumptuous ſpoils
Of foreign ſoils
Pours in the boſom of our land.

Hence Britain lays
In ſcales, and weighs
The fates of kingdoms and of kings;
And as ſhe frowns
Or ſmiles, on crowns
A night or day of glory ſprings.

Thus Ocean ſwells
The ſtreams and rills,
And to their borders lifts them high;
Or elſe withdraws
The mighty cauſe,
And leaves their famiſh'd channels dry.

How mix'd, how frail,
How ſure to fail,

* Greenwich.

Is every pleaſure of mankind!
A damp deſtroys
My blooming joys,
While Britain's glory fires my mind

For who can gaze
On reſtleſs ſeas,
Unſtruck with life's more reſtleſs ſtate?
Where all are toſs'd,
And moſt are loſt,
By tides of paſſion, blaſts of fate?

The world's the main,
How vex'd! how vain!
Ambition ſwells, and anger foams;
May good men find,
Beneath the wind,
A noiſeleſs ſhore, unruffled homes!

The public ſcene
Of harden'd men
Teach me, O teach me to deſpiſe!
The world few know,
But to their woe,
Our crimes with our experience riſe.

All tender ſenſe
Is baniſh'd thence,
All maiden nature's firſt alarms
What ſhock'd before
Diſguſts no more,
And what diſguſted has its charms.

In landſcapes green
True bliſs is ſeen,
With innocence, in ſhades, ſhe ſports;
In wealthy towns
Proud labour frowns,
And painted ſorrow ſmiles in courts.

Theſe ſcenes untry'd
Seduc'd my pride,
To fortune's arrows bar'd my breaſt,
Till wiſdom came;
A hoary dame!
And told me pleaſure was in reſt.

" O may I ſteal
" Along the vale
" Of humble life, ſecure from foes!
" My friend ſincere,
" My judgment clear,
" And gentle buſineſs my repoſe.

" My mind be ſtrong
" To combat wrong!
" Grateful, O King! for favours ſhown!
" Soft to complain
" For others' pain,
" And bold to triumph o'er my own!

" (When Fortune's kind)
" Acute to find,
" And warm to reliſh every boon,
" And wiſe to ſtill
" Fantaſtic ill,
" Whoſe frightful ſpectres ſtalk at noon.

" No fruitleſs toils,
" No brainleſs broils,
" Each moment levell'd at the mark!
" Our day ſo ſhort
" Invites no ſport;
" Be ſad and ſolemn when 'tis dark.

" Yet prudence ſtill
" Rein thou my will!
" What's moſt important make moſt dear!
" For 'tis in this
" Reſides true bliſs;
" True bliſs, a deity ſevere!

" When temper leans
" To gayer ſcenes,
" And ſerious life void moments ſpares,
" The ſylvan chace
" My ſinews brace!
" Or ſong unbend my mind from cares!

" Nor ſhun, my ſoul!
" The genial bowl,
" Where mirth, good-nature, ſpirit, flow!
" Ingredients theſe
" Above to pleaſe
" The laughing gods, the wiſe below.

" Though rich the vine,
" More wit than wine,
" More ſenſe than wit, good-will than art,
" May I provide!
" Fair truth, my pride!
" My joy, the converſe of the heart!

" The gloomy brow
" The broken vow,
" To diſtant climes, ye gods, remove!
" The nobly-ſoul'd
" Their commerce hold
" With words of truth, and looks of love!

" O glorious aim!
" O wealth ſupreme!
" Divine benevolence of ſoul!
" That greatly glows,
" And freely flows,
" And in one bleſſing graſps the whole!

" Prophetic ſchemes,
" And golden dreams,
" May I unſanguine caſt away!
" Have what I have,
" And live, not leave,
" Enamour'd of the preſent day!

" My hours my own,
" My faults unknown,
" My chief revenue in content!
" Then leave one beam
" Of honeſt fame,
" And ſcorn the labour'd monument!

" Unhurt my urn,
" Till that great turn
" When mighty nature's ſelf ſhall die;
" Time ceaſe to glide,
" With human pride,
" Sunk in the ocean of eternity."

A PARAPHRASE ON PART OF THE BOOK OF JOB.

To the Right Honourable

THOMAS LORD PARKER, BARON OF MACCLESFIELD,

LORD HIGH CHANCELLOR OF GREAT-BRITAIN, &c. &c.

My Lord,

Though I have not the honour of being known to your Lordſhip, I preſume to take a privilege which men of retirement are apt to think themſelves in poſſeſſion of, as being the only method they have of making their way to perſons of your Lordſhip's high ſtation, without ſtruggling through multitudes for acceſs. I may poſſibly fail in my reſpect to your Lordſhip, even while I endeavour to ſhow it moſt; but if I err, it is becauſe I imagined I ought not to make my firſt approach to one of your Lordſhip's exalted character with leſs ceremony than that of a dedication. It is annexed to the condition of eminent merit, not to ſuffer more from the malice of its enemies than from the importunity of its admirers; and perhaps it would be unjuſt that your Lordſhip ſhould hope to be exempted from the troubles, when you poſſeſs all the talents, of a patron.

I have here a fair occaſion to celebrate thoſe ſublime qualities, of which a whole nation is ſenſible, were it not inconſiſtent with the deſign of my preſent application. By the juſt diſcharge of your great employments, your Lordſhip may well deſerve the prayers of the diſtreſſed, the thanks of your country, and the approbation of your Royal Maſter. This indeed is a reaſon why every good Briton ſhould applaud your Lordſhip; but it is equally a reaſon why none ſhould diſturb you in the execution of your important affairs by works of fancy and amuſement. I was therefore induced to make this addreſs to your Lordſhip, by conſidering you rather in the amiable light of a perſon diſtinguiſhed for a refined taſte of the polite arts, and the candour that uſually attends it, than in the dignity of your public character.

The greatneſs and ſolemnity of the ſubjects treated of in the following work, cannot fail in ſome meaſure to recommend it to a perſon who holds in the utmoſt veneration thoſe ſacred books from which it is taken; and would at the ſame time juſtify to the world my choice of the great name prefixed to it, could I be aſſured that the undertaking had not ſuffered in my hands. Thus much I think myſelf obliged to ſay, that if this little performance had not been very indulgently ſpoken of by ſome, whoſe judgment is univerſally allowed in writings of this nature, I had not dared to gratify my ambition in offering it to your Lordſhip. I am ſenſible that I am endeavouring to excuſe one vanity by another; but I hope I ſhall meet with pardon for it, ſince it is viſibly intended to ſhow the great ſubmiſſion and reſpect with which I am,

My Lord,

Your Lordſhip's moſt obedient and moſt humble ſervant,

Edward Young.

Thrice happy Job long liv'd in regal ſtate,
Nor ſaw the ſumptuous eaſt a prince ſo great;
Whoſe worldly ſtores in ſuch abundance flow'd,
Whoſe heart with ſuch exalted virtue glow'd.
At length misfortunes take their turn to reign,
And ills on ills ſucceed; a dreadful train!
What now but deaths, and poverty, and wrong,
The ſword wide-waſting, the reproachful tongue,
And ſpotted plagues, that mark'd his limbs all o'er
So thick with pains, they wanted room for more!
A change ſo ſad what mortal here could bear?
Exhauſted woe had left him nought to fear;
But gave him all to grief. Low earth he preſt,
Wept in the duſt, and ſorely ſmote his breaſt.
His friends around the deep affliction mourn'd,
Felt all his pangs, and groan for groan return'd;

In anguish of their hearts their mantles rent,
And seven long days in solemn silence spent;
A debt of reverence to their distress so great!
Then Job contain'd no more; but curs'd his fate.
His day of birth, its inauspicious light,
He wishes sunk in shades of endless night,
And blotted from the year; nor fears to crave
Death, instant death; impatient for the grave,
That seat of peace, that mansion of repose,
Where rest and mortals are no longer foes;
Where counsellors are hush'd, and mighty kings
(O happy turn!) no more are wretched things.
His words were daring, and displeas'd his friends;
His conduct they reprove, and he defends;
And now they kindled into warm debate,
And sentiments oppos'd with equal heat;
Fix'd in opinion, both refuse to yield,
And summon all their reason to the field:
So high at length their arguments were wrought,
They reach'd the last extent of human thought:
A pause ensued.—When, lo! heaven interpos'd,
And awfully the long contention clos'd.
Full o'er their heads, with terrible surprise,
A sudden whirlwind blacken'd all the skies:
(They saw, and trembled!) from the darkness broke
A dreadful voice, and thus th' Almighty spoke:
Who gives his tongue a loose so bold and vain,
Censures my conduct, and reproves my reign;
Lifts up his thought against me from the dust,
And tells the world's Creator what is just?
Of late so brave, now lift a dauntless eye,
Face my demand, and give it a reply:
Where didst thou dwell at nature's early birth?
Who laid foundations for the spacious earth?
Who on its surface did extend the line,
Its form determine, and its bulk confine?
Who fix'd the corner-stone? What hand, declare,
Hung it on nought, and fasten'd it on air;
When the bright morning stars in concert sung,
When heaven's high arch with loud hosannahs rung,
When shouting sons of God the triumph crown'd,
And the wide concave thunder'd with the sound?
Earth's numerous kingdoms, hast thou view'd them all?
And can thy span of knowledge grasp the ball?
Who heav'd the mountain, which sublimely stands,
And casts its shadow into distant lands?
Who, stretching forth his sceptre o'er the deep,
Can that wide world in due subjection keep?
I broke the globe, I scoop'd its hollow side,
And did a bason for the floods provide;
I chain'd them with my word; the boiling sea,
Work'd up in tempests, hears my great decree;
"Thus far, thy floating tide shall be convey'd;
"And here, O main, be thy proud billows stay'd."
Hast thou explor'd the secrets of the deep,
Where, shut from use, unnumber'd treasures sleep?
Where, down a thousand fathoms from the day,
Springs the great fountain, mother of the sea?
Those gloomy paths did thy bold foot e'er tread,
Whose worlds of waters rolling o'er thy head?
Hath the cleft centre open'd wide to thee?
Death's inmost chambers didst thou ever see?
E'er knock at his tremendous gate, and wade
To the black portal through th' incumbent shade?
Deep are those shades; but shades still deeper hide
My counsels from the ken of human pride.
Where dwells the light? In what refulgent dome?
And where has darkness made her dismal home?
Thou know'st, no doubt, since thy large heart is fraught
With ripen'd wisdom, through long ages brought;
Since nature was call'd forth when thou was by,
And into being rose beneath thine eye!
Are mists begotten? Who their father knew?
From whom descend the pearly drops of dew?
To bind the stream by night what hand can boast,
Or whiten morning with the hoary frost?
Whose powerful breath, from northern regions blown,
Touches the sea, and turns it into stone?
A sudden desart spreads o'er realms defac'd,
And lays one half of the creation waste?
Thou know'st me not; thy blindness cannot see
How vast a distance parts thy God from thee.
Canst thou in whirlwinds mount aloft? Canst thou
In clouds and darkness wrap thy awful brow;
And, when day triumphs in meridian light,
Put forth thy hand, and shade the world with night?
Who launch'd the clouds in air, and bid them roll
Suspended seas aloft, from pole to pole?
Who can refresh the burning sandy plain,
And quench the summer with a waste of rain?
Who, in rough deserts, far from human toil,
Made rocks bring forth, and desolation smile?
There blooms the rose, where human face ne'er shone,
And spreads its beauties to the sun alone.
To check the shower, who lifts his hand on high,
And shuts the sluices of th' exhausted sky,
When earth no longer mourns her gaping veins,
Her naked mountains, and her ruffet plains;
But, new in life, a cheerful prospect yields
Of shining rivers, and of verdant fields;
When groves and forests lavish all their bloom,
And earth and heaven are fill'd with rich perfume?
Hast thou e'er seal'd my wintery skies, and seen
Of hail and snows my northern magazine?
These the dread treasures of mine anger are,
My funds of vengeance for the day of war,
When clouds rain death, and storms at my command
Rage through the world, or waste a guilty land.
Who taught the rapid winds to fly so fast,
Or shakes the centre with his eastern blast?
Who from the skies can a whole deluge pour?
Who strikes through nature with the solemn roar
Of dreadful thunder, points it where to fall,
And in fierce lightning wraps the flying ball?
Not he who trembles at the darted fires,
Falls at the sound, and in the flash expires.
Who drew the comet out to such a size,
And pour'd his flaming train o'er half the skies?
Did thy resentment hang him out? Does he
Glare on the nation, and denounce, from thee?

Who on low earth can moderate the rein,
That guides the ſtars along th' ethereal plain?
Appoint their ſeaſons, and direct their courſe,
Their luſtre brighten, and ſupply their force? 140
Canſt thou the ſkies benevolence reſtrain,
And cauſe the Pleiades to ſhine in vain;
Or, when Orion ſparkles from his ſphere,
Thaw the cold ſeaſon, and unbind the year;
Bid Mazzaroth his deſtin'd ſtation know,
And teach the bright Arcturus where to glow?
Mine is the night, with all her ſtars; I pour
Myriads, and myriads I reſerve in ſtore.
Doſt thou pronounce where day-light ſhall be born,
And draw the purple curtain of the morn; 150
Awake the ſun, and bid him come away,
And glad thy world with his obſequious ray?
Haſt thou, enthron'd in flaming glory, driven
Triumphant round the ſpacious ring of heaven?
That pomp of light, what hand ſo far diſplays,
That diſtant earth lies baſking in the blaze?
Who did the ſoul with her rich powers inveſt,
And light up reaſon in the human breaſt?
To ſhine, with freſh increaſe of luſtre bright,
When ſtars and ſun are ſet in endleſs night? 160
To theſe my various queſtions make reply.
Th' Almighty ſpoke; and, ſpeaking, ſhook the ſky.
What then, Chaldean ſire, was thy ſurpriſe!
Thus thou, with trembling heart and down-caſt eyes:
"Once and again, which I in groans deplore,
"My tongue has err'd; but ſhall preſume no more.
"My voice is in eternal ſilence bound,
"And all my ſoul falls proſtrate to the ground."
He ceas'd: when, lo! again th' Almighty ſpoke;
The ſame dread voice from the black whirlwind broke. 170
Can that arm meaſure with an arm divine?
And canſt thou thunder with a voice like mine;
Or in the hollow of thy hand contain
The bulk of waters, the wide-ſpreading main,
When, mad with tempeſts, all the billows riſe
In all their rage, and daſh the diſtant ſkies?
Come forth, in beauty's excellence array'd;
And be the grandeur of thy power diſplay'd;
Put on omnipotence, and, frowning, make
The ſpacious round of the creation ſhake; 180
Diſpatch thy vengeance, bid it overthrow
Triumphant vice, lay lofty tyrants low,
And crumble them to duſt. When this is done,
I grant thy ſafety lodg'd in thee alone;
Of thee thou art, and may'ſt undaunted ſtand,
Behind the buckler of thine own right-hand.
Fond man! the viſion of a moment made!
Dream of a dream! and ſhadow of a ſhade!
What worlds haſt thou produc'd, what creatures fram'd;
What inſects cheriſh'd, that thy God is blam'd? 190
When pain'd with hunger, the wild raven's brood
Loud calls on God, importunate for food:
Who hears their cry, who grants their hoarſe requeſt,
And ſtills the clamour of the craving neſt?
Who in the ſtupid oſtrich has ſubdued
A parent's care, and fond inquietude?
While far ſhe flies, her ſcatter'd eggs are found,
Without an owner, on the ſandy ground;
Caſt out on fortune, they at mercy lie,
And borrow life from an indulgent ſky: 200
Adopted by the ſun, in blaze of day,
They ripen under his prolific ray.
Unmindful ſhe, that ſome unhappy tread
May cruſh her young in their neglected bed.
What time ſhe ſkims along the field with ſpeed,
She ſcorns the rider, and purſuing ſteed.
How rich the peacock! what bright glories run
From plume to plume, and vary in the ſun!
He proudly ſpreads them to the golden ray,
Gives all his colours, and adorns the day; 210
With conſcious ſtate the ſpacious round diſplays,
And ſlowly moves amid the waving blaze.
Who taught the hawk to find, in ſeaſons wiſe,
Perpetual ſummer, and a change of ſkies?
When clouds deform the year, ſhe mounts the wind
Shoots to the ſouth, nor fears the ſtorm behind;
The ſun returning, ſhe returns again,
Lives in his beams, and leaves ill days to men.
Though ſtrong the hawk, though practis'd well to fly,
An eagle drops her in a lower ſky; 220
An eagle, when, deſerting human ſight,
She ſeeks the ſun in her unweary'd flight:
Did thy command her yellow pinion lift,
So high in air, and ſet her on the cliff,
Where far above thy world ſhe dwells alone,
And proudly makes the ſtrength of rocks her own;
Thence wide o'er nature takes her dread ſurvey,
And with a glance predeſtinates her prey? [o'er
She feaſts her young with blood; and, hovering
Th' unſlaughter'd hoſt, enjoys the promis'd gore. 230
Know'ſt thou how many moons, by me aſſign'd,
Roll o'er the mountain goat, and foreſt hind,
While pregnant they a mother's load ſuſtain?
They bend in anguiſh, and caſt forth their pain.
Hale are their young, from human frailties freed;
Walk unſuſtain'd, and unaſſiſted feed;
They live at once; forſake the dam's warm ſide;
Take the wide world, with nature for their guide;
Bound o'er the lawn, or ſeek the diſtant glade;
And find a home in each delightful ſhade. 240
Will th' tall reem, which knows no lord but me,
Low at the crib, and aſk an alms of thee?
Submit his unworn ſhoulder to the yoke,
Break the ſtiff clod, and o'er thy furrow ſmoke?
Since great his ſtrength, go truſt him, void of care;
Lay on his neck the toil of all the year;
Bid him bring home the ſeaſons to thy doors,
And caſt his load among thy gather'd ſtores.
Didſt thou from ſervice the wild-aſs diſcharge,
And break his bonds, and bid him live at large, 250
Through the wide waſte, his ample manſion, roam,
And loſe himſelf in his unbounded home?
By nature's hand magnificently fed,
His meal is on the range of mountains ſpread;
As in pure air aloft he bounds along,
He ſees in diſtant ſmoke the city throng;
Conſcious of freedom, ſcorns the ſmother'd train,
The threatening driver, and the ſervile rein.
Survey the warlike horſe! didſt thou inveſt
With thunder his robuſt diſtended creſt? 260

No fenſe of fear his dauntleſs ſoul allays;
'Tis dreadful to behold his noſtrils blaze;
To paw the vale he proudly takes delight,
And triumphs in the fulneſs of his might;
High-rais'd he ſnuffs the battle from afar,
And burns to plunge amid the raging war;
And mocks at death, and throws his foam around,
And in a ſtorm of fury ſhakes the ground.
How does his firm, his riſing heart, advance
Full on the brandiſh'd ſword, and ſhaken lance;
While his fix'd eye-balls meet the dazzling ſhield,
Gaze, and return the lightning of the field!
He ſinks the ſenſe of pain in generous pride,
Nor feels the ſhaft that trembles in his ſide;
But neighs to the ſhrill trumpet's dreadful blaſt
Till death; and when he groans, he groans his laſt.
But, fiercer ſtill, the lordly lion ſtalks,
Grimly majeſtic in his lonely walks;
When round he glares, all living creatures fly;
He clears the deſart with his rolling eye.
Say, mortal, does he rouſe at thy command,
And roar to thee, and live upon thy hand?
Doſt thou for him in foreſts bend thy bow,
And to his gloomy den the morſel throw.
Where bent on death lie hid his tawny brood,
And, couch'd in dreadful ambuſh, pant for blood;
Or, ſtretch'd on broken limbs, conſume the day,
In darkneſs wrapt, and ſlumber o'er their prey?
By the pale moon they take their deſtin'd round,
And laſh their ſides, and furious tear the ground.
Now ſhrieks and dying groans the deſart fill;
They rage, they rend; their ravenous jaws diſtil
With crimſon foam; and, when the banquet's o'er,
They ſtride away, and paint their ſteps with gore;
In flight alone the ſhepherd puts his truſt,
And ſhudders at the talon in the duſt.
Mild is my Behemoth, though large his frame;
Smooth is his temper, and repreſt his flame,
While unprovok'd. This native of the flood
Lifts his broad foot, and puts aſhore for food;
Earth ſinks beneath him, as he moves along
To ſeek the herbs, and mingle with the throng.
See with what ſtrength his harden'd loins are bound,
All over proof and ſhut againſt a wound.
How like a mountain cedar moves his tail!
Nor can his complicated ſinews fail.
Built high and wide, his ſolid bones ſurpaſs
The bars of ſteel; his ribs are ribs of braſs;
His port majeſtic and his armed jaw
Give the wide foreſt, and the mountain, law.
The mountains feed him; there the beaſts admire
The mighty ſtranger, and in dread retire,
At length his greatneſs nearer they ſurvey,
Graze in his ſhadow, and his eye obey.
The fens and marſhes are his cool retreat,
His noontide ſhelter from the burning heat;
Their ſedgy boſoms his wide couch are made,
And groves of willows give him all their ſhade.
His eye drinks Jordan up, when fir'd with drought,
He truſts to turn its current down his throat;
In leſſen'd waves it creeps along the plain:
He ſinks a river, and he thirſts again.

Go to the Nile, and, from its fruitful ſide,
Caſt forth thy line into the ſwelling tide:
With ſlender hair Leviathan command,
And ſtretch his vaſtneſs on the loaded ſtrand.
Will he become thy ſervant? Will he own
Thy lordly nod, and tremble at thy frown?
Or with his ſport amuſe thy leiſure day,
And, bound in ſilk, with thy ſoft maidens play?
Shall pompous banquets ſwell with ſuch a prize?
And the bowl journey round his ample ſize?
Or the debating merchants ſhare the prey,
And various limbs to various marts convey?
Through his firm ſkull what ſteel its way can win?
What forceful engine can ſubdue his ſkin?
Fly far, and live; tempt not his matchleſs might:
The braveſt ſhrink to cowards in his ſight;
The raſheſt dare not rouſe him up: Who then
Shall turn on me, among the ſons of men?
Am I a debtor? Haſt thou ever heard
Whence come the gifts that are on me conferr'd?
My laviſh fruit a thouſand valleys fills,
And mine the herds that graze a thouſand hills:
Earth, ſea, and air, all nature is my own;
And ſtars and ſun are duſt beneath my throne.
And dar'ſt thou with the world's great Father vie,
Thou, who doſt tremble at my creature's eye?
At full my large Leviathan ſhall riſe,
Boaſt all his ſtrength, and ſpread his wondrous ſize.
Who, great in arms, e'er ſtripp'd his ſhining mail,
Or crown'd his triumph with a ſingle ſcale!
Whoſe heart ſuſtains him to draw near? Behold,
Deſtruction yawns; his ſpacious jaws unfold,
And, marſhall'd round the wide expanſe, diſcloſe
Teeth edg'd with death, and crowding rows on rows:
What hideous fangs on either ſide ariſe!
And what a deep abyſs between them lies!
Mete with thy lance, and with thy plumbet ſound,
The one how long, the other how profound.
His bulk is charg'd with ſuch a furious ſoul,
That clouds of ſmoke from his ſpread noſtrils roll,
As from a furnace; and when rous'd his ire,
Fate iſſues from his jaws in ſtreams of fire.
The rage of tempeſts, and the roar of ſeas,
Thy terror, this thy great ſuperior pleaſe;
Strength on his ample ſhoulder ſits in ſtate;
His well-join'd limbs are dreadfully complete;
His flakes of ſolid fleſh are ſlow to part;
As ſteel his nerves, as adamant his heart.
When, late awak'd, he rears him from the floods,
And ſtretching forth his ſtature to the clouds,
Writhes in the ſun aloft his ſcaly height,
And ſtrikes the diſtant hills with tranſient light,
Far round are fatal damps of terror ſpread,
The mighty fear, nor bluſh to own their dread.
Large is his front; and when his burniſh'd eyes
Lift their broad lids, the morning ſeems to riſe.
In vain may death in various ſhapes invade,
The ſwift-wing'd arrow, the deſcending blade;
His naked breaſt their impotence deſies;
The dart rebounds, the brittle faulchion flies.
Shut in himſelf, the war without he hears,
Safe in the tempeſt of their rattling ſpears;
The cumber'd ſtrand their waſted vollies ſtrow;
His ſport, the rage and labour of the foe.

His paſtimes like a cauldron boil the flood,
And blacken ocean with the riſing mud;
The billows feel him, as he works his way;
His hoary footſteps ſhine along the ſea;
The foam high-wrought with white divides the green,
And diſtant ſailors point where death has been.

His like earth bears not on her ſpacious face;
Alone in nature ſtands his dauntleſs race,
For utter ignorance of fear renown'd,
In wrath he rolls his baleful eye around:
Makes every ſwoll'n, diſdainful heart, ſubſide,
And holds dominion o'er the ſons of pride.

Then the Chaldean eas'd his labouring breaſt,
With full conviction of his crime oppreſt.
" Thou canſt accompliſh all things, Lord of Might:
" And every thought is naked to thy ſight.
" But, oh! thy ways are wonderful, and lie
" Beyond the deepeſt reach of mortal eye.
" Oft have I heard of thine almighty power;
" But never ſaw thee till this dreadful hour.
" O'erwhelm'd with ſhame, the Lord of Life I ſee,
" Abhor myſelf, and give my ſoul to thee.
" Nor ſhall my weakneſs tempt thine anger more:
" Man is not made to queſtion, but adore."

NOTES ON THE PARAPHRASE.

Book of Job.] It is diſputed amongſt the critics who was the author of the Book of Job; ſome give it to Moſes, ſome to others. As I was engaged in this little performance, ſome arguments occurred to me which favour the former of thoſe opinions; and becauſe I do not find them mentioned by any one elſe, I have flung them into the following notes, where little elſe is to be expected.

Ver. 1.] The Almighty's ſpeech, chapter xxxviii, &c. which is what I paraphraſe in this little work, is by much the fineſt part of the nobleſt and moſt ancient poem in the world. Biſhop Patrick ſays, its grandeur is as much above all other poetry, as thunder is louder than a whiſper. In order to ſet this diſtinguiſh'd part of the poem in a fuller light, and give the reader a clearer conception of it, I have abridged the preceding and ſubſequent parts of the poem, and joined them to it; ſo that this piece is a ſort of epitome of the whole Book of Job.

I uſe the word paraphraſe, becauſe I want another which might better anſwer to the uncommon liberties I have taken. I have omitted, added, and tranſpoſed. The mountain, the comet, the ſun, and other parts, are entirely added: thoſe upon the peacock, the lion, &c. are much enlarged; and I have thrown the whole into a method more ſuitable to our notions of regularity. The judicious, if they compare this piece with the original, will, I flatter myſelf, find the reaſons for the great liberties I have indulged myſelf in through the whole.

Longinus has a chapter on interrogations, which ſhows that they contribute much to the ſublime. This ſpeech of the Almighty is made up of them. Interrogations ſeems, indeed, the proper ſtyle of majeſty incenſed. It differs from other manner of reproof, as bidding a perſon execute himſelf, does from a common execution; for he that aſks the guilty a proper queſtion, makes him, in effect, paſs ſentence on himſelf.

Ver. 41.] The Book of Job is well known to be dramatic, and like the tragedies of old Greece, is fiction built on truth. Probably this moſt noble part of it, the Almighty ſpeaking out of the whirlwind (ſo ſuitable to the after-practice of the Greek ſtage, when there happened "dignus vindice no-" dus"), is fictitious; but is fiction more agreeable to the time in which Job lived, than to any ſince. Frequent before the Law were the appearances of the Almighty after this manner, Exod. chap. xix. Ezek. chap. i. &c. Hence is he ſaid to "dwell in thick darkneſs: and have his way in the "whirlwind."

Ver. 69.] There is a very great air in all that precedes, but this is ſignally ſublime. We are ſtruck with admiration to ſee the vaſt and ungovernable ocean receiving commands, and punctually obeying them; to find it like a managed horſe, raging, toſſing, and foaming, but by the rule and direction of its maſter. This paſſage yields in ſublimity to that of "Let there be light," &c. ſo much only, as the abſolute government of nature yields to the creation of it.

The like ſpirit in theſe two paſſages is no bad concurrent argument, that Moſes is author of the Book of Job.

Ver. 191.] Another argument that Moſes was the author is, that moſt of the creatures here are Egyptian. The reaſon given why the raven is particularly mentioned as an object of the care of Providence is, becauſe by her clamorous and importunate voice, ſhe particularly ſeems always calling upon it; thence κοράσσω, à κόραξ, Ælian, l. ii. c. 48, is "to aſk earneſtly." And ſince there were ravens on the bank of the Nile more clamorous than the reſt of that ſpecies, thoſe probably are meant in that place.

Ver. 195.] There are many inſtances of this bird's ſtupidity: let two ſuffice. Firſt, it covers its head in the reeds, and thinks itſelf all out of ſight:

" Stat lumine clauſo
" Rideñdum revoluta caput, creditque latere
" Quæ non ipſa videt." CLAUD.

Secondly, They that go in purſuit of them, draw the ſkin of an oſtrich's neck on one hand, which proves a ſufficient lure to take them with the other.

They have ſo little brain, that Heliogabulus had ſix hundred heads for his ſupper.

Here we may obſerve, that our judicious, as well as ſublime author, juſt touches the great points of diſtinction in each creature, and then haſtens to another. A deſcription is exact when you cannot add, but what is common to another thing; nor withdraw, but ſomething peculiarly belonging to the thing deſcribed. A likeneſs is loſt in too much deſcription, as a meaning often in too much illuſtration.

Ver 205.] Here is marked another peculiar quality of this creature, which neither flies nor runs directly, but has a motion compoſed of both, and uſing its wings as ſails, makes great ſpeed.

" Vaſta velut Libyæ venantûm vocibus ales
" Cum premitur, calidas curſu tranſmittit arenas,
" Inque modum veli ſinuatis flamine pennis
" Pulverulenta volat." CLAUD. in Eutr.

Ver. 206.] Xenophou ſays, Cyrus had horſes that could overtake the goat and the wild aſs; but none that could reach this creature. A thouſand golden ducats, or a hundred camels, was the ſtated price of a horſe that could equal their ſpeed.

Ver. 207.] Though this bird is but juſt mentioned in my author, I could not forbear going a little farther, and ſpreading thoſe beautiful plumes (which are there ſhut up) in half a dozen lines. The circumſtance I have marked of his opening his plumes to the ſun, is true: " Expandit colores adverſo maximè ſole, quia ſic fulgentius radiant." PLIN. l. x. c. 20.

Ver. 219.] Thuanus (de Re Accip.) mentions a hawk that flew from Paris to London in a night.

And the Egyptians, in regard to its ſwiftneſs, made it their ſymbol for the wind; for which reaſon we may ſuppoſe the hawk, as well as the crow above-mentioned, to have been a bird of note in Egypt.

Ver. 227.] The eagle is ſaid to be of ſo acute a ſight, that when ſhe is ſo high in air that man cannot ſee her, ſhe can diſcern the ſmalleſt fiſh under water. My author accurately underſtood the nature of the creature he deſcribes, and ſeems to have been a naturaliſt as well as a poet, which the next note will confirm.

Ver. 231.] The meaning of this queſtion is, Knoweſt thou the time and circumſtances of their bringing forth? For to know the time only was eaſy, and had nothing extraordinary in it; but the circumſtances had ſomething peculiarly expreſſive of God's providence, which makes the queſtion proper in this place. Pliny obſerves, that the hind with young is by inſtinct directed to a certain herb called ſeſelis, which facilitates the birth. Thunder alſo (which looks like the more immediate hand of Providence) has the ſame effect. Pſ. xxix. In ſo early an age to obſerve theſe things, may ſtyle our author a naturaliſt.

Ver. 259.] The deſcription of the horſe is the moſt celebrated of any in the poem. There is an excellent critic on it in the Guardian. I ſhall therefore only obſerve, that in this deſcription, as in other parts of this ſpeech, our vulgar tranſlation has much more ſpirit than the Septuagint; it always takes the original in the moſt poetic and exalted ſenſe, ſo that moſt commentators, even on the Hebrew itſelf, fall beneath it.

Ver. 289.] Purſuing their prey by night, is true of moſt wild beaſts, particularly the lion. Pſ. cvi. 20. The Arabians have one among their 500 names for the lion, which ſignifies " the hunter by " moon-ſhine."

Ver. 322.]
" Cepheſi glaciale caput quo ſuetos anhelam
" Ferre ſitim Pythen, amnemque avertere pon-
" to." STAT. Theb. v. 349.

" Qui ſpiris tegeret montes, hauriret hiatu
" Flumina," &c. CLAUD. Pref. in Ruf.

Let not then this hyperbole ſeem too much for an eaſtern poet, though ſome commentators of name ſtrain hard in this place for a new conſtruction, through fear of it.

Ver. 323.] The taking of the crocodile is moſt difficult. Diodorus ſays, they are not to be taken but by iron nets. When Auguſtus conquered Egypt, he ſtruck a medal, the impreſs of which was a crocodile chained to a palm-tree, with this inſcription, " Nemo antea religavit."

Ver. 339.] This alludes to a cuſtom of this creature, which is, when ſated with fiſh, to come aſhore and ſleep among the reeds.

Ver. 353.] The crocodile's mouth is exceedingly wide. When he gapes, ſays Pliny, " ſit totum os." Martial ſays to his old woman,

" Cum comparata rictibus tuis ora
" Niliacus habet crocodilus anguſta."

ſo that the expreſſion here is barely juſt.

Ver. 364.] This too is nearer truth than that at firſt view may be imagined. The crocodile, ſay the naturaliſts, lying long under water, and being there forced to hold its breath, when it emerges, the breath long repreſt is hot, and burſts out ſo violently, that it reſembles fire and ſmoke. The horſe ſuppreſſes not his breath by any means ſo long, neither is he ſo fierce and animated; yet the moſt correct of poets venture to uſe the ſame metaphor concerning him:

" Collectumque premens volvit ſub naribus ig-
" nem."

By this and the foregoing note, I would caution againſt a falſe opinion of the eaſtern boldneſs, from paſſages in them ill underſtood.

Ver. 377.] " His eyes are like the eye-lids of " the morning." I think this gives us as great an image of the thing it would expreſs, as can enter the thought of man. It is not improbable that the Egyptians ſtole their hieroglyphic for the morning, which is the crocodile's eye, from this paſſage, though no commentator I have ſeen mentions it. It is eaſy to conceive how the Egyptians ſhould be both readers and admirers of the writings of Moſes, whom I ſuppoſe the author of this poem.

I have obſerved already, that three or four of the creatures here deſcribed are Egyptian; the two laſt are notoriouſly ſo; they are the river-horſe and the crocodile, thoſe celebrated inhabitants of the Nile; and on theſe two it is that our author chiefly dwells. It would have been expected from an author more remote from that river than Moſes, in a catalogue of creatures produced to magnify their Creator, to have dwelt on the two largeſt works of his hand, viz. the elephant and the whale. This is ſo natural an expectation, that ſome commentators have rendered behemoth and leviathan, the elephant and the whale, though the deſcriptions in our author will not admit of it: but Moſes being, as we may well ſuppoſe, under an immediate terror of the hippopotamus and crocodile, from their daily miſchiefs and ravages around him; it is very accountable why he ſhould permit them to take place.

ON DR. YOUNG'S TRANSLATION OF PART OF JOB.

By Dr. Cobden.

THE poem, which originally great,
Had long ſuſtain'd poor Job's unhappy fate,
Fallen from its grandeur, clad in mean array,
And in the duſt of proſe inglorious lay;
Like him now ſhines, with former greatneſs bleſt,
And in its native majeſty confeſs'd.

MICELLANIES.

ON MICHAEL ANGELO'S FAMOUS PIECE OF THE CRUCIFIXION.

Who is ſaid to have ſtabbed a Perſon that he might draw it more naturally *.

WHILST his Redeemer on his canvas dies,
Stabb'd at his feet his brother weltering lies:
The daring artiſt cruelly ſerene,
Views the pale cheek and the diſtorted mien;
He drains off life by drops, and deaf to cries,
Examines every ſpirit as it flies:
He ſtudies torment, dives in mortal woe,
To rouſe up every pang repeats his blow;
Each riſing agony, each dreadful grace,
Yet warm tranſplanting to his Saviour's face.
Oh glorious theft! oh nobly wicked draught!
With its full charge of death each feature fraught:
Such wondrous force the magic colours boaſt,
From his own ſkill he ſtarts in horror loſt.

TO MR. ADDISON,

ON THE TRAGEDY OF CATO.

WHAT do we ſee is Cato then become
A greater name in Britain than in Rome?
Does mankind now admire his virtues more,
Though Lucan, Horace, Virgil wrote before?
How will poſterity this truth explain?
"Cato begins to live in Anna's reign."
The world's great chiefs, in council or in arms,
Riſe in your lines with more exalted charms;
Illuſtrious deeds in diſtant nations wrought,
And virtues by departed heroes taught,
Raiſe in your ſoul a pure immortal flame,
Adorn your life, and conſecrate your fame;
To your renown all ages you ſubdue,
And Cæſar fought, and Cato bled for you.

All Soul's Coll. Oxon.

HISTORICAL EPILOGUE TO THE BROTHERS.

A TRAGEDY.

AN Epilogue, through cuſtom, is your right,
But ne'er perhaps was needful till this night:
To night the virtuous falls, the guilty flies,
Guilt's dreadful cloſe our narrow ſcene denies.
In hiſtory's authentic record read
What ample vengeance gluts Demetrius' ſhade;
Vengeance ſo great, that when his tale is told,
With pity ſome ev'n Perſeus may behold.
Perſeus ſurviv'd indeed, and fill'd the throne,
But ceaſeleſs cares in conqueſt made him groan:
Nor reign'd he long; from Rome ſwift thunder flew,
And headlong from his throne the tyrant threw:
Thrown headlong down, by Rome in triumph led,
For this night's deed his perjur'd boſom bled:
His brother's ghoſt each moment made him ſtart,
And all his father's anguiſh rent his heart,
When, robb'd in black, his children round him hung,
And their rais'd arms in early ſorrow wrung;
The younger ſmil'd, unconſcious of their woe;
At which thy tears, O Rome! began to flow;
So ſad the ſcene! what then muſt Perſeus feel,
To ſee Jove's race attend the victor's wheel:
To ſee the ſlaves of his worſt foes increaſe,
From ſuch a ſource!—An emperor's embrace!
He ſicken'd ſoon to death; and, what is worſe,
He well deſerv'd and felt, the coward's curſe;
Unpity'd, ſcorn'd, inſulted his laſt hour,
Far, far from home, and in a vaſſal's power:
His pale cheek reſted on his ſhameful chain,
No friend to mourn, no flatterer to feign;
No ſuit retards, no comfort ſoothes his doom,
And not one tear bedews a monarch's tomb.
Nor ends it thus—dire vengeance to complete,
His ancient empire falling ſhares his fate:
His throne forgot! his weeping country chain'd!
And nations aſk—where Alexander reign'd.
As public woes a prince's crime purſue,
So public bleſſings are his virtue's due.
Shout, Britons, ſhout—auſpicious fortune bleſs!
And cry, Long live—Our title to ſucceſs!

EPITAPH

ON LORD AUBREY BEAUCLERK *,

In Weſtminſter-Abbey, 1740.

WHILST Britain boaſts her empire o'er the deep,
This marble ſhall compel the brave to weep:

* Though the report was propagated without the leaſt truth, it may be ſufficient ground to juſtify a poetical fancy's enlarging on it.

* Lord Aubrey Beauclerk was the eight ſon of the Duke of St. Alban's, who was one of the ſons of King

As men, as Britons, and as ſoldiers, mourn;
'Tis dauntleſs, loyal, virtuous Beauclerk's urn.
Sweet were his manners, as his ſoul was great,
And ripe his worth, though immature his fate;
Each tender grace that joy and love inſpires,
Living, he mingled with his martial fires:
Dying, he bid Britannia's thunders roar;
And Spain ſtill felt him, when he breath'd no more.

EPITAPH

AT WELWYN, HERTFORDSHIRE.

If fond of what is rare, attend!
Here lies an honeſt man,
Of perfect piety,
Of lamblike patience,
My friend, James Barker;
To whom I pay this mean memorial,
For what deſerves the greateſt.
An example
Which ſhone through all the clouds of fortune,
Induſtrious in low eſtate,
The leſſon and reproach of thoſe above him.
To lay this little ſtone
Is my ambition;
While others rear
The poliſh'd marbles of the great!
Vain pomp!
A turf o'er virtue charms us more.

A LETTER TO MR. TICKELL.

Occaſioned by the Death of the Right Honourable Joſeph Addiſon, Eſq. 1719.

" --- Tu nunc eris alter ab illo." VIRG.

O LONG with me in Oxford groves confin'd,
In ſocial arts and ſacred friendſhip join'd;
Fair Iſis' ſorrow, and fair Iſis' boaſt,
Loſt from her ſide, but fortunately loſt;
Thy wonted aid, my dear companion! bring,
And teach me thy departed friend to ſing:
A darling theme! once powerful to inſpire,
And now to melt, the muſes' mourniful choir:
Now, and now firſt, we freely dare commend
His modeſt worth, nor ſhall our praiſe offend.
Early he bloom'd amid the learned train,
And raviſh'd Iſis liſten'd to his ſtrain.
See, ſee, ſhe cry'd, old Maro's muſe appears,
Wak'd from her ſlumber of two thouſand years;

Her finiſh'd charms to Addiſon ſhe brings,
Thinks in his thought, and in his numbers ſings
All read tranſported his pure claſſic page;
Read, and forget their climate and their age.
The ſtate, when now his riſing fame was known,
Th' unrivall'd genius challeng'd for her own,
Nor would that one, for ſcenes of action ſtrong,
Should let a life evaporate in ſong.
As health and ſtrength the brighteſt charms diſpenſe,
Wit is the bloſſom of the ſoundeſt ſenſe:
Yet few, how few, with lofty thoughts inſpir'd,
With quickneſs pointed, and with rapture fir'd,
In conſcious pride their own importance find,
Blind to themſelves, as the hard world is blind!
Wit they eſteem a gay but worthleſs power,
The ſlight amuſement of a leiſure hour;
Unmindful that, conceal'd from vulgar eyes,
Majeſtic wiſdom wears the bright diſguiſe.
Poor Dido fondled thus, with idle joy,
Dread Cupid, lurking in the Trojan boy;
Lightly ſhe toy'd and trifled with his charms,
And knew not that a god was in her arms.
Who greateſt excellence of thought could boaſt,
In action, too, have been diſtinguiſh'd moſt:
This Sommers knew, and Addiſon ſent forth
From the malignant regions of the north,
To be matur'd in more indulgent ſkies,
Where all the vigour of the ſoul can riſe;
Through warmer veins where ſprightlier ſpirits run,
And ſenſe enliven'd ſparkles in the ſun.
With ſecret pain the prudent patriot gave,
The hopes of Britain to the rolling wave,
Anxious, the charge to all the ſtars reſign'd,
And plac'd a confidence in ſea and wind.
Auſonia ſoon receiv'd her wondering gueſt,
And equal wonder in her turn confeſs'd,
To ſee her fervours rivall'd by the pole,
Her luſtre beaming from a northern ſoul:
In like ſurpriſe was her Æneas loſt,
To find his picture grace a foreign coaſt.
Now the wide field of Europe he ſurveys,
Compares her kings, her thrones and empires weighs,
In ripen'd judgment and conſummate thought;
Great work! by Naſſau's favour cheaply bought.
He now returns to Britain a ſupport,
Wiſe in her ſenate, graceful in her court;
And, when the public welfare would permit,
The ſource of learning, and the ſoul of wit.
O Warwick! (whom the muſe is fond to name,
And kindles, conſcious of her future theme)
O Warwick! by divine contagion bright!
How early didſt thou catch his radiant light!
By him inſpir'd, how ſhine before thy time,
And leave thy years, and leap into thy prime!
On ſome warm bank, thus, fortunately born,
A roſe-bud opens to a ſummer's morn,
Full-blown ere noon her fragrant pride diſplays,
And ſhows th' abundance of her purple rays.
Wit, as her bays, was once a barren tree;
We now, ſurpris'd, her fruitful branches ſee;
Or, orange-like, till his auſpicious time
It grew indeed, but ſhiver'd in our clime:

Charles the Second. He was born in the year 1711; and, being regularly bred to the ſea ſervice, in 1731 he was appointed to the command of his majeſty's ſhip the Ludlow Caſtle; and he commanded the Prince Frederick at the attack of the harbour of Carthagena, March 24, 1741. This young nobleman was one of the moſt promiſing commanders in the king's ſervice. When on the deſperate attack of the caſtle of Bocca Chica, at the entrance of the ſaid harbour, he loſt his life, both his legs being firſt ſhot off. The proſe part of the Inſcription on his monument, was the production of Mrs. Mary Jones of Oxford; who alſo wrote a poem on his death, printed in her Miſcellanies, 8vo, 1752.

He firſt the plant to richer gardens led,
And fix'd, indulgent, in a warmer bed:
The nation, pleas'd, enjoys the rich produce,
And gathers from her ornament her uſe.
When looſe from public cares the grove he ſought,
And fill'd the leiſure interval with thought,
The various labours of his eaſy page,
A chance amuſement, poliſh'd half an age.
Beyond this truth old bards could ſcarce invent,
Who durſt to frame a world by accident.
What he has ſung, how early, and how well,
The Thames ſhall boaſt, and Roman Tiber tell.
A glory more ſublime remains in ſtore,
Since ſuch his talents, that he ſung no more.
No fuller proof of power th' Almighty gave,
Making the ſea, than curbing her proud wave.
Nought can the genius of his works tranſcend,
But their fair purpoſe and important end;
To rouſe the war for injur'd Europe's laws,
To ſteel the patriot in great Brunſwick's cauſe;
With virtue's charms to kindle ſacred love,
Or paint th' eternal bowers of bliſs above.
Where had'ſt thou room, great Author! where to roll
The mighty theme of an immortal ſoul? [brought Through paths unknown, unbeaten, whence were
Thy proofs ſo ſtrong for immaterial thought?
One let me join, all other may excel,
"How could a mortal eſſence think ſo well?"
But why ſo large in the great writer's praiſe?
More lofty ſubjects ſhould my numbers raiſe;
In him (illuſtrious rivalry) contend
The ſtateſman, patriot, Chriſtian, and the friend!
His glory ſuch, it borders on diſgrace
To ſay he ſung the beſt of human race.
In joy once join'd, in ſorrow now for years,
Partner in grief, and brother of my tears,
Tickell! accept this verſe, thy mournful due;
Thou farther ſhalt the ſacred theme purſue;
And, as thy ſtrain deſcribes the matchleſs man,
Thy life ſhall ſecond what thy muſe began.
Though ſweet the numbers, though a fire divine
Dart through the whole, and burn in every line,
Who ſtrives not for that excellence he draws,
Is ſtain'd by fame, and ſuffers from applauſe.
But haſte to thy illuſtrious taſk; prepare
The noble work well truſted to thy care,
* The gift bequeath'd by Addiſon's command,
To Craggs made ſacred by his dying hand.
Collect the labours, join the various rays,
The ſcatter'd light in one united blaze;
Then bear to him ſo true, ſo truly lov'd,
In life diſtinguiſh'd, and in death approv'd,
Th' immortal legacy. He hangs a-while
In generous anguiſh o'er the glorious pile;
With anxious pleaſure the known page reviews,
And the dear pledge with falling tears bedews.
What though thy tears, pour'd o'er thy godlike friend,
Thy other cares for Britain's weal ſuſpend?
Think not, O patriot! while thy eyes o'erflow,
Thoſe cares ſuſpended for a private woe;
Thy love to him is to thy country ſhown;
He mourns for her, who mourns for Addiſon.

* The publication of his works.

REFLECTIONS

ON THE PUBLIC SITUATION OF THE KINGDOM.

ADDRESSED TO THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE.

WRITTEN IN THE YEAR 1745.

Holles! immortal in far more than fame!
Be thou illuſtrious in far more than power.
Great things are ſmall when greater riſe to view.
Though ſtation'd high, and preſs'd with public cares,
Diſdain not to peruſe my ſerious ſong,
Which peradventure may puſh by the world:
Of a few moments rob Britannia's weal,
And leave Europa's counſels leſs mature!
For thou art noble, and the theme is great.
Nor ſhall or Europe or Britannia blame
Thine abſent ear, but gain by the delay.
Long vers'd in ſenates and in cabinets,
States' intricate demands and high debates!
As thou of uſe to thoſe, ſo this to thee;
And in a point that empire far outweighs,
That far outweighs all Europe's thrones in one.
Let greatneſs prove its title to be great.
'Tis power's ſupreme prerogative to ſtamp
On other's minds an image of its own.
Bend the ſtrong influence of high place, to ſtem
The ſtream that ſweeps away the country's weal;
The Stygian ſtream, the torrent of our guilt.
Far as thou may'ſt give life to virtue's cauſe;

Let not the ties of perſonal regard
Betray the nation's truſt to feeble hands:
Let not fomented flames of private pique
Prey on the vitals of the public good:
Let not our ſtreets with blaſphemies reſound,
Nor lewdneſs whiſper where the laws can reach:
Let not beſt laws, the wiſdom of our ſires,
Turn ſatires on their ſunk degenerate ſons,
The baſtards of their blood! and ſerve no point
But, with more emphaſis to call them fools:
Let not our rank enormities unhinge
Britannia's welfare from divine ſupport.
Such deeds the miniſter, the prince, adorn;
No power is ſhown but in ſuch deeds as theſe:
All, all is impotence but acting right; [power?
And where's the ſtateſman but would ſhow his
To prince and people thou, of equal zeal!
Be it henceforward but thy ſecond care
To grace thy country, and ſupport the throne:
Though this ſupported, that adorn'd ſo well,
A throne ſuperior our firſt homage claims;
To Cæſar's Cæſar our firſt tribute due:
A tribute which, unpaid, makes ſpecious wrong
And ſplendid ſacrilege of all beſide:
Illuſtrious followers; we muſt firſt be juſt;
And what ſo juſt as awe for the Supreme?
Leſs fear we rugged ruffians of the north,
Than virtue's well-clad rebels nearer home;
Leſs Loyola's diſguis'd, all aping ſons,
Than traitors lurking in our appetites;
Leſs all the legions Seine and Tagus ſend,
Than unrein'd paſſions ruſhing on our peace:
You ſavage mountaineers are tame to theſe.
Againſt thoſe rioters ſend forth the laws,
And break to reaſon's yoke their wild carcers.
Prudence for all things points the proper hour,
Though ſome ſeem more importunate and great.
Though Britain's generous views and intereſts
ſpread
Beyond the narrow circle of her ſhores,
And their grand entries make on diſtant lands;
Though Britain's genius the wide wave beſtrides,
And, like a vaſt Coloſſus, towering ſtands
With one foot planted on the continent;
Yet be not wholly wrapp'd in public cares,
Though ſuch high cares ſhould call as call'd of late;
The cauſe of kings and emperors adjourn,
And Europe's little balance drop a while;
For greater drop it: ponder and adjuſt
The rival intereſts and contending claims
Of life and death, of now and of for ever;
Sublimeſt theme; and needful as ſublime.
Thus great Eliza's oracles renown'd,
Thus Walſingham and Raleigh (Britain's boaſts!)
Thus every ſtateſman thought that ever—dy'd.
There's inſpiration in a fable hour,
And death's approach makes politicians wiſe.
When, thunderſtruck, that eagle Wolſey fell;
When royal favour, as an ebbing ſea,
Like a leviathan, his grandeur left,
His graſping grandeur! naked on the ſtrand,
Naked of human, doubtful of divine,
Aſſiſtance; no more wallowing in his wealth,
Spouting proud foams of inſolence no more,
On what, then, ſmote his heart, uncardinal'd,
And ſunk beneath the level of a man?
On the grand article, the ſum of things!
The point of the firſt magnitude! that point
Tubes mounted in a court, but rarely reach;
Some painted cloud ſtill intercepts their ſight.
Firſt right to judge; then chooſe; then perſevere,
Stedfaſt, as if a crown or miſtreſs call'd.—
Theſe, theſe are politics will ſtand the teſt,
When finer politics their maſters ſting,
And ſtateſmen fain would ſhrink to common men.
Theſe, theſe are politics will anſwer now,
(When common men would fain to ſtateſmen ſwell)
Beyond a Machiavel's or Tencin's ſcheme,
All ſafety reſts on honeſt counſels: theſe
Immortalize the ſtateſman, bleſs the ſtate,
Make the prince triumph, and the people ſmile;
In peace rever'd, or terrible in arms,
Cloſe-leagued with an invincible ally,
Which honeſt counſels never fail to fix
In favour of an unabandon'd land;
A land—that ſtarts at ſuch a land as this,
A parliament, ſo principled, will ſink
All ancient ſchools of empire in diſgrace,
And Britain's glory, riſing from the dead,
Will fill the world, loud fame's ſuperior ſong.
Britain!—that word pronounc'd is an alarm;
It warms the blood, though frozen in our veins;
Awakes the ſoul, and ſends her to the field,
Enamour'd of the glorious face of death.
Britain!---there's noble magic in the ſound.
O what illuſtrious images ariſe!
Embattled, round me, blaze the pomps of war!
By ſea, by land, at home, in foreign climes,
What full-blown laurels on our father's brows!
Ye radiant trophies! and imperial ſpoils!
Ye ſcenes!---aſtoniſhing to modern ſight!
Let me, at leaſt, enjoy you in a dream.
Why vaniſh? Stay, ye godlike ſtrangers! ſtay.
Strangers!---I wrong my countrymen: they wake;
High beats the pulſe: the noble pulſe of war
Beats to that ancient meaſure, that grand march
Which then prevail'd, when Britain higheſt ſoar'd,
And every battle paid for heroes ſlain.
No more our great forefathers ſtain our cheeks
With bluſhes; their renown our ſhame no more.
In military garb, and ſudden arms,
Up ſtarts Old Britain; croſiers are laid by;
Trade wields the ſword, and agriculture leaves
Her half-turn'd furrow: other harveſts fire
A nobler avarice, avarice of renown!
And laurels are the growth of every field.
In diſtant courts is our commotion felt;
And leſs like gods fit monarchs on their thrones.
What arm can want or ſinews or ſucceſs,
Which, lifted from an honeſt heart, deſcends,
With all the weight of Britiſh wrath, to cleave
The papal mitre, or the Gallic chain,
At every ſtroke, and ſave a ſinking land?
Or death or victory muſt be reſolv'd;
To dream of mercy, O how tame! how mad!
Where, o'er black deeds the crucifix diſplay'd
Fools think heaven purchas'd by the blood they ſhed;
By giving, not ſupporting, pains and death!
Nor ſimple death! where they the reateſt ſaints

Who moſt ſubdue all tenderneſs of heart;
Students in torture! where, in zeal to him,
Whoſe darling title is The Prince of Peace,
The beſt turn ruthleſs butchers for our ſakes;
To ſave us in a world they recommend,
And yet forbear, themſelves with earth content:
What modeſty!---ſuch virtues Rome adorn!
And chiefly thoſe who Rome's firſt honours wear,
Whoſe name from Jeſus, and whoſe hearts from hell!
And ſhall a Pope-bred princeling crawl aſhore,
Replete with venom, guiltleſs of a ſting, [ſcrap'd
And whiſtle cut-throats, with thoſe ſwords that
Their barren rocks for wretched ſuſtenance,
To cut his paſſage to the Britiſh throne?
One that has ſuck'd in malice with his milk,
Malice to Britain, liberty, and truth?
Leſs ſavage was his brother-robber's nurſe,
The howling nurſe of plundering Romulus,
Ere yet far worſe than Pagan harbour'd there.
Hail to the brave! be Britain Britain ſtill:
Britain! high favour'd of indulgent heaven!
Nature's anointed empreſs of the deep!
The nurſe of merchants, who can purchaſe crowns!
Supreme in commerce! that exuberant ſource
Of wealth, the nerve of war; of wealth, the blood,
The circling current in a nation's veins,
To ſet high bloom on the fair face of peace!
This once ſo celebrated ſeat of power,
From which eſcap'd the mighty Cæſar triumph'd!
Of Gallic lilies this eternal blaſt!
This terror of armadas! this true bolt
Ethereal-temper'd, to repreſs the vain
Salmonean thunders from the papal chair! [awe!
This ſmall iſle wide-realm'd monarchs eye with
Which ſays to their ambition's foaming waves,
"Thus far, not farther!"---Let her hold, in life,
Nought dear disjoin'd from freedom and renown;
Renown, our anceſtors' great legacy,
To be tranſmitted to their lateſt ſons.
By thoughts inglorious, and un-Britiſh deeds,
Their cancell'd will is impiouſly profan'd,
Inhumanly diſturb'd their ſacred duſt.
Their ſacred duſt with recent laurels crown,
By your own valour won. This ſacred iſle,
Cut from the continent, that world of ſlaves;
This temple built by heaven's peculiar care,
In a receſs from the contagious world,
With ocean pour'd around it for its guard;
And dedicated, long, to liberty, [life!
That health, that ſtrength, that bloom, of civil
This temple of ſtill more divine; of faith
Sifted from errors, purify'd by flames,
Like gold, to take anew truth's heavenly ſtamp,
And (riſing both in luſtre and in weight)
With her bleſs'd maſter's unmaim'd image ſhine;
Why ſhould ſhe longer droop? why longer act
As an accomplice with the plots of Rome?
Why longer lend an edge to Bourbon's ſword,
And give him leave, among his daſtard troops,
To muſter that ſtrong ſuccour, Albion's crimes?
Send his ſelf-impotent ambition aid,
And crown the conqueſt of her fierceſt foes?
Where are her foes moſt fatal? Bluſhing truth,
"In her friends' vices,"---with a ſigh replies.
Empire on virtue's rock unſhaken ſtands;
Flux as the billows, when in vice diſſolv'd.
If heaven reclaims us by the ſcourge of war,
What thanks are due to Paris and Madrid?
Would they a revolution?---Aid their aim,
But be the revolution---in our hearts! [hark,
Would'ſt thou (whoſe hand is at the helm) the
The ſhaken bark of Britain, ſhould out-ride
The preſent blaſt, and every future ſtorm?
Give it that baleſt which alone has weight
With him whom wind, and waves, and war, obey.
Perſiſt. Are others ſubtle? thou be wiſe:
Above the Florentine's court-ſcience raiſe;
Stand forth a patriot of the moral world;
The pattern, and the patron, of the juſt:
Thus ſtrengthen Britain's military ſtrength;
Give its own terror to the ſword ſhe draws.
Aſk you, "What mean I?"---The moſt obvious truth;
Armies and fleets alone ne'er won the day.
When our proud arms are once diſarm'd, diſarm'd
Of aid from him by whom the mighty fall;
Of aid from him by whom the feeble ſtand;
Who takes away the keeneſt edge of battle,
Or gives the ſword commiſſion to deſtroy;
Who blaſts, or bids the martial laurel bloom---
Emaſculated, then, moſt manly might;
Or, though the might remains, it nought avails:
Then wither'd weakneſs ſoils the ſinewy arm
Of man's meridian and high-hearted power:
Our naval thunders, and our tented fields
With travell'd banners fanning ſouthern climes,
What do they? This; and more what can they do?
When heap'd the meaſure of a kingdom's crimes,
The prince moſt dauntleſs, the firſt plume of war,
By ſuch bold inroads into foreign lands,
Such elongation of our armaments,
But ſtretches out the guilty nation's neck,
While heaven commands her executioner,
Some leſs abandon'd nation, to diſcharge
Her full-ripe vengeance in a final blow,
And tell the world, "Not ſtrong is human ſtrength;
"And that the proudeſt empire holds of heaven."
O Britain! often reſcued, often crown'd,
Beyond thy merit and moſt ſanguine hopes,
With all that's great in war, or ſweet in peace!
Know from what ſource thy ſignal bleſſings flow,
Though bleſs'd with ſpirits ardent in the field,
Though cover'd various oceans with thy fleets,
Though fenc'd with rocks, and moated by the main,
Thy truſt repoſe in a far ſtronger guard;
In him, who thee, though naked, could defend;
Though weak, could ſtrengthen; ruin'd, could reſtore.
How oft, to tell what arm defends thine iſle,
To guard her welfare, and yet check her pride,
Have the winds ſnatch'd the victory from war?
Or, rather, won the day, when war deſpair'd?
How oft has providential ſuccour aw'd,
Aw'd while it bleſs'd us, conſcious of our guilt;
Struck dead all confidence in human aid,
And, while we triumph'd, made us tremble too!
Well may we tremble now; what manners reign?

But wherefore aſk we, when a true reply [events
Would ſhock too much? Kind heaven! avert
Whoſe fatal nature might reply too plain!
Heaven's half-bar'd arm of vengeance has been wav'd
In northern ſkies, and pointed to the ſouth.
Vengeance delay'd but gathers and ferments;
More formidably blackens in the wind;
Brews deeper draughts of unrelenting wrath,
And higher charges the ſuſpended ſtorm.
"That public vice portends a public fall"—
Is this conjecture of adventurous thought!
Or pious coward's pulpit-cuſhion'd dream;
Far from it. This is certain; this is fate.
What ſays experience, in her awful chair
Of ages, her authentic annals ſpread
Around her? What ſays reaſon eagle-eyed?
Nay, what ſays common ſenſe, with common care
Weighing events, and cauſes, in her ſcale?
All give one verdict, one deciſion ſign;
And this the ſentence Delphos could not mend:
" Whatever ſecondary props may riſe
" From politics, to build the public peace,
" The baſis is the manners of the land.
" When rotten theſe, the politician's wiles
" But ſtruggle with deſtruction, as a child
" With giants huge, or giants with a Jove.
" The ſtateſman's arts to conjure up a peace,
" Or military phantoms void of force,
" But ſcare away the vultures for an hour;
" The ſcent cadaverous (for, oh! how rank
" The ſtench of profligates!) ſoon lures them back;
" On the proud flutter of a Gallic wing
" Soon they return; ſoon make their full deſcent;
" Soon glut their rage, and riot in our ruin;
" Their idols grac'd and gorgeous with our ſpoils,
" Of univerſal empire ſure preſage!
" Till now repell'd by ſeas of Britiſh blood."
And whence the manners of the multitude?
The colours of their manners, black or fair,
Falls from above; from the complexion falls
Of ſtate Othellos, or white men in power:
And from the greater height example falls,
Greater the weight, and deeper its impreſs
In ranks inferior, paſſive to the ſtroke:
From the court-mint, of hearts the current coin,
The pupil preſſes, but the pattern drives.
What bonds then, bonds how manifold, and ſtrong
To duty, double duty, are the great!
And are there Samſons that can burſt them all?
Yes; and great minds that ſtand in need of none,
Whoſe pulſe beats virtues, and whoſe generous blood
Aids mental motives to puſh on renown,
In emulation of their glorious ſires,
From whom rolls down the conſecrated ſtream.
Some ſow good ſeeds in the glad people's hearts,
Some curſed tares, like Satan in the text:
This makes a foe moſt fatal to the ſtate;
A foe who (like a wizard in his cell)
In his dark cabinet of crooked ſchemes,
Reſembling Cuma's gloomy grot, the forge
Of boaſted oracles, and real lies,
(Aided, perhaps, by ſecond-ſighted Scots,
French Magi, relics riding poſt from Rome,
A Gothic hero * riſing from the dead,
And changing for ſpruce plaid his dirty ſhroud,
With ſuccour ſuitable from lower ſtill)
A foe who, theſe concurring to the charm,
Excites thoſe ſtorms that ſhall o'erturn the ſtate,
Rend up her ancient honours by the root,
And lay the boaſt of ages, the rever'd
Of nations, the dear-bought with ſumleſs wealth
And blood illuſtrious, (ſpite of her La Hogues,
Her Creſſeys, and her Blenheims) in the duſt.
How muſt this ſtrike a horror through the breaſt,
Through every generous breaſt where honour
reigns,
Through every breaſt where honour claims a ſhare!
Yes, and through every breaſt of honour void!
This thought might animate the dregs of men;
Ferment them into ſpirit; give them fire
To fight the cauſe, the black opprobrious cauſe,
Foul core of all! corruption at our hearts.
What wreck of empire has the ſtream of time
Swept, with her vices, from the mountain height
Of grandeur, deify'd by half mankind,
To dark oblivion's melancholy lake,
Or flagrant infamy's eternal brand!
Thoſe names, at which ſurrounding nations ſhook,
Thoſe names ador'd, a nuiſance! or forget!
Nor this the caprice of a doubtful dye,
But nature's courſe; no ſingle chance againſt it.
For know, my Lord! 'tis writ in adamant,
'Tis fixt, as is the baſis of the world,
Whoſe kingdoms ſtand or fall by the decree.
What ſaw theſe eyes, ſurpris'd?—Yet why ſur-
priſ'd?—
For aid divine the criſis ſeem'd to call,
And how divine was the monition given!
As late I walk'd the night in troubled thought,
My peace diſturb'd by rumours from the north,
While thunder, o'er my head, portentous, roll'd,
As giving ſignal of ſome ſtrange event,
And ocean groan'd beneath for her he lov'd,
Albion the fair! ſo long his empire's queen,
Whoſe reign is, now, conteſted by her foes,
On her white cliffs (a tablet broad and bright, Strongly reflecting the pale lunar ray)
By fate's own iron pen I ſaw it writ,
And thus the title ran:

THE STATESMAN'S CREED.

" Ye ſtates! and empires! nor of empires leaſt,
" Though leaſt in ſize; hear, Britain! thou whoſe
" Whoſe final lot is in the balance laid, [lot,
" Irreſolutely play the doubtful ſcales,
" Nor know'ſt thou which will win.—Know then from me,
" As govern'd well or ill, ſtates ſink or riſe:
" State-miniſters, as upright or corrupt,
" Are balm or poiſon in a nation's veins;
" Health or diſtemper; haſten or retard
" The period of her pride, her day of doom:
" And though, for reaſons obvious to the wiſe,

* The invader affects the character of Charles XII. of Sweden.

" Juſt Providence deals otherwiſe with men,
" Yet believe, Britons! nor too late believe,
" 'Tis fix'd! by fate irrevocably fix'd!
" Virtue and vice are empire's life and death."
Thus it is written—Heard you not a groan?
Is Britain on her death-bed?—No, that groan
Was utter'd by her foes—But ſoon the ſcale,
If this divine monition is deſpis'd,
May turn againſt us. Read it, ye who rule!
With reverence read; with ſtedfaſtneſs believe;
With courage act as ſuch belief inſpires;
Then ſhall your glory ſtand like fate's decree;
Then ſhall your name in adamant be writ,
In records that defy the tooth of time,
By nations ſav'd, reſounding your applauſe. [baſe,
While deep beyond your monument's proud
In black oblivion's kennel, ſhall be trod
Their execrable names, who, high in power,
And deep in guilt, moſt ominouſly ſhine,
(The meteors of the ſtate!) give vice her head,
To licenſe lewd let looſe the public rein;
Quench every ſpark of conſcience in the land,
And triumph in the proſligate's applauſe:
Or who to the firſt bidder ſell their ſouls,
Their country ſell, ſell all their fathers bought
With funds exhauſted and exhauſted veins,
To demons, by his Holineſs ordain'd
To propagate the goſpel—penn'd at Rome;
Hawk'd through the world by conſecrated bulls;
And how illuſtrated?—by Smithfield flames:
Who plunge (but not like Curtius) down the gulf,
Down narrow-minded ſelf's voracious gulf,
Which gapes, and ſwallows all they ſwore to ſave:
Hate all that lifted heroes into gods,
And hug the horrors of a victor's chain:
Of bodies politic that deſtin'd hell,
Inflicted here, ſince here their beings end;
And fall from foes deteſted and deſpis'd,
On diſbelievers—of the ſtateſman's creed.
Note, here, my Lord (unnoted yet it lies
By moſt, or all) theſe truths political Serve more than public ends: this creed of ſtates
Seconds, and irreſiſtibly ſupports,
The Chriſtian creed. Are you ſurpris'd?—Attend;
And on the ſtateſmen's build a nobler name.
This punctual juſtice exercis'd on ſtates,
With which authentic chronicle abounds,
As all men know, and therefore muſt believe;
This vengeance pour'd on nations ripe in guilt,
Pour'd on them here, where only they exiſt,
What is it but an argument of ſenſe,
Or rather demonſtration, to ſupport
Our feeble faith—" That they who ſtates compoſe,
" That men who ſtand not bounded by the grave,
" Shall meet like meaſure at their proper hour?"
For God is equal, ſimilarly deals
With ſtates and perſons, or he were not God;
What means a rectitude immutable?
A pattern here of univerſal right.
What, then, ſhall reſcue an abandon'd man?
Nothing, it is reply'd. Reply'd, by whom?
Reply'd by politicians well as prieſts:
Writ ſacred ſet aſide, mankind's own writ,
The whole world's annals; theſe pronounce his
doom,
Thus (what might ſeem a daring paradox)
Ev'n politics advance divinity:
True maſters there are better ſcholars here,
Who travel hiſtory in queſt of ſchemes
To govern nations, or perhaps oppreſs,
May there ſtart truths that other aims inſpire,
And, like Candace's eunuch, as they read,
By Providence turn Chriſtians on their road:
Digging for ſilver, they may ſtrike on gold;
May be ſurpris'd with better than they ſought,
And entertain an angel unawares.
Nor is divinity ungrateful found.
As politics advance divinity,
Thus, in return, divinity promotes
True politics, and crowns the ſtateſman's praiſe.
All wiſdoms are but branches of the chief,
And ſtateſmen found but ſhoots of honeſt men.
Are this world's witchcrafts pleaded in excuſe
For deviations in our moral line?
This, and the next world, view'd with ſuch an eye
As ſuits a ſtateſman, ſuch as keeps in view
His own exalted ſcience, both conſpire
To recommend and fix us in the right.
If we reward the politics of heaven,
The grand adminiſtration of the whole,
What's the next world? A ſupplement of this;
Without it, Juſtice is defective here;
Juſt as to ſtates, defective as to men:
If ſo, what is this world? as ſure as Right
Sits in heaven's throne, a prophet of the next.
Prize you the prophet? then believe him too.
His prophecy more precious than his ſmile.
How comes it then to paſs, with moſt on earth,
That this ſhould charm us, that ſhould diſcompoſe?
Long as the ſtateſman finds this caſe his own,
So long his politics are uncomplete;
In danger he; nor is the nation ſafe,
But ſoon muſt rue his inauſpicious power.
What hence reſults? a truth that ſhould reſound
For ever awful in Britannia's ear:
" Religion crowns the ſtateſman and the man,
" Sole ſource of public and of private peace."
This truth all men muſt own, and therefore will,
And praiſe and preach it too:—and when that's done,
Their compliment is paid, and 'tis forgot.
What highland pole axe half ſo deep can wound?
But how dare I, ſo mean, preſume ſo far?
Aſſume my ſeat in the dictator's chair?
Pronounce, predict (as if indeed inſpir'd),
Promulge my cenſures, lay out all my throat,
Till hoarſe in clamour on enormous crimes?
Two mighty columns riſe in my ſupport;
In their more awful and authentic voice,
Record profane and ſacred, drown the muſe,
Though loud, and far out-threat her threatening
ſong.
Still farther, Holles! ſuffer me to plead
That I ſpeak freely, as I ſpeak to thee.
Guilt only ſtartles at the name of guilt;
And truth, plain truth, is welcome to the wiſe.
Thus what ſeem'd my preſumption is thy praiſe.
Praiſe, and immortal praiſe, is virtue's claim;
And virtue's ſphere is action: yet we grant
Some merit to the trumpet's loud alarm;

Whose clangour kindles cowards into men.
Nor shall the verse, perhaps, be quite forgot,
Which talks of immortality, and bids,
In every British breast, true glory rise,
As now the warbling lark awakes the morn.
To close, my Lord! with that which all should close
And all begin, and strike us every hour,
Though no war wak'd us, no black tempest frown'd.—
The morning rises gay; yet gayest morn
Less glorious after night's incumbent shades;
Less glorious far bright nature, rich array'd
With golden robes, in all the pomp of noon,
Than the first feeble dawn of moral day?
Sole day, (let those whom statesmen serve attend
Though the sun ripens diamonds for their crowns)
Sole day worth his regard whom heaven ordains,
Undarken'd, to behold noon dark, and date,
From the sun's death, and every planet's fall,
His all-illustrious and eternal year; [awe
Where statesmen and their monarchs, (names of
And distance here) shall rank with common men,
Yet own their glory never dawn'd before.

THE COMPLAINT: OR, NIGHT THOUHTS.

PREFACE.

As the occasion of this poem was real, not fictitious; so the method pursued in it, was rather imposed, by what spontaneously arose in the author's mind on that occasion, than meditated or designed. Which will appear very probable from the nature of it. For it differs from the common mode of poetry, which is, from long narrations to draw short morals. Here, on the contrary, the narrative is short, and the morality arising from it makes the bulk of the poem. The reason of it is, That the facts mentioned did naturally pour these moral reflections on the thought of the writer.

NIGHT I.

ON LIFE, DEATH, AND IMMORTALITY.

TO THE RIGHT HON. ARTHUR ONSLOW,

Speaker of the House of Commons.

Tir'd nature's sweet restorer, balmy sleep!
He, like the world, his ready visit pays
Where fortune smiles; the wretched he forsakes;
Swift on his downy pinion flies from woe,
And lights on lids unsullied with a tear.
From short (as usual) and disturb'd repose,
I wake: How happy they, who wake no more!
Yet that were vain, if dreams infest the grave.
I wake, emerging from a sea of dreams
Tumultuous; where my wreck'd despondingthought
From wave to wave of fancied misery,
At random drove, her helm of reason lost.
Though now restor'd, 'tis only change of pain,
(A bitter change!) severer for severe.
The day too short for my distress; and night,
Ev'n in the zenith of her dark domain,
Is sunshine to the colour of my fate.
Night, sable goddess! from her ebon throne,
In rayless majesty, now stretches forth
Her leaden sceptre o'er a slumbering world.
Silence, how dead! and darkness, how profound!
Nor eye, nor listening ear, an object finds;
Creation sleeps. 'Tis as the general pulse
Of life stood still, and nature made a pause;
An awful pause! prophetic of her end.
And let her prophecy be soon fulfill'd;
Fate! drop the curtain; I can lose no more.
Silence and darkness! solemn sisters! twins
From ancient night, who nurse the tender thought!
To reason, and on reason build resolve,
(That column of true majesty in man)
Assist me: I will thank you in the grave; [fall
The grave, your kingdom: There this frame shall
A victim sacred to your dreary shrine.
But what are ye?—
Thou, who didst put to flight
Primeval silence, when the morning stars,
Exulting, shouted o'er the rising ball;
O thou, whose word from solid darkness struck
That spark, the sun; strike wisdom from my soul;
My soul, which flies to thee, her trust, her treasure,
As misers to their gold, while others rest.
Through this opaque of nature and of soul,
This double night, transmit one pitying ray,
To lighten and to cheer. O lead my mind,
(A mind that fain would wander from its woe)
Lead it through various scenes of life and death;
And from each scene the noblest truths inspire.
Nor less inspire my conduct than my song;
Teach my best reason, reason; my best will Teach rectitude; and fix my firm resolve
Wisdom to wed, and pay her long arrear:
Nor let the phial of thy vengeance, pour'd
On this devoted head, be pour'd in vain.
The bell strikes one. We take no note of time
But from its loss. To give it then a tongue
Is wise in man. As if an angel spoke,
I feel the solemn sound. If heard aright,
It is the knell of my departed hours:
Where are they? With the years beyond the flood.
It is the signal that demands dispatch:
How much is to be done? My hopes and fears
Start up alarm'd, and o'er life's narrow verge
Look down—On what? a fathomless abyss;
A dread eternity! how surely mine!

And can eternity belong to me,
Poor penſioner on the bounties of an hour?
How poor, how rich, how abject, how auguſt,
How complicate, how wonderful, is man!
How paſſing wonder he who made him ſuch!
Who centred in our make ſuch ſtrange extremes!
From different natures marvellouſly mix'd,
Connection exquiſite of diſtant worlds!
Diſtinguiſh'd link in being's endleſs chain!
Midway from nothing to the Deity!
A beam ethereal, ſully'd, and abſorp'd!
Though ſully'd and diſhonour'd, ſtill divine!
Dim miniature of greatneſs abſolute!
An heir of glory! a frail child of duſt!
Helpleſs immortal! inſect infinite!
A worm! a god!—I tremble at myſelf,
And in myſelf am loſt! at home a ſtranger,
Thought wanders up and down, ſurpris'd, aghaſt,
And wondering at her own: How reaſon reels!
O what a miracle to man is man,
Triumphantly diſtreſs'd! what joy, what dread!
Alternately tranſported and alarm'd!
What can preſerve my life, or what deſtroy?
An angel's arm can't ſnatch me from the grave;
Legions of angels can't confine me there.
'Tis paſt conjecture; all things riſe in proof:
While o'er my limbs ſleep's ſoft dominion ſpread,
What though my ſoul fantaſtic meaſures trod
O'er fairy fields; or mourn'd along the gloom
Of pathleſs woods; or down the craggy ſteep
Hurl'd headlong, ſwam with pain the mantled pool;
Or ſcal'd the cliff; or danc'd on hollow winds,
With antic ſhapes, wild natives of the brain?
Her ceaſeleſs flight, though devious, ſpeaks her nature
Of ſubtler eſſence than the trodden clod;
Active, aërial, towering, unconfin'd,
Unfetter'd with her groſs companions fall.
Ev'n ſilent night proclaims my ſoul immortal;
Ev'n ſilent night proclaims eternal day.
For human weal heaven huſbands all events;
Dull ſleep inſtructs, nor ſport vain dreams in vain.
Why then their loſs deplore that are not loſt?
Why wanders wretched thought their tombs around
In infidel diſtreſs? Are angels there?
Slumbers, rak'd up in duſt, ethereal fire?
They live! they greatly live a life on earth
Unkindled, unconceiv'd; and from an eye
Of tenderneſs let heavenly pity fall
On me, more juſtly number'd with the dead.
This is the deſert, this the ſolitude:
How populous, how vital, is the grave!
This is creation's melancholy vault,
The vale funereal, the ſad cypreſs gloom;
The land of apparitions, empty ſhades!
All, all on earth, is ſhadow, all beyond
Is ſubſtance; the reverſe is folly's creed:
How ſolid all, where change ſhall be no more!
This is the bud of being, the dim dawn,
The twilight of our day, the veſtibule;
Life's theatre as yet is ſhut, and death,
Strong death, alone can heave the maſſy bar,
This groſs impediment of clay remove,
And make us embryos of exiſtence free
From real life; but little more remote
Is he, not yet a candidate for light,
The future embryo, ſlumbering in his ſire.
Embryos we muſt be till we burſt the ſhell,
Yon ambient azure ſhell, and ſpring to life,
The life of gods, O tranſport! and of man.
Yet man, fool man! here buries all his thoughts;
Inters celeſtial hopes without one ſigh.
Priſoner of earth, and pent beneath the moon,
Here pinions all his wiſhes; wing'd by heaven
To fly at infinite; and reach it there
Where ſeraphs gather immortality,
On life's fair tree, faſt by the throne of God.
What golden joys ambroſial cluſtering glow
In his full beam, and ripen for the juſt,
Where momentary ages are no more! [pire!
Where time, and pain, and chance, and death, ex-
And is it in the flight of threeſcore years
To puſh eternity from human thought,
And ſmother ſouls immortal in the duſt?
A ſoul immortal, ſpending all her fires,
Waſting her ſtrength in ſtrenuous idleneſs,
Thrown into tumult, raptur'd or alarm'd,
At ought this ſcene can threaten or indulge,
Reſembles ocean into tempeſt wrought,
To waft a feather, or to drown a fly.
Where falls this cenſure? It o'erwhelms myſelf!
How was my heart incruſted by the world!
O how ſelf-fetter'd was my grovelling ſoul,
How, like a worm, was I wrapt round and round
In ſilken thought, which reptile fancy ſpun,
Till darken'd reaſon lay quite clouded o'er
With ſoft conceit of endleſs comfort here,
Nor yet put forth her wings to reach the ſkies!
Night-viſions may befriend: (as ſung above)
Our waking dreams are fatal. How I dream'd
Of things impoſſible! (Could ſleep do more?)
Of joys perpetual in perpetual change!
Of ſtable pleaſures on the toſſing wave!
Eternal ſunſhine in the ſtorms of life!
How richly were my noon-tide trances hung
With gorgeous tapeſtries of pictur'd joys!
Joy behind joy, in endleſs perſpective!
Till at death's toll, whoſe reſtleſs iron tongue
Calls daily for his millions at a meal,
Starting I woke, and found myſelf undone.
Where now my phrenzy's pompous furniture?
The cobwebb'd cottage, with its ragged wall
Of mouldering mud, is royalty to me!
The ſpider's moſt attenuated thread
Is cord, is cable, to man's tender tie
On earthly bliſs; it breaks at every breeze.
O ye bleſt ſcenes of permanent delight!
Full above meaſure! laſting beyond bound!
A perpetuity of bliſs is bliſs.
Could you, ſo rich in rapture, fear an end,
That ghaſtly thought would drink up all your joy,
And quite unparadiſe the realms of light.
Safe are you lodg'd above theſe rolling ſpheres;
The baleful influence of whoſe giddy dance
Sheds ſad viciſſitude on all beneath.
Here teems with revolutions every hour;
And rarely for the better; or the beſt,
More mortal than the common births of fate.

Each moment has its fickle, emulous
Of Time's enormous ſcythe, whoſe ample ſweep
Strikes empires from the root; each moment plays
His little weapon in the narrower ſphere
Of ſweet domeſtic comfort, and cuts down
The faireſt bloom of ſublunary bliſs.
Bliſs! ſublunary bliſs!—proud words, and vain!
Implicit treaſon to divine decree!
A bold invaſion of the rights of heaven!
I claſp'd the phantoms, and I found them air.
O had I weigh'd it ere my fond embrace!
What darts of agony had miſs'd my heart!
Death! great proprietor of all! 'tis thine
To tread out empire, and to quench the ſtars.
The ſun himſelf by thy permiſſion ſhines;
And one day thou ſhalt pluck him from his ſphere.
Amid ſuch mighty plunder, why exhauſt
Thy partial quiver on a mark ſo mean?
Why thy peculiar rancour wreak'd on me?
Inſatiate archer! could not one ſuffice? [ſlain!
Thy ſhaft flew thrice; and thrice my peace was
And thrice, ere thrice yon moon had fill'd her horn.
O Cynthia! why ſo pale? Doſt thou lament
Thy wretched neighbour? Grieve to ſee thy wheel
Of ceaſeleſs change outwhirl'd in human life?
How wanes my borrow'd bliſs! from fortune's ſmile,
Precarious courteſy! not virtue's ſure,
Self-given, ſolar ray of ſound delight.
In every vary'd poſture, place, and hour,
How widow'd every thought of every joy!
Thought, buſy thought! too buſy for my peace!
Through the dark poſtern of time long elaps'd,
Led ſoftly, by the ſtillneſs of the night,
Led like a murderer, (and ſuch it proves!)
Strays (wretched rover!) o'er the pleaſing paſt;
In queſt of wretchedneſs perverſely ſtrays,
And finds all deſert now, and meets the ghoſts
Of my departed joys, a numerous train!
I rue the riches of my former fate;
Sweet comfort's blaſted cluſters I lament;
I tremble at the bleſſings once ſo dear;
And every pleaſure pains me to the heart.
Yet why complain? or why complain for one?
Hangs out the ſun his luſtre but for me,
The ſingle man? Are angels all beſide?
I mourn for millions: 'Tis the common lot;
In this ſhape, or in that, has fate entail'd
The mother's throes on all of woman born,
Not more the children than ſure heirs of pain.
War, famine, peſt, volcano, ſtorm, and fire,
Inteſtine broils, oppreſſion, with her heart
Wrapt up in triple braſs, beſiege mankind.
God's image diſinherited of day,
Here, plung'd in mines, forgets a ſun was made.
There, beings deathleſs as their haughty lord,
Are hammer'd to the galling oar for life,
And plow the winter's wave, and reap deſpair.
Some, for hard maſters, broken under arms,
In battle lop'd away, with half their limbs,
Beg bitter bread through realms their valour ſav'd,
If ſo the tyrant, or his minion, doom.
Want, and incurable diſeaſe, (fell pair!)
On hopeleſs multitudes remorſeleſs ſeize
At once, and make a refuge of the grave.
How groaning hoſpitals eject their dead!
What numbers groan for ſad admiſſion there!
What numbers, once in fortune's lap high-fed,
Solicit the cold hand of charity!
To ſhock us more, ſolicit it in vain!
Ye ſilken ſons of pleaſure: ſince in pains
You rue more modiſh viſits, viſit here,
And breathe from your debauch: give, and reduce Surfeit's dominion over you: but ſo great
Your impudence, you bluſh at what is right.
Happy! did ſorrow ſeize on ſuch alone.
Not prudence can defend, or virtue ſave;
Diſeaſe invades the chaſteſt temperance,
And puniſhment the guiltleſs, and alarm,
Through thickeſt ſhades, purſues the fond of peace.
Man's caution often into danger turns;
And his guard falling cruſhes him to death.
Not happineſs itſelf makes good her name;
Our very wiſhes give us not our wiſh.
How diſtant oft the thing we doat on moſt
From that for which we doat, felicity!
The ſmoothe ſt courſe of nature has its pains;
And trueſt friends, through error, wound our reſt.
Without misfortune, what calamities!
And what hoſtilities, without a foe!
Nor are foes wanting to the beſt on earth.
But endleſs is the liſt of human ills,
And ſighs might ſooner fail, than cauſe to figh.
A part how ſmall of the terraqueous globe
Is tenanted by man! the reſt a waſte,
Rocks, deſerts, frozen ſeas, and burning ſands:
Wild haunts of monſters, poiſons, ſtings, and death.
Such is earth's melancholy map! but, far
More ſad! this earth is a true map of man.
So bounded are its haughty lord's delights
To woe's wide empire; where deep troubles toſs;
Loud ſorrows howl, invenom'd paſſions bite,
Ravenous calamities our vitals ſeize,
And threatening fate wide opens to devour.
What then am I, who ſorrow for myſelf!
In age, in infancy, from other's aid
Is all our hope: to teach us to be kind.
That, nature's firſt, laſt leſſon to mankind;
The ſelfiſh heart deſerves the pain it feels.
More generous ſorrow, while it ſinks, exalts;
And conſcious virtue mitigates the pang.
Nor virtue, more than prudence, bids me give
Swoln thought a ſecond channel; who divide,
They weaken too, the torrent of their grief.
Take then, O world! thy much indebted tear:
How ſad a ſight is human happineſs,
To thoſe whoſe thought can pierce beyond an hour!
O thou! whate'er thou art, whoſe heart exults!
Wouldſt thou I ſhould congratulate thy fate?
I know thou wouldſt; thy pride demands it from me.
Let thy pride pardon, what thy nature needs,
The ſalutary cenſure of a friend.
Thou happy wretch! by blindneſs thou art bleſt;
By dotage dandled to perpetual ſmiles.
Know, ſmiler! at thy peril art thou pleas'd;
Thy pleaſure is the promiſe of thy pain.
Miſfortune, like a creditor ſevere,
But riſes in demand for her delay;
She makes a ſcourge of paſt proſperity,

To ſting thee more, and double thy diſtreſs.
Lorenzo, fortune makes her court to thee,
Thy fond heart dances, while the Syren ſings.
Dear is thy welfare; think me not unkind;
I would not damp, but to ſecure thy joys.
Think not that fear is ſacred to the ſtorm:
Stand on thy guard againſt the ſmiles of fate.
Is heaven tremendous in its frowns? Moſt ſure;
And in its favours formidable too:
Its favours here are trials, not rewards;
A call to duty, not diſcharge from care;
And ſhould alarm us, full as much as woes;
Awake us to their cauſe and conſequence;
And make us tremble, weigh'd with our deſert;
Awe nature's tumult, and chaſtiſe her joys,
Leſt, while we claſp, we kill them; nay, invert
To worſe than ſimple miſery, their charms.
Revolted joys, like foes in civil war,
Like boſom friendſhips to reſentment ſour'd,
With rage envenom'd riſe againſt our peace.
Beware what earth calls happineſs; beware
All joys, but joys that never can expire.
Who builds on leſs than an immortal baſe,
Fond as he ſeems, condemns his joys to death.

Mine dy'd with thee, Philander! thy laſt ſigh
Diſſolv'd the charm; the diſenchanted earth
Loſt all her luſtre. Where her glittering towers?
Her golden mountains, where? all darken'd down
To naked waſte; a dreary vale of tears;
The great magician's dead! thou poor, pale piece
Of out-caſt earth, in darkneſs! what a change
From yeſterday! Thy darling hope ſo near,
(Long-labour'd prize!) O how ambition fluſh'd
Thy glowing cheek! Ambition truly great,
Of virtuous praiſe. Death's ſubtle ſeed within (Sly, treacherous miner!) working in the dark,
Smil'd at thy well-concerted ſcheme, and beckon'd
The worm to riot on that roſe ſo red,
Unfaded ere it fell; one moment's prey!

Man's foreſight is conditionally wiſe;
Lorenzo! wiſdom into folly turns
Oft, the firſt inſtant, its idea fair
To labouring thought is born. How dim our eye!
The preſent moment terminates our ſight;
Clouds, thick as thoſe on doomſday, drown the next;
We penetrate, we propheſy in vain.
Time is dealt out by particles; and each
Ere mingled with the ſtreaming ſands of life,
By fate's inviolable oath is ſworn
Deep ſilence, "Where eternity begins."

By nature's law, what may be, may be now;
There's no prerogative in human hours.
In human hearts what bolder thought can riſe,
Than man's preſumption on to-morrow's dawn?
Where is to-morrow? In another world.
For numbers this is certain; the reverſe
Is ſure to none; and yet on this perhaps,
This peradventure, infamous for lies,
As on a rock of adamant, we build
Our mountain hopes; ſpin out eternal ſchemes,
As we the fatal ſiſters could out-ſpin,
And, big with life's futurities, expire.

Not ev'n Philander had beſpoke his ſhroud:
Nor had he cauſe; a warning was deny'd:
How many fall as ſudden, not as ſafe!
As ſudden, though for years admoniſh'd home.
Of human ills the laſt extreme beware,
Beware, Lorenzo! a ſlow ſudden death.
How dreadful that deliberate ſurpriſe!
Be wiſe to-day; 'tis madneſs to defer;
Next day the fatal precedent will plead;
Thus on, till wiſdom is puſh'd out of life.
Procraſtination is the thief of time;
Year after year it ſteals, till all are fled,
And to the mercies of a moment leaves
The vaſt concerns of an eternal ſcene.
If not ſo frequent, would not this be ſtrange?
That 'tis ſo frequent, this is ſtranger ſtill.

Of man's miraculous miſtakes, this bears
The palm, "That all men are about to live,"
For ever on the brink of being born.
All pay themſelves the compliment to think
They one day ſhall not drivel: and their pride
On this reverſion takes up ready praiſe;
At leaſt, their own; their future ſelves applaud;
How excellent that life they ne'er will lead!
Time lodg'd in their own hands is folly's vails;
That lodg'd in fates, to wiſdom they conſign;
The thing they can't but purpoſe, they poſtpone;
'Tis not in folly, not to ſcorn a fool;
And ſcarce in human wiſdom, to do more.
All promiſe is poor dilatory man,
And that through every ſtage: when young, indeed,
In full content we, ſometimes, nobly reſt,
Unanxious for ourſelves; and only wiſh,
As duteous ſons, our fathers were more wiſe.
At thirty man ſuſpects himſelf a fool;
Knows it at forty, and reforms his plan;
At fifty chides his infamous delay,
Puſhes his prudent purpoſe to reſolve;
In all the magnanimity of thought
Reſolves; and re-reſolves; then dies the ſame.

And why? Becauſe he thinks himſelf immortal.
All men think all men mortal, but themſelves;
Themſelves, when ſome alarming ſhock of fate
Strikes through their wounded hearts the ſudden dread;
But their hearts wounded, like the wounded air,
Soon cloſe; where, paſt the ſhaft, no trace is found.
As from the wing, no ſcar the ſky retains;
The parted wave no furrow from the keel;
So dies in human hearts the thought of death,
Ev'n with the tender tear which nature ſheds
O'er thoſe we love, we drop it in their grave.
Can I forget Philander? That were ſtrange!
O my full heart!—But ſhould I give it vent,
The longeſt night, though longer far, would fail,
And the lark liſten to my midnight ſong.

The ſprightly lark's ſhrill matin wakes the morn;
Grief's ſharpeſt thorn hard preſſing on my breaſt,
I ſtrive, with wakeful melody, to cheer
The ſullen gloom, ſweet Philomel! like thee,
And call the ſtars to liſten: every ſtar
Is deaf to mine, enamour'd of thy lay.
Yet be not vain; there are, who thine excel,
And charm through diſtant ages: wrapt in ſhade,
Priſoner of darkneſs! to the ſilent hours,
How often I repeat their rage divine,
To lull my griefs, and ſteal my heart from woe!
I roll their raptures, but not catch their fire.

Dark, though not blind, like thee, Mæonides!
Or, Milton! thee; ah, could I reach your ſtrain!
Or his, who made Mænoides our own.
Man too he ſung: immortal man I ſing;
Oft burſts my ſong beyond the bounds of life;
What, now, but immortality can pleaſe?
O had he preſs'd his theme, purſued the track,
Which opens out of darkneſs into day!
O had he, mounted on his wing of fire,
Soar'd where I ſink, and ſung immortal man!
How had it bleſt mankind, and reſcued me!

NIGHT II.

ON TIME, DEATH, AND FRIENDSHIP.

TO THE RIGHT HON. THE EARL OF WILMINGTON.

"WHEN the cock crew, he wept"—ſmote by that eye
Which looks on me, on all: That power, who bids
This midnight centinel, with clarion ſhrill,
Emblem of that which ſhall awake the dead,
Rouſe ſouls from ſlumber, into thoughts of heaven.
Shall I too weep? Where then is fortitude?
And fortitude abandon'd, where is man?
I know the terms on which he ſees the light;
He that is born, is liſted; life is war;
Eternal war with woe. Who bears it beſt,
Deſerves it leaſt.—On other themes I'll dwell.
Lorenzo! let me turn my thoughts on thee,
And thine, on themes may profit; profit there,
Where moſt they need. Themes too, the genuine growth
Of dear Philander's duſt. He thus, though dead,
May ſtill befriend—what themes? time's wondrous price,
Death, friendſhip, and Philander's final ſcene.
So could I touch theſe themes, as might obtain
Thine ear, nor leave thy heart quite diſengag'd,
The good deed would delight me; half impreſs
On my dark cloud an Iris; and from grief
Call glory—doſt thou mourn Philander's fate?
I know thou ſay'ſt it: Says thy life the ſame?
He mourns the dead, who lives as they deſire.
Where is that thirſt, that avarice of time,
(O glorious avarice!) thought of death inſpires,
As rumour'd robberies endear our gold?
O time! than gold more ſacred; more a load
Than lead, to fools; and fools reputed wiſe.
What moment granted man without account?
What years are ſquander'd, wiſdom's debt unpaid!
Our wealth in days, all due to that diſcharge.
Haſte, haſte, he lies in wait, he's at the door,
Inſidious death! ſhould his ſtrong hand arreſt,
No compoſition ſets the priſoner free.
Eternity's inexorable chain
Faſt binds; and vengeance claims the full arrear.
How late I ſhudder'd on the brink! how late
Life call'd for her laſt refuge in deſpair!
That time is mine, O Mead! to thee I owe;
Fain would I pay thee with eternity.
But ill my genius anſwers my deſire;
My ſickly ſong is mortal, paſt thy cure.
Accept the will;—that dies not with my ſtrain.
For what calls thy diſeaſe, Lorenzo? not
For Eſculapian, but for moral aid.
Thou think'ſt it folly to be wiſe too ſoon.
Youth is not rich in time, it may be poor;
Part with it as with money, ſparing; pay
No moment, but in purchaſe of its worth;
And what its worth, aſk death-beds; they can tell.
Part with it as with life, reluctant; big
With holy hope of nobler time to come;
Time higher aim'd, ſtill nearer the great mark
Of men and angels; virtue more divine.
Is this our duty, wiſdom, glory, gain?
(Theſe heaven benign in vital union binds)
And ſport we like the natives of the bough,
When vernal ſuns inſpire? Amuſement reigns
Man's great demand: To trifle, is to live:
And is it then a trifle, too, to die?
Thou ſay'ſt I preach, Lorenzo, 'tis confeſt.
What if, for once, I preach thee quite awake?
Who wants amuſement in the flame of battle?
Is it not treaſon, in the ſoul immortal,
Her foes in arms, eternity the prize?
Will toys amuſe, when medicines cannot cure?
When ſpirits ebb, when life's enchanting ſcenes
Their luſtre loſe, and leſſen in our ſight,
As lands and cities with their glittering ſpires,
To the poor ſhatter'd bark, by ſudden ſtorm
Thrown off to ſea, and ſoon to periſh there?
Will toys amuſe? No: Thrones will then be toys,
And earth and ſkies ſeem duſt upon the ſcale.
Redeem we time?—Its loſs we dearly buy.
What pleads Lorenzo for his high-priz'd ſports?
He pleads time's numerous blanks; he loudly pleads
The ſtraw-like trifles on life's common ſtream.
From whom thoſe blanks and trifles, but from thee?
No blank, no trifle, nature made, or meant.
Virtue, or propos'd virtue, ſtill be thine;
This cancels thy complaint at once. This leaves
In act no trifle, and no blank in time.
This greatens, fills, immortalizes all;
This, the bleſt art of turning all to gold;
This, the good heart's prerogative to raiſe
A royal tribute from the pooreſt hours;
Immenſe revenue! every moment pays,
If nothing more than purpoſe in thy power;
Thy purpoſe firm, is equal to the deed:
Who does the beſt his circumſtance allows,
Does well, acts nobly; angels could no more.
Our outward act indeed admits reſtraint;
'Tis not in things o'er thought to domineer;
Guard well thy thought; our thoughts are heard in heaven.
On all important time through every age,
Though much, and warm, the wiſe have urg'd; the man
Is yet unborn, who duly weighs an hour.
"I've loſt a day"—the prince who nobly cry'd
Had been an emperor without his crown;
Of Rome, ſay rather, lord of human race:
He ſpoke, as if deputed by mankind,
So ſhould all ſpeak: So reaſon ſpeaks in all:
From the ſoft whiſpers of that God in man,
Why fly to folly, why to phrenzy fly,
For reſcue from the bleſſing we poſſeſs?
Time the ſupreme!—Time is eternity;
Pregnant with all eternity can give;
Pregnant with all, that makes archangels ſmile.
Who murders time, he cruſhes in the birth

A power ethereal, only not ador'd.
Ah! how unjuſt to nature and himſelf,
Is thoughtleſs, thankleſs, inconſiſtent man!
Like children babbling nonſenſe in their ſports
We cenſure nature for a ſpan too ſhort;
That ſpan too ſhort, we tax as tedious too;
Torture invention, all expedients tire,
To laſh the lingering moments into ſpeed,
And whirl us (happy riddance!) from ourſelves.
Art, brainleſs art! our furious charioteer
(For nature's voice unſtifled would recal),
Drives headlong towards the precipice of death;
Death, moſt our dread; death thus more dreadful made:
O what a riddle of abſurdity!
Leiſure is pain; takes off our chariot wheels;
How heavily we drag the load of life!
Bleſt leiſure is our curſe; like that of Cain,
It makes us wander; wander earth around,
To fly that tyrant, thought. As Atlas groan'd
The world beneath, we groan beneath an hour.
We cry for mercy to the next amuſement;
The next amuſement mortgages our fields;
Slight inconvenience! priſons hardly frown,
From hateful time if priſons ſet us free.
Yet when death kindly tenders us relief,
We call him cruel; years to moments ſhrink,
Ages to years. The teleſcope is turn'd.
To man's falſe optics (from his folly falſe)
Time, in advance, behind him hides his wings,
And ſeems to creep, decrepit with his age;
Behold him, when paſt by; what then is ſeen,
But his broad pinions ſwifter than the winds?
And all mankind, in contradiction ſtrong,
Rueful, aghaſt! cry out on his career.
Leave to thy foes theſe errors, and theſe ills;
To nature juſt, their cauſe and cure explore.
Not ſhort heaven's bounty, boundleſs our expence;
No niggard nature; men are prodigals.
We waſte, not uſe our time; we breathe, not live.
Time waſted is exiſtence, us'd is life,
And bare exiſtence, man, to live ordain'd,
Wrings and oppreſſes with enormous weight.
And why? ſince time was given for uſe, not waſte,
Enjoin'd to fly; with tempeſt, tide, and ſtars,
To keep his ſpeed, nor ever wait for man;
Time's uſe was doom'd a pleaſure: waſte, a pain;
That man might feel his error, if unſeen:
And, feeling, fly to labour for his cure;
Not, blundering, ſplit on idleneſs for eaſe.
Life's cares are comforts; ſuch by heaven deſign'd;
He that has none, muſt make them, or be wretched.
Cares are employments, and without employ
The ſoul is on a rack; the rack of reſt,
To ſouls moſt adverſe; action all their joy.
Here then the riddle mark'd above unfolds;
Then time turns torment, when man turns a fool.
We rave, we wreſtle, with great nature's plan;
We thwart the Deity; and 'tis decreed,
Who thwart his will, ſhall contradict their own.
Hence our unnatural quarrels with ourſelves;
Our thoughts at enmity; our boſom-broil;
We puſh time from us, and we wiſh him back:
Laviſh of luſtrums, and yet fond of life;
Life we think long, and ſhort; death ſeek, and ſhun:
Body and ſoul, like peeviſh man and wife,
United jar, and yet are loth to part.
Oh the dark days of vanity! while here,
How taſteleſs! and how terrible, when gone!
Gone! they ne'er go; when paſt, they haunt us ſtill;
The ſpirit walks of every day deceas'd;
And ſmiles an angel, or a fury frowns.
Nor death, nor life delight us. If time paſt,
And time poſſeſt, both pain us, what can pleaſe?
That which the Deity to pleaſe ordain'd,
Time us'd. The man who conſecrates his hours
By vigorous effort, and an honeſt aim,
At once he draws the ſting of life and death;
He walks with nature; and her paths are peace.
Our error's cauſe and cure are ſeen: See next
Time's nature, origin, importance, ſpeed;
And thy great gain from urging his career.—
All-ſenſual man, becauſe untouch'd, unſeen,
He looks on time as nothing. Nothing elſe
Is truly man's; 'tis fortune's—time's a god.
Haſt thou ne'er heard of time's omnipotence;
For, or againſt, what wonders he can do!
And will: To ſtand blank neuter he diſdains.
Not on thoſe terms was time (heaven's ſtranger!) ſent
On his important embaſſy to man.
Lorenzo! no: On the long-deſtin'd hour,
From everlaſting ages growing ripe,
That memorable hour of wondrous birth,
When the Dread Sire, on emanation bent,
And big with nature, riſing in his might,
Call'd forth creation (for then time was born),
By godhead ſtreaming through a thouſand worlds;
Not on thoſe terms, from the great days of heaven,
From old eternity's myſterious orb
Was time cut off, and caſt beneath the ſkies:
The ſkies, which watch him in his new abode,
Meaſuring his motions by revolving ſpheres;
That horologe machinery divine. [play,
Hours, days, and months, and years, his children,
Like numerous wings around him, as he flies:
Or rather as unequal plumes, they ſhape
His ample pinions, ſwift as darted flame,
To gain his goal, to reach his ancient reſt,
And join anew eternity his ſire;
In his immutability to neſt,
When worlds, that count his circles now, unhing'd
(Fate the loud ſignal ſounding), headlong ruſh
To timeleſs night and chaos, whence they roſe.
Why ſpur the ſpeedy? why with levities
New wing thy ſhort, ſhort day's too rapid flight?
Know'ſt thou, or what thou doſt, or what is done?
Man flies from time, and time from man; too ſoon
In ſad divorce this double flight muſt end;
And then, where are we? where, Lorenzo, then
Thy ſports? thy pomps?—I grant thee, in a ſtate
Not unambitious; in the ruffled ſhroud,
Thy Parian tomb's triumphant arch beneath.
Has death his ſopperies? Then well may life
Put on her plume, and in her rainbow ſhine.
Ye well-array'd! ye lilies of our land!
Ye lilies male! who neither toil nor ſpin
(As ſiſter lilies might), if not ſo wiſe
As Solomon, more ſumptuous to the ſight!

Ye delicate! who nothing can ſupport,
Yourſelves moſt inſupportable! for whom
The winter roſe muſt blow, the ſun put on
A brighter beam in Leo; ſilky ſoft
Favonius breathe ſtill ſofter, or be chid;
And other worlds ſend odours, ſauce, and ſong,
And robes, and notions, fram'd in foreign looms!
O ye Lorenzos of our age! who deem
One moment unamus'd a miſery
Not made for feeble man! who call aloud
For every bawble drivell'd o'er by ſenſe;
For rattles, and conceits of every caſt,
For change of follies, and relays of joy,
To drag your patient through the tedious length
Of a ſhort winter's day—ſay, ſages, ſay,
Wit's oracles! ſay, dreamers of gay dreams!
How will you weather an eternal night,
Where ſuch expedients fail?

O treacherous conſcience! while ſhe ſeems to ſleep
On roſe and myrtle, lull'd with ſyren ſong;
While ſhe ſeems, nodding o'er her charge, to drop
On headlong appetite the ſlacken'd rein,
And give us up to licence, unrecall'd,
Unmark'd;—ſee, from behind her ſecret ſtand,
The ſly informer minutes every fault,
And her dread diary with horror fills.
Not the groſs act alone employs her pen;
She reconnoitres fancy's airy band,
A watchful foe! the formidable ſpy,
Liſtening, o'erhears the whiſpers of our camp:
Our dawning purpoſes of heart explores,
And ſteals our embryos of iniquity.
As all rapacious uſurers conceal
Their doomſday-book from all-conſuming heirs;
Thus, with indulgence moſt ſevere, ſhe treats
Us ſpendthrifts of ineſtimable time;
Unnoted, notes each moment miſapply'd;
In leaves more durable than leaves of braſs
Writes our whole hiſtory; which death ſhall read
In every pale delinquent's private ear;
And judgment publiſh; publiſh to more worlds
Than this; and endleſs age in groans reſound.
Lorenzo, ſuch that ſleeper in thy breaſt!
Such is her ſlumber; and her vengeance ſuch
For ſlighted counſel; ſuch thy future peace!
And think'ſt thou ſtill thou canſt be wiſe too ſoon?
But why on time ſo laviſh is my ſong?
On this great theme kind nature keeps a ſchool,
To teach her ſons herſelf. Each night we die,
Each morn are born anew: Each day, a life!
And ſhall we kill each day? If trifling kills;
Sure vice muſt butcher. O what heaps of ſlain
Cry out for vengeance on us! Time deſtroy'd
Is ſuicide, where more than blood is ſpilt.
Time flies, death urges, knells call, heaven invites,
Hell threatens: All exerts; in effort, all;
More than creation labours!—labours more?
And is there in creation what, amidſt
This tumult univerſal, wing'd diſpatch,
And ardent energy, ſupinely yawns?
Man ſleeps; and man alone; and man, whoſe fate,
Fate irreverſible, entire, extreme,
Endleſs, hair-hung, breeze-ſhaken, o'er the gulf
A moment trembles; drops! and man, for whom
All elſe is in alarm! man, the ſole cauſe
Of this ſurrounding ſtorm! and yet he ſleeps,
As the ſtorm rock'd to reſt.—Throw years away!
Throw empires, and be blameleſs Moments ſeize;
Heaven's on their wing: A moment we may wiſh,
When worlds want wealth to buy. Bid day ſtand ſtill,
Bid him drive back his car, and reimport
The period paſt, re-give the given hour.
Lorenzo, more than miracles we want;
Lorenzo—O for yeſterdays to come!

Such is the language of the man awake;
His ardour ſuch, for what oppreſſes thee.
And is his ardour vain, Lorenzo? No;
That more than miracle the gods indulge;
To-day is yeſterday return'd; return'd
Full power'd to cancel, expiate, raiſe, adorn,
And reinſtate us on the rock of peace.
Let it not ſhare its predeceſſor's fate;
Nor, like its elder ſiſters, die a fool.
Shall it evaporate in fume? fly off
Fuliginous, and ſtain us deeper ſtill?
Shall we be poorer for the plenty pour'd?
More wretched for the clemencies of heaven?

Where ſhall I find him? Angels! tell me where.
You know him: He is near you: Point him out:
Shall I ſee glories beaming from his brow?
Or trace his footſteps by the riſing flowers?
Your golden wings, now hovering o'er him, ſhed
Protection; now, are waving in applauſe
To that bleſt ſon of foreſight! lord of fate!
That awful independent on to-morrow!
Whoſe work is done; who triumphs in the paſt;
Whoſe yeſterdays look backwards with a ſmile;
Nor, like the Parthian, wound him as they fly;
That common, but opprobrious lot! paſt hours,
If not by guilt, yet wound us by their flight,
If folly bounds our proſpect by the grave,
All feeling of futurity benumb'd;
All god-like paſſion for eternals quencht;
All reliſh of realties expir'd;
Renounc'd all correſpondence with the ſkies:
Our freedom chain'd; quite wingleſs our deſire;
In ſenſe dark-priſon'd all that ought to ſoar;
Prone to the centre; crawling in the duſt;
Diſmounted every great and glorious aim;
Embruted every faculty divine;
Heart-bury'd in the rubbiſh of the world.
The world, that gulf of ſouls, immortal ſouls,
Souls elevate, angelic, wing'd with fire
To reach the diſtant ſkies, and triumph there
On thrones, which ſhall not mourn their maſters
chang'd;
Though we from earth; ethereal, they that fell.
Such veneration due, O man, to man,
Who venerate themſelves, the world deſpiſe.
For what, gay friend! is this eſcutcheon'd world,
Which hangs out death in one eternal night;
A night, that glooms us in the noon-tide ray,
And wraps our thought, at banquets, in the ſhroud?
Life's little ſtage is a ſmall eminence,
Inch-high the grave above; that home of man,
Where dwells the multitude: We gaze around;
We read their monuments; we ſigh; and while
We ſigh, we ſink; and are what we deplor'd;
Lamenting, or lamented, all our lot!

Is death at diſtance? No: he has been on thee,
And given ſure earneſt of his final blow.
Thoſe hours that lately ſmil'd, where are they now?
Pallid to thought, and ghaſtly! drown'd, all drown'd
In that great deep, which nothing diſembogues!
And, dying, they bequeath'd thee ſmall renown.
The reſt are on the wing: how fleet their flight!
Already has the fatal train took fire;
A moment, and the world's blown up to thee;
The ſun is darkneſs, and the ſtars are duſt.
'Tis greatly wiſe to talk with our paſt hours;
And aſk them, what report they bore to heaven;
And how they might have borne more welcome news.
Their anſwers form what men experience call;
If wiſdom's friend, her beſt; if not, worſt foe.
O reconcile them! Kind experience cries,
"There's nothing here, but what as nothing weighs;
"The more our joy, the more we know it vain;
"And by ſucceſs are tutor'd to deſpair."
Nor is it only thus, but muſt be ſo.
Who knows not this, though gray, is ſtill a child.
Looſe then from earth the graſp of fond deſire!
Weigh anchor, and ſome happier clime explore.
Art thou ſo moor'd thou canſt not diſengage,
Nor give thy thoughts a ply to future ſcenes?
Since by life's paſſing breath, blown up from earth,
Light as the ſummer's duſt, we take in air
A moment's giddy flight, and fall again;
Join the dull maſs, increaſe the trodden ſoil,
And ſleep, till earth herſelf ſhall be no more;
Since then (as emmets, their ſmall world o'erthrown)
We, ſore amaz'd, from out earth's ruins crawl,
And riſe to fate extreme of foul or fair,
As man's own choice (controuler of the ſkies!)
As man's deſpotic will, perhaps one hour,
(O how omnipotent is time!) decrees;
Should not each warning give a ſtrong alarm?
Warning, far leſs than that of boſom torn
From boſom, bleeding o'er the ſacred dead!
Should not each dial ſtrike us as we paſs,
Portentous, as the written wall, which ſtruck,
O'er midnight howls, the proud Aſſyrian pale,
Ere-while high-flufht with inſolence and wine?
Like that, the dial ſpeaks; and points to thee,
Lorenzo! loth to break thy banquet up:
"O man, thy kingdom is departing from thee;
"And, while it laſts, is emptier than my ſhade."
Its ſilent language ſuch: nor need'ſt thou call
Thy magi, to decypher what it means.
Know, like the Median, fate is in thy walls:
Doſt aſk, How? Whence? Belſhazzar-like, amaz'd?
Man's make incloſes the ſure ſeeds of death;
Life feeds the murderer; ingrate! he thrives
On her own meal, and then his nurſe devours.
But here, Lorenzo, the deluſion lies;
That ſolar ſhadow, as it meaſures life,
It life reſembles too: life ſpeeds away
From point to point, though ſeeming to ſtand ſtill.
The cunning fugitive is ſwift by ſtealth:
Too ſubtle is the movement to be ſeen;
Yet ſoon man's hour is up, and we are gone.
Warnings point out our danger; gnomons, time:
As thoſe are uſeleſs when the ſun is ſet:
So thoſe, but when more glorious reaſon ſhines.
Reaſon ſhould judge in all; in reaſon's eye,
That ſedentary ſhadow travels hard.
But ſuch our gravitation to the wrong,
So prone our hearts to whiſper what we wiſh,
'Tis later with the wiſe than he's aware:
A Wilmington goes ſlower than the ſun:
And all mankind miſtake their time of day;
Ev'n age itſelf. Freſh hopes are hourly ſown
In furrow'd brows. To gentle life's deſcent
We ſhut our eyes, and think it is a plain.
We take fair days in winter, for the ſpring;
And turn our bleſſings into bane. Since oft
Man muſt compute that age he cannot feel,
He ſcarce believes he's older for his years.
Thus, at life's lateſt eve, we keep in ſtore
One diſappointment ſure, to crown the reſt;
The diſappointment of a promis'd hour.
On this, or ſimilar, Philander! thou
Whoſe mind was moral, as the preacher's tongue;
And ſtrong, to wield all ſcience, worth the name;
How often we talk'd down the ſummer's ſun,
And cool'd our paſſions by the breezy ſtream!
How often thaw'd and ſhorten'd winter's eve,
By conflict kind, that ſtruck out latent truth,
Beſt found, ſo fought; to the recluſe more coy!
Thoughts diſentagle paſſing o'er the lip;
Clean runs the thread; if not, 'tis thrown away,
Or kept to tie up nonſenſe for a ſong;
Song, faſhionably fruitleſs; ſuch as ſtains
The fancy, and unhallow'd paſſion fires;
Chiming her ſaints to Cytherea's fane.
Know'ſt thou, Lorenzo! what a friend contains?
As bees mixt nectar draw from fragrant flowers,
So men from friendſhip, wiſdom and delight;
Twins ty'd by nature, if they part, they die.
Haſt thou no friend to ſet thy mind abroach?
Good ſenſe will ſtagnate. Thoughts ſhut up want air,
And ſpoil, like bales unopen'd to the ſun.
Had thought been all, ſweet ſpeech had been too!
deny'd;
Speech, thought's canal! ſpeech, thought's criterion
Thought in the mine, may come forth gold, or dross;
When coin'd in word, we know its real worth.
If ſterling, ſtore it for thy future uſe;
'Twill buy thee benefit; perhaps renown.
Thought, too, deliver'd, is the more poſſeſt;
Teaching, we learn; and giving, we retain
The births of intellect; when dumb, forgot.
Speech ventilates our intellectual fire;
Speech burniſhes our mental magazine;
Brightens, for ornament; and whets, for uſe.
What numbers, ſheath'd in erudition, lie,
Plung'd to the hilts in venerable tomes,
And ruſted in; who might have borne an edge,
And play'd a ſprightly beam, if born to ſpeech;
If born bleſt heirs of half their mother's tongue!
'Tis thought's exchange, which, like th' alternate puſh
Of waves conflicting, breaks the learned ſcum,
And defecates the ſtudent's ſtanding pool,
In contemplation is his proud reſource?
'Tis poor, as proud, by converſe unſuſtain'd.
Rude thought runs wild in contemplation's field;

Converſe, the menage, breaks it to the bit
Of due reſtraint; and emulation's ſpur
Gives graceful energy, by rivals aw'd.
'Tis converſe qualifies for ſolitude;
As exerciſe, for ſalutary reſt.
By that untutor'd, contemplation raves:
And nature's fool, by wiſdom is undone.
Wiſdom, though richer than Peruvian mines,
And ſweeter than the ſweet ambroſial hive,
What is ſhe, but the means of happineſs?
That unobtain'd, than folly more a fool;
A melancholy fool, without her bells.
Friendſhip, the means of wiſdom, richly gives
The precious end, which makes our wiſdom wiſe.
Nature, in zeal for human amity,
Denies, or damps, an undivided joy.
Joy is an import; joy is an exchange;
Joy flies monopoliſts: it calls for two;
Rich fruit! heaven-planted! never pluckt by one.
Needful auxiliars are our friends, to give
To ſocial man true reliſh of himſelf.
Full on ourſelves, deſcending in a line,
Pleaſure's bright beam is feeble in delight:
Delight intenſe is taken by rebound;
Reverberated pleaſures fire the breaſt.
Celeſtial happineſs, whene'er ſhe ſtoops
To viſit earth, one ſhrine the goddeſs finds,
And one alone, to make her ſweet amends
For abſent heaven—the boſom of a friend;
Where heart meets heart, reciprocally ſoft,
Each other's pillow to repoſe divine.
Beware the counterfeit; in paſſion's flame
Hearts melt, but melt like ice, ſoon harder froze.
True love ſtrikes root in reaſon; paſſion's foe:
Virtue alone entenders us for life:
I wrong her much—Entenders us for ever:
Of friendſhip's faireſt fruits, the fruit moſt fair
Is virtue kindling at a rival fire,
And, emulouſly, rapid in her race.
O the ſoft enmity! endearing ſtrife!
This carries friendſhip to her noon-tide point,
And gives the rivet of eternity.

From friendſhip, which outlives my former themes,
Glorious ſurviver of old time and death;
From friendſhip, thus, that flower of heavenly ſeed;
The wiſe extracts earth's moſt Hyblean bliſs,
Superior wiſdom, crown'd with ſmiling joy.
But for whom bloſſoms this Elyſian flower?
Abroad they find, who cheriſh it at home.
Lorenzo! pardon what my love extorts,
An honeſt love, and not afraid to frown.
Though choice of follies faſten on the great,
None clings more obſtinate than fancy fond
That ſacred friendſhip is their eaſy prey;
Caught by the waſture of a golden lure,
Or faſcination of a high-borne ſmile.
Their ſmiles, the great, and the coquet, throw out
For others hearts, tenacious of their own;
And we no leſs of ours, when ſuch the bait.
Ye fortune's cofferers! Ye powers of wealth!
Can gold gain friendſhip? Impudence of hope!
As well mere man an angel might beget.
Love, and love only, is the loan for love.
Lorenzo! pride repreſs; nor hope to find
A friend, but what has found a friend in thee.
All like the purchaſe; few the price will pay;
And this makes friends ſuch miracles below.
What if (ſince daring on ſo nice a theme)
I ſhow thee friendſhip delicate as dear,
Of tender violations apt to die?
Reſerve will wound it; and diſtruſt, deſtroy.
Deliberate in all things with thy friend.
But ſince friends grow not thick on every bough,
Nor every friend unrotten at the core;
Firſt, on thy friend, deliberate with thyſelf;
Pauſe, ponder, ſift; not eager in the choice,
Nor jealous of the choſen; fixing, fix;
Judge before friendſhip, then confide till death.
Well, for thy friend; but nobler far for thee;
How gallant danger for earth's higheſt prize!
A friend is worth all hazards we can run.
"Poor is the friendleſs maſter of a world:
"A world in purchaſe for a friend is gain."
So ſung he (angels hear that angels ſing!
Angels from friendſhip gather half their joy)
So ſang Philander, as his friend went round
In the rich ichor, in the generous blood
Of Bacchus, purple god of joyous wit,
A brow ſolute, and ever-laughing eye.
He drank long health, and virtue, to his friend;
His friend, who warm'd him more, who more inſpir'd.
Friendſhip's the wine of life; but friendſhip new
(Not ſuch was his) is neither ſtrong nor pure.
O for the bright complexion, cordial warmth,
And elevating ſpirit, of a friend,
For twenty ſummers ripening by my ſide,
All feculence of falſehood long thrown down;
All ſocial virtues riſing in his ſoul,
As cryſtal clear, and ſmiling as they riſe!
Here nectar flows; it ſparkles in our ſight;
Rich to the taſte, and genuine from the heart,
High-flavour'd bliſs for gods! on earth how rare!
On earth how loſt!—Philander is no more.
Think'ſt thou the theme intoxicates my ſong?
Am I too warm? Too warm I cannot be.
I lov'd him much, but now I love him more.
Like birds, whoſe beauties languiſh, half conceal'd,
Till, mounted on the wing, their gloſſy plumes
Expanded ſhine with azure, green, and gold:
How bleſſings brighten as they take their flight!
His flight Philander took; his upward flight,
If ever ſoul aſcended. Had he dropp'd,
(That eagle genius!) O had he let fall
One feather as he flew, I then had wrote
What friends might flatter, prudent foes forbear,
Rivals ſcarce damn, and Zoilus reprieve.
Yet what I can, I muſt; it were profane
To quench a glory lighted at the ſkies,
And caſt in ſhadows his illuſtrious cloſe.
Strange! the theme moſt affecting, moſt ſublime,
Momentous moſt to man, ſhould ſleep unſung!
And yet it ſleeps, by genius unawak'd,
Painim or Chriſtian; to the bluſh of wit
Man's higheſt triumph! man's profoundeſt fall!
The death-bed of the juſt, is yet undrawn
By mortal hand! it merits a divine:
Angels ſhould paint it, angels ever there,
There, on a poſt of honour and of joy.
Dare I preſume then?—but Philander bids,

And glory tempts, and inclination calls—
Yet am I ſtruck, as ſtruck the ſoul beneath
Aërial groves impenetrable gloom;
Or in ſome mighty ruin's ſolemn ſhade;
Or, gazing by pale lamps on high-born duſt,
In vaults, thin courts of poor unflatter'd kings;
Or at the midnight altar's hallow'd flame.
Is it religion to proceed? I pauſe—
And enter, aw'd, the temple of my theme.
Is it his death-bed? No; it is his ſhrine:
Behold him there juſt riſing to a god. [fate
The chamber where the good man meets his
Is privileg'd beyond the common walk
Of virtuous life, quite in the verge of heaven.
Fly, ye profane! if not, draw near with awe,
Receive the bleſſing, and adore the chance,
That threw in this Bethesda your diſeaſe;
If unreſtor'd by this, deſpair your cure.
For here reſiſtleſs demonſtration dwells;
A death-bed's a detector of the heart.
Here tir'd diſſimulation drops her maſque
Through life's grimace, that miſtreſs of the ſcene!
Here real and apparent are the ſame.
You ſee the man: you ſee his hold on heaven,
If ſound his virtue, as Philander's ſound. [friends
Heaven waits not the laſt moment; owns her
On this ſide death, and points them out to men,
A lecture ſilent, but of ſovereign power!
To vice confuſion, and to virtue peace.
Whatever farce the boaſtful hero plays,
Virtue alone has majeſty in death!
And greater ſtill, the more the tyrant frowns.
Philander! he ſeverely frown'd on thee.
" No warning given! Unceremonious fate!
" A ſudden ruſh from life's meridian joy!
" A wrench from all we love! from all we are!
" A reſtleſs bed of pain! a plunge opaque
" Beyond conjecture! feeble nature's dread!
" Strong reaſon's ſhudder at the dark unknown!
" A ſun extinguiſh'd! a juſt-opening grave!
" And, Oh! the laſt, laſt, what? (can words expreſs?
" Thought reach it?) the laſt—ſilence of a friend!"
Where are thoſe horrors, that amazement, where,
This hideous group of ills, which ſingly ſhock,
Demand from man?—I thought him man till now.
Through nature's wreck, through vanquiſh'd agonies, [gloom)
(Like the ſtars ſtruggling through this midnight
What gleams of joy! what more than human peace!
Where the frail mortal? the poor abject worm?
No, not in death, the mortal to be found.
His conduct is a legacy for all;
Richer than Mammon's for his ſingle heir.
His comforters he comforts; great in ruin,
With unreluctant grandeur, gives, not yields,
His ſoul ſublime, and cloſes with his fate.
How our hearts burn'd within us at the ſcene;
Whence this brave bound o'er limits fix'd to man?
His God ſuſtains him in his final hour!
His final hour brings glory to his God!
Man's glory heaven vouchſafes to call her own.
We gaze, we weep; mix'd tears of grief, of joy!
Amazement ſtrikes! devotion burſts to flame!
Chriſtians adore! and Infidels believe!
As ſome tall tower, or lofty mountain's brow,
Detains the ſun, illuſtrious, from its height;
While riſing vapours, and deſcending ſhades,
With damps and darkneſs drown the ſpacious vale;
Undamp'd by doubt, undarken'd by deſpair,
Philander thus auguſtly rears his head
At that black hour, which general horror ſheds
On the low level of th' inglorious throng:
Sweet peace, and heavenly hope, and humble joy,
Divinely beam on his exalted ſoul;
Deſtruction gild, and crown him for the ſkies,
With incommunicable luſtre bright.

NIGHT III.

NARCISSA.

TO HER GRACE THE DUCHESS OF PORTLAND.

" Ignoſcenda quidem, ſcirent ſi ignoſcere
" manes." VIRG.

FROM dreams, where thought in fancy's maze runs mad,
To reaſon, that heaven-lighted lamp in man,
Once more I wake; and at the deſtin'd hour,
Punctual as lovers to the moment ſworn,
I keep my aſſignation with my woe.
O! loſt to virtue, loſt to manly thought,
Loſt to the noble fallies of the ſoul!
Who think it ſolitude to be alone.
Communion ſweet! communion large and high!
Our reaſon, guardian angel, and our God!
Then neareſt theſe when others moſt remote;
And all ere long ſhall be remote but theſe.
How dreadful then to meet them all alone,
A ſtranger! unacknowledg'd, unapprov'd!
Now woo them, wed them, bind them to thy breaſt;
To win thy wiſh, creation has no more.
Or if we wiſh a fourth, it is a friend—
But friends, how mortal, dangerous the deſire!
Take Phœbus to yourſelves, ye baſking bards!
Inebriate at fair fortune's fountain-head,
And reeling through the wilderneſs of joy;
Where ſenſe runs ſavage, broke from reaſon's chain,
And ſings falſe peace, till ſmother'd by the pall:
My fortune is unlike; unlike my ſong;
Unlike the deity my ſong invokes.
I to day's ſoft-ey'd ſiſter pay my court,
(Endymion's rival!) and her aid implore;
Now firſt implor'd in ſuccour to the muſe.
Thou, who didſt lately borrow * Cynthia's form
And modeſtly forego thine own! O thou,
Who didſt thyſelf at midnight hours inſpire!
Say, why not Cynthia patroneſs of ſong?
As thou her creſcent, ſhe thy character
Aſſumes; ſtill more a goddeſs by the change.
Are there demurring wits who dare diſpute
This revolution in the world inſpir'd?
Ye train Pierian! to the lunar ſphere,
In ſilent hour, addreſs your ardent call
For aid immortal; leſs her brother's right.

* At the Duke of Norfolk's maſquerade.

She, with the spheres harmonious, nightly leads
The mazy dance, and hears their matchless strain;
A strain for gods, deny'd to mortal ear.
Transmit it heard, thou silver queen of heaven!
What title, or what name, endears the most?
Cynthia! Cyllené! Phœbe! or dost hear
With higher gust fair Portland of the skies!
Is that the soft enchantment calls thee down,
More powerful than of old Circean charm?
Come; but from heavenly banquets with thee bring
The soul of song, and whisper in my ear
The theft divine; or in propitious dreams
(For dreams are thine) transfuse it through the breast
Of thy first votary, but not thy last,
If, like thy namesake, thou art ever kind.
And kind thou wilt be; kind on such a theme;
A theme so like thee, a quite lunar theme,
Soft, modest, melancholy, female, fair!
A theme that rose all pale, and told my soul
'Twas night; on her fond hopes perpetual night;
A night which struck a damp, a deadlier damp
Than that which smote me from Philander's tomb.
Narcissa follows, ere his tomb is clos'd.
Woes cluster; rare are solitary woes;
They love a train, they tread each others heel;
Her death invades his mournful right, and claims
The grief that started from my lids for him:
Seizes the faithless alienated tear,
Or shares it ere it falls. So frequent death,
Sorrow he more than causes, he confounds;
For human sighs his rival strokes contend,
And make distress, distraction. Oh, Philander!
What was thy fate? A double fate to me;
Portent and pain, a menace and a blow,
Like the black raven hovering o'er my peace,
Not less a bird of omen than of prey.
It call'd Narcissa long before her hour;
It call'd her tender soul, by break of bliss,
From the first blossom, from the buds of joy;
Those few our noxious fate unblasted leaves
In this inclement clime of human life.
Sweet harmonist! and beautiful as sweet!
And young as beautiful! and soft as young!
And gay as soft! and innocent as gay!
And happy (if aught happy here) as good!
For fortune fond had built her nest on high.
Like birds quite exquisite of note and plume,
Transfix'd by fate (who loves a lofty mark,)
How from the summit of the grove she fell,
And left it unharmonious. All its charms
Extinguish'd in the wonders of her song!
Her song still vibrates in my ravish'd ear,
Still melting there, and with voluptuous pain
(O to forget her!) thrilling through my heart!
Song, beauty, youth, love, virtue, joy; this group
Of bright ideas, flowers of paradise,
As yet unforfeit! in one blaze we bind,
Kneel and present it to the skies, as all
We guess of heaven: and these were all her own.
And she was mine; and I was—was!—most blest—
Gay title of the deepest misery!

As bodies grow more ponderous robb'd of life,
Good lost weighs more in grief than gain'd in joy,
Like blossom'd trees o'erturn'd by vernal storm,
Lovely in death the beauteous ruin lay;
And if in death still lovely, lovelier there,
Far lovelier! pity swells the tide of love.
And will not the severe excuse a sigh?
Scorn the proud man that is asham'd to weep;
Our tears indulg'd indeed deserve our shame.
Ye that e'er lost an angel, pity me!
Soon as the lustre languish'd in her eye,
Dawning a dimmer day on human sight,
And on her cheek, the residence of spring,
Pale omen sat, and scatter'd fears around
On all that saw (and who would cease to gaze
That once had seen?) with haste, parental haste,
I flew, I snatch'd her from the rigid north,
Her native bed, on which bleak Boreas blew,
And bore her nearer to the sun: the sun
(As if the sun could envy) check'd his beam,
Deny'd his wonted succour; nor with more
Regret beheld her drooping than the bells
Of lilies; fairest lilies not so fair!
Queen lilies! and ye painted populace!
Who dwell in fields, and lead ambrosial lives,
In morn and evening dew your beauties bathe,
And drink the sun; which gives your cheeks to glow,
And out-blush (mine excepted) every fair;
You gladlier grew ambitious of her hand,
Which often crept your odours, incense meet
To thought so pure! Ye lovely fugitives!
Coeval race with man! for man you smile;
Why not smile at him too? You share indeed
His sudden pass, but not his constant pain.
So man is made; nought ministers delight
By what his glowing passions can engage;
And glowing passions, bent on aught below,
Must, soon or late, with anguish turn the scale;
And anguish, after rapture, how severe! [divine,
Rapture! Bold man! who tempt'st the wrath
By plucking fruit denied to mortal taste,
While here, presuming on the rights of heaven.
For transport dost thou call on every hour,
Lorenzo? At thy friend's expence be wise;
Lean not on earth; 'twill pierce thee to the heart;
A broken reed at best, but oft a spear;
On its sharp point peace bleeds, and hope expires.
Turn, hopeless thought! turn from her:—
Thought repell'd
Resenting rallies, and wakes every woe.
Snatch'd ere thy prime! and in thy bridal hour!
And when kind fortune, with thy lover, smil'd!
And when high flavour'd thy fresh opening joys!
And when blind man pronounc'd thy bliss complete!
And on a foreign shore, where strangers wept!
Strangers to thee; and, more surprising still,
Strangers to kindness, wept: their eyes let fall
Inhuman tears! strange tears! that trickled down
From marble hearts! obdurate tenderness!
A tenderness that call'd them more severe;
In spite of nature's soft persuasion steel'd;
While nature melted, superstition rav'd;
That mourn'd the dead, and this denied a grave,

Their ſighs incens'd; ſighs foreign to the will!
Their will the tiger ſuck'd, outrag'd the ſtorm.
For, oh! the curſt ungodlineſs of zeal!
While ſinful fleſh relented, ſpirit nurſt
In blind infallibility's embrace,
The fainted ſpirit petrify'd the breaſt;
Deny'd the charity of duſt, to ſpread
O'er duſt! a charity their dogs enjoy.
What could I do? What ſuccour? What reſource?
With pious ſacrilege, a grave I ſtole;
With impious piety, that grave I wrong'd;
Short in my duty; coward in my grief!
More like her murderer, than friend, I crept,
With ſoft-ſuſpended ſtep, and muffled deep
In midnight darkneſs, whiſper'd my laſt ſigh.
I whiſper'd what ſhould echo through their realms;
Nor writ her name, whoſe tomb ſhould pierce the ſkies.
Preſumptuous fear! How durſt I dread her foes,
While nature's loudeſt dictates I obey'd?
Pardon neceſſity, bleſt ſhade! of grief
And indignation rival burſts I pour'd;
Half execration mingled with my prayer;
Kindled at man, while I his God ador'd;
Sore grudg'd the ſavage land her ſacred duſt;
Stamp'd the curs'd ſoil; and with humanity
(Denied Narciſſa) wiſh'd them all a grave.
Glows my reſentment into guilt? What guilt
Can equal violations of the dead?
The dead how ſacred! Sacred is the duſt
Of this heaven-labour'd form, erect, divine!
This heaven-aſſum'd majeſtic robe of earth,
He deign'd to wear, who hung the vaſt expanſe
With azure bright, and cloath'd the ſun in gold.
When every paſſion ſleeps that can offend;
When ſtrikes us every motive that can melt;
When man can wreak his rancour uncontroul'd,
That ſtrongeſt curb on inſult and ill-will;
Then, ſpleen to duſt? the duſt of innocence?
An angel's duſt?—This Lucifer tranſcends;
When he contended for the patriarch's bones,
'Twas not the ſtrife of malice, but of pride;
The ſtrife of pontiff pride, not pontiff gall.
For leſs than this is ſhocking in a race
Moſt wretched, but from ſtreams of mutual love;
And uncreated, but for love divine;
And, but for love divine, this moment loſt,
By fate reſorb'd, and ſunk in endleſs night.
Man hard of heart to man! of horrid things
Moſt horrid! 'mid ſtupendous, highly ſtrange!
Yet oft his courteſies are ſmoother wrongs;
Pride brandiſhes the favours he confers,
And contumelious his humanity:
What then his vengeance? Hear it not, ye ſtars!
And thou, pale moon! turn paler at the ſound;
Man is to man the ſoreſt, ſureſt ill.
A previous blaſt foretells the riſing ſtorm;
O'erwhelming turrets threaten ere they fall;
Volcanos bellow ere they diſembogue;
Earth trembles ere her yawning jaws devour;
And ſmoke betrays the wide conſuming fire:
Ruin from man is moſt conceal'd when near,
And ſends the dreadful tidings in the blow.
Is this the flight of fancy? Would it were!
Heaven's Sovereign ſaves all beings, but himſelf,
That hideous ſight, a naked human heart.
Fir'd is the muſe? And let the muſe be fir'd:
Who not enflam'd, when what he ſpeaks, he feels,
And in the nerve moſt tender, in his friends?
Shame to mankind! Philander had his foes:
He felt the truths I ſing, and I in him.
But he, nor I, feel more: paſt ills, Narciſſa!
Are ſunk in thee, thou recent wound of heart!
Which bleeds with other cares, with other pangs;
Pangs numerous, as the numerous ills that ſwarm'd
O'er thy diſtinguiſh'd fate, and, cluſtering there
Thick as the locuſts on the land of Nile,
Made death more deadly, and more dark the grave.
Reflect (if not forgot my touching tale)
How was each circumſtance with aſpics arm'd?
An aſpic, each! and all, an Hydra woe:
What ſtrong Herculean virtue could ſuffice?——
Or is it virtue to be conquer'd here?
This hoary cheek a train of tears bedews;
And each tear mourns its own diſtinct diſtreſs;
And each diſtreſs, diſtinctly mourn'd, demands
Of grief ſtill more, as heighten'd by the whole.
A grief like this proprietors excludes:
Not friends alone ſuch obſequies deplore;
They make mankind the mourner; carry ſighs
Far as the fatal fame can wing her way;
And turn the gayeſt thought of gayeſt age,
Down their right channel, through the vale of death.
The vale of death! that huſh'd Cimmerian vale,
Where darkneſs, brooding o'er unfiniſh'd fates,
With raven wing incumbent, waits the day
(Dread day!) that interdicts all future change!
That ſubterranean world, that land of ruin!
Fit walk, Lorenzo, for proud human thought!
There let my thought expatiate, and explore
Balſamic truths and healing ſentiments,
Of all moſt wanted, and moſt welcome, here.
For gay Lorenzo's ſake, and for thy own,
My ſoul! "The fruits of dying friends ſurvey;
"Expoſe the vain of life; weigh life and death;
"Give death his eulogy; thy fear ſubdue;
"And labour that firſt palm of noble minds,
"A manly ſcorn of terror from the tomb."
This harveſt reap from thy Narciſſa's grave.
As poet's feign'd from Ajax' ſtreaming blood
Aroſe, with grief inſcrib'd, a mournful flower;
Let wiſdom bloſſom from my mortal wound.
And firſt, of dying friends; what fruit from theſe?
It brings us more than triple aid; an aid
To chaſe our thoughtleſſneſs, fear, pride and guilt.
Our dying friends come o'er us like a cloud,
To damp our brainleſs ardors; and abate
That glare of life which often blinds the wiſe.
Our dying friends are pioneers, to ſmooth
Our rugged paſs to death; to break thoſe bars
Of terror, and abhorrence, nature throws
Croſs our obſtructed way; and, thus to make
Welcome, as ſafe, our port from every ſtorm.
Each friend by fate ſnatch'd from us, is a plume
Pluck'd from the wing of human vanity,
Which makes us ſtoop from our aërial heights,
And, dampt with omen of our own deceaſe,
On drooping pinions of ambition lower'd,

Just skim earth's surface, ere we break it up,
O'er putrid earth to scratch a little dust,
And save the world a nuisance. Smitten friends
Are angels sent on errands full of love;
For us they languish, and for us they die:
And shall they languish, shall they die, in vain?
Ungrateful, shall we grieve their hovering shades,
Which wait the revolution in our hearts?
Shall we disdain their silent, soft address;
Their posthumous advice, and pious prayer?
Senseless, as herds that graze their hallow'd graves,
Tread under foot their agonies and groans;
Frustrate their anguish, and destroy their deaths?
Lorenzo! no; the thought of death indulge;
Give it its wholesome empire! let it reign,
That kind chastiser of thy soul in joy!
Its reign will spread thy glorious conquests far,
And still the tumults of thy ruffled breast:
Auspicious era! golden days, begin!
The thought of death shall, like a god, inspire.
And why not think on death? Is life the theme
Of every thought? and wish of every hour?
And song of every joy? Surprising truth!
The beaten spaniel's fondness not so strange.
To wave the numerous ills that seize on life
As their own property, their lawful prey;
Ere man has measur'd half his weary stage,
His luxuries have left him no reserve,
No maiden relishes, unbroach'd delights;
On cold serv'd repetitions he subsists,
And in the tasteless present chews the past;
Disgusted chews, and scarce can swallow down.
Like lavish ancestors, his earlier years
Have disinherited his future hours,
Which starve on orts, and glean their former field.
Live ever here, Lorenzo!—shocking thought!
So shocking, they who wish, disown it too;
Disown from shame, what they from folly crave.
Live ever in the womb, nor see the light?
For what live ever here?—With labouring step
To tread our former footsteps? Pace the round
Eternal? To climb life's worn, heavy wheel,
Which draws up nothing new? To beat, and beat
The beaten track? To bid each wretched day
The former mock? To forfeit on the fame,
And yawn our joys? Or thank a misery [seen?
For change, though sad? To see what we have
Hear, till unheard, the same old slabber'd tale?
To taste the tasted, and at each return
Less tasteful? O'er our palates to decant
Another vintage? Strain a fatter year,
Through loaded vessels, and a laxer tone?
Crazy machines to grind earth's wasted fruits!
Ill ground, and worse connected! load, not life!
The rational soul kennels of excess!
Still-streaming thorough-fares of dull debauch!
Trembling each gulp, lest death should snatch the bowl.
Such of our fine-ones is the wish refin'd!
So would they have it; elegant desire!
Why not invite the bellowing stalls, and wilds?
But such examples might their riot awe.
Through want of virtue, that is, want of thought,
(Though on bright thought they father all their flights)
To what are they reduc'd? To love, and hate,
The same vain world; to censure, and espouse,
This painted shrew of life, who calls them fool
Each moment of each day; to flatter bad
Through dread of worse? to cling to this rude rock,
Barren to them of good, and sharp with ills,
And hourly blacken'd with impending storms,
And infamous for wrecks of human hope—
Scar'd at the gloomy gulf, that yawns beneath.
Such are their triumphs! such their pangs of joy!
'Tis time, high time, to shift this dismal scene.
This bugg'd, this hideous state, what art can cure?
One only; but that one, what all may reach;
Virtue—she, wonder-working goddess! charms
That rock to bloom; and tames the painted shrew;
And, what will more surprise, Lorenzo! gives
To life's sick, nauseous iteration, change;
And straightens nature's circle to a line.
Believ'st thou this, Lorenzo? lend an ear,
A patient ear; thou'lt blush to disbelieve.
A languid, leaden, iteration reigns,
And ever must, o'er those, whose joys are joys
Of sight, smell, taste: the cuckow-seasons sing
The same dull note to such as nothing prize,
But what those seasons, from the teeming earth,
To donting sense indulge. But nobler minds,
Which relish fruits unripen'd by the sun,
Make their days various; various as the dyes
On the dove's neck, which wanton in his rays,
On minds of dove-like innocence possess'd,
On lighten'd minds, that bask in virtue's beams,
Nothing hangs tedious, nothing old revolves
In that, for which they long; for which they live,
Their glorious efforts, wing'd with heavenly hope,
Each rising morning sees still higher rise;
Each bounteous dawn its novelty presents
To worth maturing, new strength, lustre, fame;
While nature's circle, like a chariot-wheel
Rolling beneath their elevated aims,
Makes their fair prospect fairer every hour;
Advancing virtue, in a line to bliss;
Virtue, which Christian motives best inspire!
And bliss, which Christian schemes alone ensure?
And shall we then, for virtue's sake, commence
Apostates; and turn infidels for joy?
A truth it is, few doubt, but fewer trust,
"He sins against this life, who slights the next."
What is this life? How few their favourite know?
Fond in the dark, and blind in our embrace,
By passionately loving life, we make
Lov'd life unlovely; hugging her to death.
We give to time eternity's regard;
And, dreaming, take our passage for our port.
Life has no value as an end, but means;
An end deplorable! a means divine!
When 'tis our all, 'tis nothing; worse than nought;
A nest of pains: when held as nothing, much:
Like some fair humourists, life is most enjoy'd,
When courted least; most worth, when disesteem'd:
Then 'tis the seat of comfort, rich in peace;
In prospect richer far; important! awful!
Not to be mention'd, but with shouts of praise!
Not to be thought on, but with tides of joy!
The mighty basis of eternal bliss!

Where now the barren rock? the painted ſhrew?
Where now, Lorenzo! life's eternal round?
Have I not made my triple promiſe good?
Vain is the world; but only to the vain.
To what compare we then this varying ſcene,
Whoſe worth ambiguous riſes, and declines?
Waxes, and wanes? (In all propitious, night
Aſſiſts me here) compare it to the moon;
Dark in herſelf, and indigent; but rich
In borrow'd luſtre from a higher ſphere.
When groſs guilt interpoſes, labouring earth,
O'erſhadow'd, mourns a deep eliplſe of joy;
Her joys, at brighteſt, pallid, to that font
Of full effulgent glory, whence they flow.
Nor is that glory diſtant: oh Lorenzo!
A good man, and an angel! theſe between
How thin the barrier! what divides their fate!
Perhaps a moment, or perhaps a year;
Or, if an age, it is a moment ſtill;
A moment, or eternity's forgot.
Then be, what once they were, who now are gods;
Be what Philander was, and claim the ſkies.
Starts timid nature at the gloomy paſs?
The ſoft tranſition call it; and be cheer'd:
Such it is often, and why not to thee?
To hope the beſt, is pious, brave, and wiſe;
And may itſelf procure, what it preſumes.
Life is much flatter'd, death is much traduc'd;
Compare the rivals, and the kinder crown.
"Strange competition!"—True, Lorenzo, ſtrange!
So little life can caſt into the ſcale,
Life makes the ſoul dependent on the duſt;
Death gives her wings to mount above the ſpheres.
Through chinks, ſtyl'd organs, dim life peeps at light;
Death burſts th' involving cloud, and all is day;
All eye, all ear, the diſembody'd power.
Death has feign'd evils, nature ſhall not feel;
Life, ills ſubſtantial, wiſdom cannot ſhun.
Is not the mighty mind, that ſon of heaven!
By tyrant life dethron'd, impriſon'd, pain'd?
By death enlarg'd, enobled, deify'd?
Death but entombs the body; life the ſoul.
"Is death then guiltleſs! How he marks his way
"With dreadful waſte of what deſerves to ſhine!
"Art, genius, fortune, elevated power!
"With various luſtres theſe light up the world,
"Which death puts out, and darkens human race."
I grant, Lorenzo! this indictment juſt:
The ſage, peer, potentate, king, conqueror!
Death humbles theſe; more barbarous life the man.
Life is the triumph of our mouldering clay;
Death, of the ſpirit infinite! divine!
Death has no dread, but what frail life imparts;
Nor life true joy, but what kind death improves.
No bliſs has life to boaſt, till death can give
Far greater; life's a debtor to the grave,
Dark lattice! letting in eternal day.
Lorenzo! bluſh at fondneſs for a life
Which ſends celeſtial ſouls on errands vile,
To cater for the ſenſe; and ſerve at boards,
Where every ranger of the wilds, perhaps
Each reptile, juſtly claims our upper hand.
Luxurious feaſt! a ſoul, a ſoul immortal,
In all the dainties of a brute bemir'd!
Lorenzo! bluſh at terror for a death,
Which gives thee to repoſe in feſtive bowers,
Where nectars ſparkle, angels miniſter,
And more than angels ſhare, and raiſe, and crown,
And eterniſe, the birth, bloom, burſts of bliſs.
What need I more? O death, the palm is thine.
Then welcome, death! thy dreaded harbingers,
Age, and diſeaſe; diſeaſe, though long my gueſt;
That plucks my nerves, thoſe tender ſtrings of life;
Which, pluck'd a little more, will toll the bell,
That call my few friends to my funeral;
Where feeble nature drops, perhaps, a tear,
While reaſon and religion, better taught,
Congratulate the dead, and crown his tomb
With wreathe triumphant. Death is victory;
It binds in chains the raging ills of life:
Luſt and ambition, wrath and avarice,
Dragg'd at his chariot-wheel, applaud his power.
That ills corroſive, cures importunate,
Are not immortal too, O death! is thine.
Our day of diſſolution!—name it right;
'Tis our great pay-day; 'tis our harveſt rich
And ripe: what though the ſickle, ſometimes keen,
Juſt ſcars us as we reap the golden grain?
More than thy balm, O Gilead! heals the wound.
Birth's feeble cry, and death's deep diſmal groan,
Are ſlender tributes low-tax'd nature pays
For mighty gain: the gain of each, a life!
But O! the laſt the former ſo tranſcends,
Life dies compar'd: Life lives beyond the grave.
And feel I, death! no joy from thought of thee?
Death, the great counſellor, who man inſpires
With every nobler thought, and fairer deed!
Death, the deliverer, who reſcues man!
Death, the rewarder, who the reſcued crowns!
Death, that abſolves my birth; a curſe without it!
Rich death, that realizes all my cares,
Toils, virtues, hopes; without a chimera!
Death, of all pain the period, not of joy;
Joy's ſource, and ſubject, ſtill ſubſiſt unhurt;
One, in my ſoul; and one, in her great Sire;
Though the four winds were warring for my duſt.
Yes, and from winds, and waves, and central night,
Though priſon'd there, my duſt too I reclaim,
To duſt when drop proud nature's proudeſt ſpheres)
And live entire. Death is the crown of life:
Were death deny'd, poor man would live in vain;
Were death deny'd, to live would not be life;
Were death deny'd, ev'n fools would wiſh to die.
Death wounds to cure: we fall, we riſe, we reign!
Spring from our fetters; faſten in the ſkies;
Where blooming Eden withers in our ſight:
Death gives us more than was in Eden loſt.
This king of terrors is the prince of peace.
When ſhall I die to vanity, pain, death?
When ſhall I die?—when ſhall I live for ever?

NIGHT IV.

THE CHRISTIAN TRIUMPH.

Containing our only Cure for the Fear of Death; and proper Sentiments of that Ineſtimable Bleſſing.

TO THE HONOURABLE MR. YORKE.

A MUCH-INDEBTED muſe, O Yorke! intrudes.
Amid the ſmiles of fortune, and of youth,

Thine ear is patient of a ſerious ſong.
How deep implanted in the breaſt of man
The dread of death! I ſing its ſovereign cure.
Why ſtart at death? Where is he? Death ariv'd,
Is paſt; not come or gone, he's never here.
Ere hope, ſenſation fails; black-boding man
Receives, not ſuffers, death's tremendous blow.
The knell, the ſhroud, the mattock, and the grave;
The deep damp vault, the darkneſs, and the worm;
Theſe are the bugbears of a winter's eve,
The terrors of the living, not the dead.
Imagination's fool, and error's wretch,
Man makes a death, which nature never made;
Then on the point of his own fancy falls;
And feels a thouſand deaths, in fearing one.
But were death frightful, what has age to fear?
If prudent, age ſhould meet the friendly foe,
And ſhelter in his hoſpitable gloom.
I ſcarce can meet a monument, but holds
My younger; every date cries—"Come away."
And what recalls me? Look the world around,
And tell me what: the wiſeſt cannot tell.
Should any born of women give his thought
Full range on juſt diſlike's unbounded field;
Of things, the vanity; of men, the flaws;
Flaws in the beſt; the many, flaw all o'er;
As leopards ſpotted, or as Ethiops dark;
Vivacious ill; good dying immature;
(How immature, Narciſſa's marble tells!)
And at his death bequeathing endleſs pain;
His heart, though bold, would ſicken at the ſight,
And ſpend itſelf in ſighs for future ſcenes.
But grant to life (and juſt it is to grant
To lucky life) ſome perquiſites of joy;
A time there is, when, like a thrice-told tale,
Long-rifled life of ſweet can yield no more,
But from our comment on the comedy,
Pleaſing reflections on parts well ſuſtain'd,
Or purpoſ'd emendations where we fail'd,
Or hopes of plaudits from our candid judge,
When on their exit, ſouls are bid unrobe,
Toſs fortune back her tinſel, and her plume,
And drop this maſk of fleſh behind the ſcene.
With me, that time is come; my world is dead;
A new world riſes, and new manners reign:
Foreign comedians, a ſpruce band! arrive,
To puſh me from the ſcene, or hiſs me there,
What a pert race ſtarts up! the ſtrangers gaze,
And I at them; my neighbour is unknown;
Nor that the worſt: Ah me! the dire effect
Of loitering here, of death defrauded long;
Of old ſo gracious (and let that ſuffice),
My very maſter knows me not.—
Shall I dare ſay, peculiar is the fate?
I've been ſo long remember'd, I'm forgot.
An object ever preſſing dims the ſight,
And hides behind its ardour to be ſeen.
When in his courtiers ears I pour my plaint,
They drink it as the nectar of the great;
And ſqueeze my hand, and beg me come to-morrow.
Refuſal! canſt thou wear a ſmoother form?
Indulge me, nor conceive I drop my theme:
Who cheapens life, abates the fear of death:
Twice told the period ſpent on ſtubborn Troy,
Court favour, yet untaken, I beſiege;
Ambition's ill-judg'd effort to be rich.
Alas! ambition makes my little leſs;
Embittering the poſſeſt: Why wiſh for more?
Wiſhing, of all employments, is the worſt;
Philoſophy's reverſe; and health's decay!
Were I as plump as ſtall'd theology,
Wiſhing would waſte me to this ſhade again.
Were I as wealthy as a South-ſea dream,
Wiſhing is an expedient to be poor.
Wiſhing, that conſtant hectic of a fool;
Caught at a court; purg'd off by purer air,
And ſimpler diet; gifts of rural life!
Bleſt be that hand divine, which gently laid
My heart at reſt, beneath this humble ſhed.
The world's a ſtately bark, on dangerous ſeas,
With pleaſure ſeen, but boarded at our peril;
Here, on a ſingle plank, thrown ſafe aſhore,
I hear the tumult of the diſtant throng,
As that of ſeas remote, or dying ſtorms:
And meditate on ſcenes, more ſilent ſtill;
Purſue my theme, and fight the fear of death.
Here, like a ſhepherd gazing from his hut,
Touching his reed, or leaning on his ſtaff,
Eager ambition's a fiery chace I ſee;
I ſee the circling hunt, of noiſy men,
Burſt law's incloſure, leap the mounds of right,
Purſuing, and purſued, each other's prey;
As wolves, for rapine; as the fox, for wiles;
Till death, that mighty hunter, earths them all.
Why all this toil for triumphs of an hour?
What though we wade in wealth, or ſoar in fame?
Earth's higheſt ſtation ends in, "Here he lies,"
And "duſt to duſt," concludes her nobleſt ſong.
If this ſong lives, poſterity ſhall know
One, though in Britain born, with courtiers bred,
Who thought ev'n gold might come a day too late;
Nor on his ſubtle death-bed plann'd his ſcheme
For future vacancies in church or ſtate;
Some avocation deeming it—to die,
Unbit by rage canine of dying rich;
Guilt's blunder! and the loudeſt laugh of hell.
O my coevals! remnants of yourſelves!
Poor human ruins, tottering o'er the grave!
Shall we, ſhall aged men, like aged trees,
Strike deeper their vile root, and cloſer cling,
Still more enamour'd of this wretched ſoil?
Shall our pale, wither'd hands, be ſtill ſtretch'd out,
Trembling at once with eagerneſs and age?
With avarice and convulſions graſping hard?
Graſping at air! for what has earth beſide?
Man wants but little; nor that little long;
How ſoon muſt he reſign his very duſt,
Which frugal nature lent him for an hour!
Years unexperienc'd ruſh on numerous ills;
And ſoon as man, expert from time, has found
The key of life, it opes the gates of death.
When in this vale of years I backward look,
And miſs ſuch numbers, numbers too of ſuch,
Firmer in health, and greener in their age,
And ſtricter on their guard, and fitter far
To play life's ſubtle game, I ſcarce believe
I ſtill ſurvive: and am I fond of life,
Who ſcarce can think it poſſible I live?
Alive by miracle! or what is next,

Alive by Mead! if I am ſtill alive,
Who long have bury'd what gives life to live,
Firmneſs of nerve, and energy of thought.
Life's lee is not more ſhallow than impure
And vapid; ſenſe and reaſon ſhow the door,
Call for my bier, and point me to the duſt.
O thou great arbiter of life and death!
Nature's immortal, immaterial ſun!
Whoſe all-prolific beam late call'd me forth
From darkneſs, teeming darkneſs, where I lay
The worm's inferior, and in rank beneath
The duſt I tread on, high to bear my brow,
To drink the ſpirit of the golden day,
And triumph in exiſtence; and could know
No motive, but my bliſs; and haſt ordain'd
A riſe in bleſſing! with the patriarch's joy,
Thy call I follow to the land unknown;
I truſt in thee, and know in whom I truſt;
Or life, or death, is equal; neither weighs:
All weight in this—O let me live to thee!
Though nature's terrors thus may be repreſt;
Still frowns grim death; guilt points the tyrant's ſpear.
And whence all human guilt? From death forgot.
Ah me! too long I ſet at nought the ſwarm
Of friendly warnings, which around me flew;
And ſmil'd unſmitten: ſmall my cauſe to ſmile!
Death's admonitions, like ſhafts upwards ſhot,
More dreadful by delay, the longer ere
They ſtrike our hearts, the deeper is their wound.
O think how deep, Lorenzo! here it ſtings:
Who can appeaſe its anguiſh? how it burns!
What hand the barb'd, invenom'd, thought can draw?
What healing hand can pour the balm of peace,
And turn my ſight undaunted on the tomb?
With joy—with grief that healing hand I ſee;
Ah, too conſpicuous! it is fix'd on high.
On high?—What means my phrenzy? I blaſpheme;
Alas, how low! how far beneath the ſkies!
The ſkies it form'd; and now it bleeds for me—
But bleeds the balm I want—yet ſtill it bleeds;
Draw the dire ſteel—ah no! the dreadful bleſſing
What heart or can ſuſtain, or dares forego?
There hangs all human hope; that nail ſupports
The falling univerſe: that gone, we drop;
Horror receives us, and the diſmal wiſh
Creation had been ſmother'd in her birth—
Darkneſs is his curtain, and his bed the duſt;
When ſtars and ſun are duſt beneath his throne!
In heaven itſelf can ſuch indulgence dwell?
O what a groan was there! a groan not his.
He ſeiz'd our dreadful right; the load ſuſtain'd;
And heav'd the mountain from a guilty world.
A thouſand worlds ſo bought, were bought too dear;
Senſations new in angels boſoms rife;
Suſpend their ſong; and make a pauſe in bliſs.
O for their ſong, to reach my lofty theme!
Inſpire me, night! with all thy tuneful ſpheres;
Whilſt I with ſeraphs ſhare ſeraphic themes,
And ſhow to men the dignity of man;
Leſt I blaſpheme my ſubject with my ſong.
Shall Pagan pages glow celeſtial flame,
And Chriſtian languiſh? on our hearts, not heads,
Falls the foul infamy: my heart, awake!
What can awake thee, unawak'd by this,
"Expended deity on human weal?"
Feel the great truths, which burſt the tenfold night
Of heathen error, with a golden flood
Of endleſs day: to feel, is to be ſir'd;
And to believe, Lorenzo! is to feel.
Thou moſt indulgent, moſt tremendous power!
Still more tremendous, for thy wondrous love!
That arms, which awe more awful, thy commands;
And foul tranſgreſſion dips in ſevenfold night!
How our hearts tremble at thy love immenſe!
In love immenſe, inviolably juſt!
Thou, rather than thy juſtice ſhould be ſtain'd,
Didſt ſtain the croſs; and work of wonders far
The greateſt, that thy deareſt far might bleed.
Bold thought! ſhall I dare ſpeak it, or repreſs?
Should man more execrate, or boaſt, the guilt
Which rous'd ſuch vengeance? which ſuch love inflam'd? [arms,
O'er guilt (how mountainous!) with out-ſtretch'd
Stern juſtice and ſoft-ſmiling love embrace,
Supporting, in full majeſty, thy throne,
When ſeem'd its majeſty to need ſupport,
Or that, or man, inevitably loſt;
What, but the fathomleſs of thought divine,
Could labour ſuch expedient from deſpair,
And reſcue both? both reſcue! both exalt!
O how are both exalted by the deed!
The wondrous deed! or ſhall I call it more?
A wonder in omnipotence itſelf!
A myſtery no leſs to gods than men!
Not thus, our infidels th' eternal draw,
A God all o'er, conſummate, abſolute,
Full orb'd, in his whole round of rays complete:
They ſet at odds heaven's jarring attributes;
And, with one excellence, another wound;
Maim heaven's perfection, break its equal beams,
Bid mercy triumph over—God himſelf,
Undeify'd by their opprobrious praiſe:
A God all mercy, is a God unjuſt.
Ye brainleſs wits! ye baptiz'd infidels!
Ye worſe for mending! waſh'd to fouler ſtains!
The ranſom was paid down; the fund of heaven,
Heaven's inexhauſtible, exhauſted fund,
Amazing, and amaz'd, pour'd forth the price,
All price beyond: though curious to compute,
Archangels fail'd to caſt the mighty ſum:
Its value vaſt, ungraſp'd by minds create,
For ever hides, and glows, in the Supreme.
And was the ranſom paid? it was: and paid
(What can exalt the bounty more?) for you.
The ſun beheld it---no, the ſhocking ſcene
Drove back his chariot: midnight veil'd his face;
Not ſuch as this; not ſuch as nature makes;
A midnight nature ſhudder'd to behold;
A midnight new! a dread eclipſe (without Oppoſing ſpheres) from her Creator's frown!
Sun! didſt thou fly thy Maker's pain? Or ſtart
At that enormous load of human guilt,
Which bow'd his bleſſed head; o'erwhelm'd his croſs; [womb,
Made groan the centre; burſt earth's marble
With pangs, ſtrange pangs! deliver'd of her dead?
Hell howl'd; and heaven that hour let fall a tear;

Heaven wept, that men might ſmile! heaven bled, that man
Might never die! ——
And is devotion virtue? 'Tis compell'd.
What heart of ſtone but glows at thoughts like theſe?
Such contemplations mount us; and ſhould mount
The mind ſtill higher; nor ever glance on man,
Unraptur'd, uninflam'd.—Where roll my thoughts
To reſt from wonders? other wonders riſe;
And ſtrike where'er they roll: my ſoul is caught:
Heaven's ſovereign bleſſings, cluſtering from the croſs,
Ruſh on her, in a throng, and cloſe her round,
The priſoner of amaze!—in his bleſt life
I ſee the path, and in his death the price,
And in his great aſcent the proof ſupreme
Of immortality.—And did he riſe?
Hear, O ye nations! hear it, O ye dead!
He roſe! he roſe! he burſt the bars of death.
Lift up your heads, ye everlaſting gates!
And give the king of glory to come in.
Who is the king of glory? he who left
His throne of glory, for the pang of death!
Lift up your heads, ye everlaſting gates!
And give the king of glory to come in.
Who is the king of glory? he who ſlew
The ravenous foe, that gorg'd all human race!
The king of glory, he, whoſe glory fill'd
Heaven with amazement at his love to man;
And with divine complacency beheld
Powers moſt illumin'd, wilder'd in the theme.
The theme, the joy, how then ſhall man ſuſtain?
Oh the burſt gates! cruſh'd ſting! demoliſh'd throne! [heaven!
Laſt gaſp of vanquiſh'd death. Shout earth and
This ſum of good to man. Whoſe nature, then,
Took wing, and mounted with him from the tomb!
Then, then, I roſe; then firſt humanity
Triumphant paſt the cryſtal ports of light,
(Stupendous gueſt!) and ſeiz'd eternal youth,
Seiz'd in our name. E'er ſince, 'tis blaſphemous
To call man mortal. Man's mortality [ration
Was, then, transferr'd to death; and heaven's du-
Unalienably ſeal'd to this frail frame,
This child of duſt—Man, all-immortal! hail;
Hail, heaven! all laviſh of ſtrange gifts to man!
Thine all the glory; man's the boundleſs bliſs.
Where am I rapt by this triumphant theme,
On Chriſtian joy's exulting wing, above
Th' Aonian mount!—Alas. ſmall cauſe for joy!
What if to pain immortal? if extent
Of being, to preclude a cloſe of woe?
Where, then, my boaſt of immortality?
I boaſt it ſtill, though cover'd o'er with guilt;
For guilt, not innocence, his life he pour'd,
'Tis guilt alone can juſtify his death;
Nor that, unleſs his death can juſtify
Relenting guilt in Heaven's indulgent ſight.
If, ſick of folly, I relent; he writes
My name in heaven, with that inverted ſpear
(A ſpear deep-dipt in blood!) which piere'd his
And open'd there a font for all mankind, [ſide,
Who ſtrive, who combat crimes, to drink, and live:
This, only this, ſubdues the fear of death.

And what is this?—Survey the wondrous cure?
And at each ſtep, let higher wonder riſe!
" Pardon for infinite offence! and pardon
" Through means that ſpeak its value infinite!
" A pardon bought with blood! with blood di-
" vine!
" With blood divine of him I made my foe!
" Perſiſted to provoke! though woo'd, and aw'd,
" Bleſt, and chaſtis'd, a flagrant rebel ſtill!
" A rebel, 'midſt the thunders of his throne!
" Nor I alone! a rebel univerſe!
" My ſpecies up in arms! not one exempt!
" Yet for the feuleſt of the foul, he dies,
" Moſt joy'd, for the redeem'd from deepeſt guilt!
" As if our race were held of higheſt rank;
" And Godhead dearer, as more kind to man!"
Bound, every heart! and every boſom burn!
O what a ſcale of miracles is here!
Its loweſt round, high planted on the ſkies;
Its towering ſummit loſt beyond the thought
Of man or angel! O that I could climb
The wonderful aſcent, with equal praiſe!
Praiſe! flow for ever (if aſtoniſhment
Will give thee leave): my praiſe! for ever flow;
Praiſe ardent, cordial, conſtant, to high heaven
More fragrant, than Arabia ſacrific'd,
And all her ſpicy mountains in a flame.
So dear, ſo due to heaven, ſhall praiſe deſcend,
With her ſoft plume (from plauſive angels wing
Firſt pluck'd my man) to tickle mortal ears,
Thus diving in the pockets of the great?
Is praiſe the perquiſite of every paw,
Though black as hell, that grapples well for gold?
Oh, love of gold! thou meaneſt of amours!
Shall praiſe her odours waſte on virtue's dead,
Embalm the baſe, perfume the ſtench of guilt,
Earn dirty bread by waſhing Æthiops fair,
Removing filth, or ſinking it from ſight,
A ſcavenger in ſcenes, where vacant poſts
Like gibbets yet untenanted, expect
Their future ornaments? From courts and thrones,
Return, apoſtate praiſe! thou vagabond!
Thou proſtitute! to thy firſt love return,
Thy firſt, thy greateſt, once unrival'd theme.
There flow redundant; like Meander flow,
Back to thy fountain; to that parent Power,
Who gives the tongue to ſound, the thought to ſoar,
The ſoul to be. Men homage pay to men,
Thoughtleſs beneath whoſe dreadful eye they bow
In mutual awe profound of clay to clay,
Of guilt to guilt; and turn their back on thee,
Great Sire! whom thrones celeſtial ceaſeleſs ſing:
To proſtrate angels, an amazing ſcene!
O the preſumption of man's awe for man!
Man's Author! End! Reſtorer! Law! and Judge!
Shine, all; day thine, and thine this gloom of night,
With all her wealth, with all her radiant worlds:
What, night eternal, but a frown from thee?
What, heaven's meridian glory, but thy ſmile?
And ſhall not praiſe be thine, not human praiſe?
While heaven's high hoſt on hallelujahs tive?
O may I breathe no longer, than I breathe
My ſoul in praiſe to him, who gave my ſoul,
And all her infinite of proſpect fair,

Cut through the ſhades of hell, great love! by thee
O moſt adorable! moſt unador'd! [end?
Where ſhall that praiſe begin, which ne'er ſhould
Where'er I turn, what claim on all applauſe!
How is night's ſable mantle labour'd o'er,
How richly wrought with attributes divine!
What wiſdom ſhines! what love! this midnight pomp,
This gorgeous arch, with golden worlds inlay'd!
Built with divine ambition! nought to thee;
For others this profuſion: Thou, apart,
Above! beyond! O tell me, mighty mind!
Where art thou? Shall I dive into the deep?
Call to the ſun, or aſk the roaring winds,
For their Creator? Shall I queſtion loud
The thunder, if in that th' Almighty dwells?
Or holds he furious ſtorms in ſtreighten'd reins,
And bids fierce whirlwinds wheel his rapid car?
What mean theſe queſtions?—Trembling I retract;
My proſtrate ſoul adores the preſent God:
Praiſe I a diſtant Deity? He tunes [tains:
My voice (if tun'd): the nerve, that writes, ſuſ-
Wrapt in his being, I reſound his praiſe:
But though paſt all diffus'd, without a ſhore,
His eſſence; local is his throne (as meet),
To gather the diſperſt (as ſtandards call
The liſted from afar): to fix a point,
A central point, collective of his ſons,
Since finite every nature but his own.
The nameleſs He, whoſe nod is nature's birth;
And nature's ſhield, the ſhadow of his hand;
Her diſſolution, his ſuſpended ſmile!
The great Firſt-Laſt! pavilion'd high he ſits,
In darkneſs from exceſſive ſplendor borne,
By gods unſeen, unleſs through luſtre loſt.
His glory, to created glory, bright,
As that to central horrors; he looks down
On all that ſoars; and ſpans immenſity. [view,
Though night unnumber'd worlds unfolds to
Boundleſs creation! what art thou? A beam,
A mere effluvium of his majeſty:
And ſhall an atom of this atom-world
Mutter, in duſt and ſin, the theme of Heaven?
Down to the centre ſhould I ſend my thought
Through beds of glittering ore, and glowing gems,
Their beggar'd blaze wants luſtre for my lay;
Goes out in darkneſs: if, on towering wing,
I ſend it through the boundleſs vault of ſtars!
The ſtars, though rich, what droſs their gold to thee,
Great, good, wiſe, wonderful, eternal King!
If to thoſe conſcious ſtars thy throne around,
Praiſe ever-pouring, and imbibing bliſs;
And aſk their ſtrain; they want it, more they want,
Poor their abundance, humble their ſublime,
Languid their energy, their ardour cold,
Indebted ſtill, their higheſt rapture burns;
Short of its mark, defective, though divine.
Still more—This theme is man's, and man's alone;
Their vaſt appointments reach it not: they ſee
On earth a bounty not indulg'd on high;
And downward look for heaven's ſuperior praiſe!
Firſt-born of Ether! high in fields of light!
View man, to ſee the glory of your God!
Could angels envy, they had envy'd here;
And ſome did envy; and the reſt, though gods,
Yet ſtill gods unredeem'd (there triumphs man,
Tempted to weigh the duſt againſt the ſkies)
They leſs would feel, though more adorn, my theme,
They ſung creation (for in that they ſhar'd);
How roſe in melody, that child of love!
Creation's great ſuperior, man! is thine;
Thine is redemption; they juſt gave the key:
'Tis thine to raiſe, and eternize, the ſong;
Though human, yet divine; for ſhould not this
Raiſe man o'er man, and kindle ſeraphs here?
Redemption! 'twas creation more ſublime;
Redemption! 'twas the labour of the ſkies;
Far more than labour---It was death in heaven.
A truth ſo ſtrange! 'twere bold to think it true;
If not far bolder ſtill to diſbelieve! [heaven?
Here pauſe, and ponder: was there death in
What then on earth? On earth, which ſtruck the blow?
Who ſtruck it? Who?---O how is man enlarg'd
Seen through this medium! how the pigmy towers!
How counterpois'd his origin from duſt!
How counterpois'd, to duſt his ſad return!
How voided his vaſt diſtance from the ſkies!
How near he preſſes on the ſeraph's wing!
Which is the ſeraph? Which the born of clay?
How this demonſtrates, through the thickeſt cloud
Of guilt, and clay condens'd, the ſon of heaven!
The double ſon; the made, and the re-made!
And ſhall heaven's double property be loſt?
Man's double madneſs only can deſtroy.
To man the bleeding croſs has promis'd all;
The bleeding croſs has ſworn eternal grace;
Who gave his life, what grace ſhall he deny?
O ye! who, from this rock of ages, leap,
Apoſtates, plunging headlong in the deep!
What cordial joy, what conſolation ſtrong,
Whatever winds ariſe, or billows roll,
Our intereſt in the maſter of the ſtorm!
Cling there, and in wreck'd nature's ruins ſmile;
While vile apoſtates tremble in a calm.
Man! know thyſelf. All wiſdom centres there;
To none man ſeems ignoble, but to man;
Angels that grandeur, men o'er-look, admire:
How long ſhall human nature be their book,
Degenerate mortal! and unread by thee?
The beam dim reaſon ſheds ſhows wonders there;
What high contents! Illuſtrious faculties!
But the grand comment, which diſplays at full
Our human height, ſcarce ſever'd from divine,
By heaven compos'd, was publiſh'd on the croſs.
Who looks on that, and ſees not in himſelf
An awful ſtranger, a terreſtrial god?
A glorious partner with the Deity
In that high attribute, immortal life?
If a God bleeds, he bleeds not for a worm:
I gaze, and, as I gaze, my mounting ſoul
Catches ſtrange fire, eternity! at thee;
And drops the world—or rather, more enjoys:
How chang'd the face of nature! how improv'd!
What ſeem'd a chaos, ſhines a glorious world,

Or, what a world, and Eden ; heighten'd all !
It is another ſcene ! another ſelf !
And ſtill another, as time rolls along ;
And that a ſelf far more illuſtrious ſtill.
Beyond long ages, yet roll'd up in ſhades
Unpierc'd by bold conjecture's keeneſt ray,
What evolutions of ſurpriſing fate !
How nature opens, and receives my ſoul
In boundleſs walks of raptur'd thought ! where gods
Encounter and embrace me ! What new births
Of ſtrange adventure, foreign to the ſun ;
Where what now charms, perhaps, whate'er exiſts,
Old time, and fair creation, are forgot !
Is this extravagant ? Of man we form
Extravagant conception, to be juſt :
Conception unconfin'd wants wings to reach him :
Beyond its reach, the Godhead only, more.
He, the great Father ! kindled at one flame
The world of rationals ; one ſpirit pour'd
From ſpirit's awful fountain : pour'd himſelf
Through all their ſouls ; but not in equal ſtream,
Profuſe, or frugal, of th' aſpiring God,
As his wiſe plan demanded ; and when paſt
Their various trials in their various ſpheres,
If they continue rational, as made,
Reſorbs them all into himſelf again ;
His throne their centre, and his ſmile their crown.
Why doubt we, then, the glorious truth to ſing,
Though yet unſung, as deem'd, perhaps, too bold ?
Angels are men of a ſuperior kind ;
Angels are men in lighter habit clad,
High o'er celeſtial mountains wing'd in flight ;
And men are angels, loaded for an hour,
Who wade this miry vale, and climb with pain,
And ſlippery ſtep, the bottom of the ſteep.
Angels their failings, mortals have their praiſe ;
While Here, of corps ethereal, ſuch enroll'd,
And ſummon'd to the glorious Standard ſoon,
Which flames eternal crimſon through the ſkies.
Nor are our brothers thoughtleſs of their kin,
Yet abſent ; but not abſent from their love.
Michael has fought our battles ; Raphael ſung
Our triumphs ; Gabriel on our errands flown,
Sent by the Sovereign : and are theſe, O man !
Thy friends, thy warm allies ? and thou (ſhame burn
The cheek to cinder !) rival to the brute ?
Religion's All. Deſcending from the ſkies
To wretched man, the goddeſs in her left,
Holds out this world, and, in her right, the next ;
Religion ! the ſole voucher man is man ;
Supporter ſole of man above himſelf ;
Ev'n in this night of frailty, change, and death,
She gives the ſoul a ſoul that acts a god.
Religion ! Providence ! an After-ſtate !
Here is firm footing ; here is ſolid rock !
This can ſupport us ; all is ſea beſides ;
Sinks under us ; beſtorms, and then devours.
His hand the good man faſtens on the ſkies,
And bids earth roll, nor feels her idle whirl.
As when a wretch, from thick, polluted air,
Darkneſs, and ſtench, and ſuffocating damps,
And dungeon horrors, by kind fate, diſcharg'd,
Climbs ſome fair eminence, where ether pure
Surrounds him, and Elyſian proſpects riſe,
His heart exults, his ſpirits caſt their load ;
As if new-born, he triumphs in the change ;
So joys the ſoul, when, from inglorious aims,
And ſordid ſweets, from ſeculence and froth
Of ties terreſtrial, ſet at large, ſhe mounts
To Reaſon's region, her own element,
Breathes hope immortal, and affects the ſkies.
Religion ! thou the ſoul of happineſs ;
And, groaning Calvary, of thee ! There ſhine
The nobleſt truths ; there ſtrongeſt motives ſting ;
There ſacred violence aſſaults the ſoul ;
There, nothing but compulſion is forborn.
Can love allure us ; or can terror awe ?
He weeps !—the falling drop puts out the ſun ;
He ſighs—the ſigh earth's deep foundation ſhakes.
If in his love ſo terrible, what then
His wrath inflam'd ? his tenderneſs on fire ?
Like ſoft, ſmooth oil, outblazing other fires ?
Can prayer, can praiſe, avert it ?—Thou, my All !
My theme ! my inſpiration ! and my crown !
My ſtrength in age ! my riſe in low eſtate !
My ſoul's ambition, pleaſure, wealth !—my world !
My light in darkneſs ! and my life in death !
My boaſt through time ! bliſs through eternity !
Eternity, too ſhort to ſpeak thy praiſe !
Or fathom thy profound of love to man !
To man of men the meaneſt, ev'n to me ;
My ſacrifice ! my God ! what things are theſe !
What then art thou ? by what name ſhall I call thee ?
Knew I the name devout archangels uſe,
Devout archangels ſhould the name enjoy,
By me unrival'd ; thouſands more ſublime,
None half ſo dear as that which though unſpoke,
Still glows at heart : O how omnipotence
Is loſt in love ! Thou great Philanthropiſt
Father of angels ! but the friend of man !
Like Jacob, fondeſt of the younger born !
Thou, who didſt ſave him, ſnatch the ſmoking brand
From out the flames, and quench it in thy blood !
How art thou pleas'd, by bounty to diſtreſs !
To make us groan beneath our gratitude,
Too big for birth ! to favour, and confound ;
To challenge, and to diſtance all return !
Of laviſh love ſtupendous heights to ſoar,
And leave praiſe panting in the diſtant vale !
Thy right, too great, defrauds thee of thy due ;
And ſacrilegious our ſublimeſt ſong.
But ſince the naked will obtains thy ſmile,
Beneath this monument of praiſe unpaid,
And future life ſymphonious to my ſtrain,
(That nobleſt hymn to heaven !) for ever lie
Entomb'd my fear of death ! and every fear,
The dread of every evil, but thy frown.
Whom ſee I yonder, ſo demurely ſmile ?
Laughter a labour, and might break their reſt.
Ye quietiſts, in homage to the ſkies !
Serene ! of ſoft addreſs ! who mildly make
An unobtruſive tender of your hearts,
Abhorring violence ! who halt indeed ;
But, for the bleſſing, wreſtle not with heaven !
Think you my ſong too turbulent ? too warm ?
Are paſſions, then, the pagans of the ſoul !

Reason alone baptiz'd? alone ordain'd
To touch things sacred? Oh for warmer still!
Guilt chills my zeal, and age benumbs my powers;
Oh for an humbler heart! and prouder song!
Thou, my much injur'd theme! with that soft eye
Which melted o'er doom'd Salem, deign to look
Compassion to the coldness of my breast;
And pardon to the winter in my strain.
Oh ye cold-hearted, frozen, formalists!
On such a theme, 'tis impious to be calm;
Passion is reason, transport temper, here.
Shall heaven, which gave us ardour, and has shown
Her own for man so strongly, not disdain
What smooth emollients in theology,
Recumbent virtue's downy doctors, preach;
That prose of piety, a lukewarm praise?
Rise odours sweet from incense uninflam'd?
Devotion, when lukewarm, is undevout;
But when it glows, its heat is struck to heaven;
To human hearts her golden harps are strung:
High heaven's orchestra chaunts amen to man.
Hear I, or dream I hear, their distant strain,
Sweet to the soul, and tasting strong of heaven,
Soft-wafted on celestial pity's plume,
Through the vast spaces of the universe,
To cheer me in this melancholy gloom?
Oh when will death (now stingless) like a friend,
Admit me of their choir? O when will death
This mouldering, old, partition-wall throw down?
Give beings, one in nature, one abode?
Oh death divine! that giv'st us to the skies!
Great future! glorious patron of the past,
And present! when shall I thy shrine adore?
From nature's continent, immensely wide,
Immensely blest, this little isle of life,
This dark, incarcerated colony,
Divides us. Happy day! that breaks our chain;
That manumits; that calls from exile home;
That leads to nature's great metropolis,
And re-admits us, through the guardian band
Of elder brothers, to our Father's throne;
Who hears our Advocate, and, through his wounds
Beholding man, allows that tender name.
'Tis this makes Christian triumph a command:
'Tis this makes joy a duty to the wise;
'Tis impious in a good man to be sad.
See thou, Lorenzo! where hangs all our hope?
Touch'd by the Cross, we live; or, more than die;
That touch which touch'd not angels; more divine
Than that which touch'd confusion into form,
And darkness into glory; partial touch!
Ineffably pre-eminent regard!
Sacred to man, and sovereign through the whole
Long golden chain of miracles, which hangs
From heaven through all duration, and supports
In one illustrious and amazing plan,
Thy welfare, nature? and thy God's renown.
That touch, with charm celestial, heals the soul
Diseas'd, drives pain from guilt, lights life in death,
Turns earth to heaven, to heavenly thrones transforms
The ghastly ruins of the mouldering tomb.
Dost ask me when? When he who dy'd returns;
Returns, how chang'd! Where then the man of woe?
In glory's terrors all the Godhead burns;
And all his courts, exhausted by the tide
Of deities triumphant in his train,
Leave a stupendous solitude in heaven;
Replenish'd soon, replenish'd with increase
Of pomp, and multitude; a radiant band
Of angels new; of angels from the tomb.
Is this my fancy thrown remote; and rise
Dark doubts between the promise and event?
I send thee not to volumes for thy cure;
Read nature! nature is a friend to truth;
Nature is Christian; preaches to mankind;
And bids dead matter aid us in our creed.
Hast thou ne'er seen the comet's flaming flight?
Th' illustrious stranger passing, terror sheds
On gazing nations; from his fiery train
Of length enormous, takes his ample round
Through depths of ether; coasts unnumber'd worlds,
Of more than solar glory; doubles wide
Heaven's mighty cape; and then revisits earth,
From the long travel of a thousand years.
Thus, at the destin'd period, shall return
He, once on earth, who bids the comet blaze:
And, with him, all our triumph o'er the tomb.
Nature is dumb on this important point;
Or hope precarious in low whisper breathes;
Faith speaks aloud, distinct; ev'n adders hear;
But turn, and dart into the dark again.
Faith builds a bridge across the gulf of death,
To break the shock blind nature cannot shun,
And lands thought smoothly on the farther shore.
Death's terror is the mountain faith removes;
That mountain barrier between man and peace.
'Tis faith disarms destruction; and absolves
From every clamorous charge, the guiltless tomb.
Why disbelieve? Lorenzo!—"Reason bids,
"All-sacred reason."—Hold her sacred still;
Nor shalt thou want a rival in thy flame:
All-sacred reason? source, and soul, of all
Demanding praise, on earth, or earth above!
My heart is thine: deep in its inmost folds,
Live thou with life; life dearer of the two.
Wear I the blessed Cross, by fortune stamp'd
On passive nature, before thought was born?
My birth's blind bigot! fir'd with local zeal!
No; reason re-baptiz'd me when adult;
Weigh'd true, and false, in her impartial scale;
My heart became the convert of my head,
And made that choice, which once was but my fate.
"On argument alone my faith is built:"
Reason pursu'd is faith; and, unpursued
Where proof invites, 'tis reason, then, no more:
And such our proof, that, or our faith is right,
Or reason lies, and heaven design'd it wrong:
Absolve we this? What, then, is blasphemy?
Fond as we are, and justly fond, of faith,
Reason, we grant, demands our first regard;
The mother honour'd, as the daughter dear.
Reason the root, fair faith is but the flower;
The fading flower shall die; but reason lives
Immortal, as her Father in the skies.
When faith is virtue, reason makes it so.
Wrong not the Christian; think not reason yours:
'Tis reason our great Master holds so dear;
'Tis reason's injur'd rights his wrath resents;

Tis reason's voice obey'd his glories crown;
To give loft reason life, he pour'd his own:
Believe, and fhow the reafon of a man;
Believe, and taſte the pleaſure of a God;
Believe, and look with triumph on the tomb:
Through reaſon's wounds alone thy faith can die;
Which dying, tenfold terror gives to death,
And dips in venom his twice-mortal ſting. [due
Learn hence what honours, what loud pæans,
To thoſe, who puſh our antidote aſide;
Thoſe boaſted friends to reaſon, and to man,
Whoſe fatal love ſtabs every joy, and leaves
Death's terror heighten'd, gnawing on his heart.
Theſe pompous ſons of reaſon idoliz'd
And vilified at once; of reaſon dead,
Then deify'd, as monarchs were of old;
What conduct plants proud laurels on their brow?
While love of truth through all their camp reſounds,
They draw pride's curtain o'er the noon-tide ray,
Spike up their inch of reaſon, on the point
Of philoſophic wit, call'd Argument;
And, then, exulting in their taper, cry,
" Behold the ſun:" and, Indian-like, adore.
Talk they of morals? O thou bleeding Love!
Thou maker of new morals to mankind!
The grand morality is love of thee.
As wiſe as Socrates, if ſuch they were,
(Nor will they 'bate of that ſublime renown)
As wiſe as Socrates, might juſtly ſtand
The definition of a modern fool.
A Chriſtian is the higheſt ſtyle of man:
And is there, who the bleſſed Croſs wipes off,
As a foul blot from his diſhonour'd brow?
If angels tremble, 'tis at ſuch a ſight:
The wretch they quit, deſponding of their charge,
More ſtruck with grief or wonder, who can tell?
Ye ſold to ſenſe! ye citizens of earth!
(For ſuch alone the Chriſtian banner fly)
Know ye how wiſe your choice, how great your gain?
Behold the picture of earth's happieſt man:
" He calls his wiſh, it comes; he ſends it back,
" And ſays, he call'd another; that arrives,
" Meets the ſame welcome; yet he ſtill calls on;
" Till one calls him, who varies not his call,
" But holds him faſt, in chains of darkneſs bound,
" Till nature dies, and judgment ſets him free;
" A freedom far leſs welcome than his chain."
But grant man happy; grant him happy long;
Add to life's higheſt prize her lateſt hour;
That hour, ſo late, is nimble in approach,
That, like a poſt, comes on in full career:
How ſwift the ſhuttle flies, that weaves thy ſhroud!
Where is the fable of thy former years!
Thrown down the gulf of time; as far from thee
As they had ne'er been thine; the day in hand,
Like a bird ſtruggling to get looſe, is going;
Scarce now poſſeſs'd, ſo ſuddenly 'tis gone;
And each ſwift moment fled, is death advanc'd
By ſtrides as ſwift: eternity is all;
And whoſe eternity? Who triumphs there?
Bathing for ever in the font of bliſs!
For ever baſking in the Deity!
Lorenzo! who?—Thy conſcience ſhall reply.

O give it leave to ſpeak; 'twill ſpeak ere long,
Thy leave unaſk'd: Lorenzo! hear it now,
While uſeful its advice, its accent mild,
By the great edict, the divine decree,
Truth is depoſed with man's laſt hour;
An honeſt hour, and faithful to her truſt:
Truth, eldeſt daughter of the Deity;
Truth, of his counſel when he made the worlds;
Nor leſs, when he ſhall judge the worlds he made;
Though ſilent long, and ſleeping ne'er ſo ſound,
Smother'd with errors, and oppreſs'd with toys,
That heaven-commiſſion'd hour, no ſooner calls,
But, from her cavern in the ſoul's abyſs,
Like him they fable under Ætna whelm'd,
The goddeſs, burſts in thunder, and in flame;
Loudly convinces, and ſeverely pains.
Dark dæmons I diſcharge, and Hydra ſtings;
The keen vibration of bright truth—is hell:
Juſt definition! though by ſchools untaught.
Ye deaf to truth! peruſe this parſon'd page,
And truſt, for once, a prophet, and a prieſt;
" Men may live fools, but fools they cannot die."

NIGHT V.

THE RELAPSE.

TO THE RIGHT HON. THE EARL OF LITCHFIELD.

Lorenzo! to recriminate is juſt.
Fondneſs for fame is avarice of air.
I grant the man is vain who writes for praiſe.
Praiſe no man e'er deſerv'd, who fought no more.
As juſt thy ſecond charge. I grant the muſe
Has often bluſh'd at her degenerate ſons,
Retain'd by ſenſe to plead her filthy cauſe;
To raiſe the low, to magnify the mean,
And ſubtilize the groſs into refin'd:
As if to magic numbers' powerful charm
'Twas given to make a civet of their ſong
Obſcene, and ſweeten ordure to perfume.
Wit, a true pagan, deifies the brute,
And lifts our ſwine-enjoyments from the mire.
The fact notorious, nor obſcure the cauſe.
We wear the chains of pleaſure, and of pride.
Theſe ſhare the man; and theſe diſtract him too;
Draw different ways, and claſh in their commands.
Pride, like an eagle, builds among the ſtars;
But pleaſure, lark-like, neſts upon the ground.
Joys ſhar'd by brute-creation, pride reſents;
Pleaſure embraces: man would both enjoy,
And both at once: a point how hard to gain!
But, what can't wit, when ſtung by ſtrong deſire?
Wit dares attempt this arduous enterprize.
Since joys of ſenſe can't riſe to reaſon's taſte;
In ſubtle ſophiſtry's laborious forge,
Wit hammers out a reaſon new, that ſtoops
To ſordid ſcenes, and meets them with applauſe.
Wit calls the graces the chaſte zone to looſe;
Nor leſs than a plump god to fill the bowl:
A thouſand phantoms, and a thouſand ſpells,
A thouſand opiates ſcatters, to delude
To faſcinate, inebriate, lay aſleep,
And the fool'd mind delightfully confound.
Thus that which ſhock'd the judgment, ſhocks no more;

That which gave pride offence, no more offends
Pleasure and pride, by nature mortal foes,
At war eternal, which in man shall reign,
By wit's address, patch up a fatal peace,
And hand in hand lead on the rank debauch,
From rank, refin'd to delicate and gay.
Art, curs'd art! wipes off th' indebted blush
From nature's cheek, and bronzes every shame.
Man smiles in ruin, glories in his guilt,
And infamy stands candidate for praise.
All writ by man in favour of the soul,
These sensual ethics far, in bulk, transcend.
The flowers of eloquence, profusely pour'd
O'er spotted vice, fill half the letter'd world.
Can powers of genius exercise their page,
And consecrate enormities with song?
But let not these inexpiable strains
Condemn the muse that knows her dignity;
Nor meanly stops at time, but holds the world
As 'tis, in nature's ample field, a point,
A point in her esteem; from whence to start,
And run the round of universal space,
To visit being universal there,
And being's source, that utmost flight of mind!
Yet, spite of this so vast circumference,
Well knows, but what is moral, nought is great.
Sing syrens only? Do not angels sing?
There is in poesy a decent pride,
Which well becomes her when she speaks to prose,
Her younger sister; haply, not more wise.
Think'st thou, Lorenzo! to find pastimes here?
No guilty passion blown into a flame,
No foible flatter'd, dignity disgrac'd,
No fairy field of fiction, all on flower,
No rainbow colours, here, or silken tale:
But solemn counsels, images of awe,
Truths, which eternity lets fall on man
With double weight, through these revolving spheres,
This death-deep silence, and incumbent shade:
Thoughts, such as shall revisit your last hour;
Visit uncall'd, and live when life expires;
And thy dark pencil, midnight! darker still
In melancholy dip'd, embrowns the whole.
Yet this, even this, my laughter-loving friends!
Lorenzo! and thy brothers of the smile!
If, what imports you most, can most engage,
Shall steal your ear, and chain you to my song.
Or if you fail me, know, the wise shall taste
The truths I sing; the truths I sing shall feel;
And, feeling, give assent; and their assent
Is ample recompense; is more than praise.
But chiefly thine, O Litchfield! nor mistake;
Think not unintroduc'd I force my way;
Narcissa, not unknown, not unally'd,
By virtue, or by blood, illustrious youth!
To thee, from blooming amaranthine bowers,
Where all the language harmony, descends
Uncall'd, and asks admittance for the muse:
A muse that will not pain thee with thy praise;
Thy praise she drops, by nobler still inspir'd.
O thou! bless Spirit! whether the supreme,
Great antemundane Father! in whose breast
Embryo creation, unborn being, dwelt,
And all its various revolutions roll'd
Present, though future; prior to themselves;
Whose breath can blow it into nought again;
Or, from his throne some delegated power,
Who, studious of our peace, dost turn the thought
From vain and vile, to solid and sublime!
Unseen thou lead'st me to delicious draughts
Of inspiration, from a purer stream,
And fuller of the god, than that which burst
From fam'd Castalia: nor is yet allay'd
My sacred thirst; though long my soul has rang'd
Through pleasing paths of moral, and divine,
By thee sustain'd, and lighted by the stars.
By them best lighted are the paths of thought;
Nights are their days, their most illumin'd hours.
By day, the soul, o'erborne by life's career,
Stunn'd by the din, and giddy with the glare,
Reels far from reason, jostled by the throng.
By day the soul is passive, all her thoughts
Impos'd, precarious, broken ere mature.
By night, from objects free, from passion cool,
Thoughts uncontroul'd, and unimpress'd, the births
Of pure election, arbitrary range,
Not to the limits of one world confin'd;
But from ethereal travels, light on earth,
As voyagers drop anchor, for repose.
Let Indians, and the gay, like Indians, fond
Of feather'd fopperies, the sun adore:
Darkness has more divinity for me;
It strikes thought inward; it drives back the soul
To settle on herself, our point supreme!
There lies our theatre! there sits our judge.
Darkness the curtain drops o'er life's dull scene;
'Tis the kind hand of providence stretch'd out
'Twixt man and vanity; 'tis reason's reign,
And virtue's too; these tutelary shades
Are man's asylum from the tainted throng.
Night is the good man's friend, and guardian too;
It no less rescues virtue, than inspires.
Virtue, for ever frail, as fair, below,
Her tender nature suffers in the crowd,
Nor touches on the world, without a stain:
The world's infectious; few bring back at eve,
Immaculate, the manners of the morn.
Something we thought, is blotted; we resolv'd,
Is shaken; we renounc'd, returns again.
Each salutation may slide in a sin
Unthought before, or fix a former flaw.
Nor is it strange: light, motion, concourse, noise,
All, scatter us abroad; thought outward-bound,
Neglectful of our home affairs, flies off
In fume and dissipation, quits her charge,
And leaves the breast unguarded to the foe.
Present example gets within our guard,
And acts with double force, by few repell'd.
Ambition fires ambition; love of gain
Strikes like a pestilence, from breast to breast;
Riot, pride, perfidy, blue vapours breathe;
And inhumanity is caught from man,
From smiling man. A slight, a single glance,
And shot at random, often has brought home
A sudden fever to the throbbing heart,
Of envy, rancour, or impure desire.
We see, we hear, with peril; safety dwells
Remote from multitude; the world's a school
Of wrong, and what proficients swarm around!

We must, or imitate, or disapprove;
Must list as their accomplices, or foes;
That stains our innocence; this wounds our peace.
From nature's birth, hence, wisdom has been smit
With sweet recess, and languish'd for the shade.
This sacred shade, and solitude, what is it?
'Tis the felt presence of the Deity.
Few are the faults we flatter when alone,
Vice sinks in her allurements, is ungilt,
And looks, like other objects, black by night.
By night an Atheist half-believes a God.
Night is fair virtue's immemorial friend;
The conscious moon, through every distant age,
Has held a lamp to wisdom, and let fall,
On contemplation's eye, her purging ray.
The fam'd Athenian, he who woo'd from heaven
Philosophy the fair, to dwell with men,
And form their manners, not inflame their pride,
While o'er his head, as fearful to molest
His labouring mind, the stars in silence slide,
And seem all gazing on their future guest,
See him soliciting his ardent suit
In private audience: all the live-long night,
Rigid in thought, and motionless, he stands;
Nor quits his theme, or posture, till the sun
(Rude drunkard rising rosy from the main!)
Disturbs his nobler intellectual beam,
And gives him to the tumult of the world.
Hail, precious moments! stol'n from the black waste
Of murder'd time! Auspicious midnight! hail!
The world excluded, every passion hush,
And open'd a calm intercourse with heaven,
Here the soul sits in council; ponders past,
Predestines future action; sees, not feels,
Tumultuous life, and reasons with the storm;
All her lies answers, and thinks down her charms.
What awful joy! what mental liberty!
I am not pent in darkness; rather say,
(If not too bold) in darkness I'm embower'd.
Delightful gloom! the clustering thoughts around
Spontaneous rise, and blossom in the shade;
But droop by day, and sicken in the sun.
Thought borrows light elsewhere; from that first fire,
Fountain of animation! whence descends
Urania, my celestial guest! who deigns
Nightly to visit me, so mean; and now,
Conscious how needful discipline to man,
From pleasing dalliance with the charms of night
My wandering thought recalls, to what excites
Far other beat of heart! Narcissa's tomb!
Or is it feeble nature calls me back,
And breaks my spirit into grief again?
Is it a Stygian vapour in my blood!
A cold, slow puddle, creeping through my veins?
Or is it thus with all men?—Thus with all.
What are we? How unequal! Now we soar,
And now we sink: to be the fame, transcends
Our present prowess. Dearly pays the soul
For lodging ill; too dearly rents her clay.
Reason, a baffled counsellor! but adds
The blush of weakness to the bane of woe.
The noblest spirit, fighting her hard fate,
In this damp, dusty region, charg'd with storms,
But feebly flutters, yet untaught to fly;
Or, flying short her flight, and sure her fall.
Our utmost strength, when down, to rise again;
And not to yield, though beaten, all our praise.
'Tis vain to seek in men for more than man.
Though proud in promise, big in previous thought,
Experience damps our triumph. I who late,
Emerging from the shadows of the grave,
Where grief detain'd me prisoner, mounting high,
Threw wide the gates of everlasting day,
And call'd mankind to glory, shook off pain,
Mortality shook off, in ether pure,
And struck the stars; now feel my spirits fail;
They drop me from the zenith; down I rush,
Like him whom fable fledg'd with waxen wings,
In sorrow drown'd, but not in sorrow lost.
How wretched is the man who never mourn'd!
I dive for precious pearl in sorrow's stream;
Not so the thoughtless man that only grieves;
Takes all the torment, and rejects the gain,
(Ineffimable gain.) and gives heaven leave
To make him but more wretched, not more wise.
If wisdom is our lesson, (and what else
Ennobles man? what else have angels learnt?)
Grief! more proficients in thy school are made
Than genius or proud learning e'er could boast.
Voracious learning, often over-fed,
Digests not into sense her motley meal.
This book-case, with dark booty almost burst,
This forager on others wisdom, leaves
Her native farm, her reason, quite untill'd.
With mix'd manure she surfeits the rank soil,
Dung'd, but not dress'd, and rich to beggary.
A pomp untameable of weeds prevails.
Her servant's wealth encumber'd wisdom mourns.
And what says genius? "Let the dull be wise."
Genius, too hard for right, can prove it wrong;
And loves to boast where blush men less inspir'd.
It pleads exemption from the laws of sense;
Considers reason as a leveller;
And scorns to share a blessing with the crowd.
That wise it could be, thinks an ample claim
To glory, and to pleasure gives the rest.
Crassus but sleeps, Ardelio is undone.
Wisdom less shudders at a fool than wit.
But wisdom smiles when humbled mortals weep.
When sorrow wounds the breast, as ploughs the glebe,
And hearts obdurate feel her softening shower,
Her seed celestial then glad wisdom sows;
Her golden harvest triumphs in the soil.
If so, Narcissa, welcome my relapse;
I'll raise a tax on my calamity,
And reap rich compensation from my pain.
I'll range the plenteous intellectual field,
And gather every thought of sovereign power
To chase the moral maladies of man;
Thoughts which may bear transplanting to the skies,
Though natives of this coarse penurious soil:
Nor wholly wither there, where seraphs sing,
Refin'd, exalted, not annull'd, in heaven.
Reason, the sun that gives them birth, the same
In either clime, though more illustrious there.
These choicely cull'd, and elegantly rang'd,
Shall form a garland for Narcissa's tomb;

And, peradventure, of no fading flowers. [fcend?
Say on what themes fhall puzzled choice de-
" Th' importance of contemplating the tomb;
" Why men decline it; fuicide's foul birth;
" The various kind of grief; the faults of age;
" And death's dread character—invite my fong."
And firft th' importance of our end furvey'd.
Friends counfel quick difmiffion of our grief:
Miftaken kindnefs! our hearts heal too foon.
Are they more kind than he who ftruck the blow?
Who bid it do his errand in our hearts,
And baniih peace, till nobler gueits arrive,
And bring it back, a true and endlefs peace?
Calamities are friends: as glaring day
Of thefe unnumber'd luftres rob our fight,
Profperity puts out unnumber'd thoughts
Of import high, and light divine, to man.
The man how bleft, who, fick of gaudy fcenes,
(Scenes apt to thruft between us and ourfelves!)
Is led by choice to take his favourite walk
Beneath death's gloomy, filent, cypreis fhades,
Unpierc'd by vanity's fantaftic ray,
To read his monuments, to weigh his duft,
Vifit his vaults, and dwell among the tombs!
Lorenzo! read with me Narciffa's ftone;
(Narciffa was thy favourite) let us read
Her moral ftone! few doctors preach fo well;
Few orators fo tenderly can touch
The feeling heart. What pathos in the date!
Apt words can ftrike; and yet in them we fee
Faint images of what we here enjoy.
What caufe have we to build on length of life?
Temptations feize when fear is laid afleep;
And ill foreboded is our ftrongeft guard.
See from her tomb, as from an humbler fhrine,
Truth, radiant goddefs! fallies on my foul,
And puts delufion's dufky train to flight;
Difpels the mifts our fultry paffions raife
From objects low, terreftrial, and obfcene;
And fhows the real eftimate of things;
Which no man, unafflicted, ever faw;
Pulls off the veil from virtue's rifing charms;
Detects temptation in a thoufand lies.
Truth bids me look on men as autumn leaves,
And all they bleed for as the fummer's duft,
Driven by the whirlwind: lighted by her beams,
I widen my horizon, gain new powers,
See things inviiible, feel things remote,
Am preient with futurities; think nought
To man fo foreign as the joys poffeft'd,
Nought fo much his as thofe beyond the grave.
No folly keeps its colour in her light;
Pale world'y wifdom lofes all her charms;
In pompous promiie, from her fchemes profound,
If future fate fhe plans, 'tis all in leaves,
Like Sibyl, unfubftantial, fleeting blifs!
At the firft blaft it vaniihes in air.
Not fo celeftial: wouldft thou know, Lorenzo,
How differ worldly wifdom and divine?
Juft as the waning and the waxing moon.
More empty worldly wifdom every day;
And every day more fair her rival fhines.
When later, there's lefs time to play the fool.
Soon our old term for wifdom is expir'd,
(Thou know'ft fhe calls no council in the grave:)
And everlafting fool is writ in fire,
Or real wifdom wafts us to the fkies.
As worldly fchemes refembles Sibyl's leaves,
The good man's days to Sibyl's books compare,
(In ancient ftory read, thou know'ft the tale,)
In price ftill rifing, as in number lefs,
Ineftimable quite his final hour.
For that who thrones can offer, offer thrones;
Infolvent worlds the purchafe cannot pay.
" Oh! let me die his death!" all nature cries:
" Then live his life."—All nature faulters there;
Our great phyfician daily to confult,
To commune with the grave, our only cure.
What grave prefcribes the beft?—A friend's;
and yet
From a friend's grave how foon we difengage!
Even to the deareft, as his marble, cold.
Why are friends raviih'd from us? 'Tis to bind,
By loft affection's ties, on human hearts,
The thought of death, which reafon, too fupine,
Or mifemploy'd, fo rarely faftens there.
Nor reafon, nor affection, no, nor both
Combin'd, can break the witchcrafts of the world.
Behold th' inexorable hour at hand!
Behold th' inexorable hour forgot!
And to forget it the chief aim of life,
Though well to ponder it is life's chief end.
Is death, that ever-threatening, ne'er remote,
That all-important, and that only fure,
(Come when he will) an unexpected gueft?
Nay, though invited by the loudeft calls
Of blind imprudence, unexpected ftill?
Though numerous meffengers are fent before
To warn his great arrival. What the cauie,
The wondrous cauie, of this myfterious ill?
All heaven looks down aftoniih'd at the fight.
Is it that life has fown her joys fo thick,
We can't thruft in a fingle care between?
Is it that life has fuch a fwarm of cares,
The thought of death can't enter for the throng?
Is it that time fteals on with downy feet,
Nor wakes indulgence from her golden dream?
To-day is fo like yefterday, it cheats;
We take the lying fifter for the fame.
Life glides away, Lorenzo, like a brook;
For ever changing, unperceiv'd the change.
In the fame brook none ever bath'd him twice;
To the fame life none ever twice awoke.
We call the brook the fame; the fame we think
Our life, though ftill more rapid in its flow;
Nor mark the much, irrevocably laps'd,
And mingled with the fea. Or fhall we fay
(Retaining ftill the brook to bear us on)
That life is like a veffel on the ftream?
In life embark'd, we fmoothly down the tide
Of time defcend, but not on time intent;
Amus'd, unconfcious of the gliding wave,
Till on a fudden we perceive a fhock;
We ftart, awake, look out; what fee we there?
Our brittle bark is burft on Charon's fhore.
Is this the cauie death flies all human thought?
Or is it judgment, by the will ftruck blind,
That domineering miftrefs of the foul!
Like him fo ftrong, by Dalilah the fair?
Or is it fear turns ftartled reafon back

From looking down a precipice so steep?
'Tis dreadful; and the dread is wisely plac'd
By nature, conscious of the make of man.
A dreadful friend it is, a terror kind,
A flaming sword to guard the tree of life.
By that unaw'd in life's most smiling hour,
The good man would repine, would suffer joys,
And burn impatient for his promis'd skies.
The bad, on each punctilious pique of pride,
Or gloom of humour, would give rage the rein;
Bound o'er the barrier, rush into the dark,
And mar the schemes of Providence below.
What groan was that, Lorenzo?—Furies! rise,
And drown in your less execrable yell
Britannia's shame. There took her gloomy flight,
On wing impetuous, a black sullen soul,
Blasted from hell, with horrid lust of death.
Thy friend, the brave, the gallant Altamont,
So call'd, so thought—And then he fled the field.
Less base the fear of death than fear of life.
O Britain, infamous for suicide!
An island in thy manners, far disjoin'd
From the whole world of rationals beside!
In ambient waves plunge thy polluted head,
Wash the dire stain, nor shock the continent.
But thou be shock'd, while I detect the cause
Of self-assault, expose the monster's birth,
And bid abhorrence hiss it round the world.
Blame not thy clime, nor chide the distant sun;
The sun is innocent, thy clime absolv'd:
Immoral climes kind nature never made.
The cause I sing in Eden might prevail,
And proves it is thy folly, not thy fate.
The soul of man, (let man in homage bow,
Who names his soul) a native of the skies!
High-born, and free, her freedom should maintain,
Unfold, unmortgag'd for earth's little bribes.
Th' illustrious stranger, in this foreign land,
Like strangers, jealous of her dignity,
Studious of home, and ardent to return,
Of earth suspicious, earth's enchanted cup
With cool reserve light touching, should indulge
On immortality her godlike taste, [there.
There take large draughts, make her chief banquet
But some reject this sustenance divine;
To beggarly vile appetites descend;
Ask alms of earth for guests that came from heaven;
Sink into slaves; and sell, for present hire,
Their rich reversion, and (what shares its fate)
Their native freedom, to the prince who sways
This nether world. And when his payments fail,
When his foul basket gorges them no more,
Or their pall'd palates loath the basket full,
Are instantly, with wild demoniac rage,
For breaking all the chains of Providence,
And bursting their confinement, though fast barr'd
By laws divine and human, guarded strong
With horrors doubled to defend the pass,
The blackest nature or dire guilt can raise,
And moted round with fathomless destruction,
Sure to receive, and whelm them in their fall.
Such, Britons! is the cause, to you unknown,
Or worse o'erlook'd; o'erlook'd by magistrates,
Thus criminals themselves. I grant the deed
Is madness, but the madness of the heart.
And what is that? Our utmost bound of guilt.
A sensual, unreflecting life, is big
With monstrous births, and suicide, to crown
The black infernal brood. The bold to break
Heaven's law supreme, and desperately rush
Through sacred nature's murder on their own,
Because they never think of death, they die.
'Tis equally man's duty, glory, gain,
At once to shun, and meditate his end.
When by the bed of languishment we sit,
(The seat of wisdom! if our choice, not fate)
Or o'er our dying friends in anguish hang,
Wipe the cold dew, or stay the sinking head,
Number their moments, and in every clock
Start at the voice of an eternity;
See the dim lamp of life just feebly lift
An agonizing beam, at us to gaze,
Then sink again, and quiver into death,
That most pathetic herald of our own:
How read we such sad scenes? As sent to man
In perfect vengeance? No; in pity sent,
To melt him down like wax, and then impress,
Idelible, death's image on his heart;
Bleeding for others, trembling for himself.
We bleed, we tremble, we forget, we smile.
The mind turns fool before the cheek is dry.
Our quick-returning folly cancels all,
As the tide rushing rases what is writ
In yielding sands, and smooths the letter'd shore.
Lorenzo! hast thou ever weigh'd a sigh?
Or study'd the philosophy of tears?
(A science yet unlectur'd in our schools!)
Hast thou descended deep into the breast,
And seen their source? If not, descend with me,
And trace these briny rivulets to their springs.
Our funeral tears from different causes rise,
As if from separate cisterns in the soul,
Of various kinds, they flow. From tender hearts,
By soft contagion call'd, some burst at once,
And stream obsequious to the leading eye.
Some ask more time, by curious art distill'd.
Some hearts, in secret heard, unapt to melt,
Struck by the magic of the public eye,
Like Moses' smitten rock, gush out amain.
Some weep to share the fate of the deceas'd,
So high in merit, and to them so dear.
They dwell on praises, which they think they share;
And thus, without a blush, commend themselves.
Some mourn, in proof, that something they could love:
They weep not to relieve their grief, but show.
Some weep in perfect justice to the dead,
As conscious all their love is in arrear.
Some mischievously weep, not unappriz'd,
Tears, sometimes, aid the conquest of an eye.
With what address the soft Ephesians draw
Their fable net-work o'er entangled hearts!
As seen through crystal, how their roses glow,
While liquid pearl runs trickling down their cheek!
Of her's not prouder Egypt's wanton queen,
Carousing gems, herself dissolv'd in love.
Some weep at death, abstracted from the dead,
And celebrate, like Charles, their own decease.
By kind construction some are deem'd to weep,
Because a decent veil conceals their joy.

Some weep in earneſt, and yet weep in vain;
As deep in indiſcretion, as in woe.
Paſſion, blind paſſion! impotently pours
Tears, that deſerve more tears; while reaſon ſleeps;
Or gazes like an idiot, unconcern'd;
Nor comprehends the meaning of the ſtorm;
Knows not it ſpeaks to her, and her alone.
Irrationals all ſorrow are beneath,
That noble gift! that privilege of man!
From ſorrow's pang, the birth of endleſs joy.
But theſe are barren of that birth divine:
They weep impetuous, as the ſummer ſtorm,
And full as ſhort! The cruel grief ſoon tam'd,
They make a paſtime of the ſtingleſs tale;
Far as the deep reſounding knell, they ſpread
The dreadful news, and hardly feel it more.
No grain of wiſdom pays them for their woe.
Half-round the globe, the tears pump'd up by death
Are ſpent in watering vanities of life;
In making folly flouriſh ſtill more fair,
When the ſick ſoul, her wonted ſtay withdrawn,
Reclines on earth, and ſorrows in the duſt;
Inſtead of learning, there, her true ſupport,
Though there thrown down her true ſupport to learn.
Without heaven's aid, impatient to be bleſt,
She crawls to the next ſhrub, or bramble vile,
Though from the ſtately cedar's arms ſhe fell;
With ſtale, forſworn embraces, clings anew,
The ſtranger weds, and bloſſoms, as before,
In all the fruitleſs fopperies of life:
Preſents her weed, well fancy'd, at the ball,
And raffles for the death's head on the ring.
So wept Aurelia, till the deſtin'd youth
Stept in, with his receipt for making ſmiles,
And blanching ſables into bridal bloom.
So wept Lorenzo fair Clariſſa's fate;
Who gave that angel boy, on whom he doats;
And dy'd to give him, orphan'd in his birth!
Not ſuch, Narciſſa, my diſtreſs for thee.
I'll make an altar of thy ſacred tomb,
To ſacrifice to wiſdom. What waſt thou?
"Young, gay, and fortunate!" Each yields a theme.
I'll dwell on each, to ſhun thought more ſevere;
(Heaven knows I labour with ſeverer ſtill!)
I'll dwell on each, and quite exhauſt thy death.
A ſoul without reflection, like a pile
Without inhabitant, to ruin runs.
And, firſt, thy youth. What ſays it to gray hairs!
Narciſſa, I'm become thy pupil now—
Early, bright, tranſient, chaſte, as morning dew,
She ſparkled, was exhal'd, and went to heaven.
Time on this head has ſnow'd; yet ſtill 'tis borne
Aloft; nor thinks but on another's grave.
Cover'd with ſhame I ſpeak it, age ſevere
Old worn-out vice ſets down for virtue fair;
With graceleſs gravity, chaſtiſing youth,
That youth chaſtis'd ſurpaſſing in a fault,
Father of all, forgetfulneſs of death:
As if, like objects preſſing on the ſight,
Death had advanc'd too near us to be ſeen:
Or, that life's loan time ripen'd into right;
And men might plead preſcription from the grave;
Deathleſs, from repetition of reprieve.
Deathleſs? far from it! ſuch are dead already;
Their hearts are bury'd, and the world their grave.
Tell me, ſome god! my guardian angel! tell,
What thus infatuates? what enchantment plants
The phantom of an age 'twixt us and death
Already at the door? He knocks, we hear,
And yet we will not hear. What mail defends
Our untouch'd hearts? What miracle turns off
The pointed thought, which from a thouſand quivers
Is daily darted, and is daily ſhunn'd?
We ſtand, as in a battle, throngs on throngs
Around us falling; wounded oft ourſelves;
Though bleeding with our wounds, immortal ſtill:
We ſee time's furrows on another's brow,
And death entrench'd, preparing his aſſault;
How few themſelves in that juſt mirror ſee!
Or, ſeeing, draw their inference as ſtrong!
There death is certain; doubtful here: he muſt,
And ſoon; we may, within an age, expire.
Though gray our heads, our thoughts and aims are green;
Like damag'd clocks, whoſe hand and bell diſſent;
Folly ſings ſix, while nature points at twelve.
Abſurd longevity! More, more, it cries:
More life, more wealth, more traſh of every kind.
And wherefore mad for more, when reliſh fails?
Object, and appetite, muſt club for joy;
Shall folly labour hard to mend the bow,
Baubles, I mean, that ſtrike us from without,
While nature is relaxing every ſtring?
Aſk thought for joy; grow rich, and hoard within.
Think you the ſoul, when this life's rattles ceaſe,
Has nothing of more manly to ſucceed?
Contract the taſte immortal; learn ev'n now
To reliſh what alone ſubſiſts hereafter.
Divine, or none, henceforth your joys for ever.
Of age the glory is, to wiſh to die.
That wiſh is praiſe, and promiſe; it applauds
Paſt life, and promiſes our future bliſs.
What weakneſs ſee not children in their ſires?
Grand-climacterical abſurdities!
Gray-hair'd authority, to faults of youth,
How ſhocking: it makes folly thrice a fool;
And our firſt childhood might our laſt deſpiſe.
Peace and eſteem is all that age can hope.
Nothing but wiſdom gives the firſt; the laſt,
Nothing, but the repute of being wiſe.
Folly bars both; our age is quite undone.
What folly can be ranker? Like our ſhadows,
Our wiſhes lengthen, as our ſun declines.
No wiſh ſhould loiter, then, this ſide the grave.
Our hearts ſhould leave the world, before the knell
Calls for our carcaſes to mend the ſoil.
Enough to live in tempeſt, die in port;
Age ſhould fly concourſe, cover in retreat
Defects of judgment; and the will ſubdue;
Walk thoughtful on the ſilent, ſolemn ſhore
Of that vaſt ocean it muſt ſail ſo ſoon;
And put good-works on board; and wait the wind
That ſhortly blows us into worlds unknown;
If unconſider'd too, a dreadful ſcene!
All ſhould be prophets to themſelves; foreſee
Their future fate; their future fate foretaſte;
This art would waſte the bitterneſs of death

The thought of death alone, the fear deſtroys.
A diſaffection to that precious thought
Is more than midnight darkneſs on the ſoul,
Which ſleeps beneath it, on a precipice,
Puff'd off by the firſt blaſt, and loſt for ever.
Doſt aſk, Lorenzo, why ſo warmly preſt,
By repetition hammer'd on thine ear, [chine,
The thought of death? That thought is the ma-
The grand machine! that heaves us from the duſt,
And rears us into men. That thought, ply'd home,
Will ſoon reduce the ghaſtly precipice
O'er-hanging hell, will ſoften the deſcent,
And gently ſlope our paſſage to the grave;
How warmly to be wiſh'd! What heart of fleſh
Would trifle with tremendous? dare extremes?
Yawn o'er the fate of infinite? What hand,
Beyond the blackeſt brand of cenſure bold,
(So ſpeak a language too well known to thee)
Would ar a moment give its all to chance,
And ſtamp the die for an eternity?
Aid me, Narciſſa! aid me to keep pace
With deſtiny; and ere her ſciſſars cut
My thread of life, to break this tougher thread
Of moral death, that ties me to the world.
Sting thou my ſlumbering reaſon to ſend forth
A thought of obſervation on the foe;
To ſally; and ſurvey the rapid march
Of his ten thouſand meſſengers to man;
Who, Jehu-like, behind him turns them all.
All accident apart, by nature ſign'd,
My warrant is gone out, though dormant yet;
Perhaps behind one moment lurks my fate.
Muſt I then forward only look for death?
Backward I turn mine eye, and find him there.
Man is a ſelf-ſurvivor every year.
Man, like a ſtream, is in perpetual flow.
Death's a deſtroyer of quotidian prey.
My youth, my noon-tide, his; my yeſterday;
The bold invader ſhares the preſent hour.
Each moment on the former ſhuts the grave.
While man is growing, life is in decreaſe;
And cradles rock us nearer to the tomb.
Our birth is nothing but our death begun;
As tapers waſte that inſtant they take fire.
Shall we then fear, leſt that ſhould come to paſs,
Which comes to paſs each moment of our lives?
If fear we muſt, let that death turn us pale,
Which murders ſtrength and ardour; what remains
Should rather call on death, than dread his call.
Ye partners of my fault, and my decline!
Thoughtleſs of death, but when your neighbour's knell
(Rude viſitant!) knocks hard at your dull ſenſe,
And with its thunder ſcarce obtains your ear!
Be death your theme, in every place and hour;
Nor longer want, ye monumental fires!
A brother tomb to tell you ye ſhall die.
That death you dread (ſo great is nature's ſkill)
Know, you ſhall court before you ſhall enjoy.
But you are learn'd; in volumes, deep you ſit;
In wiſdom ſhallow; pompous ignorance!
Would you be ſtill more learned than the learn'd?
Learn well to know how much need not be known,
And what that knowledge, which impairs your ſenſe.
Our needful knowledge, like our needful food,
Unhedg'd, lies open in life's common field;
And bids all welcome to the vital feaſt.
You ſcorn what lies before you in the page
Of nature, and experience, moral truth;
Of indiſpenſable, eternal fruit;
Fruit, on which mortals feeding, turn to gods:
And dive in ſcience for diſtinguiſh'd names,
Diſhoneſt fomentation of your pride!
Sinking in virtue, as you riſe in fame.
Your learning, like the lunar beam, affords
Light, but not heat; it leaves you undevout,
Frozen at heart, while ſpeculation ſhines.
Awake, ye curious indagators! fond
Of knowing all, but what avails you known.
If you would learn death's character, attend.
All caſts of conduct, all degrees of health,
All dies of fortune, and all dates of age,
Together ſhook in his impartial urn,
Come forth at random: or, if choice is made,
The choice is quite ſarcaſtic, and inſults
All bold conjecture, and fond hopes of man.
What countleſs multitudes not only leave,
But deeply diſappoint us, by their deaths!
Though great our ſorrow, greater our ſurpriſe.
Like other tyrants, death delights to ſmite,
What, ſmitten, moſt proclaims the pride of power,
And arbitrary nod. His joy ſupreme,
To bid the wretch ſurvive the fortunate;
The feeble wrap th' athletic in his ſhroud;
And weeping fathers build their childrens tomb:
Me thine, Narciſſa!—What though ſhort thy date?
Virtue, not rolling ſuns, the mind matures.
That life is long, which anſwers life's great end.
The time that bears no fruit, deſerves no name;
The man of wiſdom is the man of years.
In hoary youth Methuſalems may die;
O how miſdated on their flattering tombs!
Narciſſa's youth has lectur'd me thus far.
And can her gaiety give counſel too?
That, like the Jews fam'd oracle of gems,
Sparkles inſtruction; ſuch as throws new light,
And opens more the character of death;
Ill-known to thee, Lorenzo! This thy vaunt:
"Give death his due, the wretched, and the old;
"Ev'n let him ſweep his rubbiſh to the grave;
"Let him not violate kind nature's laws,
"But own man born to live as well as die."
Wretched and old thou giv'ſt him; young and gay
He takes; and plunder is a tyrant's joy.
What if I prove, "That fartheſt from the fear,
"Are often neareſt to the ſtroke of fate?"
All, more than common, menaces an end.
A blaze betokens brevity of life:
As if bright embers ſhould emit a flame,
Glad ſpirits ſparkled from Narciſſa's eye,
And made youth younger, and taught life to live.
As nature's oppoſites wage endleſs war,
For this offence, as treaſon to the deep
Inviolable ſtupor of his reign,
Where luſt, and turbulent ambition, ſleep,
Death took ſwift vengeance. As he life deteſts,
More life is ſtill more odious; and, reduc'd
By conqueſt, aggrandizes more his power.
But wherefore aggrandiz'd? By heaven's decree,

To plant the ſoul on her eternal guard,
In awful expectation of our end. [ſo
Thus runs death's dread commiſſion: "Strike, but
"As moſt alarms the living by the dead."
Hence ſtratagem delights him, and ſurpriſe,
And cruel ſport with man's ſecurities.
Not ſimple conqueſt, triumph is his aim; [moſt.
And, where leaſt fear'd, there conqueſt triumphs
This proves my bold aſſertion not too bold.
What are his arts to lay our fears aſleep?
Tiberian arts his purpoſes wrap up
In deep diſſimulation's darkeſt night.
Like princes unconfeſt in foreign courts,
Who travel under cover, death aſſumes
The name and look of life, and dwells among us.
He takes all ſhapes that ſerve his black deſigns:
Though maſter of a wider empire far
Than that o'er which the Roman eagle flew.
Like Nero, he's a ſidler, charioteer,
Or drives his phaeton, in female guiſe;
Quite unſuſpected, till, the wheel beneath,
His diſarray'd oblation he devours.
He moſt affects the forms leaſt like himſelf,
His ſlender ſelf. Hence burly corpulence
In his familiar wear, and ſleek diſguiſe.
Behind the roſy bloom he loves to lurk,
Or ambuſh in a ſmile; or wanton dive
In dimples deep; love's eddies, which draw in
Unwary hearts, and ſink them in deſpair.
Such, on Narciſſa's couch he loiter'd long
Unknown; and, when detected, ſtill was ſeen
To ſmile; ſuch peace has innocence in death!
Moſt happy they! whom leaſt his arts deceive.
One eye on death, and one full fix'd on heaven,
Becomes a mortal, and immortal man.
Long on his wiles a piqu'd and jealous ſpy,
I've ſeen, or dreamt I ſaw, the tyrant dreſs;
Lay by his horrors, and put on his ſmiles.
Say, muſe, for thou remember'ſt, call it back,
And ſhow Lorenzo the ſurpriſing ſcene;
If 'twas a dream, his genius can explain.
'Twas in a circle of the gay, I ſtood.
Death would have enter'd; nature puſh'd him back;
Supported by a doctor of renown,
His point he gain'd. Then artfully diſmiſt
The ſage; for death deſign'd to be conceal'd.
He gave an old vivacious uſurer
His meagre aſpect, and his naked bones;
In gratitude for plumping up his prey,
A pamper'd ſpendthrift; whoſe fantaſtic air,
Well-faſhion'd figure, and cockaded brow,
He took in change, and underneath the pride
Of coſtly linen, tuck'd his filthy ſhroud.
His crooked bow he ſtraiten'd to a cane;
And hid his deadly ſhafts in Myra's eye.
The dreadful maſquerader, thus equipt,
Out-ſallies on adventures. Aſk you where?
Where is he not? For his peculiar haunts,
Let this ſuffice; ſure as night follows day,
Death treads in pleaſure's footſteps round the world;
When pleaſure treads the path, which reaſon ſhuns.
When, againſt reaſon, riot ſhuts the door,
And gaiety ſupplies the place of ſenſe,
Then, foremoſt at the banquet and the ball,
Death leads the dance, or ſtamps the deadly die;
Nor ever fails the midnight howl to crown.
Gaily carouſing to his gay compeers,
Inly he laughs, to ſee them laugh at him,
As abſent far: and when the revel burns,
When fear is baniſh'd, and triumphant thought,
Calling for all the joys beneath the moon,
Againſt him turns the key; and bids him ſup
With their progenitors—He drops his maſk;
Frowns out at full; they ſtart, deſpair, expire.
Scarce with more ſudden terror and ſurpriſe,
From his black maſk of nitre, touch'd by fire,
He burſts, expands, roars, blazes, and devours.
And is not this triumphant treachery,
And more than ſimple conqueſt, in the fiend?
And now, Lorenzo, doſt thou wrap thy ſoul
In ſoft ſecurity, becauſe unknown
Which moment is commiſſion'd to deſtroy?
In death's uncertainty thy danger lies.
Is death uncertain? Therefore thou be fit;
Fixt as a centinel, all eye, all ear,
All expectation of the coming foe.
Rouſe, ſtand in arms, nor lean againſt thy ſpear;
Leſt ſlumber ſteal one moment o'er thy ſoul,
And fate ſurpriſe thee nodding. Watch, be ſtrong;
Thus give each day the merit, and renown,
Of dying well; though doom'd but once to die.
Nor let life's period hidden (as from moſt)
Hide too from thee the precious uſe of life.
Early, not ſudden, was Narciſſa's fate.
Soon, not ſurpriſing, death his viſit paid.
Her thought went forth to meet him on his way,
Nor gaiety forgot it was to die:
Though fortune too (our third and final theme),
As an accomplice, play'd her gaudy plumes,
And every glittering gewgaw, on her ſight,
To dazzle, and debauch it from its mark.
Death's dreadful advent is the mark of man;
And every thought that miſſes it, is blind.
Fortune, with youth and gaiety, conſpir'd
To weave a triple wreath of happineſs
(If happineſs on earth) to crown her brow.
And could death charge through ſuch a ſhining ſhield?
That ſhining ſhield invites the tyrant's ſpear,
As if to damp our elevated aims,
And ſtrongly preach humility to man.
O how portentous is proſperity!
How, comet-like, it threatens, while it ſhines!
Few years but yield us proof of death's ambition,
To cull his victims from the faireſt fold,
And ſheath his ſhafts in all the pride of life.
When flooded with abundance, purpled o'er
With recent honours, bloom'd with every bliſs,
Set up in oſtentation, made the gaze,
The gaudy centre, of the public eye,
When fortune thus has toſs'd her child in air,
Snatcht from the covert of an humble ſtate,
How often have I ſeen him dropt at once,
Our morning's envy! and our evening's ſigh!
As if her bounties were the ſignal given,
The flowery wreathe to mark the ſacrifice,
And call death's arrows on the deſtin'd prey.
High fortune ſeems in cruel league with fate.
Aſk you for what? To give his war on man
The deeper dread, and more illuſtrious ſpoil;

Thus to keep daring mortals more in awe.
And burns Lorenzo ſtill for the ſublime
Of life? To hang his airy neſt on high,
On the ſlight timber of the topmoſt bough,
Rockt at each breeze, and menacing a fall?
Granting grim death at equal diſtance there;
Yet peace begins juſt where ambition ends.
What makes man wretched? Happineſs deny'd?
Lorenzo! no: 'Tis happineſs diſdain'd.
She comes too meanly dreſt to win our ſmile;
And calls herſelf content, a homely name!
Our flame is tranſport, and content our ſcorn.
Ambition turns, and ſhuts the door againſt her,
And weds a toil, a tempeſt, in her ſtead;
A tempeſt to warm tranſport near of kin.
Unknowing what our mortal ſtate admits,
Life's modeſt joys we ruin, while we raiſe;
And all our ecſtaſies are wounds to peace;
Peace, the full portion of mankind below.

And ſince thy peace is dear, ambitious youth!
Of fortune fond! as thoughtleſs of thy fate!
As late I drew death's picture, to ſtir up
Thy wholeſome fears; now, drawn in contraſt, ſee
Gay fortune's, thy vain hope's to reprimand.
See, high in air the ſportive goddeſs hangs,
Unlocks her caſket, ſpreads her glittering ware,
And calls the giddy winds to puff abroad
Her random bounties o'er the gaping throng.
All ruſh rapacious; friends o'er trodden friends;
Sons o'er their fathers, ſubjects o'er their kings,
Prieſts o'er their gods, and lovers o'er the fair,
(Still more ador'd) to ſnatch the golden ſhower.

Gold glitters moſt, where virtue ſhines no more;
As ſtars from abſent ſuns have leave to ſhine.
O what a precious pack of votaries
Unkennel'd from the priſons, and the ſtews,
Pour in, all opening in their idol's praiſe;
All, ardent, eye each wafture of her hand,
And, wide-expanding their voracious jaws,
Morſel on morſel ſwallow down unchew'd,
Untaſted, through mad appetite for more;
Gorg'd to the throat, yet lean and ravenous ſtill.
Sagacious all, to trace the ſmalleſt game,
And bold to ſeize the greateſt. If (bleſt chance!)
Court zephyrs ſweetly breathe, they launch, they fly,
O'er juſt, o'er ſacred, all-forbidden ground,
Drunk with the burning ſcent of place or power,
Staunch to the foot of lucre, till they die.

Or, if for men you take them, as I mark
Their manners, thou their various fates ſurvey.
With aim miſ meaſur'd, and impetuous ſpeed,
Some darting, ſtrike their ardent wiſh far off,
Through fury to poſſeſs it: Some ſucceed,
But ſtumble, and let fall the taken prize.
From ſome, by ſudden blaſts, 'tis whirl'd away,
And lodg'd in boſoms that ne'er dreamt of gain.
To ſome it ſticks ſo cloſe, that, when torn off,
Torn is the man, and mortal is the wound.
Some, o'er-enamour'd of their bags, run mad,
Groan under gold, yet weep for want of bread.
Together ſome (unhappy rivals!) ſeize,
And rend abundance into poverty;
Loud croaks the raven of the law, and ſmiles:
Smiles too the goddeſs; but ſmiles moſt at thoſe,
(Juſt victims of exhorbitant deſire!)
Who periſh at their own requeſt, and whelm'd
Beneath her load of laviſh grants, expire.
Fortune is famous for her numbers ſlain,
The number ſmall, which happineſs can bear.
Though various for a while their fates; at laſt
One curſe involves them all: at death's approach,
All read their riches backward into loſs,
And mourn, in juſt proportion to their ſtore.

And death's approach (if orthodox my ſong)
Is haſten'd by the lure of fortune's ſmiles.
And art thou ſtill a glutton of bright gold?
And art thou ſtill rapacious of thy ruin?
Death loves a ſhining mark, a ſignal blow;
A blow, which while it executes, alarms;
And ſtartles thouſands with a ſingle fall.
As when ſome ſtately growth of oak, or pine,
Which nods aloft, and proudly ſpreads her ſhade,
The ſun's defiance, and the flock's defence;
By the ſtrong ſtrokes of labouring hinds ſubdued,
Loud groans her laſt, and, ruſhing from her height,
In cumbrous ruin, thunders to the ground:
The conſcious foreſt trembles at the ſhock,
And hill, and ſtream, and diſtant dale reſound.

Theſe high-aim'd darts of death, and theſe alone,
Should I collect, my quiver would be full.
A quiver, which, ſuſpended in mid air,
Or near heaven's archer, in the zodiac hung,
(So could it be) ſhould draw the public eye,
The gaze and contemplation of mankind!
A conſtellation awful, yet benign,
To guide the gay through life's tempeſtuous wave;
Nor ſuffer them to ſtrike the common rock,
" From greater danger, to grow more ſecure,
" And, wrapt in happineſs, forget their fate."

Lyſander, happy paſt the common lot,
Was warn'd of danger, but too gay to fear.
He woo'd the fair Aſpaſio: ſhe was kind:
In youth, form, fortune, fame, they both were bleſt:
All who knew envy'd: yet in envy lov'd:
Can fancy form more finiſht happineſs?
Fixt was the nuptial hour. Her ſtately dome
Roſe on the founding beach. The glittering ſpires
Float in the wave, and break againſt the ſhore:
So break thoſe glittering ſhadows, human joys.
The faithleſs morning ſmil'd: he takes his leave,
To re-embrace, in ecſtaſies, at eve.
The riſing ſtorm forbids. The news arrives:
Untold, ſhe ſaw it in her ſervant's eye.
She felt it ſeen (her heart was apt to feel);
And, drown'd without the furious ocean's aid,
In ſuffocating ſorrows, ſhares his tomb.
Now, round the ſumptuous bridal monument,
The guilty billows innocently roar;
And the rough ſailor paſſing, drops a tear.
A tear?—Can tears ſuffice?—But not for me.
How vain our efforts! and our arts how vain!
The diſtant train of thought I took to ſhun,
Has thrown me on my fate—Theſe died together;
Happy in ruin! undivorc'd by death!
Or ne'er to meet, or ne'er to part, is peace—
Narciſſa! Pity bleeds at thought of thee.
Yet thou waſt only near me; not myſelf.
Survive myſelf?—That cures all other woe.

Narciſſa lives; Philander is forgot.
O the ſoft commerce! O the tender ties,
Cloſe-twiſted with the fibres of the heart!
Which, broken, break them; and drain off the ſoul
Of human joy; and make it pain to live—
And is it then to live? When ſuch friends part,
'Tis the ſurvivor dies—My heart, no more.

NIGHT VI.

THE INFIDEL RECLAIMED.

IN TWO PARTS.

Containing the Nature, Proof, and Importance of Immortality.

PART I.

Where, among other things, Glory, and Riches, are particularly conſidered.

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE HENRY PELHAM, FIRST LORD COMMISSIONER OF THE TREASUREY, AND CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER.

PREFACE.

FEW ages have been deeper in diſpute about religion than this. The diſpute about religion, and the practice of it, ſeldom go together. The ſhorter, therefore, the diſpute the better. I think it may be reduced to this ſingle queſtion, Is man immortal, or is he not? If he is not, all our diſputes are mere amuſements, or trials of ſkill. In this caſe, truth, reaſon, religion, which give our diſcourſes ſuch pomp and ſolemnity, are (as will be ſhown) mere empty ſound, without any meaning in them. But if man is immortal, it will behove him to be very ſerious about eternal conſequences; or, in other words, to be truly religious. And this great fundamental truth, uneſtabliſhed, or unawakened in the minds of men, is, I conceive, the real ſource and ſupport of all our infidelity; how remote ſoever the particular objections advanced may ſeem to be from it.

Senſible appearances affect moſt men much more than abſtract reaſonings; and we daily ſee bodies drop around us, but the ſoul is inviſible. The power which inclination has over the judgment, is greater than can be conceived by thoſe that have not had an experience of it; and of what numbers is it the ſad intereſt that ſouls ſhould not ſurvive! The heathen world confeſſed, that they rather hoped, than firmly believed immortality! And how many heathens have we ſtill amongſt us! The ſacred page aſſures us, that life and immortality is brought to light by the goſpel: but by how many is the goſpel rejected, or overlooked! From theſe conſiderations, and from my being, accidentally, privy to the ſentiments of ſome particular perſons,—I have been long perſuaded that moſt, if not all our infidels (whatever name they take, and whatever ſcheme, for argument's ſake, and to keep themſelves in countenance, they patronize) are ſupported in their deplorable error, by ſome doubt of their immortality, at the bottom. And I am ſatisfied, that men once thoroughly convinced of their immorality, are not far from being Chriſtians. For it is hard to conceive, that a man fully conſcious eternal pain or happineſs will certainly be his lot, ſhould not earneſtly, and impartially, inquire after the ſureſt means of eſcaping one, and ſecuring the other. And of ſuch an earneſt and impartial inquiry, I well know the conſequence.

Here, therefore, in proof of this moſt fundamental truth, ſome plain arguments are offered: arguments derived from principles which infidels admit in common with believers; arguments, which appear to me altogether irreſtible; and ſuch as I am ſatisfied will have great weight with all who give themſelves the ſmall trouble of looking ſeriouſly into their own boſoms, and of obſerving, with any tolerable degree of attention, what daily paſſes round about them in the world. If ſome arguments ſhall, here, occur, which others have declined, they are ſubmitted, with all deference, to better judgments in this, of all points the moſt important. For, as to the being of a God, that is no longer diſputed; but it is indiſputed for this reaſon only; viz. becauſe, where the leaſt pretence to reaſon is admitted, it muſt for ever be indiſputable. And of conſequence no man can be betrayed into a diſpute of that nature by vanity; which has a principal ſhare in animating our modern combatants againſt other articles of our belief.

SHE * (for I know not yet her name in heaven)
Not early, like Narciſſa, left the ſcene;
Nor ſudden, like Philander. What avail?
This ſeeming mitigation but inflames;
This fancy'd medicine heightens the diſeaſe.
The longer known, the cloſer ſtill ſhe grew;
And gradual parting is a gradual death.
'Tis the grim tyrant's engine, which extorts,
By tardy preſſure's ſtill increaſing weight,
From hardeſt hearts, confeſſion of diſtreſs.
O the long, dark approach through years of pain,
Death's gallery! (might I dare to call it ſo)
With diſmal doubt, and ſable terror, hung:
Sick hopes, pale lamp its only glimmering ray:
There, fate my melancholy walk ordain'd,
Forbid ſelf-love itſelf to flatter, there,
How oft I gaz'd, prophetically ſad!
How oft I ſaw her dead, while yet in ſmiles!
In ſmiles ſhe ſunk her grief to leſſen mine.
She ſpoke me comfort, and increas'd my pain.
Like powerful armies trenching at a town,
By ſlow, and ſilent, but reſiſtleſs ſap,
In his pale progreſs gently gaining ground,
Death urg'd his deadly ſiege; in ſpite of art,
Of all the balmy bleſſings nature lends
To ſuccour frail humanity. Ye ſtars!
(Not now firſt made familiar to my ſight)
And thou, O moon! bear witneſs, many a night
He tore the pillow from beneath my head,
Ty'd down by ſore attention to the ſhock,

* Referring to Night V.

By ceaſeleſs depredations on a life
Dearer than that he left me. Dreadful poſt
Of obſervation! darker every hour!
Leſs dread the day that drove me to the brink,
And pointed at eternity below;
When my ſoul ſhudder'd at futurity;
When, a moment's point, th' important die,
Of life and death ſpun doubtful, ere it fell,
And turn'd up life; my title to more woe.
But why more woe? More comfort let it be.
Nothing is dead, but that which wiſh'd to die;
Nothing is dead, but wretchedneſs and pain;
Nothing is dead, but what incumber'd, gall'd,
Block'd up the paſs, and barr'd from real life.
Where dwells that wiſh moſt ardent of the wiſe?
Too dark the ſun to ſee it; higheſt ſtars
Too low to reach it; death, great death alone,
O'er ſtars and ſun, triumphant lead us there.
Nor dreadful our tranſition; though the mind,
An artiſt at creating ſelf-alarms,
Rich in expedients for inquietude,
Is prone to paint it dreadful. Who can take Death's portrait true? The tyrant never ſat.
Our ſketch all random ſtrokes, conjecture all;
Cloſe ſhuts the grave, nor tells one ſingle tale.
Death, and his image riſing in the brain,
Bear faint reſemblance; never are alike;
Fear ſhakes the pencil; fancy loves exceſs;
Dark ignorance is laviſh of her ſhades;
And theſe the formidable picture draw. [riſe;
But grant the worſt; 'tis paſt; new proſpects
And drop a veil eternal o'er her tomb.
Far other views our contemplation claim,
Views that o'erpay the rigours of our life;
Views that ſuſpend our agonies in death.
Wrapt in the thought of immortality,
Wrapt in the ſingle, the triumphant thought!
Long life might lapſe, age unperceiv'd come on;
And find the ſoul unfated with her theme.
Its nature, proof, importance, fire my ſong.
O that my ſong could emulate my ſoul!
Like her immortal. No!—the ſoul diſdains
A mark ſo mean; far nobler hope inflames;
If endleſs ages can outweigh an hour,
Let not the laurel, but the palm inſpire.
Thy nature, immortality! who knows?
And yet who knows it not? It is but life
In ſtronger thread of brighter colour ſpun,
And ſpun for ever; dipt by cruel fate
In Stygian dye, how black, how brittle here!
How ſhort our correſpondence with the ſun!
And while it laſts, inglorious! Our beſt deeds,
How wanting in their weight! Our higheſt joys
Small cordials to ſupport us in our pain,
And give us ſtrength to ſuffer. But how great
To mingle intereſts, converſe amities,
With all the ſons of reaſon, ſcatter'd wide
Through habitable ſpace, wherever born,
Howe'er endow'd! To live free citizens
Of univerſal nature! To lay hold
By more than feeble faith on the Supreme!
To call heaven's rich unfathomable mines
(Mines, which ſupport archangels in their ſtate)
Our own! to riſe in ſcience, as in bliſs,
Initiate in the ſecrets of the ſkies!
To read creation; read its mighty plan
In the bare boſom of the Deity!
The plan, and execution, to collate!
To ſee, before each glance of piercing thought,
All cloud, all ſhadow, blown remote; and leave
No myſtery—but that of love divine,
Which lifts us on the ſeraph's flaming wing,
From earth's aceldama, this field of blood,
Of inward anguiſh, and of outward ill,
From darkneſs, and from duſt, to ſuch a ſcene!
Love's element! true joy's illuſtrious home;
From earth's ſad contraſt (now deplor'd) more fair!
What exquiſite viciſſitude of fate!
Bleſt abſolution of our blackeſt hour!
Lorenzo, theſe are thoughts that make man Man,
The wiſe illumine, aggrandize the great,
How great (while yet we tread the kindred clod,
And every moment fear to ſink beneath
The clod we tread; ſoon trodden by our ſons)
How great, in the wild whirl of time's purſuits,
To ſtop, and pauſe, involv'd in high preſage,
Through the long viſto of a thouſand years,
To ſtand contemplating our diſtant ſelves,
As in a magnifying mirror ſeen,
Enlarg'd, ennobled, elevate, divine!
To propheſy our own futurities;
To gaze in thought on what all thought tranſcends!
To talk with fellow-candidates, of joys
As far beyond conception as deſert,
Ourſelves th' aſtoniſh'd talkers and the tale!
Lorenzo, ſwells thy boſom at the thought?
The ſwell becomes thee: 'Tis an honeſt pride.
Revere thyſelf:—and yet thyſelf deſpiſe.
His nature no man can o'er-rate; and none
Can under-rate his merit. Take good heed,
Nor be thou modeſt, where thou ſhould'ſt be proud;
That almoſt univerſal error ſhun.
How juſt our pride, when we behold thoſe heights!
Not thoſe ambition paints in air, but thoſe
Reaſon points out, and ardent virtue gains;
And angels emulate; our pride how juſt!
When mount we? When theſe ſhackles caſt? When quit
This cell of the creation? This ſmall neſt,
Stuck in a corner of the univerſe,
Wrapt up in fleecy cloud, and fine-ſpun air?
Fine-ſpun to ſenſe; but groſs and feculent
To ſouls celeſtial; ſouls ordain'd to breathe
Ambroſial gales and drink a purer ſky;
Greatly triumphant on time's farther ſhore,
Where virtue reigns, enrich'd with full arrears;
While pomp imperial begs an alms of peace.
In empire high, or in proud ſcience deep,
Ye born of earth! on what you can confer,
With half the dignity, with half the gain,
The guſt, the glow of rational delight,
As on this theme, which angels praiſe and ſhare?
Man's fates and favours are a theme in heaven.
What wretched repetition cloys us here!
What periodic potions for the ſick!
Diſtemper'd bodies! and diſtemper'd minds!
In an eternity, what ſcenes ſhall ſtrike!
Adventures thicken! novelties ſurpriſe!

What webs of wonder ſhall unravel, there!
What full day pour on all the paths of heaven!
And light th' Almighty's footſteps in the deep,
How ſhall the bleſſed day of our diſcharge
Unwind, at once, the labyrinths of fate,
And ſtraiten its inextricable maze!
If inextinguiſhable thirſt in man
To know; how rich, how full, our banquet there,
There, not the moral world alone unfolds;
The world material, lately ſeen in ſhades,
And, in thoſe ſhades, by fragments only ſeen,
And ſeen thoſe fragments by the labouring eye,
Unbroken, then, illuſtrious and entire,
Its ample ſphere, its univerſal frame,
In full dimenſions, ſwells to the ſurvey;
And enters at one glance, the raviſh'd ſight.
From ſome ſuperior point (where, who can tell?
Suffice it, 'tis a point where gods reſide)
How ſhall the ſtranger man's illumin'd eye,
In the vaſt ocean of unbounded ſpace,
Behold an infinite of floating worlds
Divide the cryſtal waves of ether pure,
In endleſs voyage, without port! The leaſt
Of theſe diſſeminated orbs, how great!
Great as they are, what numbers theſe ſurpaſs,
Huge, as leviathan, to that ſmall race,
Thoſe twinkling multitudes of little life,
He ſwallows unperceiv'd? ſtupendous theſe!
Yet what are theſe ſtupendous to the whole!
As particles, as atoms ill perceiv'd;
As circulating globules in our viens;
So vaſt the plan. Fecundity divine!
Exuberant ſource! perhaps, I wrong thee ſtill.
If admiration is a ſource of joy,
What tranſport hence; yet this the leaſt in heaven.
What this to that illuſtrious robe he wears,
Who toſt this maſs of wonders from his hand,
A ſpecimen, an earneſt of his power?
'Tis to that glory, whence all glory flows,
As the mead's meaneſt floweret to the ſun,
Which gave it birth. But what, this ſun of heav'n?
This bliſs ſupreme of the ſupremely bleſt?
Death, only death, the queſtion can reſolve.
By death, cheap-bought th' ideas of our joy;
The bare ideas! ſolid happineſs
So diſtant from its ſhadow chas'd below.
And chaſe we ſtill the phantom through the fire,
O'er bog, and brake, and precipice, till death?
And toil we ſtill for ſublunary pay?
Defy the dangers of the field and flood,
Or, ſpider-like, ſpin out our precious all,
Our more than vitals ſpin (if no regard
To great futurity) in curious webs
Of ſubtle thought, and exquiſite deſign;
(Fine net-work of the brain!) to catch a fly!
The momentary buz of vain renown!
A name; a mortal immortality!
Or (meaner ſtill!) inſtead of graſping air
For ſordid lucre, plunge we in the mire? [gain,
Drudge, ſweat, through every ſhame, for every
For vile contaminating traſh; throw up
Our hope in heaven, our dignity with man?
And deify the dirt matur'd to gold?
Ambition, avarice; the two dæmons theſe,
Which goad through every ſlough our human herd,
Hard travell'd from the cradle to the grave.
How low the wretches ſtoop! How ſteep they climb!
Theſe dæmons burn mankind; but moſt poſſeſs
Lorenzo's boſom, and turn out the ſkies.
Is it in time to hide eternity!
And why not in an atom on the ſhore
To cover ocean? or a mote, the ſun?
Glory and wealth! have they this blinding power?
What if to them I prove Lorenzo blind?
Would it ſurpriſe thee? Be thou then ſurpris'd;
Thou neither know'ſt: their nature learn from me.
Mark well, as foreign as theſe ſubjects ſeem,
What cloſe connection ties them to my theme.
Firſt, what is true ambition? The purſuit
Of glory, nothing leſs than man can ſhare.
Were they as vain as gaudy minded man,
As flatulent with fumes of ſelf-applauſe,
Their arts and conqueſts animals might boaſt,
And claim their laurel crowns as well as we;
But not celeſtial. Here we ſtand alone;
As in our form diſtinct, pre-eminent;
If prone in thought, our ſtature is our ſhame:
And man ſhould bluſh, his forehead meets the ſkies.
The viſible and preſent are for brutes,
A ſlender portion: and a narrow bound!
Theſe reaſon, with an energy divine,
O'erleaps; and claims the future and unſeen;
The vaſt unſeen! the future fathomleſs!
When the great ſoul buoys up to this high point,
Leaving groſs nature's ſediments below,
Then, and then only, Adam's offſpring quits
The ſage and hero of the fields and woods,
Aſſerts his rank, and riſes into man.
This is ambition: this is human fire.
Can parts or place (two bold pretenders!) make
Lorenzo great, and pluck him from the throng?
Genius and art, ambition's boaſted wings,
Our boaſt but ill deſerve. A feeble aid!
Dedalian enginery! If theſe alone
Aſſiſt our flight, fame's flight is glory's fall.
Heart merit wanting, mount we ne'er ſo high,
Our height is but the gibbet of our name.
A celebrated wretch, when I behold;
When I behold a genius bright and baſe,
Of towering talents, and terreſtrial aims;
Methinks I ſee, as thrown from her high ſphere,
The glorious fragments of a ſoul immortal,
With rubbiſh mix'd, and glittering in the duſt.
Struck at the ſplendid, melancholy ſight,
At once compaſſion ſoft, and envy riſe—
But wherefore envy? Talents angel-bright,
If wanting worth, are ſhining inſtruments
In falſe ambition's hand, to finiſh faults
Illuſtrious, and give infamy renown.
Great ill is an atchievment of great powers.
Plain ſenſe but rarely leads us far aſtray.
Reaſon the means, affections cauſe our end;
Means have not merit, if our end amiſs.
If wrong our hearts, our heads are right in vain;
What is a Pelham's head, to Pelham's heart?
Hearts are proprietors of all applauſe. [wiſe
Right ends, and means, make wiſdom: Worldly-
Is but half-witted, at its higheſt praiſe,

Let genius then deſpair to make thee great;
Nor flatter ſtation: What is ſtation high?
'Tis a proud mendicant; it boaſts, and begs;
It begs an alms of homage from the throng,
And oft the throng denies its charity.
Monarchs and miniſters are awful names;
Whoever wear them, challenge our devoir.
Religion, public order, both exact
External homage, and a ſupple knee,
To beings pompouſly ſet up, to ſerve
The meaneſt ſlave; all more is merit's due,
He ſacred and inviolable right
Nor ever paid the monarch, but the man.
Our hearts ne'er bow but to ſuperior worth;
Nor ever fail of their allegiance there.
Fools, indeed, drop the man in their account,
And vote the mantle into majeſty.
Let the ſmall ſavage boaſt his ſilver fur;
His royal robe unborrow'd, and unbought,
His own, deſcending fairly from his ſires.
Shall man be proud to wear his livery,
And ſouls in ermin ſcorn a ſoul without?
Can place or leſſen us, or aggrandize?
Pygmies are pygmies ſtill, though perch'd on Alps;
And pyramids are pyramids in vales.
Each man makes his own ſtature, builds himſelf:
Virtue alone outbuilds the pyramids:
Her monuments ſhall laſt, when Egypt's fall.
Of theſe ſure truths doſt thou demand the cauſe?
The cauſe is lodg'd in immortality.
Hear, and aſſent. Thy boſom burns for power;
What ſtation charms thee? I'll inſtall thee there;
'Tis thine. And art thou greater than before?
Then thou before waſt ſomething leſs than man.
Has thy new poſt betray'd thee into pride?
That treacherous pride betrays the dignity;
That pride defames humanity, and calls
The being mean, which ſtaffs or ſtrings can raiſe.
That pride, like hooded hawks, in darkneſs ſoars,
From blindneſs bold, and towering to the ſkies.
'Tis born of ignorance, which knows not man;
An angel's ſecond; nor his ſecond, long.
A Nero quitting his imperial throne,
And courting glory from the tinkling ſtring,
But faintly ſhadows an immortal ſoul,
With empire's ſelf, to pride, or rapture, fir'd.
If nobler motives miniſter no cure,
Ev'n vanity forbids thee to be vain.
High worth is elevated place: 'Tis more;
It makes the poſt ſtand candidate for thee;
Makes more than monarchs, makes an honeſt man;
Though no exchequer it commands, 'tis wealth;
And though it wears no ribband, 'tis renown;
Renown, that would not quit thee, though diſgrac'd,
Nor leave thee pendant on a maſter's ſmile.
Other ambition nature interdicts;
Nature proclaims it moſt abſurd in man,
By pointing at his origin, and end;
Milk, and a ſwathe, at firſt, his whole demand;
His whole domain, at laſt, a turf, or ſtone;
To whom, between, a world may ſeem too ſmall.
Souls truly great dart forward on the wing
Of juſt ambition, to the grand reſult,
The curtain fall; there, ſee the buſkin'd chief
Unſhod behind this momentary ſcene;
Reduc'd to his own ſtature, low or high,
As vice or virtue, ſinks him, or ſublimes;
And laugh at this fantaſtic mummery,
This antic prelude of groteſque events,
Where dwarfs are often ſtilted, and betray
A littleneſs of ſoul by worlds o'er-run,
And nations laid in blood. Dread ſacrifice
To Chriſtian pride! which had with horror ſhock'd
The darkeſt pagans offer'd to their gods.
O thou moſt Chriſtian enemy to peace;
Again in arms? Again provoking fate?
That prince, and that alone, is truly great,
Who draws the ſword reluctant, gladly ſheathes;
On empire builds what empire far outweighs,
And makes his throne a ſcaffold to the ſkies.
Why this ſo rare? Becauſe forgot of all
The day of death; that venerable day, [nounce
Which ſits as judge; that day, which ſhall pro-
On all our days, abſolve them, or condemn.
Lorenzo, never ſhut thy thought againſt it;
Be levees ne'er ſo full, afford it room,
And give it audience in the cabinet.
That friend conſulted, flatteries apart,
Will tell the fair, if thou art great, or mean.
To doat on aught may leave us, or be left,
Is that ambition? Then let flames deſcend,
Point to the centre their inverted ſpires,
And learn humiliation from a ſoul,
Which boaſts her lineage from celeſtial fire.
Yet theſe are they the world pronounces wiſe;
The world which cancels nature's right and wrong,
And caſts new wiſdom: ev'n the grave man lends
His ſolemn face, to countenance the coin.
Wiſdom for parts is madneſs for the whole.
This ſtamps the paradox, and gives us leave
To call the wiſeſt weak, the richeſt poor,
The moſt ambitious, unambitious, mean;
In triumph, mean; and abject, on a throne.
Nothing can make it leſs than mad in man,
To put forth all his ardour, all his art,
And give his ſoul her full unbounded flight,
But reaching him, who gave her wings to fly.
When blind ambition quite miſtakes her road,
And downwards pores, for that which ſhines above,
Subſtantial happineſs, and true renown;
Then, like an idiot, gazing on the brook,
We leap at ſtars, and faſten in the mud;
At glory graſp, and ſink in infamy.
Ambition! powerful ſource of good and ill!
Thy ſtrength in man, like length of wing in birds,
When diſengag'd from earth, with greater eaſe,
And ſwifter flight tranſports us to the ſkies;
By toys entangled, or in guilt bemir'd,
It turns a curſe; it is our chain, and ſcourge,
In this dark dungeon, where confin'd we lie.
Cloſe-grated by the ſordid bars of ſenſe;
All proſpect of eternity ſhut out;
And, but for execution, ne'er ſet free.
With error in ambition juſtly charg'd,
Find we Lorenzo wiſer in his wealth?
What if thy rental I reform? and draw
An inventory new to ſet thee right?
Where thy true treaſure? Gold ſays, "Not in me."
And, "Not in me," the diamond. Gold is poor;

India's infolvent; ſeek it in thyſelf,
Seek in thy naked ſelf, and find it there;
In being ſo deſcended, form'd, endow'd;
Sky-born, ſky-guided, ſky-returning race!
Erect, immortal, rational, divine!
In ſenſes, which inherit earth, and heavens;
Enjoy the various riches nature yields;
Far nobler! give the riches they enjoy;
Give taſte to fruits; and harmony to groves;
Their radiant beams to gold, and gold's bright fire;
Take in, at once, the landſcape of the world,
At a ſmall inlet which a grain might cloſe,
And half create the wondrous world they ſee.
Our ſenſes, as our reaſon, are divine.
But for the magic organ's powerful charm,
Earth were a rude, uncolour'd chaos, ſtill.
Objects are but th' occaſion; ours th' exploit;
Ours is the cloth, the pencil, and the paint,
Which nature's admirable picture draws;
And beautifies creation's ample dome.
Like Milton's Eve, when gazing on the lake
Man makes the matchleſs image man admires.
Say, then, ſhall man, his thoughts all ſent abroad,
Superior wonders in himſelf forgot,
His admiration waſte on objects round,
When heaven makes him the ſoul of all he ſees?
Abſurd! not rare ſo great, ſo mean is man.
What wealth in ſenſes ſuch as theſe! What wealth
In fancy, fir'd to form a fairer ſcene
Than ſenſe ſurveys! In memory's firm record,
Which, ſhould it periſh, could this world recal
From the dark ſhadows of o'erwhelming !
In colours freſh, originally bright,
Preſerve its portrait, and report its fate!
What wealth in intellect, that ſovereign power!
Which ſenſe and fancy ſummons to the bar;
Interrogates, approves, or reprehends;
And from the maſs thoſe underlings import,
From their materials ſifted, and refin'd,
And in truth's balance accurately weigh'd,
Forms art, and ſcience, government, and law;
The ſolid baſis, and the beauteous frame,
The vitals, and the grace of civil life!
And manners (ſad exception!) ſet aſide,
Strikes out, with maſter hand, a copy fair
Of his idea, whoſe indulgent thought
Long, long, ere chaos teem'd, plann'd human bliſs.
What wealth in ſouls that ſoar, dive, range around,
Diſdaining limit, or from place, or time;
And hear at once, in thought extenſive, hear
Th' Almighty fiat, and the trumpet's ſound!
Bold, on creation's outſide walk, and view
What was, and is, and more than e'er ſhall be;
Commanding, with omnipotence of thought,
Creations new in fancy's field to riſe!
Souls that can graſp whate'er th' Almighty made,
And wander wild through things impoſſible!
What wealth, in faculties of endleſs growth,
In quenchleſs paſſions violent to crave,
In liberty to chooſe, in power to reach,
And in duration (how thy riches riſe!)
Duration to perpetuate—boundleſs bliſs!
Aſk you what power reſides in feeble man
That bliſs to gain? Is virtue's, then, unknown?
Virtue, our preſent peace, our future prize.
Man's unprecarious, natural eſtate,
Improveable at will, in virtue lies;
Its tenure ſure; its income is divine.
High-built abundance, heap on heap, for what?
To breed new wants, and beggar us the more;
Then make a richer ſcramble for the throng?
Soon as this feeble pulſe, which leaps ſo long
Almoſt by miracle, is tir'd with play,
Like rubbiſh from diſploding engines thrown,
Our magazines of hoarded trifles fly;
Fly diverſe; fly to foreigners, to foes;
New maſters court, and call the former fool
(How juſtly!) for dependence on their ſtay.
Wide ſcatter, firſt, our playthings; then our duſt?
Doſt court abundance for the ſake of peace?
Learn, and lament thy ſelf-defeated ſcheme:
Riches enable to be richer ſtill;
And, richer ſtill, what mortal can reſiſt?
Thus wealth (a cruel taſk-maſter!) enjoins
New toils, ſucceeding toils, an endleſs train!
And murders peace, which taught it firſt to ſhine.
The poor are half as wretched as the rich;
Whoſe proud and painful privilege it is,
At once, to bear a double load of woe;
To feel the ſtings of envy, and of want,
Outrageous want! both Indies cannot cure.
A competence is vital to content,
Much wealth is corpulence, if not diſeaſe;
Sick, or encumber'd, is our happineſs.
A competence is all we can enjoy.
O be content, where heaven can give no more!
More, like a flaſh of water from a lock,
Quickens our ſpirits' movement for an hour;
But ſoon its force is ſpent, nor riſe our joys
Above our native temper's common ſtream.
Hence diſappointment lurks in every prize,
As bees in flowers; and ſtings us with ſucceſs.
The rich man, who denies it, proudly feigns;
Nor knows the wiſe are privy to the lie.
Much learning ſhows how little mortals know;
Much wealth, how little worldlings can enjoy;
At beſt, it babies us with endleſs toys,
And keeps us children till we drop to duſt.
As monkeys at a mirror ſtand amaz'd,
They fail to find what they ſo plainly ſee;
Thus men, in ſhining riches, ſee the face
Of happineſs, nor know it is a ſhade;
But gaze, and touch, and peep, and peep again,
And wiſh, and wonder it is abſent ſtill.
How few can reſcue opulence from want!
Who lives to nature, rarely can be poor;
Who lives to fancy, never can be rich.
Poor is the man in debt; the man of gold,
In debt to fortune, trembles at her power.
The man of reaſon ſmiles at her, and death.
O what a patrimony this! A being
Of ſuch inherent ſtrength and majeſty,
Not worlds poſſeſt can raiſe it; worlds deſtroy'd
Can't injure: which holds on its glorious courſe,
When thine, O nature! ends; too bleſt to mourn
Creation's obſequies. What treaſure, this!
The Monarch is a beggar to the Man.
Immortal! Ages paſt, yet nothing gone!
Morn without eve! a race without a goal!

Unshorten'd by progression infinite!
Futurity for ever future! Life
Beginning still where computation ends!
'Tis the description of a Deity!
'Tis the description of the meanest slave:
The meanest slave dares then Lorenzo scorn?
The meanest slave thy sovereign glory shares.
Proud youth! fastidious of the lower world!
Man's lawful pride includes humility;
Stoops to the lowest; is too great to find
Inferiors; all immortal! brothers all!
Proprietors eternal of thy love,
Immortal! What can strike the sense so strong,
As this the soul? It thunders to the thought;
Reason amazes; gratitude o'erwhelms;
No more we slumber on the brink of fate;
Rous'd at the sound, th' exulting soul ascends,
And breathes her native air; an air that feeds
Ambitions high, and fans ethereal fires;
Quick kindles all that is divine within us;
Nor leaves one loitering thought beneath the stars.
Has not Lorenzo's bosom caught the flame?
Immortal! Were but one immortal, how
Would others envy! How would thrones adore!
Because 'tis common, is the blessing lost?
How this ties up the bounteous hand of heaven!
O vain, vain, vain, all else! Eternity!
A glorious and a needful refuge, that
From vile imprisonment, in abject view.
'Tis immortality, 'tis that alone,
Amid life's pains, abasement, emptiness,
The soul can comfort, elevate, and fill.
That only, and that amply this performs;
Lifts us above life's pains, her joys above;
Their terror these, and these their lustre lose;
Eternity depending covers all;
Eternity depending all atchieves;
Sets earth at distance; casts her into shades;
Blends her distinctions; abrogates her powers;
The low, the lofty, joyous, and severe,
Fortune's dread frowns, and fascinating smiles,
Make one promiscuous and neglected heap,
The man beneath; if I may call him man,
Whom immortality's full force inspires.
Nothing terrestrial touches his high thought;
Suns shine unseen, and thunders roll unheard,
By minds quite conscious of their high descent,
Their present province, and their future prize;
Divinely darting upward every wish,
Warm on the wing, in glorious absence lost!
Doubt you this truth? Why labours your belief?
If earth's whole orb by some due distanc'd eye
Were seen at once, her towering Alps would sink,
And levell'd Atlas leave an even sphere.
Thus earth, and all that earthly minds admire,
Is swallow'd in eternity's vast round.
To that stupendous view when souls awake,
So large of late, so mountainous to man,
Time's toys subside; and equal all below.
Enthusiastic this? Then all are weak,
But rank enthusiasts. To this godlike height
Some souls have soar'd; or martyrs ne'er had bled.
And all may do, what has by by man been done.
Who beaten by these sublunary storms,
Boundless, interminable joys can weigh,
Unraptur'd, unexalted, uninflam'd?
What slave unblest, who from to-morrow's dawn
Expects an empire? He forgets his chain,
And thron'd in thought, his absent sceptre waves.
And what a sceptre waits us! what a throne!
Her own immense appointments to compute,
Or comprehend her high prerogatives,
In this her dark minority, how toils,
How vainly pants, the human soul divine!
Too great the bounty seems for earthly joy;
What heart but trembles at so strange a bliss?
In spite of all the truths the muse has sung,
Ne'er to be priz'd enough! enough revolv'd!
Are there who wrap the world so close about them;
They see no farther than the clouds; and dance
On heedless vanity's fantastic toe,
Till stumbling at a straw in their career, [song?
Headlong they plunge, where end both dance and
Are there, Lorenzo? Is it possible?
Are there on earth (let me not call them men)
Who lodge a soul immortal in their breasts;
Unconscious as the mountain of its ore;
Or rock of its ineftimable gem?
When rocks shall melt, and mountains vanish, these
Shall know their treasure; treasure then no more.
Are there (still more amazing!) who resist
The rising thought? who smother in its birth
The glorious truth? who struggle to be brutes?
Who through this bosom-barrier burst their way,
And with revers'd ambition strive to sink?
Who labour downwards through th' opposing powers
Of instinct, reason, and the world against them,
To dismal hopes, and shelter in the shock
Of endless night; darker than the grave's?
Who fight the proofs of immortality?
With horrid zeal, and execrable arts,
Work all their engines, level their black fires,
To blot from man this attribute divine,
(Than vital blood far dearer to the wise)
Blasphemers, and rank atheists to themselves?
To contradict them, see all nature rise!
What object, what event, the moon beneath
But argues or endears an after-scene?
To reason proves, or weds it to desire?
All things proclaim it needful; some advance
One precious step beyond, and prove it sure.
A thousand arguments swarm round my pen,
From heaven, and earth, and man. Indulge a few
By nature, as her common habit worn;
So pressing Providence a truth to teach,
Which truth untaught, all other truths were vain.
Thou, whose all-providential eye surveys,
Whose hand directs, whose spirit fills and warms
Creation, and holds empire far beyond!
Eternity's inhabitant august!
Of two eternities amazing Lord!
One past, ere man's or angel's had begun;
Aid; while I rescue from the foe's assault
Thy glorious immortality in man:
A theme for ever, and for all, of weight,
Of moment infinite! but relish'd most
By those who love thee most, who most adore.
Nature, thy daughter, ever-changing birth
Of thee the Great Immutable, to man

Speaks wiſdom; is his oracle ſupreme;
And he who moſt conſults her, is moſt wiſe.
Lorenzo, to his heavenly Delphos haſte;
And come back all-immortal, all-divine:
Look nature through, 'tis revolution all;
All change; no death. Day follows night; and night
The dying day; ſtars riſe, and ſet, and riſe;
Earth takes th' example. See, the ſummer gay,
With her green chaplet, and ambroſial flowers,
Droops into pallid autumn: Winter gray,
Horrid with froſt, and turbulent with ſtorm,
Blows autumn and his golden fruits away:
Then melts into the ſpring: Soft ſpring, with breath
Favonian, from warm chambers of the ſouth
Recalls the firſt. All, to re-flouriſh, fades;
As in a wheel all ſinks, to re-aſcend.
Emblems of man, who paſſes, not expires.
With this minute diſtinction, emblems juſt,
Nature revolves, but man advances; both
Eternal, that a circle, this a line.
That gravitates, this ſoars. Th' aſpiring ſoul,
Ardent and tremulous, like flame, aſcends,
Zeal and humility her wings, to heaven.
The world of matter, with its various forms,
All dies into new life. Life born from death
Rolls the vaſt maſs, and ſhall for ever roll.
No ſingle atom once in being, loſt,
With change of counſel chargeſt the Moſt High.
What hence infers Lorenzo? Can it be!
Matter immortal? And ſhall ſpirit die?
Above the nobler, ſhall leſs noble riſe?
Shall man alone, for whom all elſe revives,
No reſurrection know? Shall man alone,
Imperial man! be ſown in barren ground,
Leſs privileg'd than grain on which he feeds?
Is man, in whom alone is power to prize
The bliſs of being, or with previous pain
Deplore its period by the ſpleen of fate,
Severely doom'd death's ſingle unredeem'd?
If nature's revolution ſpeaks aloud,
In her gradation, hear her louder ſtill.
Look nature through, 'tis neat gradation all.
By what minute degrees her ſcale aſcends!
Each middle nature join'd at each extreme,
To that above it join'd, to that beneath.
Parts into parts reciprocally ſhot,
Abhor divorce: what love of union reigns!
Here dormant matter waits a call to life;
Half-life, half-death, join there; here life and ſenſe;
There ſenſe from reaſon ſteals a glimmering ray;
Reaſon ſhines out in man. But how preſerv'd
The chain unbroken upward, to the realms
Of incorporeal life? thoſe realms of bliſs,
Where death hath no dominion? Grant a make
Half-mortal, half-immortal; earthly part,
And part ethereal; grant the ſoul of man
Eternal; or in man the ſeries ends,
Wide yawns the gap; connection is no more;
Check'd reaſon halts; her next ſtep wants ſupport;
Striving to climb, ſhe tumbles from her ſcheme;
A ſcheme analogy pronounc'd ſo true;
Analogy, man's ſureſt guide below.
Thus far, all nature calls on thy belief.
And will Lorenzo, careleſs of the call,
Falſe atteſtation on all nature charge,
Rather than violate his league with death?
Renounce his reaſon, rather than renounce
The duſt belov'd, and run the riſk of heaven?
O what indignity to deathleſs ſouls!
What treaſon to the majeſty of man!
Of man immortal! Here the lofty ſtyle:
"If ſo decreed, th' Almighty will be done.
"Let earth diſſolve, yon ponderous orbs deſcend,
"And grind us into duſt. The ſoul is ſafe;
"The man emerges; mounts above the wreck,
"As towering flame from nature's funeral pyre;
"O'er devaſtation, as a gainer, ſmiles;
"His charter, his inviolable rights,
"Well pleas'd to learn from thunder's impotence,
"Death's pointleſs darts, and hell's defeated
"ſtorms."
But theſe chimeras touch not thee, Lorenzo!
The glories of the world thy ſevenfold ſhield.
Other ambition than of crowns in air,
And ſuperlunary felicities,
Thy boſom warm. I'll cool it, if I can;
And turn thoſe glories that inchant againſt thee.
What ties thee to this life, proclaims the next.
If wiſe, the cauſe that wounds thee is thy cure.
Come, my ambitious! let us mount together
(To mount, Lorenzo, never can refuſe);
And from the clouds, where pride delights to dwell,
Look down on earth.—What ſeeſt thou? Wondrous things!
Terreſtrial wonders, that eclipſe the ſkies.
What lengths of labour'd lands! what loaded ſeas!
Loaded by man for pleaſure, wealth, or war!
Seas, winds, and planets, into ſervice brought,
His art acknowledge, and promote his ends.
Nor can th' eternal rocks his will withſtand;
What levell'd mountains! and what lifted vales!
O'er vales and mountains ſumptuous cities ſwell,
And gild our landſcape with their glittering ſpires.
Some mid the wondering waves majeſtic riſe;
And Neptune holds a mirror to their charms.
Far greater ſtill! (what cannot mortal might?)
See, wide dominions raviſh'd from the deep!
The narrow'd deep with indignation foams.
Or ſouthward turn; to delicate and grand,
The finer arts there ripen in the ſun.
How the tall temples, as to meet their gods,
Aſcend the ſkies! the proud triumphal arch
Shows us half heaven beneath its ample bend.
Hid through mid air, here ſtreams are taught to flow;
Whole rivers there, laid by in baſons, ſleep.
Here, plains turn oceans; there, vaſt oceans join
Through kingdoms channell'd deep from ſhore to ſhore;
And chang'd creation takes his face from man.
Beats thy brave breaſt for formidable ſcenes,
Where fame and empire wait upon the ſword?
See fields in blood; here navel thunders riſe;
Britannia's voice! that awes the world to peace.
How yon enormous mole projecting breaks
The mid-ſea, furious waves! Their roar amidſt,
Out-ſpeaks the Deity, and ſays, "O main!
"Thus far, nor farther; new reſtraints obey."
Earth's diſembowell'd! meaſur'd are the ſkies!

Stars are detected in their deep recefs!
Creation widens! vanquifh'd nature yields!
Her fecrets are extorted! art prevails!
What monument of genius, fpirit, power!
And now, Lorenzo! raptur'd at this fcene,
Whofe glories render heaven fuperfluous! fay,
Whofe footfteps thefe?—Immortals have been here.
Could lefs than fouls immortal this have done?
Earth's cover'd o'er with proofs of fouls immortal;
And proofs of immortality forgot.
To flatter thy grand foible, I confefs
Thefe are ambition's works: and thefe are great:
But this, the leaft immortal fouls can do;
Tranfcend them all—but what can thefe tranfcend?
Doft afk me what?—one figh for the diftreft.
What then for infidels? A deeper figh.
'Tis moral grandeur makes the mighty man:
How little they, who think ought great below!
All our ambitions death defeats, but one;
All that it crowns. Here ceafe we: but ere long,
More powerful proof fhall take the field againft thee,
Stronger than death, and fmiling at the tomb.

NIGHT VII.

BEING THE SECOND PART OF

THE INFIDEL RECLAIMED.

Containing the Nature, Proof, and Importance of Immortality.

PREFACE.

As we are at war with the power, it were well if we were at war with the manners of France. A land of levity is a land of guilt. A ferious mind is the native foil of every virtue; and the fingle character that does true honour to mankind. The foul's immortality has been the favourite theme with the ferious of all ages. Nor is it ftrange; it is a fubject by far the moft intereffing and important that can enter the mind of man. Of higheft moment this fubject always was, and always will be. Yet this its higheft moment feems to admit of increafe at this day; a fort of occafional importance is fuperadded to the natural weight of it; if that opinion which is advanced in the preface to the preceding Night, be juft. It is there fuppofed, that all our infidels, whatever fcheme, for argument's fake, and to keep themfelves in countenance, they patronize, are betrayed into their deplorable error, by fome doubts of their immortality, at the bottom. And the more I confider this point, the more I am perfuaded of the truth of that opinion. Though the diftruft of a futurity is a ftrange error; yet it is an error into which bad men may naturally be diftreffed. For it is impoffible to bid defiance to final ruin, without fome refuge in imagination, fome prefumption of efcape. And what prefumption is there? There are but two in nature; but two, within the compafs of human thought. And thefe are—That either God will not, or can not punifh. Confidering the divine attributes, the firft is too grofs to be digefted by our ftrongeft wifhes. And fince omnipotence is as much a divine attribute as holinefs, that God can not punifh, is as abfurd a fuppofition, as the former. God certainly can punifh as long as wicked men exift. In non-exiftence, therefore, is their only refuge; and, confequently, non-exiftence is their ftrongeft wifh. And ftrong wifhes have a ftrange influence on our opinions; they bias the judgment in a manner, almoft, incredible. And fince on this member of their alternative, there are fome very fmall appearances in their favour, and none at all on the other, they catch at this reed, they lay hold on this chimæra, to fave themfelves from the fhock and horror of an immediate and abfolute defpair.

On reviewing my fubject, by the light which this argument, and others of like tendency, threw upon it, I was more inclined than ever to purfue it, as it appeared to me to ftrike directly at the main root of all our infidelity. In the following pages it is, accordingly, purfued at large; and fome arguments for immortality, new at leaft to me, are ventured on in them. There alfo the writer has made an attempt to fet the grofs abfurdities and horrors of annihilation in a fuller and more affecting view, than is (I think) to be met with elfewhere.

The gentlemen, for whofe fake this attempt was chiefly made, profefs great admiration for the wifdom of heathen antiquity: what pity it is they are not fincere! If they were fincere, how would it mortify them to confider, with what contempt and abhorrence their notions would have been received by thofe whom they fo much admire! What degree of contempt and abhorrence would fall to their fhare, may be conjectured by the following matter of fact (in my opinion) extremely memorable. Of all their heathen worthies, Socrates (it is well known) was the moft guarded, difpaffionate, and compofed: yet this great maftor of temper was angry; and angry at his laft hour; and angry with his friend; and angry at for what deferved acknowledgement; angry for a right and tender inftance of true friendfhip towards him. Is not this furprifing? What could be the caufe? The caufe was for his honour; it was a truly noble, though, perhaps, a too punctilious, regard for immortality: for his friend afking him, with fuch an affectionate concern as became a friend, "Where he fhould depofite his remains?" it was refented by Socrates, as implying a difhonourable fuppofition, that he could be fo mean, as to have a regard for any thing, even in himfelf, that was not immortal.

This fact well confidered would make our infidels withdraw their admiration from Socrates; or make them endeavour, by their imitation of this illuftrious example, to fhare his glory: and, confequently, it would incline them to perufe the following pages with candour and impartiality: which is all I defire; and that, for their fakes: for I am perfuaded, that an unprejudiced infidel muft, neceffarily, receive fome advantageous impreffions from them.

CONTENTS.

In the fixth Night arguments were drawn, from

Nature, in proof of immortality: here, others are drawn from Man: from his Diſcontent, Ver. 29.; from his Paſſions and Powers, 64; from the gradual growth of Reaſon, 81; from his fear of Death, 86; from the nature of Hope, 104, and of Virtue, 159, &c. from Knowledge and Love, as being the moſt eſſential properties of the ſoul, 253; from the Order of Creation, 290, &c. from the nature of Ambition, 337, &c. Avarice, 460; Pleaſure, 477; a digreſſion on the grandeur of the Paſſions, 521. Immortality alone renders our preſent ſtate intelligible, 545. An objection from the Stoics diſbelief of immortality anſwered, 585. Endleſs queſtions unreſolvable, but on ſuppoſition of our immortality, 606. The natural, moſt melancholy, and pathetic complaint of a worthy man, under the perſuaſion of no futurity, 653, &c. The groſs abſurdities and horrors of annihilation urged home on Lorenzo, 842, &c. The ſoul's vaſt importance, 990, &c. from whence it ariſes, 1078. The Difficulty of being an infidel, 1131, the Infamy, 1148, the Cauſe, 1183, and the Character, 1203, of an infidel ſtate. What true free-thinking is, 1217. The neceſſary puniſhment of the falſe, 1271. Man's ruin is from himſelf, 1303. An infidel accuſes himſelf of guilt, and hypocriſy, and that of the worſt ſort, 1319. His obligation to Chriſtians, 1337. What danger he incurs by Virtue, 1345. Vice recommended to him, 1364. His high pretences to Virtue and Benevolence, exploded, 1373. The concluſion, on the nature of Faith, 1427. Reaſon, 1439; and Hope, 1443; with an apology for this attempt, 1470.

HEAVEN gives the needful, but neglected, call,
What day, what hour, but knocks at human hearts,
To wake the ſoul to ſenſe of future ſcenes?
Deaths ſtand, like Mercuries, in every way,
And kindly point us to our journey's end.
Pope, who couldſt make immortals! art thou dead?
I give thee joy: nor will I take my leave;
So ſoon to follow. Man but dives in death;
Dives from the ſun, in fairer day to riſe;
The grave, his ſubterranean road to bliſs.
Yes, infinite indulgence plann'd it ſo;
Through various parts our glorious ſtory runs;
Time gives the preface, endleſs age unrolls
The volume (ne'er unroll'd!) of human fate.
This, earth and ſkies * already have proclaim'd.
The world's a prophecy of worlds to come;
And who, what God fortels (who ſpeaks in things,
Still louder than in words) ſhall dare deny?
If nature's arguments appear too weak,
Turn a new leaf, and ſtronger read in man.
If man ſleeps on, untaught by what he ſees,
Can he prove infidel to what he feels?
He, whoſe blind thought futurity denies,
Unconſcious bears, Bellerophon! like thee,
His own indictment; he condemns himſelf;
Who reads his boſom, reads immortal life;
Or, nature, there, impoſing on her ſons,
Has written fables; man was made a lie.

Why diſcontent for ever harbour'd there?
Incurable conſumption of our peace!
Reſolve me, why the cottager and king,
He whom ſea-ſever'd realms obey, and he
Who ſteals his whole dominion from the waſte,
Repelling winter blaſts with mud and ſtraw,
Diſquieted alike, draw figh for figh,
In fate ſo diſtant, in complaint ſo near?
Is it, that things terreſtrial can't content?
Deep in rich paſture, will thy flocks complain?
Not ſo; but to their maſter is deny'd
To ſhare their ſweet ſerene. Man, ill at eaſe,
In this, not his own place, this foreign field,
Where nature fodders him with other food
Than was ordain'd his cravings to ſuffice,
Poor in abundance, famiſh'd at a feaſt,
Sighs on for ſomething more, when moſt enjoy'd.
Is heaven then kinder to thy flocks than thee?
Not ſo; thy paſture richer, but remote;
In part, remote; for that remoter part
Man bleats from inſtinct, though perhaps, debauch'd
By ſenſe, his reaſon ſleeps, nor dreams the cauſe.
The cauſe how obvious, when his reaſon wakes!
His grief is but his grandeur in diſguiſe;
And diſcontent is immortality.
Shall ſons of ether, ſhall the blood of heaven,
Set up their hopes on earth, and ſtable here
With brutal acquieſcence in the mire?
Lorenzo! no! they ſhall be nobly pain'd;
The glorious foreigners, diſtreſs'd, ſhall ſigh
On thrones; and thou congratulate the figh:
Man's miſery declares him born for bliſs;
His anxious heart aſſerts the truth I ſing,
And gives the ſceptic in his head the lie.
Our heads, our hearts, our paſſions, and our powers,
Speak the ſame language; call us to the ſkies;
Unripen'd theſe in this inclement clime,
Scarce riſe above conjecture and miſtake;
And for this land of trifles thoſe too ſtrong
Tumultuous riſe, and tempeſt human life:
What prize on earth can pay us for the ſtorm?
Meet objects for our paſſions, heaven ordain'd,
Objects that challenge all their fire, and leave
No fault, but in defect: Bleſt Heaven! avert
A bounded ardour for unbounded bliſs!
O for a bliſs unbounded! far beneath
A ſoul immortal, is a mortal joy.
Nor are our powers to periſh immature;
But, after feeble effort here, beneath
A brighter ſun, and in a nobler ſoil,
Tranſplanted from this ſublunary bed,
Shall flouriſh fair, and put forth all their bloom.
Reaſon progreſſive, inſtinct is complete;
Swift inſtinct leaps; ſlow reaſon feebly climbs.
Brutes ſoon their zenith reach; their little all
Flows in at once; in ages they no more
Could know, or do, or covet, or enjoy.
Were man to live coëval with the ſun,
The patriarch-pupil would be learning ſtill;
Yet, dying, leave his leſſon half unlearnt.
Men periſh in advance, as if the ſun
Should ſet ere noon, in eaſtern oceans drown'd;
If fit, with dim, illuſtrious to compare,
The ſun's meridian with the ſoul of man.

* Night the Sixth.

To man, why, ſtep-dame nature! ſo ſevere?
Why thrown aſide thy maſter-piece half-wrought,
While meaner efforts thy laſt hand enjoy?
Or, if abortively poor man muſt die,
Nor reach, what reach he might, why die in dread?
Why curſt with foreſight? Wiſe to miſery?
Why of his proud prerogative the prey?
Why leſs pre-eminent in rank, than pain?
His immortality alone can tell;
Full ample fund to balance all amiſs,
And turn the ſcale in favour of the juſt!
His immortality alone can ſolve
The darkeſt of enigmas, human hope;
Of all the darkeſt, if at death we die.
Hope, eager hope, th' aſſaſſin of our joy,
All preſent bleſſings treading under foot,
Is ſcarce a milder tyrant than deſpair.
With no paſt toils content, ſtill planning new,
Hope turns us o'er to death alone for eaſe.
Poſſeſſion, why more taſteleſs than purſuit?
Why is a wiſh far dearer than a crown?
That wiſh accompliſh'd, why, the grave of bliſs?
Becauſe in the great future bury'd deep,
Beyond our plans of empire, and renown,
Lies all that man with ardour ſhould purſue;
And he who made him, bent him to the right.
Man's heart th' Almighty to the future ſets,
By ſecret and inviolable ſprings;
And makes his hope his ſublunary joy.
Man's heart eats all things, and is hungery ſtill;
"More, more!" the glutton cries: for ſomething new
So rages appetite, if man can't mount,
He will deſcend. He ſtarves on the poſſeſt.
Hence, the world's maſter, from ambition's ſpire,
In Caprea plung'd; and div'd beneath the brute.
In that rank ſty why wallow'd empire's ſon
Supreme? Becauſe he could no higher fly;
His riot was ambition in deſpair.
Old Rome conſulted birds; Lorenzo! thou,
With more ſucceſs, the flight of hope ſurvey;
Of reſtleſs hope, for ever on the wing.
High-perch'd o'er every thought that falcon ſits,
To fly at all that riſes in her ſight;
And, never ſtooping, but to mount again
Next moment, ſhe betrays her aim's miſtake,
And owns her quarry lodg'd beyond the grave.
There ſhould it fail us (it muſt fail us there,
If being fails) more mournful riddles riſe,
And virtue vies with hope in myſtery.
Why virtue? Where its praiſe, its being, fled?
Virtue is true ſelf-intereſt purſued:
What true ſelf-intereſt of quite-mortal man?
To cloſe with all that makes him happy here.
If vice (as ſometimes) is our friend on earth,
Then vice is virtue; 'tis our ſovereign good.
In ſelf-applauſe is virtue's golden prize;
No ſelf-applauſe attends it on thy ſcheme:
Whence ſelf-applauſe? From conſcience of the right.
And what is right, but means of happineſs?
No means of happineſs when virtue yields;
That baſis failing, falls the building too,
And lays in ruin every virtuous joy.
The rigid guardian of a blameleſs heart,
So long rever'd, ſo long reputed wiſe,
Is weak; with rank knight-errantries o'er-run,
Why beats thy boſom with illuſtrious dreams
Of ſelf-expoſure, laudable, and great?
Of gallant enterpriſe, and glorious death?
Die for thy country?—Thou romantic fool!
Seize, ſeize the plank thyſelf, and let her ſink:
Thy country! what to thee?—The Godhead, what?
(I ſpeak with awe!) though he ſhould bid thee bleed?
If, with thy blood, thy final hope is ſpilt,
Nor can Omnipotence reward the blow,
Be deaf; preſerve thy being; diſobey.
Nor is it diſobedience: know, Lorenzo!
Whate'er th' Almighty's ſubſequent command,
His firſt command is this:—"Man, love thyſelf."
In this alone, free-agents are not free.
Exiſtence is the baſis, bliſs the prize;
If virtue coſts exiſtence, 'tis a crime;
Bold violation of our law ſupreme,
Black ſuicide; though nations, which conſult
Their gain, at thy expence, reſound applauſe.
Since virtue's recompence is doubtful here,
If man dies wholly, well may we demand
Why is man ſuffer'd to be good in vain?
Why to be good in vain is man enjoin'd?
Why to be good in vain is man betray'd?
Betray'd by traitors lodg'd in his own breaſt,
By ſweet complacencies from virtue felt?
Why whiſpers nature lies on virtue's part?
Or if blind inſtinct (which aſſumes the name
Of ſacred conſcience) plays the fool in man,
Why reaſon made accomplice in the cheat?
Why are the wiſeſt loudeſt in her praiſe?
Can man by reaſon's beam be led aſtray?
Or, at his peril, imitate his God?
Since virtue ſometimes ruins us on earth,
Or both are true, or man ſurvives the grave.
Or man ſurvives the grave; or own, Lorenzo,
Thy boaſt ſupreme, a wild abſurdity.
Dauntleſs thy ſpirit; cowards are thy ſcorn.
Grant man immortal, and thy ſcorn is juſt.
The man immortal, rationally brave,
Dares ruſh on death—becauſe he cannot die.
But if man loſes all when life is loſt,
He lives a coward, or a fool expires.
A daring infidel (and ſuch there are,
From pride, example, lucre, rage, revenge,
Or pure heroical defect of thought,)
Of all earth's madmen moſt deſerves a chain.
When to the grave we follow the renown'd
For valour, virtue, ſcience, all we love,
And all we praiſe; for worth, whoſe noon-tide beam,
Enabling us to think in higher ſtyle,
Mends our ideas of ethereal powers,
Dream we that luſtre of the moral world
Goes out in ſtench, and rottenneſs the cloſe?
Why was he wiſe to know, and warm to praiſe,
And ſtrenuous to tranſcribe, in human life,
The Mind Almighty? Could it be that fate,
Juſt when the lineaments began to ſhine,
And dawn the Deity, ſhould ſnatch the draught,
With night eternal blot it out, and give
The ſkies alarm, leſt angels too might die?
If human ſouls, why not angelic too,

Extinguish'd? and a solitary God
O'er ghastly ruin frowning from his throne!
Shall we this moment gaze on God in man?
The next lose man for ever in the dust?
From dust we disengage, or man mistakes;
And there, where least his judgment fears a flaw,
Wisdom and worth how boldly he commends!
Wisdom and worth are sacred names; rever'd
Where not embrac'd; applauded! deify'd!
Why not compassion'd too? If spirits die,
Both are calamities, inflicted both
To make us but more wretched: Wisdom's eye
Acute, for what? To spy more miseries;
And worth, so recompens'd, new-points their stings.
Or man surmounts the grave, or gain is loss,
And worth exalted humbles us the more.
Thou wilt not patronise a scheme that makes
Weakness and vice the refuge of mankind.
"Has virtue then no joys?"—Yes, joys dear bought,
Talk ne'er so long, in this imperfect state,
Virtue and vice are at eternal war.
Virtue's a combat; and who fights for nought?
Or for precarious, or for small reward?
Who virtue's self-reward so loud resound,
Would take degrees angelic here below,
And virtue, while they compliment, betray,
By feeble motives, and unfaithful guards.
The crown, th' unfading crown, her soul inspires;
'Tis that, and that alone, can countervail
The body's treacheries, and the world's assaults:
On earth's poor pay our famish'd virtue dies.
Truth inconteStable! in spite of all
A Bayle has preach'd, or a Voltaire believ'd.
In man the more we dive, the more we see
Heaven's signet stamping an immortal make.
Dive to the bottom of his soul, the base
Sustaining all; what find we? Knowledge, love:
As light and heat essential to the sun,
These to the soul. And why, if souls expire?
How little lovely here? How little known?
Small knowledge we dig up with endless toil;
And love unfeign'd may purchase perfect hate.
Why starv'd on earth our angel appetites,
While brutal are indulg'd their fulsome fill?
Were then capacities divine conferr'd,
As a mock diadem, in savage sport,
Rank insult of our pompous poverty,
Which reaps but pain from seeming claims so fair?
In future age lies no redress? And shuts
Eternity the door on our complaint?
If so, for what strange ends were mortals made!
The worst to wallow, and the best to weep;
The man who merits most must most complain:
Can we conceive a disregard in heaven,
What the worst perpetrate, or best endure?
This cannot be. To love, and know, in man
Is boundless appetite, and boundless power;
And these demonstrate boundless objects too.
Objects, powers, appetites, heaven suits in all;
Nor, nature through, e'er violates this sweet,
Eternal concord, on her tuneful string.
Is man the sole exception from her laws?
Eternity struck off from human hope,
(I speak with truth, but veneration too)
Man is a monster, the reproach of heaven,
A stain, a dark impenetrable cloud
On nature's beauteous aspect, and deforms,
(Amazing blot!) deforms her with her lord.
If such is man's allotment, what is heaven?
Or own the soul immortal, or blaspheme.
Or own the soul immortal, or invert
All order. Go, mock majesty! go, man!
And bow to thy superiors of the stall;
Through every scene of sense superior far:
They graze the turf untill'd; they drink the stream
Unbrew'd, and ever full, and unembitter'd
With doubts, fears, fruitless hopes, regrets, despairs;
Mankind's peculiar! reason's precious dower!
No foreign clime they ransack for their robes;
Nor brothers cite to the litigious bar;
Their good is good entire, unmix'd, unmarr'd;
They find a paradise in every field,
On boughs forbidden where no curses hang:
Their ill no more than strikes the sense; unstretch'd
By previous dread, or murmur in the rear:
When the worst comes, it comes unfear'd; one stroke
Begins and ends their woe: they die but once;
Blest, incommunicable privilege! for which
Proud man, who rules the globe, and reads the stars,
Philosopher, or hero, sighs in vain.
Account for this prerogative in brutes.
No day, no glimpse of day, to solve the knot,
But what beams on it from eternity.
O sole, and sweet solution! that unties
The difficult, and softens the severe;
The cloud on nature's beauteous face dispels,
Restores bright order, casts the brute beneath,
And re-enthrones us in supremacy
Of joy ev'n here: admit immortal life,
And virtue is knight-errantry no more;
Each virtue brings in hand a golden dower,
Far richer in reversion: Hope exults;
And though much bitter in our cup is thrown,
Predominates, and gives the taste of heaven.
O wherefore is the Deity so kind?
Astonishing beyond astonishment!
Heaven our reward—for heaven enjoy'd below.
Still unsubdu'd thy stubborn heart?—For there
The traitor lurks who doubts the truth I sing.
Reason is guiltless; will alone rebels.
What in that stubborn heart if I should find
New unexpected witnesses against thee?
Ambition, pleasure, and the love of gain!
Canst thou suspect that these, which make the soul
The slave of earth, should own her heir of heaven?
Canst thou suspect what makes us disbelieve
Our immortality, should prove it sure?
First then ambition summon to the bar.
Ambition's shame, extravagance, disgust,
And inextinguishable nature, speak.
Each much deposes; hear them in their turn.
Thy soul, how passionately fond of fame!
How anxious that fond passion to conceal!
We blush, detected in designs on praise,
Though for best deeds, and from the best of men;
And why? Because immortal. Art divine
Has made the body tutor to the soul;
Heaven kindly gives our blood a moral flow;

Bids it aſcend the glowing cheek, and there
Upbraid that little heart's inglorious aim
Which ſtoops to court a character from man;
While o'er us in tremendous judgment ſit
Far more than man, with endleſs praiſe, and blame.
Ambition's bourdleſs appetite out-ſpeaks
The verdict of its ſhame. When ſouls take fire
At high preſumptions of their own deſert,
One age is poor applauſe; the mighty ſhout,
The thunder by the living few begun,
Late time muſt echo, worlds unborn reſound.
We wiſh our names eternally to live:
Wild dream, which ne'er had haunted human thought,
Had not our natures been eternal too.
Inſtinct points out an intereſt in hereafter;
But our blind reaſon ſees not where it lies;
Or, ſeeing, gives the ſubſtance for the ſhade.
Fame is the ſhade of immortality,
And in itſelf a ſhadow. Soon as caught,
Contemn'd; it ſhrinks to nothing in the graſp.
Conſult th' ambitious, 'tis ambition's cure.
"And is this all?" cry'd Cæſar at his height,
Diſguſted. This third proof ambition brings
Of immortality. The firſt in fame,
Obſerve him near, your envy will abate:
Sham'd at the diſproportion vaſt; between
The paſſion and the purchaſe, he will ſigh
At ſuch ſucceſs, and bluſh at his renown.
And why? Becauſe far richer prize invites
His heart; far more illuſtrious glory calls;
It calls in whiſpers, yet the deafeſt hear.
And can ambition a fourth proof ſupply?
It can, and ſtronger than the former three;
Yet quite o'erlook'd by ſome reputed wiſe.
Though diſappointments in ambition pain,
And though ſucceſs diſguſts, yet ſtill, Lorenzo,
In vain we ſtrive to pluck it from our hearts;
By nature planted for the nobleſt ends.
Abſurd the fam'd advice to Pyrrhus given;
More prais'd than ponder'd; ſpecious, but unſound;
Sooner that hero's ſword the world had quell'd
Than reaſon his ambition. Man muſt ſoar.
An obſtinate activity within,
An inſuppreſſive ſpring, will toſs him up
In ſpite of fortune's load. Not kings alone,
Each villager has his ambition too;
No Sultan prouder than his fetter'd ſlave:
Slaves build their little Babylons of ſtraw,
Echo the proud Aſſyrian in their hearts,
And cry, "Behold the wonders of my might!"
And why? Becauſe immortal as their lord;
And ſouls immortal muſt for ever heave
At ſomething great, the glitter or the gold,
The praiſe of mortals, or the praiſe of heaven.
Nor abſolutely vain is human praiſe,
When human is ſupported by divine.
I'll introduce Lorenzo to himſelf;
Pleaſure and pride (bad maſters!) ſhare our hearts,
As love of pleaſure is ordain'd to guard
And feed our bodies, and extend our race,
The love of praiſe is planted to protect
And propagate the glories of the mind.
What is it but the love of praiſe inſpires,
Matures, refines, embelliſhes, exalts,
Earth's happineſs? From that the delicate,
The grand, the marvellous, of civil life,
Want and convenience, under-workers, lay
The baſis on which love of glory builds.
Nor is thy life, O virtue! leſs in debt
To praiſe, thy ſecret ſtimulating friend.
Were men not proud, what merit ſhould we miſs!
Pride made the virtues of the pagan world.
Praiſe is the ſalt that ſeaſons right to man,
And whets his appetite for moral good.
Thirſt of applauſe is virtue's ſecond guard;
Reaſon her firſt; but reaſon wants an aid;
Our private reaſon is a flatterer;
Thirſt of applauſe calls public judgment in,
To poiſe our own, to keep an even ſcale,
And give endanger'd virtue fairer play.
Here a fifth proof ariſes, ſtronger ſtill:
Why this ſo nice conſtruction of our hearts?
Theſe delicate moralities of ſenſe,
This conſtitutional reſerve of aid
To ſuccour virtue when our reaſon fails,
If virtue, kept alive by care and toil,
And oft the mark of injuries on earth,
When labour'd to maturity (its bill
Of diſciplines, and pains, unpaid) muſt die?
Why freighted-rich to daſh againſt a rock?
Were man to periſh when moſt fit to live,
O how miſ-ſpent were all theſe ſtratagems,
By ſkill divine enwoven in our frame!
Where are heaven's holineſs and mercy fled?
Laughs heaven at once at virtue and at man?
If not, why that diſcourag'd, this deſtroy'd?
Thus far ambition. What ſays avarice?
This her chief maxim, which has long been thine:
"The wiſe and wealthy are the ſame,"—I grant it.
To ſtore up treaſure with inceſſant toil,
This is man's province, this his higheſt praiſe.
To this great end keen inſtinct ſtings him on.
To guide that inſtinct, reaſon, is thy charge;
'Tis thine to tell us where true treaſure lies:
But, reaſon failing to diſcharge her truſt,
Or to the deaf diſcharging it in vain,
A blunder follows; and blind induſtry,
Gall'd by the ſpur, but ſtranger to the courſe,
(The courſe where ſtakes of more than gold are won)
O'erloading with the cares of diſtant age,
The jaded ſpirits of the preſent hour,
Provides for an eternity below.
"Thou ſhalt not covet," is a wiſe command;
But bounded to the wealth the ſun ſurveys:
Look farther, the command ſtands quite revers'd,
And avarice is a virtue moſt divine.
Is faith a refuge for our happineſs?
Moſt ſure; and is it not for reaſon too?
Nothing this world unriddles but the next.
Whence inextinguiſhable thirſt of gain?
From inextinguiſhable life in man:
Man, if not meant by worth to reach the ſkies,
Had wanted wing to fly ſo far in guilt.
Sour grapes, I grant, ambition, avarice,
Yet ſtill their root is immortality:
Theſe its wild growths, ſo bitter and ſo baſe,
(Pain and reproach!) religion can reclaim,
Refine, exalt, throw down their poiſonous lee,

And make them ſparkle in the bowl of bliſs.
See, the third witneſs laughs at bliſs remote,
And falſely promiſes an Eden here:
Truth ſhe ſhall ſpeak for once, though prone to lie,
A common cheat, and pleaſure is her name.
To pleaſure never was Lorenzo deaf;
Then hear her now, now firſt thy real friend.
Since nature made us not more fond than proud
Of happineſs (whence hypocrites in joy!
Makers of mirth! artificers of ſmiles!)
Why ſhould the joy moſt poignant ſenſe affords
Burn us with bluſhes, and rebuke our pride?—
Thoſe heaven-born bluſhes tell us man deſcends,
Ev'n in the zenith of his earthly bliſs:
Should reaſon take her infidel repoſe,
This honeſt inſtinct ſpeaks our lineage high;
This inſtinct calls on darkneſs to conceal
Our rapturous relation to the ſtalls.
Our glory covers us with noble ſhame,
And he that's unconfounded, is unmann'd.
The man that bluſhes is not quite a brute.
Thus far with thee, Lorenzo! will I cloſe,
Pleaſure is good, and man for pleaſure made;
But pleaſure full of glory, as of joy;
Pleaſure, which neither bluſhes, nor expires.
The witneſſes are heard; the cauſe is o'er;
Let conſcience file the ſentence in her court,
Dearer than deeds that half a realm convey:
Thus ſeal'd by truth, th' authentic record runs.
" Know, all; know, infidels,—unapt to know!
" 'Tis immortality your nature ſolves;
" 'Tis immortality decyphers man,
" And opens all the myſteries of his make.
" Without it half his inſtincts are a riddle;
" Without it all his virtues are a dream,
" His very crimes atteſt his dignity;
" His fateleſs thirſt of pleaſure, gold, and fame,
" Declares him born for bleſſings infinite:
" What leſs than infinite makes un-abſurd
" Paſſions, which all on earth but more inflames?
" Fierce paſſions, ſo miſ-meaſur'd to this ſcene,
" Stretch'd out, like eagles wings, beyond our neſt,
" Far, far beyond the worth of all below.
" For earth too large, preſage a nobler flight,
" And evidence our title to the ſkies."
Ye gentle theologues, of calmer kind!
Whoſe conſtitution dictates to your pen, [hell!
Who, cold yourſelves, think ardour comes from
Think not our paſſions from corruption ſprung,
Though to corruption now they lend their wings;
That is their miſtreſs, not their mother. All
(And juſtly) reaſon deem divine: I ſee,
I feel a grandeur, in the paſſions too,
Which ſpeaks their high deſcent, and glorious end;
Which ſpeaks them rays of an eternal fire.
In Paradiſe itſelf they burnt as ſtrong,
Ere Adam fell; though wiſer in their aim,
Like the proud Eaſtern, ſtruck by Providence,
What though our paſſions are run mad, and ſtoop
With low, terreſtrial appetite, to graze
On traſh, on toys, dethron'd from high deſire?
Yet ſtill, through their diſgrace, no feeble ray
Of greatneſs ſhines, and tells us whence they fell:
But theſe (like that fall'n monarch when reclaim'd),
When reaſon moderates the rein aright,
Shall re-aſcend, remount their former ſphere,
Where once they ſoar'd illuſtrious; ere ſeduc'd
By wanton Eve's debauch, to ſtroll on earth,
And ſet the ſublunary world on fire.
But grant their phrenſy laſts; their phrenſy fails
To diſappoint one providential end,
For which heaven blew up ardour in our hearts:
Were reaſon ſilent, boundleſs paſſion ſpeaks
A future ſcene of boundleſs objects too,
And brings glad tidings of eternal day.
Eternal day! 'Tis that enlightens all;
And all, by that enlighten'd, proves it ſure.
Conſider man as an immortal being,
Intelligible all; and all is great;
A cryſtalline tranſparency prevails,
And ſtrikes full luſtre through the human ſphere;
Conſider man as mortal, all is dark,
And wretched; reaſon weeps at the ſurvey.
The learn'd Lorenzo cries, " And let her weep,
" Weak modern reaſon: Ancient times were wiſe.
" Authority, that venerable guide,
" Stands on my part; the fam'd Athenian porch
" (And who for wiſdom ſo renown'd as they?)
" Deny'd this immortality to man."
I grant it; but affirm, they prov'd it too.
A riddle this!—Have patience; I'll explain.
What noble vanities, what moral flights,
Glittering through their romantic wiſdom's page,
Make us, at once, deſpiſe them, and admire?
Fable is flat to theſe high-ſeaſon'd fires!
They leave th' extravagance of ſong below.
" Fleſh ſhall not feel; or, feeling, ſhall enjoy
" The dagger or the rack; to them, alike
" A bed of roſes, or the burning bull."
In men exploding all beyond the grave,
Strange doctrine, this! As doctrine, it was ſtrange:
But not, as prophecy; for ſuch it prov'd,
And, to their own amazement, was fulfill'd:
They feign'd a firmneſs Chriſtians need not feign.
The Chriſtian truly triumpli'd in the flame:
The Stoic ſaw, in double wonder loſt,
Wonder at them, and wonder at himſelf,
To find the bold adventures of his thought,
Not bold, and that he ſtrove to lie in vain.
Whence, then, thoſe thoughts? Thoſe towering thoughts, that flew
Such monſtrous heights?—From inſtinct, and from pride.
The glorious inſtinct of a deathleſs ſoul,
Confuſ'dly conſcious of her dignity,
Suggeſted truths they could not underſtand.
In luſt's dominion, and in paſſion's ſtorm,
Truth's ſyſtem broken, ſcatter'd fragments lay,
As light in chaos, glimmering through the gloom:
Smit with the pomp of lofty ſentiments,
Pleas'd pride proclaim'd, what reaſon diſbeliev'd,
Pride, like the Delphic prieſteſs, with a ſwell,
Rav'd nonſenſe, deſtin'd to be future ſenſe,
When life immortal, in full day, ſhould ſhine;
And death's dark ſhadows fly the goſpel ſun.
They ſpoke, what nothing but immortal ſouls
Could ſpeak; and thus the truth they queſtion'd, prov'd.
Can then abſurdities, as well as crimes,
Speak man immortal? All things ſpeak him ſo.

Much has been urg'd: and doſt thou call for more?
Call; and with endleſs queſtions be diſtreſs'd,
All unreſolvable, if earth is all.
" Why life, a moment; infinite, deſire?
" Our wiſh, eternity? Our home, the grave?
" Heaven's promiſe dormant lies in human hope;
" Who wiſhes life immortal, proves it too.
" Why happineſs purſued, though never found?
" Man's thirſt of happineſs declares it is,
" (For nature never gravitates to nought);
" That thirſt unquench'd declares it is not here.
" My Lucia, thy Clariſſa, call to thought;
" Why cordial friendſhip rivetted ſo deep,
" As hearts to pierce at firſt, at parting rend,
" If friend, and friendſhip, vaniſh in an hour?
" Is not this torment in the maſk of joy?
" Why by reflection marr'd the joys of ſenſe?
" Why paſt, and future, preying on our hearts,
" And putting all our preſent joys to death?
" Why labours reaſon? inſtinct were as well;
" Inſtinct far better; what can chooſe, can err:
" O how infallible the thoughtleſs brute!
" 'Twere well his Holineſs were half as ſure.
" Reaſon with inclination, why at war?
" Why ſenſe of guilt? why conſcience up in arms?"
Conſcience of guilt, is prophecy of pain,
And boſom-council to decline the blow.
Reaſon with inclination ne'er had jarr'd,
If nothing future paid forbearance here:
Thus on—theſe, and a thouſand pleas uncall'd,
All promiſe, ſome enſue, a ſecond ſcene;
Which, were it doubtful, would be dearer far
Than all things elſe moſt certain; were it falſe.
What truth on earth ſo precious as the lie?
This world it gives us, let what will enſue;
This world it gives, in that high cordial, hope:
The future of the preſent is the ſoul:
How this life groans, when ſever'd from the next!
Poor mutilated wretch, that diſbelieves!
By dark diſtruſt his being cut in two,
In both parts periſhes; life void of joy,
Sad prelude of eternity in pain!
Couldſt thou perſuade me, the next life could fail
Our ardent wiſhes; how ſhould I pour out
My bleeding heart in anguiſh, new, as deep!
Oh! with what thoughts, thy hope, and my deſpair,
Abhorr'd annihilation! blaſts the ſoul,
And wide extends the bounds of human woe!
Could I believe Lorenzo's ſyſtem true,
In this black channel would my ravings run.
" Grief from the future borrow'd peace, ere while.
" The future vaniſh'd! and the preſent pain'd!
" Strange import of unprecedented ill!
" Fall, how profound! Like Lucifer's, the fall!
" Unequal fate! his fall, without his guilt!
" From where ſond hope built her pavilion high,
" The gods among, hurl'd headlong, hurl'd at once
" To night! To nothing, darker ſtill than night!
" If 'twas a dream, why wake me, my worſt foe,
" Lorenzo! boaſtful of the name of friend!
" O for deluſion! O for error ſtill!
" Could vengeance ſtrike much ſtronger than to plant
" A thinking being in a world like this,
" Not ever-rich before, now beggar'd quite;
" More curſt than at the fall?—The ſun goes out
" The thorns ſhoot up! What thorns in every thought!
" Why ſenſe of better? It imbitters worſe.
" Why ſenſe? why life? If but to ſigh, then ſink
" To what I was! twice nothing! and much woe!
" Woe, from heaven's bounties! woe from what was wont
" To flatter moſt, high intellectual powers.
" Thought, virtue, knowledge! bleſſings, by thy ſcheme,
" All poiſon'd into pains. Firſt, knowledge, once
" My ſoul's ambition, now her greateſt dread.
" To know myſelf, true wiſdom?—No, to ſhun
" That ſhocking ſcience, parent of deſpair!
" Avert thy mirror: if I ſee, I die.
" Know my Creator? Climb his bleſt abode
" By painful ſpeculation, pierce the veil,
" Dive in his nature, read his attributes,
" And gaze in admiration—on a foe,
" Obtruding life, with-holding happineſs!
" From the full rivers that ſurround his throne,
" Not letting fall one drop of joy on man;
" Man gaſping for one drop, that he might ceaſe
" To curſe his birth, nor envy reptiles more!
" Ye ſable clouds! ye darkeſt ſhades of night!
" Hide him, for ever hide him, from my thought,
" Once all my comfort; ſource, and ſoul of joy!
" Now leagu'd with furies, and with * thee, againſt me.
" Know his atchievements? Study his renown?
" Contemplate this amazing univerſe,
" Drop from his hand, with miracles replete!
" For what? 'Mid miracles of nobler name,
" To find one miracle of mercy?
" To find the being, which alone can know
" And praiſe his works, a blemiſh on his praiſe?
" Through nature's ample range, in thought to ſtroll.
" And ſtar fat man, the ſingle mourner there,
" Breathing high hope! chain'd down to pangs, and death?
" Knowing is ſuffering: and ſhall virtue ſhare
" The ſigh of knowledge?—Virtue ſhares the ſigh.
" By ſtraining up the ſteep of excellent,
" By battles fought, and, from temptation, won,
" What gain ſhe, but the pang of ſeeing worth,
" Angelic worth, ſoon ſhuffled in the dark
" With every vice, and ſwept to brutal duſt?
" Merit is madneſs; virtue is a crime;
" A crime to reaſon, if it coſts us pain
" Unpaid: what pain, amidſt a thouſand more,
" To think the moſt abandon'd, after days
" Of triumph o'er their betters, find in death
" As ſoft a pillow, nor make fouler clay!
" Duty! religion!—Theſe, our duty done,
" Imply reward. Religion is miſtake.
" Duty!—There's none, but to repel the cheat.
" Ye cheats! away! ye daughters of my pride!
" Who feign yourſelves the favourites of the ſkies:
" Ye towering hopes! abortive energies!
" That toſs and ſtruggle in my lying breaſt,
" To ſcale the ſkies, and build preſumptions there,

* Lorenzo.

" As I were heir of an eternity.
" Vain, vain ambitions! trouble me no more.
" Why travel far in queſt of ſure defeat?
" As bounded as my being be my wiſh.
" All is inverted; wiſdom is a fool.
" Senſe, take the rein; blind paſſion, drive us on;
" And ignorance, befriend us on our way;
" Ye new, but trueſt patrons of our peace!
" Yes; give the pulſe full empire; live the brute,
" Since as the brute we die. The ſum of man,
" Of godlike man! to revel, and to rot.
" But not on equal terms with other brutes:
" Their revels a more poignant reliſh yield,
" And ſafer too; they never poiſons chooſe.
" Inſtinct than reaſon makes more wholeſome meals,
" And ſends all-marring murmur far away.
" For ſenſual life they beſt philoſophiſe;
" Theirs that ſerene the ſages ſought in vain:
" 'Tis man alone expoſtulates with heaven;
" His all the power and all the cauſe to mourn.
" Shall human eyes alone diſſolve in tears?
" And bleed, in anguiſh, none but human hearts?
" The wide-ſtretch'd realm of intellectual woe,
" Surpaſſing ſenſual far, is all our own.
" In life ſo fatally diſtinguiſh'd, why
" Caſt in one lot, confounded, lump'd, in death?
" Ere yet in being, was mankind in guilt?
" Why thunder'd this peculiar clauſe againſt us,
" All-mortal and all-wretched?—Have the ſkies
" Reaſons of ſtate their ſubjects may not ſcan,
" Nor humbly reaſon when they ſorely ſigh?
" All-mortal and all-wretched!—'Tis too much;
" Unparallel'd in nature; 'tis too much
" On being unrequeſted at thy hands,
" Omnipotent! for I ſee nought but power.
" And why ſee that? Why thought? To toil, and eat,
" Then make our bed in darkneſs, needs no thought.
" What ſuperfluities are reaſoning ſouls!
" O give eternity! or thought deſtroy.
" But without thought our curſe were half unfelt;
" Its blunted edge would ſpare the throbbing heart;
" And therefore 'tis beſtow'd, I thank thee, reaſon!
" For aiding life's too ſmall calamities,
" And giving being to the dread of death.
" Such are thy bounties!—Was it then too much
" For me, to treſpaſs on the brutal rights?
" Too much for heaven to make one emmet more?
" Too much for chaos to permit my maſs
" A longer ſtay with eſſences unwrought,
" Unfaſhion'd, untormented into man?
" Wretched preferment to this round of pains!
" Wretched capacity of frenzy, thought!
" Wretched capacity of dying life!
" Life, thought, worth, wiſdom, All (O foul revolt)
" Once friends to peace, gone over to the foe.
" Death, then, has chang'd his nature too: O death!
" Come to my boſom, thou beſt gift of heaven!
" Beſt friend of man! ſince man is man no more!
" Why in this thorny wilderneſs ſo long,
" Since there's no promis'd land's ambroſial bower,
" To pay me with its honey for my ſtings?
" If needful to the ſelfiſh ſchemes of heaven!
" To ſting us ſore, why mock't our miſery?
" Why this ſo ſumptuous inſult o'er our heads?
" Why this illuſtrious canopy diſplay'd?
" Why ſo magnificently lodg'd deſpair?
" At ſtated periods, ſure returning, roll
" Theſe glorious orbs, that mortals may compute
" Their length of labours, and of pains; nor loſe
" Their miſery's full meaſure?——Smiles with flowers,
" And fruits, promiſcuous, ever-teeming earth,
" That man may languiſh in luxurious ſcenes,
" And in an Eden mourn his wither'd joys?
" Claim earth and ſkies man's admiration, due
" For ſuch delights! Bleſt animals! too wiſe
" To wonder; and too happy to complain!
" Our doom decreed demands a mournful ſcene:
" Why not a dungeon dark for the condemn'd?
" Why not the dragon's ſubterranean den,
" For man to howl in? Why not his abode
" Of the ſame diſmal colour with his fate?
" A Thebes, a Babylon, at vaſt expence
" Of time, toil, treaſure, art, for owls and adders,
" As congruous, as, for man, this lofty dome,
" Which prompts proud thought, and kindles high deſire;
" If, from her humble chamber in the duſt,
" While proud thought ſwells, and high deſire in- flames,
" The poor worm calls us for her inmates there;
" And, round us, death's inexorable hand
" Draws the dark curtain cloſe; undrawn no more.
" Undrawn no more!—Behind the cloud of death,
" Once, I beheld the ſun; a ſun which gilt
" That fable cloud, and turn'd it all to gold:
" How the grave's alter'd! Fathomleſs, as hell!
" A real hell to thoſe who dreamt of heaven.
" Annihilation! How it yawns before me!
" Next moment I may drop from thought, from ſenſe,
" The privilege of angels, and of worms,
" An outcaſt from exiſtence! and this ſpirit,
" This all-pervading, this all-conſcious ſoul,
" This particle of energy divine,
" Which travels nature, flies from ſtar to ſtar,
" And viſits gods, and emulates their powers,
" For ever is extinguiſht. Horror! death!
" Death of that death I fearleſs once ſurvey'd!—
" When horror univerſal ſhall deſcend,
" And heaven's dark concave urn all human race,
" On that enormous, unrefunding tomb,
" How juſt this verſe! this monumental ſigh!"

Beneath the lumber of demoliſh'd worlds,
Deep in the rubbiſh of the general wreck,
Swept ignominious to the common maſs
Of matter, never dignify'd with life,
Here lie proud rationals; The ſons of heaven!
The lords of earth! The property of worms!
Beings of yeſterday! and not to-morrow!
Who liv'd in terror, and in pangs expir'd!
All gone to rot in chaos; or to make
Their happy tranſit into blocks or brutes,
Nor longer ſilly their Creator's name.

Lorenzo! hear, pauſe, ponder, and pronounce.
Juſt is this hiſtory? If ſuch is man,

Mankind's hiſtorian, though divine, might weep
And dares Lorenzo ſmile!—I know thee proud;
For once let pride befriend thee; pride looks pale
At ſuch a ſcene, and ſighs for ſomething more.
Amid thy boaſts, preſumptions, and diſplays,
And art though then a ſhadow? Leſs than ſhade?
A nothing? Leſs than nothing? To have been,
And not to be, is lower than unborn.
Art thou ambitious? Why then make the worm
Thine equal? Runs thy taſte of pleaſure high?
Why patronize ſure death of every joy?
Charm riches? Why chooſe beggary in the grave,
Of every hope a bankrupt! and for ever?
Ambition, pleaſure, avarice, perſuade thee
To make that world of glory, rapture, wealth,
They * lately prov'd the ſoul's ſupreme deſire.
What art thou made of? Rather, how unmade?
Great nature's maſter appetite deſtroy'd!
Is endleſs life and happineſs deſpis'd?
Or both wiſh'd, here, where neither can be found?
Such man's perverſe, eternal war with heaven!
Dar'ſt thou perſiſt? And is there nought on earth,
But a long train of tranſitory forms,
Riſing and breaking millions in an hour?
Bubbles of a fantaſtic deity, blown up
In ſport, and then in cruelty deſtroy'd?
Oh! for what crime, unmerciful Lorenzo!
Deſtroys thy ſcheme the whole of human race?
Kind is fell Lucifer compar'd to thee:
O! ſpare this waſte of being half divine;
And vindicate th' economy of heaven.
Heaven is all love; all joy in giving joy:
It never had created, but to bleſs:
And ſhall it, then, ſtrike off the liſt of life,
A being bleſt, or worthy ſo to be?
Heaven ſtarts at an annihilating God.
Is that all nature ſtarts at, thy deſire?
Art ſuch a clod to wiſh thyſelf all clay?
What is that dreadful wiſh?—The dying groan
Of nature, murder'd by the blackeſt guilt.
What deadly poiſon has thy nature drunk;
To nature undebauch'd no ſhock ſo great;
Nature's firſt wiſh is endleſs happineſs;
Annihilation is an after-thought,
A monſtrous wiſh, unborn till virtue dies.
And, oh! what depth of horror lies enclos'd
For non-exiſtence no man ever wiſh'd,
But, firſt, he wiſh'd the Deity deſtroyed.
If ſo; what words are dark enough to draw
Thy picture true? The darkeſt are too fair.
Beneath what baleful planet, in what hour
Of deſperation, by what fury's aid,
In what infernal poſture of the ſoul,
All hell invited, and all hell in joy
At ſuch a birth, a birth ſo near of kin,
Did thy foul fancy whelp ſo black a ſcheme
Of hopes abortive, faculties half-blown,
And deities begun, reduc'd to duſt?
There's nought (thou ſay'ſt) but one eternal flux
Of feeble effences, tumultuous driven
Through time's rough billows into night's abyſs.

* In Night VI.

Say, in this rapid tide of human ruin,
Is there no rock, on which man's toſſing thought
Can reſt from terror, dare his fate ſurvey,
And boldly think it ſomething to be born?
Amid ſuch hourly wrecks of being fair,
Is there no central, all-ſuſtaining baſe,
All-realiſing, all-connecting power,
Which, as it call'd forth all things, can recall,
And force deſtruction to refund her ſpoil?
Command the grave reſtore her taken prey?
Bids death's dark vale its human harveſt yield,
And earth, and ocean, pay their debt of man,
True to the grand depoſit truſted there?
Is there no potentate, whoſe outſtretch'd arm,
When ripening time calls forth th' appointed hour,
Pluck'd from foul devaſtation's famiſh'd maw,
Binds preſent, paſt, and future, to his throne?
His throne, how glorious, thus divinely grac'd,
By germinating beings cluſtering round!
A garland worthy the divinity!
A throne, by heaven's omnipotence in ſmiles,
Built (like a pharos towering in the waves)
Amidſt immenſe effuſions of his love!
An ocean of communicated bliſs!
An all-prolific, all-preſerving god!
This were a god indeed.—And ſuch is man,
As here preſum'd: he riſes from his fall.
Think'ſt thou Omnipotence a naked root,
Each bloſſom fair of Deity deſtroy'd?
Nothing is dead; nay, nothing ſleeps; each ſoul,
That ever animated human clay,
Now wakes; is on the wing: and where, O where,
Will the ſwarm ſettle?—When the trumpet's call,
As ſounding braſs collects us round heaven's throne,
Conglob'd, we baſk in everlaſting day,
(Paternal ſplendour!) and adhere for ever.
Had not the ſoul this outlet to the ſkies,
In this vaſt veſſel of the univerſe,
How ſhould we gaſp, as in an empty void!
How in the pangs of famiſh'd hope expire!
How bright my proſpect ſhines; how gloomy, thine!
A trembling world! and a devouring God!
Earth, but the ſhambles of Omnipotence!
Heaven's face all ſtain'd with cauſeleſs maſſacres
Of countleſs millions, born to feel the pang
Of being loſt. Lorenzo! can it be?
This bids us ſhudder at the thoughts of life.
Who would be born to ſuch a phantom world,
Where nought ſubſtantial but our miſery
Where joy (if joy) but heightens our diſtreſs,
So ſoon to periſh, and revive no more?
The greater ſuch a joy, the more it pains.
A world, ſo far from great (and yet how great
It ſhines to thee!) there's nothing real in it;
Being, a ſhadow; conſciouſneſs, a dream;
A dream, how dreadful! Univerſal blank
Before it, and behind! Poor man, a ſpark
From non-exiſtence ſtruck by wrath divine,
Glittering a moment, nor that moment ſure,
'Midſt upper, nether, and ſurrounding night,
His ſad, ſure, ſudden, and eternal tomb!
Lorenzo! doſt thou feel theſe arguments?
Or is there nought but vengeance can be felt?
How haſt thou dar'd the Deity dethrone?

How dar'd indict him of a world like this?
If such the world, creation was a crime;
For what is crime but cause of misery?
Retract, blaspheмer! and unriddle this,
Of endless arguments above, below,
Without us, and within, the short result—
"If man's immortal, there's a God in heaven."
But wherefore such redundancy? such waste
Of argument? One sets my soul at rest!
One obvious, and at hand, and, oh!—at heart.
So just the skies, Philander's life so pain'd,
His heart so pure; that, or succeeding scenes
Have palms to give, or ne'er had he been born.
"What an old tale is this!" Lorenzo cries.—
I grant this argument is old; but truth
No years impair; and had not this been true,
Thou never hadst despis'd it for its age.
Truth is immortal as thy soul; and fable
As fleeting as thy joys: be wise, nor make
Heaven's highest blessing, vengeance; O be wise!
Nor make a curse of immortality.
Say, know'st thou what it is, or what thou art?
Know'st thou th' importance of a soul immortal?
Behold this midnight glory: worlds on worlds!
Amazing pomp! redouble this amaze;
Ten thousand add; add twice ten thousand more;
Then weigh the whole; one soul outweighs them all;
And calls th' astonishing magnificence
Of unintelligent creation poor.
For this, believe not me; no man believe;
Trust not in words, but deeds; and deeds no less
Than those of the Supreme; nor his, a few;
Consult them all; consulted, all proclaim
Thy soul's importance: tremble at thyself;
For whom Omnipotence has wak'd so long:
Has wak'd, and work'd, for ages; from the birth
Of nature to this unbelieving hour.
In this small province of his vast domain
(All nature bow, while I pronounce his name!)
What has God done, and not for this sole end,
To rescue souls from death! The soul's high price
Is writ in all the conduct of the skies.
The soul's high price is the creation's key.
Unlocks its mysteries, and naked lays
The genuine cause of every deed divine:
That is the chain of ages, which maintains
Their obvious correspondence, and unites
Most distant periods in one blest design:
That is the mighty hinge, on which have turn'd
All revolutions, whether we regard
The natural, civil, or religious, world;
The former two but servants to the third:
To that their duty done, they both expire,
Their mass new-cast, forgot their deeds renown'd:
And angels ask, "Where once they shone so fair?"
To lift us from this abject, to sublime;
This flux, to permanent; this dark, to day;
This foul, to pure; this turbid, to serene;
This mean, to mighty!—for this glorious end
Th' Almighty, rising, his long Sabbath broke!
The world was made; was ruin'd; was restor'd;
Laws from the skies were publish'd; were repeal'd;
On earth kings, kingdoms, rose; kings, kingdoms, fell;
Fam'd sages lighted up the pagan world;
Prophets from Sion darted a keen glance
Through distant age; saints travell'd; martyrs bled;
By wonders sacred nature stood control'd;
The living were translated; dead were rais'd;
Angels, and more than angels, came from heaven;
And, oh! for this, descended lower still:
Guilt was hell's gloom; astonish'd at his guest,
For one short moment Lucifer ador'd:
Lorenzo! and wilt thou do less?—For this,
That hallow'd page, fools scoff at, was inspir'd,
Of all these truths thrice venerable code!
Deists! perform your quarantine; and then
Fall prostrate, ere you touch it, lest you die.
Nor less intensely bent infernal powers
To mar, than those of light, this end to gain.
O what a scene is here!—Lorenzo! wake!
Rise to the thought; exert, expand thy soul
To take the vast idea: it denies
All else the name of great. Two warring worlds!
Not Europe against Afric; warring worlds!
Of more than mortal! mounted on the wing!
On ardent wings of energy and zeal,
High-hovering o'er this little brand of strife!
This sublunary ball—But strife, for what?
In their own cause conflicting? No; in thine,
In man's. His single interest blows the flame;
His the sole stake; his fate the trumpet sounds,
Which kindles war immortal. How it burns!
Tumultuous swarms of deities in arms!
Force, force opposing, till the waves run high,
And tempest nature's universal sphere.
Such opposites eternal, stedfast, stern,
Such foes implacable are good, and ill;
Yet man, vain man, would meditate peace between them.
Think not this fiction, "There was war in heaven,"
From heaven's high crystal mountain, where it hung,
Th' Almighty's out-stretch'd arm took down his bow,
And shot his indignation at the deep:
Re-thunder'd hell, and darted all her fires.
And seems the stake of little moment still?
And slumbers man, who singly caus'd the storm?
He sleeps—And art thou shock'd at mysteries?
The greatest, thou. How dreadful to reflect,
What ardour, care, and counsel mortals cause
In breasts divine! how little in their own!
Where'er I turn, how new proofs pour upon me!
How happily this wondrous view supports
My former argument! How strongly strikes
Immortal life's full demonstration, here!
Why this exertion? Why this strange regard
From heaven's Omnipotent indulg'd to man?—
Because, in man, the glorious dreadful power,
Extremely to be pain'd, or blest for ever.
Duration gives importance; swells the price.
An angel, if a creature of a day,
What would he be? A trifle of no weight;

Or ſtand, or fall; no matter which; he's gone.
Becauſe immortal, therefore is indulg'd
This ſtrange regard of deities to duſt.
Hence heaven looks down on earth with all her eyes:
Hence, the ſoul's mighty moment in her ſight:
Hence, every ſoul has partiſans above,
And every thought a critic in the ſkies:
Hence, clay, vile clay! has angels for its guard,
And every guard a paſſion for his charge:
Hence, from all age, the cabinet divine
Has held high counſel o'er the fate of man.
Nor have the clouds thoſe gracious counſels hid;
Angels undrew the curtain of the throne,
And Providence came forth to meet mankind:
In various modes of emphaſis and awe,
He ſpoke his will, and trembling nature heard;
He ſpoke it loud, in thunder and in ſtorm.
Witneſs, thou Sinai! whoſe cloud-cover'd height,
And ſhaken baſis, own'd the preſent God;
Witneſs, ye billows! whoſe returning tide,
Breaking the chain that faſten'd it in air,
Swept Egypt and her menaces, to hell:
Witneſs, ye flames! th' Aſſyrian tyrant blew
To ſevenfold rage, as impotent, as ſtrong:
And thou, earth! witneſs, whoſe expanding jaws
Clos'd o'er prefumption's* ſacrilegious ſons:
Has not each element, in turn, ſubſcrib'd
The ſoul's high price, and ſworn it to the wiſe?
Has not flame, ocean, ether, earthquake, ſtrove
To ſtrike this truth through adamantine man?
If not all adamant, Lorenzo! hear;
All is deluſion; nature is wrapt up,
In tenfold night, from reaſon's keeneſt eye;
There's no conſiſtence, meaning, plan, or end,
In all beneath the ſun, in all above,
(As far as man can penetrate), or heaven
Is an immenſe, ineſtimable prize;
Or all is nothing, or that prize is all—
And ſhall each tey be ſtill a match for heaven,
And full equivalent for groans below?
Who would not give a trifle to prevent
What he would give a thouſand worlds to cure?
Lorenzo! thou haſt ſeen (if thine to ſee)
All nature, and her God (by nature's courſe,
And nature's courſe controul'd) declare for me;
The ſkies above proclaim, "immortal man!"
And, "man immortal!" all below reſounds.
The world's a ſyſtem of theology,
Read by the greateſt ſtrangers to the ſchools;
If honeſt, learned: and ſages o'er a plough.
Is not Lorenzo! then impos'd on thee
This hard alternative; or, to renounce
Thy reaſon, or thy ſenſe; or, to believe?
What then is thy unbelief? 'Tis an exploit;
A ſtrenuous enterpriſe: to gain it, man
Muſt burſt through every bar of common ſenſe,
Of common ſhame, magnanimouſly wrong;
And what rewards the ſturdy combatant?
His prize, repentance; infamy, his crown.
But wherefore, infamy?—For want of faith,
Down the ſteep precipice of wrong he ſlides;
There's nothing to ſupport him in the right.

Faith in the future wanting is at leaſt
In embryo, every weakneſs, every guilt;
And ſtrong temptation ripens it to birth.
If this life's gain invites him to the deed,
Why not his country ſold, his father ſlain?
'Tis virtue to purſue our good ſupreme;
And his ſupreme, his only good is here.
Ambition, avarice, by the wiſe diſdain'd,
Is perfect wiſdom, while mankind are fools,
And think a turf, or tomb-ſtone, covers all:
Theſe find employment, and provide for ſenſe
A richer paſture, and a larger range;
And ſenſe by right divine aſcends the throne,
When virtue's prize and proſpect are no more;
Virtue no more we think the will of heaven.
Would heaven quite beggar virtue, if belov'd?
"Has virtue charms?"—I grant her heavenly fair;
But if unportion'd, all will intereſt wed;
Though that our admiration, this our choice.
The virtues grow on immortality;
That root deſtroy'd, they wither and expire.
A deity believ'd, will nought avail;
Rewards and puniſhments make God ador'd;
And hopes and fears give conſcience all her power.
As in the dying parent dies the child,
Virtue with immortality, expires.
Who tells me he denies his ſoul immortal,
Whate'er his boaſt, has told me, He's a knave.
His duty 'tis, to love himſelf alone;
Nor care though mankind periſh, if he ſmiles.
Who thinks ere long the man ſhall wholly die,
Is dead already; nought but brute ſurvives.
And are there ſuch?—Such candidates there are
For more than death; for utter loſs of being,
Being, the baſis of the Deity!
Aſk you the cauſe?—The cauſe they will not tell:
Nor need they: O the ſorceries of ſenſe!
They work this transformation on the ſoul,
Diſmount her, like the ſerpent at the fall,
Diſmount her from her native wing, (which ſoar'd
Ere-while ethereal heights), and throw her down,
To lick the duſt, and crawl in ſuch a thought.
Is it in words to paint you? O ye fall'n!
Fall'n from the wings of reaſon, and of hope!
Erect in ſtature, prone in appetite!
Patrons of pleaſure, poſting into pain!
Lovers of argument, averſe to ſenſe!
Boaſters of liberty, faſt bound in chains!
Lords of the wide creation, and the ſhame!
More ſenſeleſs than th' irrationals you ſcorn!
More baſe than thoſe you rule! Than thoſe you pity,
Far more undone! O ye moſt infamous
Of beings, from ſuperior dignity!
Deepeſt in woe from means of boundleſs bliſs!
Ye curſt by bleſſings infinite! becauſe
Moſt highly favour'd, moſt profoundly loſt!
Ye motly maſs of contradiction ſtrong!
And are you, too, convinc'd, your ſouls fly off
In exhalation ſoft, and die in air,
From the full flood of evidence againſt you?
In the coarſe drudgeries and ſinks of ſenſe,
Your ſouls have quite worn out the make of heaven,

* Korah, &c.

By vice new-caſt, and creatures of your own:
But though you can deform, you can't deſtroy;
To curſe, not uncreate, is all your power.
Lorenzo! this black brotherhood renounce;
Renounce St. Evremont, and read St. Paul.
Ere, rapt by miracle, by reaſon wing'd,
His mounting mind made long abode in heaven.
This is freethinking, unconfin'd to parts.
To ſend the ſoul, on curious travel bent,
Through all the provinces of human thought;
To dart her flight through the whole ſphere of man;
Of this vaſt univerſe to make the tour;
In each receſs of ſpace and time, at home;
Familiar with their wonders; diving deep;
And, like a prince of boundleſs intereſts there,
Still moſt ambitious of the moſt remote;
To look on truth unbroken, and entire;
Truth in the ſyſtem, the full orb; where truths
By truths enlighten'd, and ſuſtain'd, afford
An arch-like, ſtrong foundation, to ſupport
Th' incumbent weight of abſolute, complete
Conviction; here, the more we preſs, we ſtand
More firm; who moſt examine, muſt believe,
Parts, like half-ſentences, confound; the whole
Conveys the ſenſe, and God is underſtood;
Who not in fragments writes to human race:
Read his whole volume, ſceptic! then reply.
This, this, is thinking free, a thought that graſps
Beyond a grain, and looks beyond an hour.
Turn up thine eyes, ſurvey this midnight ſcene;
What are earth's kingdoms, to yon boundleſs orbs,
Of human ſouls, one day, the deſtin'd range?
And what yon boundleſs orbs, to godlike man?
Thoſe numerous worlds that throng the firmament,
And aſk more ſpace in heaven, can roll at large
In man's capacious thought, and ſtill leave room
For ampler orbs, for new creations, there.
Can ſuch a ſoul contract itſelf, to gripe
A point of no dimenſion, of no weight?
It can; it does: the world is ſuch a point:
And, of that point, how ſmall a part enſlaves!
How ſmall a part—of nothing, ſhall I ſay?
Why not?—Friends, our chief treaſure! how they drop!
Lucia, Narciſſa fair, Philander gone!
The grave, like fabled Cerberus, has op'd
A triple mouth; and, in an awful voice,
Loud calls my ſoul, and utters all I ſing.
How the world falls to pieces round about us,
And leaves us in a ruin of our joy!
What ſays this tranſportation of my friends?
It bids me love the place where now they dwell,
And ſcorn this wretched ſpot they leave ſo poor.
Eternity's vaſt ocean lies before thee;
There, there; Lorenzo! thy Clariſſa ſails.
Give thy mind ſea-room; keep it wide of earth,
That rock of ſouls immortal; cut thy cord;
Weigh anchor; ſpread thy ſails; call every wind;
Eye thy great pole-ſtar; make the land of life,
Two kinds of life has double-natur'd man,
And two of death; the laſt far more ſevere.
Life animal is nurtur'd by the ſun;
Thrives on his bounties, triumphs in his beams.
Life rational ſubſiſts on higher food,
Triumphant in his beams, who made the day.
When we leave that ſun, and are left by this,
(The fate of all who die in ſtubborn guilt)
'Tis utter darkneſs; ſtrictly double death.
We ſink by no judicial ſtroke of heaven,
But nature's courſe; as ſure as plumbets fall.
Since God, or man, muſt alter, ere they meet,
(Since light and darkneſs blend not in one ſphere)
'Tis manifeſt, Lorenzo! who muſt change.
If, then, that double death ſhould prove thy lot,
Blame not the bowels of the Deity;
Man ſhall be bleſt, as far as man permits.
Not man alone, all rationals, heaven arms
With an illuſtrious, but tremendous, power
To counter-act its own moſt gracious ends;
And this, of ſtrict neceſſity, not choice;
That power deny'd men, angels, were no more
But paſſive engines, void of praiſe or blame.
A nature rational implies the power
Of being bleſt, or wretched, as we pleaſe;
Elſe idle reaſon would have nought to do;
And he that would be barr'd capacity
Of pain, courts incapacity of bliſs.
Heaven wills our happineſs, allows our doom;
Invites us ardently, but not compels;
Heaven but perſuades, almighty man decrees;
Man is the maker of immortal fates.
Man falls by man, if finally he falls:
And fall he muſt, who learns from death alone,
The dreadful ſecret—That he lives for ever.
Why this to thee?—Thee yet, perhaps, in doubt,
Of ſecond life? But wherefore doubtful ſtill?
Eternal life is nature's ardent wiſh:
What ardently we wiſh, we ſoon believe:
Thy tardy faith declares that wiſh deſtroy'd:
What has deſtroy'd it?—Shall I tell thee what?
When fear'd the future, 'tis no longer wiſh'd;
And, when unwiſh'd, we ſtrive to diſbelieve.
"Thus infidelity our guilt betrays."
Nor that the ſole detection! Bluſh Lorenzo!
Bluſh for hypocriſy, if not for guilt.
The future fear'd?—An infidel, and fear?
Fear what? A dream? A fable?—How thy dread,
Unwilling evidence, and therefore ſtrong,
Affords my cauſe an undeſign'd ſupport!
How diſbelief affirms what it denies!
"It unawares, aſſerts immortal life."
Surpriſing! infidelity turns out
A creed, and a confeſſion of our ſins:
Apoſtates, thus, are orthodox divines.
Lorenzo! with Lorenzo claſh no more;
Nor longer a tranſparent vizor wear.
Think'ſt thou, religion only has her maſk?
Our infidels are Satan's hypocrites,
Pretend the worſt, and, at the bottom, fail.
When viſited by thought (thought will intrude),
Like him they ſerve, they tremble, and believe.
Is their hypocriſy ſo ſoul as this;
So fatal to the welfare of the world?
What deteſtation, what contempt, their due!
And, if unpaid, be thank'd for their eſcape
That Chriſtian candour they ſtrive hard to ſcorn:
If not for that aſylum, they might find
A hell on earth; nor 'ſcape a worſe below.

With insolence, and impotence of thought,
Instead of racking fancy to refute,
Reform thy manners, and the truth enjoy.—
But shall I dare confess the dire result?
Can thy proud reason brook so black a brand?
From purer manners, to sublimer faith,
Is nature's unavoidable ascent;
An honest deist, where the gospel shines,
Matur'd to nobler, in the Christian ends.
When that blest change arrives, e'en cast aside
This song superfluous; life immortal strikes
Conviction, in a flood of light divine.
A Christian dwells, like * Uriel, in the sun;
Meridian evidence puts doubt to flight;
And ardent hope anticipates the skies.
Of that bright sun, Lorenzo! scale the sphere;
'Tis easy. it invites thee; it descends
From heaven to woo, and waft thee whence it came:
Read and revere the sacred page; a page
Where triumphs immortality; a page
Which not the whole creation could produce;
Which not the conflagration shall destroy,
'Tis printed in the mind of gods for ever,
In nature's ruins not one letter lost.
In proud disdain of what ev'n gods adore,
Dost smile?—Pour wretch! thy guardian angel weeps.
Angels and men assent to what I sing;
Wits smile, and thank me for my midnight dream.
How vicious hearts fume frenzy to the brain!
Parts push us on to pride, and pride to shame;
Pert infidelity is wit's cockade,
To grace the brazen brow that braves the skies,
By loss of being, dreadfully secure.
Lorenzo! if thy doctrine wins the day,
And drives my dreams, defeated, from the field;
If this is all, if earth a final scene,
Take heed; stand fast; be sure to be a knave.
A knave in grain! ne'er deviate to the right:
Should'st thou be good—how infinite thy loss!
Guilt only makes annihilation gain.
Blest scheme! which life deprives of comfort, death
Of hope; and which vice only recommends.
If so, where, infidels! your bait thrown out
To catch weak converts? where your lofty boast
Of zeal for virtue, and of love to man?
Annihilation! I confess in these.
What can reclaim you? Dare I hope profound
Philosophers the converts of a song?
Yet know, its † title flatters you, not me;
Yours be the praise to make my title good;
Mine to bless heaven, and triumph in your praise.
But since so pestilential your disease,
Though sovereign is the medicine I prescribe,
As yet, I'll neither triumph, nor despair:
But hope ere long my midnight dream will wake
Your hearts, and teach your wisdom—to be wise:
For why should souls immortal, made for bliss,
E'er wish (and wish in vain!) that souls could die!
What ne'er can die, oh! grant to live; and crown
The wish, and aim, and labour of the skies;
Increase, and enter on the joys of heaven;
Thus shall my title pass a sacred seal,
Receive an imprimatur from above,
While angels shout—an Infidel Reclaim'd!
To close, Lorenzo! spire of all my pains,
Still seems it strange, that thou should'st live for ever?
Is it less strange, that thou should'st live at all?
This is a miracle; and that no more.
Who gave beginning, can exclude an end.
Deny thou art: Then doubt if thou shalt be.
A miracle with miracles enclos'd,
Is man: and starts his faith at what is strange?
What less than wonders from the wonderful?
What less than miracles from God can flow?
Admit a God—that mystery supreme!
That cause uncaus'd! all other wonders cease;
Nothing is marvellous for him to do:
Deny him—all is mystery besides;
Millions of mysteries! each darker far,
Than that thy wisdom would unwisely shun.
If weak thy faith, why choose the harder side?
We nothing know, but what is marvellous;
Yet what is marvellous, we can't believe.
So weak our reason, and so great our God,
What most surprises in the sacred page,
Or full as strange, or stranger, must be true.
Faith is not reason's labour, but repose.
To faith and virtue, why so backward, man?
From hence:—The present strongly strikes us all;
The future faintly; can we then be men?
If men, Lorenzo! the reverse is right.
Reason is man's peculiar: Sense the brute's.
The present is the scanty realm of sense;
The future, reason's empire unconfin'd:
On that expending all her godlike power,
She plans, provides, expatiates, triumphs, there;
There builds her blessing! There expects her praise;
And nothing asks of fortune, or of man.
And what is reason? Be she thus defin'd;
Reason is upright stature in the soul.
Oh! be a man; and strive to be a god.
"For what? (thou say'st) To damp the joys of "life?"
No; to give heart and substance to thy joys.
That tyrant, hope; mark how she domineers;
She bids us quit realities for dreams;
Safety and peace for hazard and alarm;
That tyrant o'er the tyrants of the soul,
She bids ambition quit its taken prize.
Spurn the luxuriant branch on which it sits.
Though bearing crowns, to spring at distant game;
And plunge in toils and dangers—for repose.
If hope precarious, and of things, when gain'd,
Of little moment, and as little stay,
Can sweeten toils and dangers into joys;
What then, that hope, which nothing can defeat,
Our leave unask'd? Rich hope of boundless bliss!
Bliss, past man's power to paint it; time's to close!
This hope is earth's most estimable prize:
This is man's portion, while no more than man;
Hope, of all passions, most befriends us here;
Passions of prouder name befriend us less.
Joy has her tears; and transport has her death;
Hope, like a cordial, innocent, though strong,

* Milton.
† The Infidel Reclaimed.

Man's heart at once inſpirits and ſerenes;
Nor makes him pay his wiſdom for his joys;
'Tis all our preſent ſtate can ſafely bear,
Health to the frame! and vigour to the mind!
A joy attemper'd! a chaſtis'd delight!
Like the fair ſummer evening, mild and ſweet!
'Tis man's full cup; his paradiſe below! 1471
A bleſt hereafter then, or hop'd, or gain'd,
Is all; our whole of happineſs: full proof,
I choſe no trivial or inglorious theme.
And know, ye foes to ſong! (well-meaning men,
Though quite forgotten * half your Bible's praiſe!
Important truths, in ſpite of verſe, may pleaſe:
Grave minds you praiſe; nor can you praiſe too much:
If there is weight in an eternity,
Let the grave liſten;—and be graver ſtill.

NIGHT VIII.

VIRTUE'S APOLOGY;

OR, THE MAN OF THE WORLD ANSWERED.

In which are conſidered the Love of this Life; the Ambition and Pleaſure, with the Wit and Wiſdom of the World.

And has all nature then eſpous'd my part?
Have I brib'd heaven and earth to plead againſt thee?
And is thy ſoul immortal?—What remains?
All, all, Lorenzo!—Make immortal bleſt.
Unbleſt immortals!—What can ſhock us more?
And yet Lorenzo ſtill affects the world;
There ſtows his treaſure; thence his title draws,
Man of the world (for ſuch wouldſt thou be call'd)
And art thou proud of that inglorious ſtyle?
Proud of reproach? for a reproach it was,
In ancient days; and Chriſtian—in an age,
When men were men, and not aſham'd of heaven—
Fir'd their ambition, as it crown'd their joy.
Sprinkled with dews from the Caſtalian font,
Fain would I re-baptize thee, and confer
A purer ſpirit, and a nobler name.
Thy fond attachments fatal and inflam'd,
Point out my path, and dictate to my ſong:
To thee the world how fair! How ſtrongly ſtrikes
Ambition! and gay pleaſure ſtronger ſtill!
Thy triple bane! the triple bolt that lays
Thy virtue dead! Be theſe my triple theme;
Nor ſhall thy wit or wiſdom be forgot.
Common the theme; not ſo the ſong; if ſhe
My ſong invokes, Urania deigns to ſmile.
The charm that chains us to the world, her foe,
If ſhe diſſolves, the man of earth at once
Starts from his trance, and ſighs for other ſcenes;
Scenes where theſe ſparks of night, theſe ſtars ſhall ſhine Unnumber'd ſuns (for all things as they are
The bleſt behold;) and in one glory pour
Their blended blaze on man's aſtoniſh'd ſight;
A blaze—the leaſt illuſtrious object there.
Lorenzo! ſince eternal is at hand,
To ſwallow time's ambitions; as the vaſt
Leviathan, the bubbles vain, that ride
High on the foaming billow; what avail
High titles, high deſcent, attainments high,
If unattain'd our higheſt? O Lorenzo!
What lofty thoughts, theſe elements above,
What towering hopes, what ſallies from the ſun;
What grand ſurveys of deſtiny divine,
And pompous preſage of unfathom'd fate,
Should roll in boſoms, where a ſpirit burns,
Bound for eternity! In boſoms read
By him, who foibles in archangels ſees!
On human hearts he bends a jealous eye,
And marks, and in heaven's regiſter inrolls,
The riſe and progreſs of each option there;
Sacred to doomſday! That the page unfolds,
And ſpreads us to the gaze of gods and men.
And what an option, O Lorenzo, thine?
This world! and this, unrivall'd by the ſkies!
A world, where luſt of pleaſure, grandeur, gold,
Three demons that divide its realms betwecn them,
With ſtrokes alternate buffet to and fro
Man's reſtleſs heart, their ſport, their flying ball;
Till with the giddy circle ſick, and tir'd,
It pants for peace, and drops into deſpair.
Such is the world Lorenzo ſets above
That glorious promiſe angels were eſteem'd
Too mean to bring; a promiſe, their ador'd
Deſcended to communicate, and preſs,
By counſel, miracle, life, death, on man.
Such is the world Lorenzo's wiſdom woos,
And on its thorny pillow ſeeks repoſe;
A pillow which, like opiates ill-prepar'd,
Intoxicates, but not compoſes; fills
The viſionary mind with gay chimeras,
All the wild traſh of ſleep, without the reſt;
What unfeign'd travel, and what dreams of joy!
How frail men, things! how momentary both!
Fantaſtic chaſe of ſhadows hunting ſhades!
The gay, the buſy, equal, though unlike;
Equal in wiſdom, differently wiſe! [waſtes,
Through flowery meadows, and through dreary
One buſtling, and one dancing into death.
There's not a day, but to the man of thought
Betrays ſome ſecret, that throws new reproach
On life, and makes him ſick of ſeeing more.
The ſcenes of buſineſs tell us—"What are men;"
The ſcenes of pleaſure—"What is all beſide;"
There, others we deſpiſe; and here, ourſelves.
Amid diſguſt eternal, dwells delight?
'Tis approbation ſtrikes the ſtring of joy.
What wondrous prize has kindled this career,
Stuns with the din, and chokes us with the duſt,
On life's gay ſtage, one inch above the grave?
The proud run up and down in queſt of eyes;
The ſenſual, in purſuit of ſomething worſe;
The grave, of gold; the politic, of power,
And all, of other butterflies, as vain!
As eddies draw things frivolous and light,
How is man's heart by vanity drawn in;
On the ſwift circle of returning toys,
Whirl'd, ſtraw-like, round and round, and then ingulf'd;
Where gay deluſion darkens to deſpair!
"This is a beaten track."—Is this a track
Should not be beaten? never beat enough,

* The poetical parts of it.

Till enough learn'd the truths it would inſpire.
Shall truth be ſilent, becauſe folly frowns?
Turn the world's hiſtory; what find we there
But fortune's ſports, or nature's cruel claims,
Or woman's artifice, or man's revenge,
And endleſs inhumanities on man?
Fame's trumpet ſeldom ſounds, but like the knell
It brings bad tidings: how it hourly blows
Man's miſadventures round the liſtening world!
Man is the tale of narrative old time;
Sad tale; which high as paradiſe begins;
As if the toil of travel to delude,
From ſtage to ſtage, in his eternal round,
The days, his daughters, as they ſpin our hours
On fortune's wheel, where accident unthought
Oft in a moment ſnaps life's ſtrongeſt thread,
Each in her turn ſome tragic ſtory tells,
With now-and-then, a wretched farce between,
And fills his chronicle with human woes. [us;
Time's daughters, true as thoſe of men, deceive
Not one, but puts ſome cheat on all mankind:
While in their father's boſom, not yet ours,
They flatter our fond hopes; and promiſe much
Of amiable; but hold him not o'er wiſe, [year,
Who dares to truſt them; and laugh round the
At ſtill-confiding, ſtill-confounded man,
Confiding, though confounded; hoping on,
Untaught by trial, unconvinc'd by proof,
And ever-looking for the never-ſeen.
Life to the laſt, like harden'd felons, lies;
Nor owns itſelf a cheat, till it expires.
Its little joy goes out by one and one,
And leave poor man at length in perfect night;
Night darker than what now involves the pole.
O thou, who doſt permit theſe ills to fall
For gracious ends, and would'ſt that man ſhould mourn!
O thou, whoſe hands this goodly fabric fram'd,
Who know'ſt it beſt, and would'ſt that man ſhould know!
What is this ſublunary world? A vapour;
A vapour all it holds; itſelf a vapour;
From the damp bed of chaos, by thy beam
Exhal'd, ordain'd to ſwim its deſtin'd hour
In ambient air, then melt, and diſappear.
Earth's days are number'd, nor remote her doom;
As mortal, though leſs tranſient than her ſons;
Yet they doat on her, as the world and they
Were both eternal, ſolid; thou a dream.
They doat! on what? Immortal views apart,
A region of outſides! a land of ſhadows!
A fruitful field of flowery promiſes!
A wilderneſs of joy! perplex'd with doubts,
And ſharp with thorns! a troubled ocean, ſpread
With bold adventurers, their all on board!
No ſecond hope, if here their fortune frowns;
Frown ſoon it muſt. Of various rates they ſail,
Of enſigns various; all alike in this,
All reſtleſs, anxious; toſt with hopes and fears,
In calmeſt ſkies; obnoxious all to ſtorm;
And ſtormy the moſt general blaſt of life:
All bound for happineſs; yet few provide
The chart of knowledge, pointing where it lies;
Or virtue's helm, to ſhape the courſe deſign'd:
All, more or leſs, capricious fate lament,
Now lifted by the tide, and now reſorb'd,
And farther from their wiſhes than before:
All, more or leſs, againſt each other daſh,
To mutual hurt, by guſts of paſſion driven,
And ſuffering more from folly, than from fate.
Ocean! thou dreadful and tumultuous home
Of dangers, at eternal war with man!
Death's capital, where moſt he domineers,
With all his choſen terrors frowning round,
(Though lately feaſted high at * Albion's coſt),
Wide-opening, and loud-roaring ſtill for more!
Too faithful mirror! how doſt thou reflect
The melancholy face of human life!
The ſtrong reſemblance tempts me farther ſtill:
And, haply, Britain may be deeper ſtruck
By moral truth, in ſuch a mirror ſeen,
Which nature holds for ever at her eye.
Self-flatter'd, unexperienc'd, high in hope,
When young, with ſanguine cheer, and ſtreamers gay,
We cut our cable, launch into the world,
And fondly dream each wind and ſtar our friend;
All, in ſome darling enterpriſe embark'd:
But where is he can fathom its extent?
Amid a multitude of artleſs hands,
Ruin's ſure perquiſite! her lawful prize!
Some ſteer aright; but the black blaſt blows hard,
And puffs them wide of hope: with hearts of proof,
Full againſt wind and tide, ſome win their way;
And when ſtrong effort has deſerv'd the port,
And tugg'd it into view, 'tis won! 'tis loſt!
Though ſtrong their oar, ſtill ſtronger is their fate:
They ſtrike; and while they triumph, they expire.
In ſtreſs of weather, moſt: ſome ſink outright;
O'er them, and o'er their names, the billows cloſe;
To-morrow knows not they were ever born.
Others a ſhort memorial leave behind,
Like a flag floating, when the bark's ingulf'd;
It floats a moment, and is ſeen no more:
One Cæſar lives; a thouſand are forgot.
How few, beneath auſpicious planets born,
(Darlings of providence! fond fate's elect!)
With ſwelling ſails make good the promis'd port,
With all their wiſhes freighted! yet e'en theſe,
Freighted with all their wiſhes, ſoon complain;
Free from misfortune, not from nature free,
They ſtill are men; and when is man ſecure?
As fatal time, as ſtorm! the ruſh of years
Beats down their ſtrength; their numberleſs eſcapes
In ruin end: and, now, their proud ſucceſs
But plants new terrors on the victor's brow:
What pain to quit the world, juſt made their own.
Their neſt ſo deeply drown'd, and built ſo high!
Too low they build, who build beneath the ſtars.
Woe then apart (if woe apart can be
From mortal man), and fortune at our nod,
The gay! rich! great! triumphant! and auguſt!
What are they?—The moſt happy (ſtrange to ſay!)
Convince me moſt of human miſery;
What are they? Smiling wretches of to-morrow!

* Admiral Balchen, &c.

More wretched, then, than e'er their ſlave can be;
Their treacherous bleſſings, at the day of need,
Like other faithleſs friends, unmaſk, and ſting:
Then, what provoking indigence in wealth!
What aggravated impotence in power!
High titles, then, what inſult of their pain!
If that ſole anchor, equal to the waves,
Immortal hope! defies not the rude ſtorm,
Takes comfort from their foaming billows' rage,
And makes a welcome harbour of the tomb.
Is this a ſketch of what thy ſoul admires?
"But here (thou ſay'ſt) the miſeries of life
"Are huddled in a group. A more diſtinct
"Survey, perhaps, might bring thee better news."
Look on life's ſtages: they ſpeak plainer ſtill;
The plainer they, the deeper wilt thou ſigh.
Look on thy lovely boy; in him behold
The beſt that can befal the beſt on earth;
The boy has virtue by his mother's ſide:
Yes, on Florello look: a father's heart
Is tender, though the man's is made of ſtone;
The truth, through ſuch a medium ſeen, may make
Impreſſion deep, and fondneſs prove thy friend.
Florello lately caſt on this rude coaſt
A helpleſs infant; now a heedleſs child;
To poor Clariſſa's throes, thy care ſucceeds;
Care full of love, and yet ſevere as hate!
O'er thy foul's joy how oft thy fondneſs frowns!
Needful auſterities his will reſtrain;
As thorns fence-in the tender plant from harm.
As yet, his reaſon cannot go alone;
But aſks a ſterner nurſe to lead it on.
His little heart is often terrify'd;
The bluſh of morning, in his cheek, turns pale;
Its pearly dew-drop trembles in his eye;
His harmleſs eye! and drowns an angel there.
Ah! what avails his innocence? The taſk
Enjoin'd muſt diſcipline his early powers;
He learns to ſigh, ere he is known to ſin;
Guiltleſs, and ſad! a wretch before the fall!
How cruel this! more cruel to forbear.
Our nature ſuch, with neceſſary pains,
We purchaſe proſpects of precarious peace:
Though not a father, this might ſteal a ſigh.
Suppoſe him diſciplin'd aright (if not,
'Twill ſink our poor account to poorer ſtill);
Ripe from the tutor, proud of liberty,
He leaps encloſure, bounds into the world!
The world is taken, after ten years toil,
Like ancient Troy; and all its joys his own.
Alas! the world's a tutor more ſevere;
Its leſſons hard, and ill deſerve his pains;
Unteaching all his virtuous nature taught,
Or books (fair virtue's advocates!) inſpir'd.
For who receives him into public life?
Men of the world, the terræ filial breed,
Welcome the modeſt ſtranger to their ſphere,
(Which glitter'd long, at diſtance, in his ſight)
And, in their hoſpitable arms, encloſe:
Men, who think nought ſo ſtrong of the romance,
So rank knight-errant, as a real friend:
Men, that act up to reaſon's golden rule,
All weakneſs of affection quite ſubdued:
Men, that would bluſh at being thought ſincere,
And feign, for glory, the few faults they want;
That love a lie, where truth would pay as well
As if, to them, vice ſhone her own reward.
Lorenzo! canſt thou bear a ſhocking ſight?
Such, for Florello's ſake, 'twill now appear:
See, the ſteel'd files of ſeaſon'd veterans,
Train'd to the world, in burniſh'd falſehood bright;
Deep in the fatal ſtratagems of peace;
All ſoft ſenſation, in the throng, rubb'd off;
All their keen purpoſe, in politeneſs, ſheath'd;
His friends eternal—during intereſt;
His foes implacable—when worth their while;
At war with every welfare, but their own;
As wife as Lucifer; and half as good;
And by whom none, but Lucifer, can gain—
Naked, through theſe (ſo common fate ordains),
Naked of heart, his cruel courſe he runs,
Stung out of all, moſt amiable in life,
Prompt truth, and open thought, and ſmiles unfeign'd;
Affection, as his ſpecies, wide diffus'd;
Noble preſumptions to mankind's renown;
Ingenious truſt, and confidence of love.
Theſe claims to joy (if mortals joy might claim)
Will coſt him many a ſigh; till time, and pains,
From the ſlow miſtreſs of this ſchool, experience,
And her aſſiſtant, pauſing, pale, diſtruſt,
Purchaſe a dear-bought clue to lead his youth
Through ſerpentine obliquities of life,
And the dark labyrinth of human hearts.
And happy! if the clue ſhall come ſo cheap;
For, while we learn to fence with public guilt,
Full oft we feel its foul contagion too,
If leſs than heavenly virtue is our guard.
Thus, a ſtrange kind of curs'd neceſſity
Brings down the ſterling temper of his ſoul,
By baſe alloy, to bear the current ſtamp,
Below call'd wiſdom; ſinks him into ſafety;
And brands him into credit with the world;
Where ſpecious titles dignify diſgrace,
And nature's injuries are arts of life;
Where brighter reaſon prompts to bolder crimes;
And heavenly talents make infernal hearts;
That unſurmountable extreme of guilt!
Poor Machiavel! who labour'd hard his plan,
Forgot, that genius need not go to ſchool;
Forgot, that man, without a tutor wiſe,
His plan had practis'd, long before 't was writ.
The world's all title-page; there's no contents;
The world's all face? the man who ſhows his heart,
Is hooted for his nudities, and ſcorn'd.
A man I knew, who liv'd upon a ſmile;
And well it fed him; he look'd plump and fair;
While rankeſt venom foam'd through every vein.
Lorenzo! what I tell thee, take not ill!
Living, he ſawn'd on every fool alive;
And, dying, curs'd the friend on whom he liv'd.
To ſuch proficients thou art half a ſaint.
In foreign realms (for thou haſt travell'd far)
How curious to contemplate two ſtate-rooks,
Studious their neſts to feather in a trice,
With all the necromantics of their art,
Playing the game of faces on each other,
Making court ſweet-meats of their latent gall,
In fooliſh hope, to ſteal each other's truſt;

Both cheating, both exulting, both deceiv'd;
And, sometimes, both (let earth rejoice) undone!
Their parts we doubt not; but be that their shame;
Shall men of talents, fit to rule mankind,
Stoop to mean wiles, that would disgrace a fool;
And lose the thanks of those few friends they serve?
For who can thank the man he cannot see?
Why so much cover! It defeats itself.
Ye, that know all things! know ye not men's hearts,
Are therefore known, because they are conceal'd?
For why conceal'd?—The cause they need not tell.
I give him joy, that's awkward at a lie;
Whose feeble nature truth keeps still in awe;
His incapacity is his renown.
'Tis great, 'tis manly, to disdain disguise;
It shows our spirit, or it proves our strength.
Thou say'st, 'Tis needful: it is therefore right?
Howe'er, I grant it some small sign of grace,
To strain at an excuse: and wouldst thou then
Escape that cruel need? Thou may'st, with ease;
Think no post needful that demands a knave.
When late our civil helm was shifting hands,
So Pulteney thought: think better if you can.
But this, how rare! the public path of life
Is dirty:—yet, allow that dirt is due,
It makes the noble mind more noble still:
The world's no neuter; it will wound, or save;
Or virtue quench, or indignation fire.
You say, The world, well-known will make a man:
The world, well-known, will give our hearts to heaven,
Or make us demons, long before we die.
To show how fair the world, thy mistress, shines,
Take either part, sure ills attend the choice;
Sure, though not equal, detriment ensues.
Not virtue's self is deify'd on earth;
Virtue has her relapses, conflicts, foes;
Foes, that ne'er fail to make her feel their hate.
Virtue has her peculiar set of pains.
True friends to virtue, last, and least, complain;
But if they sigh, can others hope to smile?
If wisdom has her miseries to mourn,
How can poor folly lead a happy life?
And if both suffer, what has earth to boast,
Where he most happy, who the least laments!
Where much, much patience, the most envy'd state,
And some forgiveness, needs the best of friends?
For friend, or happy life, who looks not higher,
Of neither shall he find the shadow here.
The world's sworn advocate, without a fee
Lorenzo smartly, with a smile replies;
" Thus far thy song is right; and all most own.
" Virtue has her peculiar set of pains.—
" And joys peculiar who to vice denies?
" If vice it is, with nature to comply:
" If pride, and sense, are so predominant,
" To check, not overcome them makes a saint,
" Can nature in a plainer voice proclaim
" Pleasure, and glory, the chief good of man?"
Can pride and sensuality rejoice?
From purity of thought, all pleasure springs;
And, from an humble spirit, all our peace.
Ambition, pleasure! let us talk of these:
Of these, the porch, and academy, talk'd;
Of these, each following age had much to say:
Yet, unexhausted, still, the needful theme.
Who talks of these, to mankind all at once
He talks; for were the saint from either free?
Are these thy refuge?—No: these rush upon thee;
Thy vitals seize, and vulture-like, devour:
I'll try, if I can pluck thee from thy rock,
Prometheus! from this barren ball of earth;
If reason can unchain thee, thou art free.
And, first, thy Caucasus, ambition, calls;
Mountain of torments! eminence of woes!
Of courted woes! and courted through mistake!
'Tis not ambition charms thee; 'tis a cheat
Will make thee start, as H—— at his Moor.
Dost grasp at greatness? first, know what it is:
Think'st thou thy greatness in distinction lies?
Not in the feather, wave it e'er so high,
By fortune stuck, to mark us from the throng,
Is glory lodg'd: 'tis lodg'd in the reverse;
In that which joins, in that which equals, all,
The monarch and his slave;—" A deathless soul,
" Unbounded prospect, and immortal kin,
" A Father God, and brothers in the skies;"
Elder, indeed, in time; but less remote
In excellence, perhaps, than thought by man;
Why greater what can fall, than what can rise?
If still delirious, now, Lorenzo! go;
And with thy full blown brothers of the world,
Throw scorn around thee; cast it on thy slaves;
Thy slaves, and equals: how scorn cast on them
Rebounds on thee! if man is mean, as man,
Art thou a god? If fortune makes him so,
Beware the consequence: a maxim that,
Which draws a monstrous picture of mankind,
Where, in the drapery, the man is lost;
Externals fluttering, and the soul forgot.
Thy greatest glory, when dispos'd to boast,
Boast that aloud, in which thy servants share.
We wisely strip the steed we mean to buy:
Judge we, in their caparisons, of men?
It nought avails thee, where, but what, thou art;
All the distinctions of this little life
Are quite cutaneous, foreign to the man,
When, through death's streights, earth's subtle serpents creep,
Which wriggle into wealth, or climb renown.
As crooked Satan the forbidden tree,
They leave their party-colour'd robe behind,
All that now glitters, while they rear aloft
Their brazen crests, and his as us below.
Of fortune's fucus strip them, yet alive;
Strip them of body, too; nay, closer still,
Away with all, but moral, in their minds;
And let, what then remains, impose their name,
Pronounce them weak, or worthy; great, or mean.
How mean that snuff of glory fortune lights,
And death puts out! Dost thou demand a test,
A test, at once, infallible, and short,
Of real greatness? That man greatly lives,
Whate'er his fate, or fame, who greatly dies;
High-flush'd with hope, where heroes shall despair.
If this a true criterion, many courts,
Illustrious, might afford but few grandees.
Th' Almighty, from his throne, on earth surveys

Nought greater, than an honeſt, humble heart;
An humble heart, his reſidence! pronounc'd
His ſecond ſeat; and rival to the ſkies.
The private path, the ſecret acts of men,
If noble, far the nobleſt of our lives!
How far above Lorenzo's glory ſits
Th' illuſtrious maſter of a name unknown;
Whoſe worth unrivall'd, and unwitneſs'd, loves
Life's ſacred ſhades, where gods converſe with men;
And peace, beyond the world's conceptions, ſmiles!
As thou (now dark), before we part, ſhalt ſee.

But thy great ſoul this ſkulking glory ſcorns,
Lorenzo's ſick, but when Lorenzo's ſeen;
And, when he ſhrugs at public buſineſs, lies.
Deny'd the public eye, the public voice,
As if he liv'd on others' breath, he dies.
Fain would he make the world his pedeſtal;
Mankind the gazers, the ſole figure, he.
Knows he, that mankind praiſe againſt their will,
And mix as much detraction as they can?
Knows he, that faithleſs fame her whiſper has,
As well as trumpet? That his vanity
Is ſo much tickled from not hearing all?
Knows this all-knower, that from itch of praiſe,
Or, from an itch more ſordid, when he ſhines,
Taking his country by five hundred ears,
Senates at once admire him, and deſpiſe,
With modeſt laughter lining loud applauſe,
Which makes the ſmile more mortal to his fame?
His fame, which (like the mighty Cæſar), crown'd
With laurels, in full ſenate, greatly falls,
By ſeeming friends, that honour, and deſtroy.
We riſe in glory, as we ſink in pride:
Where boaſting ends, there dignity begins:
And yet, miſtaken beyond all miſtake,
The blind Lorenzo's proud—of being proud;
And dreams himſelf aſcending in his fall.

An eminence, though fancy'd, turns the brain:
All vice wants hellebore; but of all vice,
Pride loudeſt calls, and for the largeſt bowl;
Becauſe, unlike all other vice, it flies,
In fact, the point, in fancy moſt purſued.
Who court applauſe, oblige the world in this;
They gratify man's paſſion to refuſe.
Superior honour, when aſſum'd, is loſt;
Ev'n good men turn banditti, and rejoice,
Like Kouli Kan, in plunder of the proud.

Though ſomewhat diſconcerted, ſteady ſtill
To the world's cauſe, with half a face of joy,
Lorenzo cries—"Be, then, ambition caſt;
"Ambition's dearer far ſtands unimpeach'd,
"Gay pleaſure! proud ambition is her ſlave;
"For her, he ſoars at great, and hazards ill;
"For her he fights, and bleeds, or overcomes;
"And paves his way, with crowns, to reach her ſmile: [renzo!
"Who can reſiſt her charms?"—Or. ſhould? Lo-
What mortal ſhall reſiſt, where angels yield?
Pleaſure 's the miſtreſs of ethereal powers;
For her contend the rival gods above;
Pleaſure 's the miſtreſs of the world below;
And well it was for man, that pleaſure charms;
How would all ſtagnate, but for pleaſure's ray!
How would the frozen ſtream of action ceaſe!
What is the pulſe of this ſo buſy world?
The love of pleaſure: that, through every vein,
Throws motion, warmth; and ſhuts out death from life.

Though various are the tempers of mankind,
Pleaſure's gay family hold all in chains:
Some moſt affect the black; and ſome, the fair;
Some honeſt pleaſure court; and ſome obſcene.
Pleaſures obſcene are various, as the throng
Of paſſions, that can err in human hearts;
Miſtake their objects, or tranſgreſs their bounds.
Think you there's but one whoredom? Whoredom all,
But when our reaſon licenſes delight
Doſt doubt, Lorenzo? Thou ſhalt doubt no more
Thy father chides thy gallantries; yet hugs
An ugly, common harlot, in the dark;
A rank adulterer with others' gold!
And that hag, vengeance, in a corner charms,
Hatred her brothel has, as well as love,
Where horrid epicures debauch in blood.
Whate'er the motive, pleaſure is the mark:
For her, the black aſſaſſin draws his ſword;
For her, dark ſtateſmen trim their midnight lamp,
To which no ſingle ſacrifice may fall;
For her the ſaint abſtains; the miſer ſtarves;
The Stoic proud, for pleaſure, pleaſure ſcorn'd;
For her, affliction's daughters grief indulge,
And find, or hope, a luxury in tears;
For her, guilt, ſhame, toil, danger, we defy;
And with an aim voluptuous, ruſh on death.
Thus univerſal her deſpotic power!

And as her empire wide, her praiſe is juſt.
Patron of pleaſure! doater on delight!
I am thy rival; pleaſure I profeſs;
Pleaſure the purpoſe of my gloomy ſong.
Pleaſure is nought but virtue's gayer name;
I wrong her ſtill, I rate her worth too low;
Virtue the root, and pleaſure is the flower;
And honeſt Epicurus' foes were fools.

But this ſounds harſh, and gives the wiſe offence;
If o'erſtrain'd wiſdom ſtill retains the name.
How knits auſterity her cloudy brow,
And blames, as bold, and hazardous, the praiſe
Of pleaſure, to mankind, unprais'd, too dear!
Ye modern Stoics! hear my ſoft reply;
Their ſenſes men will truſt: we can't impoſe;
Or, if we could, is impoſition right?
Own honey ſweet; but owning add this ſting;
"When mixt with poiſon, it is deadly too."
Truth never was indebted to a lie.
Is nought but virtue to be praiſ'd as good?
Why then is health preferr'd before diſeaſe?
What nature loves is good, without our leave.
And where no future drawback cries, "Beware!"
Pleaſure, though not from virtue, ſhould prevail.
'Tis balm to life, and gratitude to heaven:
How cold our thanks for bounties unenjoy'd!
The love of pleaſure is man's eldeſt born,
Born in his cradle, living to his tomb;
Wiſdom, her younger ſiſter, though more grave,
Was meant to miniſter, and not to mar,
Imperial pleaſure, queen of human hearts.

Lorenzo! thou her majeſty's renown'd,
Though uncouth counſel, learned in the wo rld!

Who think'ſt thyſelf a Murray, with diſdain
May'ſt look on me. Yet, my Demoſthenes!
Canſt thou plead pleaſure's cauſe as well as I?
Know'ſt thou her nature, purpoſe, parentage?
Attend my ſong, and thou ſhalt know them all;
And know thyſelf; and know thyſelf to be
(Strange truth!) the moſt abſtemious man alive.
Tell not Caliſta; ſhe will laugh thee dead;
Or ſend thee to her hermitage with L——.
Abſurd preſumption! Thou who never knew'ſt
A ſerious thought! ſhalt thou dare dream of joy?
No man e'er found a happy life by chance;
Or yawn'd it into being with a wiſh;
Or with the ſhout of grove'ling appetite
E'er ſmelt it out, and grubb'd it from the dirt.
An art it is, and muſt be learnt; and learnt
With unremitting effort, or be loſt;
And leaves us perfect blockheads in our bliſs.
The clouds may drop down titles and eſtates;
Wealth may ſeek us; but wiſdom muſt be ſought;
Sought before all; but (how unlike all elſe
We ſeek on earth!) 'tis never ſought in vain.
Firſt, pleaſure's birth, riſe, ſtrength, and grandeur, ſee.
Brought forth by wiſdom, nurſt by diſcipline,
By patience taught, by perſeverance crown'd,
She rears her head majeſtic; round her throne,
Erected in the boſom of the juſt,
Each virtue liſted forms her manly guard.
For what are virtues? (Formidable name!)
What, but the fountain, or defence of joy?
Why then commanded? Need mankind commands,
At once to merit, and to make their bliſs?—
Great Legiſlator! ſcarce ſo great as kind!
If men are rational, and love delight,
Thy gracious law but flatters human choice;
In the tranſgreſſion lies the penalty;
And they the moſt indulge, who moſt obey.
Of pleaſure next the final cauſe explore;
Its mighty purpoſe, its important end.
Not to turn human brutal, but to build
Divine on human, pleaſure came from heaven.
In aid to reaſon was the goddeſs ſent;
To call up all its ſtrength by ſuch a charm.
Pleaſure firſt ſuccours virtue; in return
Virtue gives pleaſure an eternal reign.
What but the pleaſure of food, friendſhip, faith,
Supports life natural, civil, and divine?
'Tis from the pleaſure of repaſt we live;
'Tis from the pleaſure of applauſe we pleaſe;
'Tis from the pleaſure of belief we pray
(All prayer would ceaſe, if unbeliev'd the prize):
It ſerves ourſelves, our ſpecies, and our God;
And to ſerve more, is paſt the ſphere of man.
Glide then for ever, pleaſure's ſacred ſtream!
Through Eden, as Euphrates ran, it runs,
And noſters every growth of happy life;
Makes a new Eden where it flows;—but ſuch
As muſt be loſt, Lorenzo! by thy fall.
"What mean I by thy fall?"—Thou'lt ſhortly ſee,
While pleaſure's nature is at large diſplay'd;
Already ſung her origin, and ends.
Thoſe glorious ends, by kind, or by degree,
When pleaſure violates, 'tis then a vice,
And vengeance too; it haſtens into pain.
From due refreſhment, life, health, reaſon, joy;
From wild exceſs, pain, grief, diſtraction, death;
Heaven's juſtice this proclaims, and that her love.
What greater evil can I wiſh my foe,
Than his full draught of pleaſure, from a caſk
Unbroach'd by juſt authority, unguag'd
By temperance, by reaſon unreſin'd?
A thouſand demons lurk within the lee.
Heaven, others, and ourſelves! uninjur'd theſe.
Drink deep; the deeper, then the more divine:
Angels are angels, from indulgence there;
'Tis unrepenting pleaſure makes a god.
Doſt think thyſelf a god from other joys?
A victim rather! ſhortly ſure to bleed.
The wrong muſt mourn: can heaven's appointments fail?
Can man outwit Omnipotence? Strike out
A ſelf-wrought happineſs unmeant by him
Who made us, and the world we would enjoy?
Who forms an inſtrument, ordains from whence
Its diſſonance or harmony ſhall riſe.
Heaven bade the ſoul this mortal frame inſpire:
Bade virtue's ray divine inſpire the ſoul
With unprecarious flows of vital joy;
And without breathing, man as well might hope
For life, as without piety, for peace.
"Is virtue then and piety the ſame?"
No; piety is more; 'tis virtue's ſource;
Mother of every worth, as that of joy.
Men of the world this doctrine ill digeſt;
They ſmile at piety; yet boaſt aloud
Good will to men; nor know they ſtrive to part
What nature joins; and thus confute themſelves.
With piety begins all good on earth;
'Tis the firſt-born of rationality.
Conſcience, her firſt law broken, wounded lies;
Enfeebled, lifeleſs, impotent to good;
A feign'd affection bounds her utmoſt power.
Some we can't love, but for the Almighty's ſake;
A foe to God was ne'er true friend to man;
Some ſiniſter intent taints all he does;
And, in his kindeſt actions, he's unkind.
On piety, humanity is built;
And, on humanity, much happineſs;
And yet ſtill more on piety itſelf.
A ſoul in commerce with her God, is heaven;
Feels not the tumults and the ſhocks of life;
The whirls of paſſion, and the ſtrokes of heart.
A Deity believ'd is joy begun;
A Deity ador'd is joy advanc'd;
A Deity belov'd is joy matur'd.
Each branch of piety delight inſpires;
Faith builds a bridge from this world to the next,
O'er death's dark gulf, and all its horror hides;
Praiſe, the ſweet exhalation of our joy,
That joy exalts, and makes it ſweeter ſtill;
Prayer ardent opens heaven, lets down a ſtream
Of glory on the conſecrated hour
Of man, in audience with the Deity.
Who worſhips the Great God, that inſtant joins
The firſt in heaven, and ſets his foot on hell.
Lorenzo! when waſt thou at church before?
Thou think'ſt the ſervice long: but is it juſt?
Though juſt, unwelcome; thou hadſt rather tread
Unhallow'd ground; the muſe, to win thine ear,

Muſt take an air leſs ſolemn. She complies.
Good conſcience! at the ſound the world retires;
Verſe diſaffects it, and Lorenzo ſmiles;
Yet has ſhe her ſeraglio full of charms;
And ſuch as age ſhall heighten, not impair.
Art thou dejected? Is thy mind o'ercaſt?
Amid her fair ones, thou the faireſt chooſe,
To chaſe thy gloom.—"Go, fix ſome weighty
"truth;
"Chain down ſome paſſion; do ſome generous good;
"Teach ignorance to ſee, or grief to ſmile;
"Correct thy friend; befriend thy greateſt foe;
"Or with warm heart and confidence divine,
"Spring up, and lay ſtrong hold on him who made
"thee."
Thy gloom is ſcatter'd, ſprightly ſpirits flow;
Though wither'd is thy vine, and harp unſtrung:
Doſt call the bowl, the viol, and the dance,
Loud mirth, mad laughter? wretched comforters!
Phyſicians! more than half of thy diſeaſe.
Laughter, though never cenſur'd yet as ſin,
(Pardon a thought that only ſeems ſevere)
Is half immortal: is it much indulg'd?
By venting ſpleen, or diſſipating thought,
It ſhows a ſcorner, or it makes a fool;
And ſins, as hurting others, or ourſelves.
'Tis pride, or emptineſs, applies the ſtraw;
That tickles little minds to mirth effuſe;
Of grief approaching, the portentous ſign!
The houſe of laughter makes a houſe of woe.
A man triumphant is a monſtrous ſight;
A man dejected is a ſight as mean.
What cauſe for triumph, where ſuch ills abound?
What for dejection, where preſides a Power,
Who call'd us into being to be bleſt?
So grieve, as conſcious grief may riſe to joy;
So joy, as conſcious joy to grief may fall.
Moſt true, a wiſe man never will be ſad;
But neither will ſonorous bubbling mirth,
A ſhallow ſtream of happineſs betray:
Too happy to be ſportive, he's ſerene. [pence)
Yet wouldſt thou laugh (but at thy own ex-
This counſel ſtrange ſhould I preſume to give—
"Retire, and read thy Bible, to be gay."
There truths abound of ſovereign aid to peace;
Ah! do not prize them leſs, becauſe inſpir'd,
As thou and thine are apt and proud to do.
If not inſpir'd, that pregnant page had ſtood,
Time's treaſure? and the wonder of the wiſe!
Thou think'ſt, perhaps, thy ſoul alone at ſtake;
Alas!—Should men miſtake thee for a fool;—
What man of taſte for genius, wiſdom, truth,
Though tender of thy fame, could interpoſe?
Believe me, ſenſe here acts a double part,
And the true critic is a Chriſtian too.
But theſe, thou think'ſt, are gloomy paths to joy.—
True joy in ſunſhine ne'er was found at firſt.
They, firſt, themſelves offend, who greatly pleaſe;
And travel only gives us ſound repoſe.
Heaven ſells all pleaſure: effort is the price;
The joys of conqueſt are the joys of man;
And glory the victorious laurel ſpreads
O'er pleaſure's pure, perpetual, placid ſtream.
There is a time, when toil muſt be preferr'd,
Or joy, by miſ-tim'd fondneſs, is undone.
A man of pleaſure is a man of pains.
Thou wilt not take the trouble to be bleſt.
Falſe joys, indeed, are born from want of thought:
From thoughts full bent, and energy the true;
And that demands a mind in equal poiſe,
Remote from gloomy grief, and glaring joy.
Much joy not only ſpeaks ſmall happineſs,
But happineſs that ſhortly muſt expire.
Can joy, unbottom'd in reflection, ſtand?
And, in a tempeſt can reflection live?
Can joy, like thine, ſecure itſelf an hour?
Can joy, like thine, meet accident unſhock'd?
Or ope the door to honeſt poverty?
Or talk with threatening death, and not turn pale?
In ſuch a world, and ſuch a nature, theſe
Are needful fundamentals of delight:
Theſe fundamentals give delight indeed;
Delight, pure, delicate, and durable;
Delight, unſhaken, maſculine, divine;
A conſtant, and a ſound, but ſerious joy.
Is joy the daughter of ſeverity?
It is:—yet far my doctrine from ſevere.
"Rejoice for ever;" it becomes a man;
Exalts, and ſets him nearer to the gods.
"Rejoice for ever!" Nature cries, "Rejoice;"
And drinks to man in her nectareous cup,
Mixt up of delicates for every ſenſe;
To the great Founder of the bounteous feaſt,
Drinks glory, gratitude, eternal praiſe;
And he that will not pledge her, is a churl.
Ill firmly to ſupport, good fully taſte,
Is the whole ſcience of felicity:
Yet ſparing pledge: her bowl is not the beſt
Mankind can boaſt.—"A rational repaſt,
"Exertion, vigilance, a mind in arms,
"A military diſcipline of thought,
"To foil temptation in the doubtful field,
"And ever-waking ardour for the right."
'Tis theſe firſt give, then guard, a cheerful heart;
Nought that is right think little, well aware
What reaſon bids God bids; by his command
How aggrandis'd the ſmalleſt thing we do!
Thus nothing is inſipid to the wiſe;
To thee inſipid all, but what is mad;
Joys ſeaſon'd high, and taſting ſtrong of guilt.
"Mad!" (thou reply'ſt, with indignation fir'd)
"Of ancient ſages proud to tread the ſteps,
"I follow nature."—Follow nature ſtill,
But look it be thine own: Is conſcience then
No part of nature? Is ſhe not ſupreme?
Thou regicide! O raiſe her from the dead!
Then follow nature, and reſemble God.
When, ſpite of conſcience, pleaſure is purſu'd,
Man's nature is unnaturally pleas'd;
And what's unnatural is painful too
At intervals, and muſt diſguſt ev'n thee!
The fact thou know'ſt, but not perhaps the cauſe.
Virtue's foundations with the world's were laid;
Heavenmix'd her with our make, and twiſted cloſe
Her ſacred intereſts with the ſtrings of life.
Who breaks her awful mandate, ſhocks himſelf,
His better ſelf; and is it greater pain
Our ſoul ſhould murmur, or our duſt repine?
And one in their eternal war muſt bleed.
If one muſt ſuffer, which ſhould leaſt be ſpar'd;

The pains of mind surpass the pains of sense:
Ask then the gout what torment is in guilt.
The joys of sense to mental joys are mean:
Sense on the present only feeds; the soul
On past and future foragers for joy.
'Tis hers by retrospect through time to range,
And forward time's great sequel to survey.
Could human courts take vengeance on the mind,
Axes might rust, and racks and gibbets fall:
Guard then thy mind, and leave the rest to fate.

Lorenzo! wilt thou never be a man?
The man is dead who for the body lives,
Lur'd, by the beating of his pulse, to list
With every lust that wars against his peace,
And sets him quite at variance with himself.
Thyself first know, then love: a self there is
Of virtue fond, that kindles at her charms.
A self there is, as fond of every vice,
While every virtue wounds it to the heart:
Humility degrades it, justice robs,
Blest bounty beggars it, fair truth betrays,
And godlike magnanimity destroys.
This self, when rival to the former, scorn;
When not in competition, kindly treat,
Defend it, feed it:—But, when virtue bids,
Toss it, or to the fowls, or to the flames.
And why? 'Tis love of pleasure bids thee bleed;
Comply, or own self-love extinct or blind.

For what is vice? Self-love in a mistake;
A poor blind merchant buying joys too dear.
And virtue, what? 'Tis self-love in her wits,
Quite skilful in the market of delight.
Self-love's good sense is love of that dread Power,
From whom herself, and all she can enjoy.
Other self-love is but disguis'd self-hate;
More mortal than the malice of our foes;
A self-hate now scarce felt, then felt full sore
When being curs'd; extinction, loud implor'd;
And every thing preferr'd to what we are.

Yet this self-love Lorenzo makes his choice;
And, in this choice triumphant, boasts of joy.
How is his want of happiness betray'd
By disaffection to the present hour!
Imagination wanders far afield:
The future pleases: why? The present pains—
"But that's a secret." Yes, which all men know,
And know from thee, discover'd unawares.
Thy ceaseless agitation restless roll
From cheat to cheat, impatient of a pause;
What is it? 'Tis the cradle of the soul,
From instinct sent, to rock her in disease,
Which her physician, reason, will not cure.
A poor expedient! yet thy best; and while
It mitigates thy pain, it owns it too.

Such are Lorenzo's wretched remedies!
The weak have remedies, the wise have joys.
Superior wisdom is superior bliss.
And what sure mark distinguishes the wise?
Consistent wisdom ever wills the same;
Thy fickle wish is ever on the wing.
Sick of herself is folly's character,
As wisdom's is, a modest self-applause.
A change of evils is thy good supreme;
Nor but in motion canst thou find thy rest.
Man's greatest strength is shown in standing still.
The first sure symptom of a mind in health
Is rest of heart, and pleasure felt at home.
False pleasure from abroad her joys imports;
Rich from within, and self-sustain'd, the true.
The true is fix'd, and solid as a rock;
Slippery the false, and tossing as the wave.
This, a wild wanderer on earth, like Cain;
That, like the fabled, self-enamour'd boy,
Home-contemplation her supreme delight;
She dreads an interruption from without,
Smit with her own condition; and the more
Intense she gazes, still it charms the more.

No man is happy, till he thinks on earth
There breathes not a more happy than himself;
Then envy dies, and love o'erflows on all;
And love o'erflowing makes an angel here.
Such angels, all entitled to repose
On him who governs fate: though tempest frowns,
Though nature shakes, how soft to lean on heaven?
To lean on him on whom archangels lean!
With inward eyes, and silent as the grave,
They stand collecting every beam of thought,
Till their hearts kindle with divine delight;
For all their thoughts, like angels seen of old
In Israel's dream, come from and go to heaven:
Hence are they studious of sequester'd scenes,
While noise and dissipation comfort thee.

Were all men happy, revelings would cease,
That opiate for inquietude within.
Lorenzo! never man was truly blest,
But it compos'd, and gave him such a cast,
As folly might mistake for want of joy.
A cast unlike the triumph of the proud;
A modest aspect, and a smile at heart.
O for a joy from thy Philander's spring!
A spring perennial rising in the breast,
And permanent as pure! no turbid stream
Of rapturous exultation, swelling high,
Which like land-floods impetuous pour a while,
Then sink at once, and leave us in the mire.
What does the man who transient joy prefers?
What, but prefer the bubbles to the stream?

Vain are all sudden sallies of delight;
Convulsions of a weak distemper'd joy.
Joy's a fix'd state, a tenure, not a start.
Bliss there is none, but unprecarious bliss:
That is the gem: sell all, and purchase that.
Why go a-begging to contingencies,
Not gain'd with ease, nor safely lov'd, if gain'd?
At good fortuitous draw back and pause;
Suspect it; what thou canst ensure, enjoy;
And nought but what thou giv'st thyself is sure.
Reason perpetuates joy that reason gives,
And makes it as immortal as herself:
To mortals nought immortal but their worth.

Worth, conscious worth, should absolutely reign,
And other joys ask leave for their approach,
Nor, unexamin'd, ever leave obtain.
Thou art all anarchy; a mob of joys
Wage war, and perish in intestine broils;
Not the least promise of internal peace!
No bosom-comfort, or unborrow'd bliss!
Thy thoughts are vagabonds; all outward-bound,
'Mid sands, and rocks, and storms, to cruise for pleasure;

If gain'd, dear bought; and better miss'd than gain'd.
Much pain must expiate what much pain procur'd.
Fancy, and sense, from an infected shore
Thy cargo bring, and pestilence the prize.
Then, such thy thirst (insatiable thirst!
By fond indulgence but inflam'd the more!)
Fancy still cruises when poor sense is tir'd.
Imagination is the Paphian shop,
Where feeble happiness, like Vulcan, lame,
Bids foul ideas, in their dark recess,
And hot as hell (which kindled the black fires,)
With wanton art those fatal arrows form
Which murder all thy time, health, wealth, and fame.
Would'st thou receive them, other thoughts there [are
On angel-wing, descending from above,
Which these, with art divine, would counter-work,
And form celestial armour for thy peace.
In this is seen imagination's guilt;
But who can count her follies? She betrays thee,
To think in grandeur there is something great.
For works of curious art, and ancient fame,
Thy genius hungers, elegantly pain'd;
And foreign climes must cater for thy taste.
Hence what disaster!—Though the price was paid,
That persecuting priest, the Turk of Rome,
Whose foot (ye gods!) though cloven, must be kiss'd,
Detain'd thy dinner on the Latian shore;
(Such is the fate of honest Protestants!)
And poor magnificence is starv'd to death.
Hence just resentment, indignation, ire!—
Be pacify'd, if outward things are great;
'Tis magnanimity great things to scorn;
Pompous expences, and parades august,
And courts, that insalubrious soil to peace.
True happiness ne'er enter'd at an eye;
True happiness resides in things unseen.
No smiles of fortune ever bless the bad,
Nor can her frowns rob innocence of joys;
That jewel wanting, triple crowns are poor:
So tell his Holiness, and be reveng'd.
Pleasure, we both agree, is man's chief good;
Or only contest, what deserves the name.
Give pleasure's name to nought, but what has pass'd
Th' authentic seal of reason, which, like Yorke,
Demurs on what it passes,) and defies
The tooth of time; when past, a pleasure still;
Dearer on trial, lovelier for its age,
And doubly to be priz'd, as it promotes
Our future, while it forms our present, joy.
Some joys the future overcast; and some
Throw all their beams that way, and gild the tomb.
Some joys endear eternity; some give
Abhorr'd annihilation dreadful charms.
Are rival joys contending for thy choice?
Consult thy whole existence, and be safe;
That oracle will put all doubt to flight.
Short is the lesson, though my lecture long,
Be good—and let heaven answer for the rest.
Yet, with a sigh o'er all mankind, I grant
In this our day of proof, our land of hope,
The good man has his clouds that intervene;
Clouds that obscure his sublunary day,
But never conquer: ev'n the best must own
Patience and resignation are the pillars
Of human peace on earth. The pillars these;
But those of Seth not more remote from thee,
Till this heroic lesson thou hast learnt,
To frown at pleasure, and to smile in pain.
Fir'd at the prospect of unclouded bliss,
Heaven in reversion, like the sun, as yet
Beneath th' horizon, cheers us in this world;
It sheds, on souls susceptible of light,
The glorious dawn of our eternal day.
"This (says Lorenzo) is a fair harangue:
"But can harangues blow back strong nature's stream,
"Or stem the tide heaven pushes through our veins,
"Which sweeps away man's impotent resolves,
"And lays his labour level with the world?"
Themselves men make their comment on mankind,
And think nought is, but what they find at home:
Thus weakness to chimera turns the truth.
Nothing romantic has the muse prescrib'd.
* Above, Lorenzo saw the man of earth,
The mortal man, and wretched was the sight.
To balance that, to comfort, and exalt,
Now see the man immortal: him I mean
Who lives as such; whose heart, full bent on heaven,
Leans all that way, his bias to the stars.
The world's dark shades, in contrast set, shall raise
His lustre more, though bright, without a foil:
Observe his awful portrait, and admire;
Nor stop at wonder; imitate, and live.
Some angel guide my pencil, while I draw
What nothing less than angel can exceed!
A man on earth devoted to the skies;
Like ships in seas, while in, above the world.
With aspect mild, and elevated eye,
Behold him seated on a mount serene,
Above the fogs of sense, and passion's storm;
All the black cares and tumults of this life,
Like harmless thunders breaking at his feet,
Excite his pity, not impair his peace.
Earth's genuine sons, the sceptr'd and the slave,
A mingled mob! a wandering herd! he sees
Bewilder'd in the vale; in all unlike!
His full reverse in all! what higher praise?
What stronger demonstration of the right?
The present all their care, the future his.
When public welfare calls, or private want,
They give to fame, his bounty he conceals.
Their virtues varnish nature, his exalt.
Mankind's esteem they court, and he his own.
Theirs, the wild chase of false felicities,
His, the compos'd possession of the true.
Alike throughout is his consistent peace,
All of one colour, and an even thread;
While party-colour'd shreds of happiness,
With hideous gaps between, patch up for them
A madman's robe; each puff of fortune blows
The tatters by, and shews their nakedness.
He sees with other eyes than theirs: where they

* In a former Night.

Behold a ſun, he ſpies a Deity;
What makes them only ſmile, makes him adore.
Where they ſee mountains, he but atoms ſees;
An empire in his balance weighs a grain.
They things terreſtrial worſhip as divine;
His hopes immortal blow them by as duſt,
That dims his ſight, and ſhortens his ſurvey,
Which longs in infinite to loſe all bound.
Titles and honours (if they prove his fate)
He lays aſide to find his dignity;
No dignity they find in aught beſides.
They triumph in externals, (which conceal Man's real glory) proud of an eclipſe.
Himſelf too much he prizes to be proud,
And nothing thinks ſo great in man as man.
Too dear he holds his intereſt, to neglect
Another's welfare, or his right invade;
Their intereſt, like a lion, lives on prey.
They kindle at the ſhadow of a wrong;
Wrong he ſuſtains with temper, looks on heaven,
Nor ſtoops to think his injurer his foe;
Nought, but what wounds his virtue wounds his peace.
A cover'd heart their character defends;
A cover'd heart denies him half his praiſe.
With nakedneſs his innocence agrees;
While their broad foliage teſtifies their fall.
Their no joys end, where his full feaſt begins:
His joys create, theirs murder, future bliſs.
To triumph in exiſtence, his alone;
And his alone, triumphantly to think
His true exiſtence is not yet begun.
His glorious courſe was, yeſterday, complete;
Death, then, was welcome; yet life ſtill is ſweet.
But nothing charms Lorenzo, like the firm,
Undaunted breaſt——And whoſe is that high praiſe?
They yield to pleaſure, though they danger brave,
And ſhow no fortitude, but in the field;
If there they ſhow it, 'tis for glory ſhown;
Nor will that cordial always man their hearts.
A cordial his ſuſtains, that cannot fail;
By pleaſure unſubdued, unbroke by pain,
He ſhares in that Omnipotence he truſts.
All-bearing, all-attempting, till he falls;
And when he falls, writes VICI on his ſhield.
From magnanimity, all fear above;
From nobler recompenſe, above applauſe;
Which owes to man's ſhort out-look all its charms.
Backward to credit what he never felt,
Lorenzo cries,—"Where ſhines this miracle?
"From what root riſes this immortal man?"
A root that grows not in Lorenzo's ground;
The root diſſect, nor wonder at the flower.
He follows nature (not like thee) and ſhows us
An uninverted ſyſtem of a man.
His appetite wears reaſon's golden chain,
And finds, in due reſtraint, its luxury.
His paſſion like an eagle well reclaim'd,
Is taught to fly at nought, but infinite.
Patient his hope, un-anxious is his care,
His caution fearleſs, and his grief, (if grief
The gods ordain) a ſtranger to deſpair.
And why?—Becauſe, affection, more than meet,
His wiſdom leaves not diſengag'd from heaven.
Thoſe ſecondary goods that ſmile on earth,
He, loving in proportion, loves in peace.
They moſt the world enjoy, who leaſt admire.
His underſtanding 'ſcapes the common cloud
Of fumes, ariſing from a boiling breaſt.
His head is clear, becauſe his heart is cool,
By worldly competitions uninflam'd.
The moderate movements of his ſoul admit
Diſtinct ideas, and matur'd debate,
An eye impartial, and an even ſcale;
Whence judgment ſound, and unrepenting choice.
Thus, in a double ſenſe, the good are wiſe;
On its own dunghill, wiſer than the world.
What, then, the world? It muſt be doubly weak;
Strange truth! as ſoon would they believe their Creed.
Yet thus it is; nor otherwiſe can be;
So far from aught romantic, what I ſing.
Bliſs has no being, virtue has no ſtrength,
But from the proſpect of immortal life. [ſame)
Who think earth all, or (what weighs juſt the
Who care no farther, muſt prize what it yields;
Fond of its fancies, proud of its parades.
Who thinks earth nothing, can't its charms admire;
He can't a foe, though moſt malignant, hate,
Becauſe that hate would prove his greater foe.
'Tis hard for them (yet who ſo loudly boaſt
Good-will to men?) to love their deareſt friend;
For may not he invade their good ſupreme,
Where the leaſt jealouſy turns love to gall!
All ſhines to them, that for a ſeaſon ſhines.
Each act, each thought, he queſtions, "What its "weight,
"Its colour what, a thouſand ages hence?"
And what it there appears, he deems it now.
Hence, pure are the receſſes of his ſoul.
The godlike man has nothing to conceal.
His virtue, conſtitutionally deep,
Has habit's firmneſs, and affection's flame;
Angels, ally'd, deſcend to feed the fire;
And death, which others ſlays, makes him a god.
And now, Lorenzo! bigot of this world!
Wont to diſdain poor bigots caught by heaven!
Stand by thy ſcorn, and be reduc'd to nought:
For what art thou!—Thou boaſter! while thy glare,
Thy gaudy grandeur, and mere worldly worth,
Like a broad miſt, at diſtance, ſtrikes us moſt;
And like a miſt, is nothing when at hand;
His merit, like a mountain, on approach,
Swells more, and riſes nearer to the ſkies,
By promiſe now, and by poſſeſſion ſoon,
(Too ſoon, too much, it cannot be) his own.
From this thy juſt annihilation riſe,
Lorenzo! riſe to ſomething, by reply.
The world, thy client, liſtens, and expects;
And longs to crown thee with immortal praiſe.
Canſt thou be ſilent? No; for wit is thine;
And wit talks moſt, when leaſt ſhe has to ſay,
And reaſon interrupts not her career.
She'll ſay—That miſts above the mountains riſe;
And, with a thouſand pleaſantries, amuſe;
She'll ſparkle, puzzle, flutter, raiſe a duſt,
And fly conviction, in the duſt ſhe rais'd.

Wit, how delicious to man's dainty taſte?
'Tis precious, as the vehicle of ſenſe;
But, as its ſubſtitute, a dire diſeaſe.
Pernicious, talent! flatter'd by the world,
By the blind world, which thinks the talent rare.
Wiſdom is rare, Lorenzo! wit abounds;
Paſſion can give it; ſometimes wine inſpires
The lucky flaſh; and madneſs rarely fails.
Whatever cauſe the ſpirit ſtrongly ſtirs,
Confers the bays, and rivals thy renown.
For thy renown, 't were well, was this the worſt;
Chance often hits it; and, to pique the more,
See dullneſs, blundering on vivacities,
Shakes her ſage head at the calamity,
Which has expos'd, and let her down to thee.
But wiſdom, awful wiſdom! which inſpects,
Diſcerns, compares, weighs, ſeparates, infers,
Seizes the right, and holds it to the laſt;
How rare! in ſenates, ſynods, ſought in vain;
Or, if there found, 'tis ſacred to the few;
While a lewd proſtitute to multitudes,
Frequent, as fatal, wit: in civil life,
Wit makes an enterpriſer; ſenſe a man.
Wit hates authority; commotion loves,
And thinks herſelf the lightning of the ſtorm.
In ſtates, 'tis dangerous; in religion, death:
Shall wit turn Chriſtian, when the dull believe?
Senſe is our helmet, wit is but the plume;
The plume expoſes, 'tis our helmet ſaves.
Senſe is the diamond, weighty, ſolid, ſound;
When cut by wit, it caſts a brighter beam;
Yet, wit apart, it is a diamond ſtill.
Wit, widow'd of good ſenſe, is worſe than nought;
It hoiſts more ſail to run againſt a rock.
Thus, a half-Cheſterfield is quite a fool;
Whom dull fools ſcorn, and bleſs their want of wit.
How ruinous the rock I warn thee ſhun,
Where Syrens ſit, to ſing thee to thy fate!
A joy, in which our reaſon bears no part,
Is but a ſorrow tickling, ere it ſtings.
Let not the cooings of the world allure thee;
Which of her lovers ever found her true?
Happy! of this bad world who little know?—
And yet, we much muſt know her, to be ſafe.
To know the world, not love her, is thy point;
She gives but little, nor that little long.
There is, I grant, a triumph of the pulſe;
A dance of ſpirits, a mere froth of joy,
Our thoughtleſs agitation's idle child,
That mantles high, that ſparkles and expires,
Leaving the ſoul more vapid than before.
An animal ovation! ſuch as holds
No commerce with our reaſon, but ſubſiſts
On juices, through the well-ton'd tubes, well ſtrain'd;
A nice machine! ſcarce ever tun'd aright;
And when it jars—thy ſyrens ſing no more,
Thy dance is done; the demi-god is thrown (Short apotheoſis!) beneath the man,
In coward gloom immers'd, or fell deſpair.
Art thou yet dull enough deſpair to dread,
And ſtartle at deſtruction? If thou art,
Accept a buckler, take it to the field;
(A field of battle is this mortal life!)
When danger threatens, lay it on thy heart;
A ſingle ſentence proof againſt the world;
"Soul, body, fortune! Every good pertain
"To one of theſe; but prize not all alike;
"The goods of fortune to the body's health,
"Body to ſoul, and ſoul ſubmit to God."
Wouldſt thou build laſting happineſs? Do this;
Th' inverted pyramid can never ſtand.
Is this truth doubtful? it outſhines the ſun;
Nay the ſun ſhines not, but to ſhow us this,
The ſingle leſſon of mankind on earth.
And yet—yet, what? No news! mankind is mad;
Such mighty numbers liſt againſt the right,
(And what can't numbers, when bewitch'd atchieve!)
They talk themſelves to ſomething like belief,
That all earth's joys are theirs: As Athens' fool
Grinn'd from the port, on every ſail his own.
They grin; but wherefore? and how long the laugh!
Half ignorance, their mirth; and half, a lie;
To cheat the world, and cheat themſelves, they ſmile.
Hard either taſk! The moſt abandon'd own,
That others, if abandon'd, are undone:
Then for themſelves, the moment reaſon wakes,
(And Providence denies it long repoſe)
O how laborious is their gaiety!
They ſcarce can ſwallow their ebullient ſpleen,
Scarce muſter patience to ſupport the farce,
And pump ſad laughter till the curtain falls.
Scarce, did I ſay? Some cannot ſit it out;
Oft their own daring hands the curtain draw,
And ſhow us what their joy, by their deſpair.
The clotted hair! gor'd breaſt! blaſpheming eye!
Its impious fury ſtill alive in death!
Shut, ſhut the ſhocking ſcene.—But heaven denies
A cover to ſuch guilt; and ſo ſhould man.
Look round, Lorenzo! ſee the reeking blade,
Th' invenom'd phial, and the fatal ball;
The ſtrangling cord and ſuffocating ſtream;
The loathſome rottenneſs, and foul decays
From raging riot (flower ſuicides!)
And pride in theſe, more execrable ſtill!
How horrid all to thought!—But horrors, theſe,
That vouch the truth; and aid my feeble ſong.
From vice, ſenſe, fancy, no man can be bleſt:
Bliſs is too great, to lodge within an hour:
When an immortal being aims at bliſs,
Duration is eſſential to the name.
O for a joy from reaſon! Joy from that,
Which makes man man; and, exercis'd aright,
Will make him more: A bounteous joy! that gives,
And promiſes; that weaves with art divine,
The richeſt proſpect into preſent peace:
A joy ambitious! Joy in common held
With thrones ethereal, and their greater far;
A joy high-privileg'd from chance, time, death!
A joy, which death ſhall double, judgment crown!
Crown'd higher, and ſtill higher, at each ſtage,
Through bleſt eternity's long day: yet ſtill,
Not more remote from ſorrow, than from him,
Whoſe laviſh hand, whoſe love ſtupendous, pours
So much of Deity on guilty duſt.

There, O my Lucia! may I meet thee there,
Where not thy preſence can improve my bliſs!
Affects not this the ſages of the world?
Can nought affect them, but what fools them too?
Eternity depending on an hour,
Makes ſerious thought man's wiſdom, joy, and praiſe.
Nor need you bluſh (though ſometimes your deſigns
May ſhun the light) at your deſigns on heaven:
Sole point! where over-baſhful is your blame.
Are you not wiſe?—You know you are: Yet hear
One truth, amid your numerous ſchemes, miſlaid,
Or overlook'd, or thrown aſide, if ſeen;
"Our ſchemes to plan by this world, or the next,
"Is the ſole difference between wiſe and fool."
All worthy men will weigh you in this ſcale;
What wonder, then, if they pronounce you light?
Is their eſteem alone not worth your care?
Accept my ſimple ſcheme of common ſenſe: [own.
Thus, ſave your fame, and make two worlds your
The world replies not;—but the world perſiſts;
And puts the cauſe off to the longeſt day,
Planning evaſions for the day of doom.
So far, at that re-hearing, from redreſs,
They then turn witneſſes againſt themſelves:
Hear that, Lorenzo! nor be wiſe to-morrow,
Haſte, Haſte! A man, by nature, is in haſte;
For who ſhall anſwer for another hour?
'Tis highly prudent, to make one ſure friend;
And that thou canſt not do, this ſide the ſkies.
Ye ſons of earth! (nor willing to be more!)
Since verſe you think from prieſtcraft ſomewhat free,
Thus, in an age ſo gay, the muſe plain truths
(Truths, which, at church, you might have heard in proſe)
Has ventur'd into light; well-pleas'd the verſe
Should be forgot, if you the truths retain;
And crown her with your welfare, not your praiſe.
But praiſe ſhe need not fear: I ſee my fate;
And headlong leap, like Curtius, down the gulf.
Since many an ample volume, mighty tome,
Muſt die; and die unwept; O thou minute,
Devoted page! go forth among thy foes;
Go nobly proud of martyrdom for truth,
And die a double death: mankind, incens'd,
Denies thee long to live: nor ſhalt thou reſt
When thou art dead; in Stygian ſhades arraign'd
By Lucifer, as traitor to his throne;
And bold blaſphemer of his friend—the world;
The world, whoſe legions coſt him ſlender pay,
And volunteers around his banner ſwarm;
Prudent, as Pruſſia, in her zeal for Gaul!
"Are all, then, fools?" Lorenzo cries.—Yes, all,
But ſuch as hold this doctrine (new to thee);
"The mother of true wiſdom is the will;"
The nobleſt intellect, a fool without it.
World-wiſdom much has done, and more may do,
In arts and ſciences, in wars and peace;
But art and ſcience, like thy wealth, will leave thee,
And make thee twice a beggar at thy death.
This is the moſt indulgence can afford;—
"They wiſdom all can do, but—make thee wiſe."
Nor think this cenſure is ſevere on thee:
Satan, thy maſter, I dare call a dunce.

NIGHT IX.

THE CONSOLATION.

Containing, among other things,

I. A Moral Survey of the Nocturnal Heavens.
II. A Night-Addreſs to the Deity.

HUMBLY INSCRIBED TO HIS GRACE THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE,

One of his Majeſty's principal Secretaries of State.

"— Fatis contraria fata rependens."—VIRG.

As when a traveller, a long day paſt
In painful ſearch of what he cannot find,
At night's approach, content with the next cot,
There ruminates a while his labour loſt;
Then cheers his heart with what his fate affords,
And chaunts his ſonnet to deceive the time,
Till the due ſeaſon calls him to repoſe:
Thus I, long-travell'd in the ways of men,
And dancing with the reſt, the giddy maze,
Where diſappointment ſmiles at hope's career;
Warn'd by the langour of life's evening ray,
At length have hous'd me in an humble ſhed;
Where future wandering baniſh'd from my thought,
And waiting patient the ſweet hour of reſt,
I chaſe the moments with a ſerious ſong.
Song ſooths our pains; and age has pains to ſooth.
When age, care, crime, and friends embrac'd at heart,
Torn from my bleeding breaſt, and death's dark ſhade,
Which hovers o'er me, quench'd th' ethereal fire;
Canſt thou, O night! indulge one labour more?
One labour more indulge! then ſleep, my ſtrain!
Till haply wak'd by Raphael's golden lyre,
Where night, death, age, care, crime, and ſorrow, ceaſe;
To bear a part in everlaſting lays;
Though far, far higher ſet in aim I truſt,
Symphonious to this humble prelude here.
Has not the muſe aſſerted pleaſures pure,
Like thoſe above; exploding other joys?
Weigh what was urg'd, Lorenzo! fairly weigh;
And tell me, haſt thou cauſe to triumph ſtill?
I think thou wilt forbear a boaſt ſo bold.
But if beneath the favour of miſtake,
Thy ſmile's ſincere; not more ſincere can be
Lorenzo's ſmile, than my compaſſion for him.
The ſick in body call for aid; the ſick
In mind are covetous of more diſeaſe;
And when at worſt, they dream themſelves quite well.
To know ourſelves diſeas'd, is half our cure.
When nature's bluſh by cuſtom is wip'd off,
And conſcience, deaden'd by repeated ſtrokes,
Has into manners naturaliz'd our crimes;
The curſe of curſes is, our curſe to love;
To triumph in the blackneſs of our guilt
(As Indians glory in the deepeſt jet),
And throw aſide our ſenſes with our peace.
But grant no guilt, no ſhame, no baſe alloy;
Grant joy and glory quite unſully'd ſhone;
Yet ſtill it ill deſerves Lorenzo's heart.

No joy, no glory, glitters in thy ſight,
But through the thin partition of an hour,
I ſee its ſables wove by deſtiny;
And that in ſorrow bury'd; this in ſhame;
While howling furies ring the doleful knell;
And conſcience, now ſo ſoft thou ſcarce canſt hear
Her whiſper, echoes her eternal peal.

Where the prime actors of the laſt year's ſcene;
Their port ſo proud, their buſkin, and their plume?
How many ſleep, who kept the world awake
With luſtre, and with noiſe! has death proclaim'd
A truce, and hung his fated lance on high?
'Tis brandiſh'd ſtill; nor ſhall the preſent year
Be more tenacious of her human leaf,
Or ſpread of feeble life a thinner fall.

But needleſs monuments to wake the thought;
Life's gayeſt ſcenes ſpeak man's mortality;
Though in a ſtyle more florid, full as plain,
As mauſoleums, pyramids, and tombs.
What are our nobleſt ornaments, but deaths
Turn'd flatterers of life, in paint or marble,
The well-ſtain'd canvas, or the featur'd ſtone?
Our fathers grace, or rather haunt, the ſcene.
Joy peoples her pavilion from the dead.
"Profeſt diverſions!—cannot theſe eſcape?"—
Far from it: theſe preſents us with a ſhroud;
And talk of death, like garlands o'er a grave.
As ſome bold plunderers, for bury'd wealth,
We ranſack tombs for paſtime; from the duſt
Call up the ſleeping hero; bid him tread
The ſcene for our amuſement: how like gods
We ſit; and wrapt in immortality,
Shed generous tears on wretches born to die;
Their fate deploring, to forget our own!

What all the pomps and triumphs of our lives,
But legacies in bloſſom? Our lean ſoil,
Luxuriant grown, and rank in vanities,
From friends interr'd beneath; a rich manure!
Like other worms, we banquet on the dead;
Like other worms, ſhall we crawl on, nor know
Our preſent frailties, or approaching fate?

Lorenzo! ſuch the glories of the world!
What is the world itſelf? Thy world—a grave.
Where is the duſt that has not been alive?
The ſpade, the plough, diſturb our anceſtors;
From human mould we reap our daily bread.
The globe around earth's hollow ſurface ſhakes,
And is the cieling of her ſleeping ſons.
O'er devaſtation we blind revels keep;
Whole bury'd towns ſupport the dancer's heel.
The moiſt of human frame the ſun exhales;
Winds ſcatter through the mighty void the dry;
Earth repoſſeſſes part of what ſhe gave,
And the freed ſpirit mounts on wings of fire;
Each element partakes our ſcatter'd ſpoils;
As nature wide our ruins ſpread: man's death
Inhabits all things, but the thought of man.

Nor man alone; his breathing buſt expires,
His tomb is mortal; empires die: where now,
The Roman, Greek? They ſtalk, an empty name!
Yet few regard them in this uſeful light;
Though half our learning is their epitaph.
When down thy vale, unlock'd by midnight thought,
That loves to wander in thy ſunleſs realms,
O death! I ſtretch my view; what viſions riſe!
What triumghs! toils imperial! arts divine!
In wither'd laurels glide before my ſight!
What lengths of far-fam'd ages, billow'd high
With human agitation, roll along
In unſubſtantial images of air!
The melancholy ghoſts of dead renown,
Whiſpering faint echoes of the world's applauſe,
With penitential aſpect as they paſs,
All point at earth, and hiſs at human pride,
The wiſdom of the wiſe, and prancings of the great.

But, O Lorenzo! far the reſt above,
Of ghaſtly nature, and enormous ſize,
One form aſſaults my ſight, and chills my blood,
And ſhakes my frame. Of one departed world
I ſee the mighty ſhadow: oozy wreath
And diſmal ſea-weed crown her; o'er her urn
Reclin'd, ſhe weeps her deſolated realms,
And bloated ſons; and, weeping, propheſies
Another's diſſolution ſoon in flames.
But like Caſſandra propheſies in vain;
In vain to many; not I truſt to thee.

For know'ſt thou not, or art thou loth to know,
The great decree, the counſel of the ſkies?
Deluge and conflagration, dreadful powers!
Prime miniſters of vengeance! chain'd in caves
Diſtinct, apart the giant furies roar;
Apart; or ſuch their horrid rage for ruin,
In mutual conflict would they riſe, and wage
Eternal war, till one was quite devour'd.
But not for this, ordain'd their boundleſs rage;
When heaven's inferior inſtruments of wrath,
War, famine, peſtilence, are found too weak
To ſcourge a world for her enormous crimes,
Theſe are let looſe alternate: down they ruſh,
Swift and tempeſtuous, from th' eternal throne,
With irreſiſtible commiſſion arm'd,
The world, in vain corrected, to deſtroy,
And eaſe creation of the ſhocking ſcene.

Seeſt thou, Lorenzo! what depends on man?
The fate of nature; as for man her birth.
Earth's actors change earth's tranſitory ſcenes,
And make creation groan with human guilt.
How muſt it groan, in a new deluge whelm'd,
But not of waters! at the deſtin'd hour,
By the loud trumpet ſummon'd to the charge,
See all the formidable ſons of fire,
Eruptions, earthquakes, comets, lightnings, play
Their various engines; all at once diſgorge
Their blazing magazines; and take by ſtorm
This poor terreſtrial citadel of man.

Amazing period! when each mountain-height
Out-burns Veſuvius; rocks eternal pour
Their melted maſs, as rivers once they pour'd;
Stars ruſh; and final ruin fiercely drives
Her ploughſhare o'er creation!—while aloft,
More than aſtoniſhment! if more can be!
Far other firmament than e'er was ſeen,
Than e'er was thought by man! far other ſtars!
Stars animate, that govern theſe of fire;
Far other ſun!—A ſun, O how unlike
The Babe at Bethlem! how unlike the man
That groan'd on Calvary!—Yet be it is; [pomp!
That Man of Sorrows! O how chang'd! what
In grandeur terrible, all heaven deſcends!
And gods ambitious, triumph in his train.

A ſwift archangel, with his golden wing,
As blots and clouds, that darken and diſgrace
The ſcene divine, ſweeps ſtars and ſuns aſide.
And now all droſs remov'd, heaven's own pure day,
Full on the confines of our ether flame.
While (dreadful contraſt!) far, how far beneath!
Hell burſting, belches forth her blazing ſeas,
And ſtorms ſulphureous; her voracious jaws
Expanding wide, and roaring for her prey.

Lorenzo! welcome to this ſcene; the laſt
In nature's courſe: the firſt in wiſdom's thought.
This ſtrikes, if aught can ſtrike thee; this awakes
The moſt ſupine; this ſnatches man from death.
Rouſe, rouſe, Lorenzo, then, and follow me,
Where truth, the moſt momentous man can hear,
Loud calls my ſoul, and ardour wings her flight.
I find my inſpiration in my theme;
The grandeur of my ſubject is my muſe.

At midnight, when mankind is wrapt in peace,
And worldly fancy feeds on golden dreams;
To give more dread to man's moſt dreadful hour,
At midnight, 'tis preſum'd, this pomp will burſt
From tenfold darkneſs; ſudden as the ſpark
From ſmitten ſteel; from nitrous grain the blaze.
Man, ſtarting from his couch, ſhall ſleep no more!
The day is broke, which never more ſhall cloſe!
Above, around, beneath, amazement all!
Terror and glory join'd in their extremes!
Our God in grandeur, and our world on fire!
All nature ſtruggling in the pangs of death!
Doſt thou not hear her? Doſt thou not deplore
Her ſtrong convulſions, and her final groan?
Where are we now? Ah me! the ground is gone
On which we ſtood; Lorenzo! while thou may'ſt,
Provide more firm ſupport, or ſink for ever!
Where? how? from whence? Vain hope! it is too late!
Where, where for ſhelter ſhall the guilty fly,
Where conſternation turns the good man pale?

Great day! for which all other days were made;
For which earth roſe from chaos, man from earth;
And an eternity, the date of gods,
Deſcended on poor earth-created man!
Great day of dread, deciſion, and deſpair!
At thought of thee, each ſublunary wiſh
Lets go its eager graſp, and drops the world;
And catches at each reed of hope in heaven.
As thought of thee!—and art thou abſent then?
Lorenzo! no; 'tis here; it is begun;—
Already is begun the grand aſſize,
In thee, in all; deputed conſcience ſcales
The dread tribunal, and foreſtalls our doom;
Foreſtalls; and, by foreſtalling, proves it ſure.
Why on himſelf ſhould man void judgment paſs?
Is idle nature laughing at her ſons?
Who conſcience ſent, her ſentence will ſupport.
And God above aſſert that God in man.
Thrice happy they! that enter now the court
Heaven opens in their boſoms: but, how rare,
Ah me! that magnanimity, how rare!
What hero, like the man who ſtands himſelf;
Who dares to meet his naked heart alone;
Who hears intrepid, the full charge it brings,
Reſolv'd to ſilence future murmurs there?
The coward flies; and flying, is undone.
(Art thou a coward? No:) The coward flies;
Thinks, but thinks ſlightly; aſks, but fears to know;
Aſks, "What is truth!" with Pilate; and retires;
Diſſolves the court, and mingles with the throng;
Aſylum ſad! from reaſon, hope, and heaven!

Shall all but man, look out with ardent eye,
For that great day, which was ordain'd for man?
O day of conſummation! mark ſupreme
(If men are wiſe) of human thought! nor leaſt,
Or in the ſight of angels, or their King!
Angels, whoſe radiant circles, height o'er height,
Order o'er order, riſing, blaze o'er blaze,
As in a theatre, ſurround this ſcene,
Intent on man, and anxious for his fate.
Angels look out for thee; for thee, their Lord,
To vindicate his glory; and for thee,
Creation univerſal calls aloud,
To diſinvolve the moral world, and give
To nature's renovation brighter charms.

Shall man alone, whoſe fate, whoſe final fate,
Hangs on that hour, exclude it from his thought?
I think of nothing elſe; I ſee! I feel it!
All nature, like an earthquake, trembling round!
All deities, like ſummer's ſwarms, on wing!
All baſking in the full meridian blaze!
I ſee the Judge enthron'd! the flaming guard!
The volume open'd! open'd every heart!
A ſun-beam pointing out each ſecret thought
No patron! interceſſor none! now paſt
The ſweet, the clement, mediatorial hour!
For guilt no plea! to pain, no pauſe! no bound!
Inexorable all! and all, extreme!

Nor man alone; the foe of God and man,
From his dark den, blaſpheming, drags his chain,
And rears his brazen front, with thunder ſcar'd:
Receives his ſentence, and begins his hell.
All vengeance paſt, now, ſeems abundant grace:
Like meteors in a ſtormy ſky, how roll
His baleful eyes; he curſes whom he dreads;
And deems it the firſt moment of his fall.

'Tis preſent to my thought!—and yet where is it?
Angels can't tell me; angels cannot gueſs
The period; from created beings lock'd
In darkneſs. But the proceſs, and the place,
Are leſs obſcure; for theſe may man inquire.
Say, thou great cloſe of human hopes and fears!
Great key of hearts! great finiſher of fates!
Great end! and great beginning! ſay, Where art thou?
Art thou in time, or in eternity?
Nor in eternity, nor time, I find thee.
Theſe, as two monarchs, on their borders meet,
(Monarchs of all elaps'd, or unarriv'd!)
As in debate, how beſt their powers ally'd,
May ſwell the grandeur, or diſcharge the wrath,
Of him, whom both their monarchies obey.

Time, this faſt fabric for him built (and doom'd
With him to fall) now burſting o'er his head;
His lamp, the ſun, extinguiſh'd; from beneath
The frown of hideous darkneſs, calls his ſons
From their long ſlumber; from earth's heaving womb,
To ſecond birth! contemporary throng!

Rous'd at one call, upſtarted from one bed,
Preſt in one crowd, appall'd with one amaze,
He turns them o'er, Eternity! to thee.
Then (as a king depos'd diſdains to live)
He falls on his own ſcythe; nor falls alone;
His greateſt foe falls with him; time, and he
Who murder'd all time's offſpring, death, expire.
Time was! Eternity now reigns alone!
Awful eternity! offended queen!
And her reſentment to mankind, how juſt!
With kind intent, ſoliciting acceſs,
How often has ſhe knock'd at human hearts!
Rich to repay their hoſpitality,
How often call'd! and with the voice of God!
Yet bore repulſe, excluded as a cheat!
A dream! while fouleſt foes found welcome there!
A dream, a cheat, now, all things, but her ſmile.
For, lo! her twice ten thouſand gates thrown wide,
As thrice from Indus to the frozen pole,
With banners ſtreaming as the comet's blaze,
And clarions, louder than the deep in ſtorms,
Sonorous as immortal breath can blow,
Pour forth their myriads, potentates, and powers,
Of light, of darkneſs; in a middle field,
Wide, as creation! populous, as wide!
A neutral region! there to mark th' event
Of that great drama, whoſe preceding ſcenes
Detain'd them cloſe ſpectators, through a length
Of ages, ripening to this grand reſult;
Ages, as yet unnumber'd, but by God;
Who now pronouncing ſentence, vindicates
The rights of virtue, and his own renown.
Eternity, the various ſentence paſt,
Aſſigns the ſever'd throng diſtinct abodes,
Sulphureous, or ambroſial: What enſues?
The deed predominant! the deed of deeds!
Which makes a hell of hell, a heaven of heaven.
The goddeſs, with determin'd aſpect, turns
Her adamantine key's enormous ſize
Through deſtiny's inextricable wards,
Deep driving every bolt, on both their fates.
Then, from the cryſtal battlements of heaven,
Down, down, ſhe hurls it through the dark profound,
Ten thouſand thouſand fathom; there to ruſt,
And ne'er unlock her reſolution more. [glooms,
The deep reſounds; and hell, through all her
Returns, in groans, the melancholy roar.
O how unlike the chorus of the ſkies!
O how unlike thoſe ſhouts of joy, that ſhake
The whole ethereal! How the concave rings!
Nor ſtrange! when deities their voice exalt;
And louder far, than when creation roſe,
To ſee creation's godlike aim, and end,
So well accompliſh'd! ſo divinely cloſ'd!
To ſee the mighty dramatiſt's laſt act
(As meet) in glory riſing o'er the reſt.
No fancy'd god, a god indeed, deſcends,
To ſolve all knots; to ſtrike the moral home;
To throw full day on darkeſt ſcenes of time;
To clear, commend, exalt, and crown the whole.
Hence, in one peal of loud, eternal praiſe,
The charm'd ſpectators thunder their applauſe!
And the vaſt void beyond, applauſe reſounds.

What then am I?—
Amidſt applauding worlds,
And worlds celeſtial, is their found on earth,
A peeviſh, diſſonant, rebellious ſtring,
Which jars on the grand chorus, and complains?
Cenſure on thee, Lorenzo! I ſuſpend,
And turn it on myſelf; how greatly due!
All, all is right; by God ordain'd or done;
And who, but God, reſum'd the friends he gave?
And have I been complaining, then, ſo long?
Complaining of his favours, pain, and death?
Who, without pain's advice, would e'er be good?
Who, without death, but would be good in vain?
Pain is to ſave from pain; all puniſhment,
To make for peace; and death to ſave from death;
And ſecond death, to guard immortal life;
To rouſe the careleſs, the preſumptuous awe,
And turn the tide of ſouls another way;
By the ſame tenderneſs divine ordain'd,
That planted Eden, and high-bloom'd for man,
A fairer Eden, endleſs, in the ſkies.
Heaven gives us friends to bleſs the preſent ſcene;
Reſumes them, to prepare us for the next.
All evils natural are moral goods;
All diſcipline, indulgence, on the whole.
None are unhappy: all have cauſe to ſmile,
But ſuch as to themſelves that cauſe deny.
Our faults are at the bottom of our pains;
Error, in acts, or judgment, is the ſource
Of endleſs ſighs: We ſin, or we miſtake;
And nature tax, when falſe opinion ſtings.
Let impious grief be baniſh'd, joy indulg'd;
But chiefly then, when grief puts in her claim,
Joy from the joyous, frequently betrays,
Oft lives in vanity, and dies in woe.
Joy, amidſt ills, corroborates, exalts;
'Tis joy and conqueſt; joy, and virtue too.
A noble fortitude in ills, delights
Heaven, earth, ourſelves; 'tis duty, glory, peace.
Affliction is the good man's ſhining ſcene;
Proſperity conceals his brighteſt ray;
As night to ſtars, woe luſtre gives to man.
Heroes in battle, pilots in the ſtorm,
And virtue in calamities, admire.
The crown of manhood is a winter-joy;
An evergreen, that ſtands the northern blaſt,
And bloſſoms in the rigour of our fate.
'Tis a prime part of happineſs, to know
How much unhappineſs muſt prove our lot;
A part which few poſſeſs! I'll pay life's tax,
Without one rebel murmur, from this hour,
Nor think it miſery to be a man;
Who thinks it is, ſhall never be a god.
Some ills we wiſh for, when we wiſh to live.
What ſpoke proud paſſion?—" * Wiſh my being loſt?"
Preſumptuous! blaſphemous! abſurd! and falſe!
The triumph of my ſoul is—That I am;
And therefore that I may be—what? Lorenzo!
Look inward, and look deep; and deeper ſtill;
Unfathomably deep our treaſure runs
In golden veins, through all eternity!
Ages, and ages, and ſucceeding ſtill

* Referring to the Firſt Night.

New ages, where the phantom of an hour,
Which courts, each night, dull ſlumber, for repair,
Shall wake, and wonder, and exult, and praiſe.
And fly through infinite, and all unlock;
And (if deſerv'd) by heaven's redundant love,
Made half adorable itſelf, adore;
And find, in adoration, endleſs joy!
Where thou, not maſter of a moment here,
Frail as the flower, and fleeting as the gale,
May'ſt boaſt a whole eternity, enrich'd
With all a kind Omnipotence can pour.
Since Adam fell, no mortal, uninſpir'd,
Has ever yet conceiv'd, or ever ſhall,
How kind is God, how great (if good) is man.
No man too largely from heaven's love can hope,
If what is hop'd he labours to ſecure.
Ills?—there are none:---All-gracious! none
from thee;
From man full many! numerous is the race
Of blackeſt ills, and thoſe immortal too,
Begot by madneſs on fair liberty;
Heaven's daughter, hell-debauch'd! her hand alone
Unlocks deſtruction to the ſons of men,
Firſt barr'd by thine: high-wall'd with adamant,
Guarded with terrors reaching to this world,
And cover'd with the thunders of thy law;
Whoſe threats are mercies, whoſe injunctions, guides,
Aſſiſting, not reſtraining, reaſon's choice;
Whoſe ſanctions, unavoidable reſults
From nature's courſe, indulgently reveal'd;
If unreveal'd, more dangerous, nor leſs ſure.
Thus, an indulgent father warns his ſons,
"Do this; fly that"---nor always tells the cauſe;
Pleas'd to reward, as duty to his will,
A conduct needful to their own repoſe.
Great God of wonders! (if, thy love ſurvey'd, Aught elſe the name of wonderful retains)
What rocks are theſe, on which to build our truſt!
Thy ways admit no blemiſh; none I find;
Or this alone---"That none is to be found."
Not one, to ſoften cenſure's hardy crime;
Not one, to palliate peeviſh grief's complaint,
Who like a demon, murmuring from the duſt,
Dares into judgment call her Judge.---Supreme!
For all I bleſs thee; moſt, for the ſevere;
* Her death---my own at hand---the fiery gulf,
That flaming bound of wrath omnipotent!
It thunders;---but it thunders to preſerve;
It ſtrengthens what it ſtrikes; its wholeſome dread
Averts the dreaded pain; its hideous groans
Join heaven's ſweet hallelujahs in thy praiſe,
Great ſource of good alone! How kind in all!
In vengeance kind! pain, death, gehenna, ſave.
Thus, in thy world material, mighty mind!
Not that alone which ſolaces, and ſhines,
The rough and gloomy, challenges our praiſe.
The winter is as needful as the ſpring;
The thunder, as the ſun; a ſtagnate maſs
Of vapours breeds a peſtilential air:
Nor more propitious the Favonian breeze
To nature's health, than purifying ſtorms;
The dread volcano miniſters to good.
Its ſmother'd flames might undermine the world.
Loud Ætnas fulminate in love to man;
Comets good omens are, when duly ſcann'd;
And in their uſe, eclipſes learn to ſhine.
Man is reſponſible for ills receiv'd;
Thoſe we call wretched are a choſen band,
Compell'd to refuge in the right, for peace.
Amid my liſt of bleſſings infinite,
Stand this the foremoſt. "That my heart has bled."
'Tis heaven's laſt effort of good-will to man;
When pain can't bleſs, heaven quits us in deſpair.
Who fails to grieve, when juſt occaſion calls,
Or grieves too much, deſerves not to be bleſt;
Inhuman, or effeminate, his heart;
Reaſon abſolves the grief, which reaſon ends.
May heaven ne'er truſt my friend with happineſs
Till it has taught him how to bear it well,
By previous pain; and made it ſafe to ſmile!
Such ſmiles are mine, and ſuch may they remain;
Nor hazard their extinctions, from exceſs.
My change of heart a change of ſtyle demands;
The conſolation cancels the complaint,
And makes a convert of my guilty ſong.
And when o'er-labour'd, and inclin'd to breathe,
A panting traveller ſome riſing ground,
Some ſmall aſcent, has gain'd, he turns him round,
And meaſures with his eye the various vales,
The fields, woods, meads, and rivers, he has paſt;
And, ſatiate of his journey, thinks of home,
Endear'd by diſtance, nor affects more toil;
Thus I, though ſmall, indeed, is that aſcent
The muſe has gain'd, review the paths ſhe trod;
Various, extenſive, beaten but by view;
And, conſcious of her prudence in repoſe,
Pauſe; and with pleaſure meditate an end.
Though ſtill remote; ſo fruitful is my theme,
Through many a field of moral, and divine,
The muſe has ſtray'd; and much of ſorrow ſeen
In human ways; and much of falſe and vain;
Which none who travel this bad road, can miſs.
O'er friends deceas'd full heartily ſhe wept;
Of love divine the wonders ſhe diſplay'd;
Prov'd man immortal; ſhow'd the ſource of joy;
The grand tribunal rais'd; aſſign'd the bounds
Of human grief: in few, to cloſe the whole,
The moral muſe has ſhadow'd out a ſketch,
Though not in form, nor with a Raphael-ſtroke,
Of moſt our weakneſs needs believe, or do,
In this our land of travel and of hope,
For peace on earth, or proſpect of the ſkies. [debt
What then remains? Much! much! a mighty
To be diſcharg'd: theſe thoughts, O night! are thine;
From thee they came, like lovers ſecret ſighs,
While others ſlept. So Cynthia (poets feign)
In ſhadows veil'd, ſoft ſliding from her ſphere,
Her ſhepherd cheer'd; of her enamour'd leſs,
Than I of thee.---And art thou ſtill unſung,
Beneath whoſe brow, and by whoſe aid, I ſing?
Immortal ſilence! where ſhall I begin?
Where end? Or how ſteal muſic from the ſpheres,
To ſooth their goddeſs?
O majeſtic night!
Nature's great anceſtor! day's elder-born!
And fated to ſurvive the tranſient ſun!
By mortals, and immortals, ſeen with awe!

* Lucia.

A ſtarry crown thy raven brow adorns,
An azure zone thy waiſt; clouds, in heaven's loom
Wrought through varieties of ſhape and ſhade,
In ample folds of drapery divine, [out,
Thy flowing mantle form; and heaven through-
Voluminouſly pour thy pompous train.
Thy gloomy graudeurs (nature's moſt auguſt,
Inſpiring aſpect!) claim a grateful verſe;
And, like a ſable curtain ſtarr'd with gold,
Drawn o'er my labours paſt, ſhall cloſe the ſcene.
And what, O man! ſo worthy to be ſung?
What more prepares us for the ſongs of heaven?
Creation, of archangels is the theme!
What, to be ſung, ſo needful? What ſo well
Celeſtial joys prepare us to ſuſtain!
The ſoul of man, his face deſign'd to ſee
Who gave theſe wonders to be ſeen by man,
Has here a previous ſcene of objects great,
On which to dwell; to ſtretch to that expanſe
Of thought, to riſe to that exalted height
Of admiration, to contract that awe,
And give her whole capacities that ſtrength,
Which beſt may qualify for final joy.
The more our ſpirits are enlarg'd on earth,
The deeper draught ſhall they receive of heaven.
Heaven's King! whoſe face unveil'd conſummates bliſs;
Redundant bliſs! which fills that mighty void,
The whole creation leaves in human hearts!
Thou, who didſt touch the lip of Jeſſe's ſon,
Rapt in ſweet contemplation of theſe fires,
And ſet his harp in concert with the ſpheres;
While of thy works material the ſupreme
I dare attempt, aſſiſt my daring ſong,
Looſe me from earth's enclofure, from the ſun's Contracted circle ſet my heart at large;
Eliminate my ſpirit, give it range
Through provinces of thought yet unexplor'd;
Teach me, by this ſtupendous ſcaffolding,
Creation's golden ſteps, to climb to thee.
Teach me with art great nature to controul,
And ſpread a luſtre o'er the ſhades of night.
Feel I thy kind aſſent? and ſhall the ſun
Be ſeen at midnight, riſing in my ſong?
Lorenzo! come, and warm thee: thou whoſe heart,
Whoſe little heart is moor'd within a nook
Of this obſcure terreſtrial, anchor weigh.
Another ocean calls, a nobler port;
I am thy pilot, I thy proſperous gale.
Gainful thy voyage through yon azure main;
Main, without tempeſt, pirate, rock, or ſhore;
And whence thou may'ſt import eternal wealth;
And leave to beggar'd minds the pearl and gold.
Thy travels doſt thou boaſt o'er foreign realms?
Thou ſtranger to the world! thy tour begin:
Thy tour through nature's univerſal orb.
Nature delineates her whole chart at large,
On ſoaring ſouls, that fail among the ſpheres;
And man how purblind, if unknown the whole!
Who circles ſpacious earth, then travels here,
Shall own he never was from home before!
Come, my * Prometheus, from thy pointed rock
Of falſe ambition if unchain'd, we'll mount;
We'll innocently ſteal celeſtial fire,
And kindle our devotion at the ſtars;
A theft that ſhall not chain but ſet thee free.
Above our atmoſphere's inteſtine wars,
Rain's fountain head, the magazine of hail;
Above the northern neſts of feather'd ſnows,
The brew of thunders, and the flaming forge
That forms the crooked lightning; above the caves
Where infant tempeſts wait their growing wings,
And tune their tender voices to that roar,
Which ſoon, perhaps, ſhall ſhake a guilty world;
Above miſconſtrued omens of the ſky,
Far-travell'd comets calculated blaze;
Elance thy thought, and think of more than man.
Thy ſoul, till now contracted, wither'd, ſhrunk,
Blighted by blaſts of earth's unwholeſome air,
Will bloſſom here; ſpread all her faculties
To theſe bright ardours; every power unfold,
And riſe into ſublimities of thought.
Stars teach as well as ſhine. At nature's birth,
Thus their commiſſion ran—"Be kind to man."
Where art thou, poor benighted traveller?
The ſtars will light thee; though the moon ſhould fail.
Where are thou more benighted! more aſtray!
In ways immortal? The ſtars call thee back;
And, if obey'd their counſel, ſet thee right.
This proſpect vaſt, what is it?—Weigh'd aright
'Tis nature's ſyſtem of divinity,
And every ſtudent of the night inſpires.
'Tis elder ſcripture, writ by God's own hand:
Scripture authentic! uncorrupt by man.
Lorenzo! with my radius (the rich gift
Of thought nocturnal!) I'll point out to thee
Its various leſſons; ſome that may ſurpriſe
An unadept in myſteries of night;
Little, perhaps, expected in her ſchool,
Nor thought to grow on planet, or on ſtar.
Bulls, lions, ſcorpions, monſters here we feign;
Ourſelves more monſtrous, not to ſee what here
Exiſts indeed;—a lecture to mankind.
What read we here?—Th' exiſtence of a God?
Yes; and of other beings, man above;
Natives of ether! Sons of higher climes!
And, what may move Lorenzo's wonder more,
Eternity is written in the ſkies.
And whoſe eternity?—Lorenzo! thine;
Mankind's eternity. Nor faith alone,
Virtue grows here; here ſprings the ſovereign cure
Of almoſt every vice; but chiefly thine;
Wrath, pride, ambition, and impure deſire.
Lorenzo! thou canſt wake at midnight too,
Though not on morals bent: Ambition, pleaſure!
Thoſe tyrants † for thee ſo lately fought,
Afford their harraſs'd ſlaves but ſlender reſt.
Thou to whom midnight is immoral noon,
And the ſun's noon-tide blaze, prime dawn of day;
Not by thy climate, but capricious crime,
Commencing one of our Antipodes!
In thy nocturnal rove, one moment halt,
'Twixt ſtage and ſtage, of riot, and cabal;

* Night VIII.

* Night VIII.

And lift thine eye, (if bold an eye to lift,
If bold to meet the face of injur'd heaven)
To yonder ſtars: For other ends they ſhine,
Than to light revellers from ſhame to ſhame,
And thus be made accomplices in guilt.
Why from yon arch, that infinite of ſpace,
With infinite of lucid orbs replete,
Which ſet the living firmament on fire,
At the firſt glance, in ſuch an overwhelm
Of wonderful on man's aſtoniſh'd ſight,
Ruſhes Omnipotence?—To curb our pride;
Our reaſon rouſe, and lead it to that power,
Whoſe love lets down theſe ſilver chains of light;
To draw up man's ambition to himſelf,
And bind our chaſte affections to his throne.
Thus the three virtues, leaſt alive on earth,
And welcom'd on heaven's coaſt with moſt applauſe,
An humble, pure, and heaven'ly-minded heart,
Are here inſpir'd:---And canſt thou gaze too long?
Nor ſtands thy wrath, depriv'd of its reproof,
Or unupbraided by this radiant choir.
The planets of each ſyſtem repreſent
Kind neighbours; mutual amity prevails;
Sweet interchange of rays, receiv'd, return'd;
Enlightening and enlighten'd! All, at once
Attracting, and attracted! Patriot-like,
None ſins againſt the welfare of the whole;
But their reciprocal, unſelfiſh aid,
Affords an emblem of millennial love.
Nothing in nature, much leſs conſcious being,
Was e'er created ſolely for itſelf:
Thus man his ſovereign duty learns in this Material picture of benevolence.
And know, of all our ſupercilious race,
Thou moſt inflammable! Thou waſp of men!
Man's angry heart, inſpected, would be found
As rightly ſet, as are the ſtarry ſpheres;
'Tis nature's ſtructure, broke by ſtubborn will,
Breeds all that unceleſtial diſcord there.
Wilt thou not feel the bias nature gave?
Canſt thou deſcend from converſe with the ſkies
And ſeize thy brother's throat?---For what---a clod,
An inch of earth? The planet's cry, "Forbear,"
They chaſe our double darkneſs; nature's gloom,
And (kinder ſtill!) our intellectual night.
And ſee, day's amiable ſiſter ſends
Her invitation in the ſofteſt rays
Of mitigated luſtre; courts thy ſight,
Which ſuffers from her tyrant brother's blaze.
Night grants thee the full freedom of the ſkies,
Nor rudely reprimands thy lifted eye;
With gain and joy ſhe bribes thee to be wiſe.
Night opes the nobleſt ſcenes, and ſheds an awe,
Which gives thoſe venerable ſcenes full weight,
And deep reception in th' intender'd heart;
While light ſteeps through the darkneſs like a ſpy;
And darkneſs ſhows its grandeur by the light.
Nor is the profit greater than the joy,
If human hearts at glorious objects glow,
And admiration can inſpire delight.
What ſpeak I more than I this moment feel;
With pleaſing ſtupor firſt the ſoul is ſtruck
(Stupor ordained to make her truly wiſe!)
Then into tranſport ſtarting from her trance,
With love and admiration, how ſhe glows!
This gorgeous apparatus! This diſplay!
This oſtentation of creative power!
This theatre!---what eye can take it in?
By what divine enchantment was it rais'd,
For minds of the firſt magnitude to launch
In endleſs ſpeculation, and adore?
One ſun by day, by night ten thouſand ſhine:
And light us deep into the Deity;
How boundleſs in magnificence and might!
O what a confluence of ethereal fires,
Form urns unnumbered, down the ſteep of heaven,
Streams to a point, and centres in my ſight!
Nor tarries there; I feel it at my heart.
My heart at once it humbles and exalts;
Lays it in duſt, and calls it to the ſkies.
Who ſees it unexalted? or unaw'd?
Who ſees it, and can ſtop at what is ſeen?
Material offſpring of Omnipotence!
Inanimate, all-animating birth!
Work worthy him who made it! worthy praiſe!
All praiſe! praiſe more than human! nor deny'd
Thy praiſe divine!---But though man drown'd in ſleep,
Withholds his homage, not alone I wake;
Bright legions ſwarm unſeen, and ſing unheard
By mortal ear, the glorious Architect,
In this his univerſal temple hung
With luſtres, with innumerable lights,
That ſhed religion on the ſoul; at once
The temple and the preacher! O how loud
It calls devotion! genuine growth of night!
Devotion! daughter of aſtronomy!
An undevout aſtronomer is mad.
True; all things ſpeak a God; but in the ſmall,
Men trace out him; in great, he ſeizes man;
Seizes, and elevates, and wraps, and fills
With new inquiries, 'mid aſſociates new.
Tell me, ye ſtars! ye planets! tell me, all
Ye ſtarr'd, and planeted, inhabitants! What is it?
What are theſe ſons of wonder? Say, proud arch,
(Within whoſe azure palaces they dwell)
Built with divine ambition! in diſdain
Of limit built! built in the taſte of heaven!
Vaſt concave! ample dome! waſt thou deſign'd
A meet apartment for the Deity?---
Not ſo; that thought alone thy ſtate impairs,
Thy lofty ſinks, and ſhallows thy profound,
And ſtraightens thy diffuſive; dwarfs the whole,
And makes an univerſe an orrery.
But when I drop mine eye, and look on man,
Thy right regain'd, thy grandeur is reſtor'd,
O Nature! wide flies off the expanding round.
As when whole magazines at once are fir'd,
The ſmitten air is hollow'd by the blow;
The vaſt diſploſion diſſipates the clouds:
Shock'd ether's billows daſh the diſtant ſkies;
Thus (but far more) th' expanding round flies off,
And leaves a mighty void, a ſpacious womb,
Might teem with new creation; re-inflam'd
Thy luminaries triumph, and aſſume
Divinity themſelves. Nor was it ſtrange,
Matter high-wrought to ſuch ſurpriſing pomp,
Such godlike glory, ſtole the ſtyle of gods,

From ages dark, obtuſe, and ſteep'd in ſenſe;
For, ſure to ſenſe they truly are divine;
And half abſolv'd idolatry from guilt;
Nay, turn'd it into virtue. Such it was
In thoſe, who put forth all they had of man
Unloſt, to lift their thought, nor mounted higher;
But, weak of wings, on planets perch'd; and thought
What was their higheſt, muſt be their ador'd.
But they how weak, who could no higher mount?
And are there, then, Lorenzo! Thoſe, to whom
Unſeen, and unexiſtent, are the ſame?
And if incomprehenſible is join'd,
Who dare pronounce it madneſs, to believe?
Why has the mighty Builder thrown aſide
All meaſure in his work; ſtretch'd out his line
So far, and ſpread amazement o'er the whole?
Then (as he took delight in wide extremes),
Deep in the boſom of his univerſe,
Dropt down that reaſoning mite, that inſect, man,
To crawl and gaze, and wonder at the ſcene?---
That man might ne'er preſume to plead amazement
For diſbelief of wonders in himſelf.
Shall God be leſs miraculous, than what
His hand has form'd? Shall myſteries deſcend
From un-myſterious? Things more elevate,
Be more familiar? Uncreated lie
More obvious than created, to the graſp
Of human thought? The more of wonderful
Is heard in him, the more we ſhould aſſent.
Could we conceive him, God he could not be;
Or be not God, or we could not be men.
A God alone can comprehend a God;
Man's diſtance how immenſe! On ſuch a theme,
Know this, Lorenzo! (ſeem it ne'er ſo ſtrange)
Nothing can ſatisfy but what confounds;
Nothing but what aſtoniſhes is true.
The ſcene thou ſeeſt, atteſts the truth I ſing,
And every ſtar ſheds light upon thy creed.
Theſe ſtars, this furniture, this coſt of heaven,
If but reported, thou hadſt ne'er believ'd;
But thine eye tells thee the romance is true.
The grand of nature is th' Almighty's oath,
In reaſon's court, to ſilence unbelief.
How my mind, opening at this ſcene, imbibes
The moral emanations of the ſkies,
While nought, perhaps, Lorenzo leſs admires!
Has the Great Sovereign ſent ten thouſand worlds
To tell us, he reſides above them all,
In glory's unapproachable receſs?
And dare earth's bold inhabitants deny
The ſumptuous, the magnific embaſſy
A moment's audience? Turn we, nor will hear
From whom they come, or what they would impart
For man's emolument; ſole cauſe that ſtoops
Their grandeur to man's eye? Lorenzo! rouſe;
Let thought, awaken'd, take the lightning's wing,
And glance from eaſt to weſt, from pole to pole.
Who ſees, but is confounded, or convinc'd?
Renounces reaſon, or a God adores?
Mankind was ſent into the world to ſee:
Sight gives the ſcience needful to their peace;
That obvious ſcience aſks ſmall learning's aid.
Wouldſt thou on metaphyſic pinions ſoar?
Or wound thy patience amid logic thorns?
Or travel hiſtory's enormous round?
Nature no ſuch hard taſk enjoins: She gave
A make to man directive of his thought;
A make ſet upright, pointing to the ſtars,
As who ſhall ſay, "Read thy chief leſſon there."
Too late to read this manuſcript of heaven,
When like a parchment ſcroll, ſhrunk up by flames,
It folds Lorenzo's leſſon from his ſight.
Leſſon how various! Not the God alone,
I ſee his miniſters; I ſee, diffus'd
In radiant orders, eſſences ſublime,
Of various offices, of various plume,
In heavenly liveries, diſtinctly clad,
Azure, green, purple, pearl, or downy gold,
Or all commix'd; they ſtand, with wings outſpread,
Liſtening to catch the maſter's leaſt command,
And fly through nature, ere the moment ends;
Numbers innumerable!—Well conceiv'd
By Pagan, and by Chriſtian! O'er each ſphere
Preſides an angel, to direct its courſe,
And feed, or fan, its flames; or to diſcharge
Other high truſts unknown. For who can ſee
Such pomp of matter, and imagine, mind,
For which alone inanimate was made,
More ſparingly diſpens'd? That nobler ſon,
Far liker the great ſire!—'Tis thus the ſkies
Inform us of ſuperiors numberleſs,
As much, in excellence, above mankind,
As above earth, in magnitude, the ſpheres.
Theſe, as a cloud of witneſſes, hang o'er us;
In a throng'd theatre are all our deeds;
Perhaps, a thouſand demigods deſcend
On every beam we ſee, to walk with men,
Awful reflection! Strong reſtraint from ill!
Yet, here, our virtue finds ſtill ſtronger aid
From theſe ethereal glories ſenſe ſurveys.
Something, like magic, ſtrikes from this blue vault;
With juſt attention is it view'd? We feel
A ſudden ſuccour, unimplor'd, unthought;
Nature herſelf does half the work of man.
Seas, rivers, mountains, foreſts, deſarts, rocks,
The promontory's height, the depth profound
Of ſubterranean, excavated grots,
Black brow'd, and vaulted high, and yawning wide
From nature's ſtructure, or the ſcoop of time;
If ample of dimenſion, vaſt of ſize,
Ev'n theſe an aggrandizing impulſe give;
Of ſolemn thought enthuſiaſtic heights
Ev'n theſe infuſe.—But what of vaſt in theſe?
Nothing;—or we muſt own the ſkies forgot.
Much leſs in art!—Vain art! Thou pigmy power!
How doſt thou ſwell and ſtrut, with human pride,
To ſhow thy littleneſs! What childiſh toys,
Thy watery columns ſquirted to the clouds!
Thy baſon'd rivers, and impriſon'd ſeas!
Thy mountains moulded into forms of men!
Thy hundred-gated capitals! or thoſe
Where three days travel left us much to ride;
Gazing on miracles by mortals wrought,
Arches triumphal, theatres immenſe,
Or nodding g rdens pendent in mid-air!
Or temples proud to meet their gods half-way!
Yet theſe effect us in no common kind.

What then the force of such superior scenes?
Enter a temple, it will strike an awe:
What awe from this the Deity has built?
A good man seen, though silent, counsel gives:
The touch'd spectator wishes to be wise:
In a bright mirror his own hands have made,
Here we see something like the face of God.
Seems it not then enough, to say, Lorenzo!
To man abandon'd, "Hast thou seen the skies?"
And yet, so thwarted nature's kind design
By daring man, he makes her sacred awe
(That guard from ill) his shelter, his temptation
To more than common guilt, and quite inverts
Celestial art's intent. The trembling stars
See crimes gigantic, stalking through the gloom
With front erect, that hide their head by day,
And making night still darker by their deeds.
Slumbering in covert, till the shades descend,
Rapine and murder, link'd, now prowl for prey.
The miser earths his treasure; and the thief,
Watching the mole, half-beggars him ere morn.
Now plots, and foul conspiracies, awake;
And, muffling up their horrors from the moon,
Havock and devastation they prepare,
And kingdoms tottering in the field of blood.
Now sons of riot in mid-revel rage.
What shall I do!—Suppress it? or proclaim?—
Why sleeps the thunder? Now, Lorenzo! now,
His best friend's couch the rank adulterer
Ascends secure; and laughs at gods and men.
Prepostrous madmen, void of fear or shame,
Lay their crimes bare to these chaste eyes of heaven;
Yet shrink, and shudder, at a mortal's sight.
Were moon, and stars, for villains only made?
To guide, yet screen them, with tenebrious light?
No; they were made to fashion the sublime
Of human hearts, and wiser make the wise.
Those ends were answer'd once; when mortals liv'd
Of stronger wing, of aquiline ascent
In theory sublime. O how unlike.
Those vermin of the night, this moment sung,
Who crawl on earth, and on her venom feed!
Those ancient sages, human stars! They met
Their brothers of the skies, at midnight hour;
Their counsel ask'd; and, what they ask'd obey'd.
The Stagirite, and Plato, he who drank
The poison'd bowl, and he of Tusculum,
With him of Corduba (immortal names!)
In these unbounded, and Elysian, walks,
An area fit for gods and godlike men, [paths
They took their nightly round, through radiant
By seraphs trod; instructed; chiefly, thus,
To tread in their bright footsteps here below;
To walk in worth still brighter than the skies.
There they contracted their contempt of earth;
Of hopes eternal kindled, there, the fire;
There, as in near approach, they glow'd and grew
(Great visitants!) more intimate with God,
More worth to men, more joyous to themselves.
Through various virtues, they, with ardour, ran
The zodiac of their learn'd, illustrious lives.
In Christian hearts, O for a Pagan zeal!
A needful, but approbrious prayer! as much
Our ardour less, as greater is our light.
How monstrous this in morals! Scarce more strange
Would this phænomenon in nature strike,
A sun, that froze her, or a star, that warm'd.
What taught these heroes of the moral world?
To these thou giv'st thy praise, give credit too.
These doctors ne'er were pension'd to deceive thee;
And Pagan tutors are thy taste.—They taught,
That, narrow views betray to misery:
That, wise it is to comprehend the whole:
That, virtue, rose from nature, ponder'd well,
The single base of virtue built to heaven:
That God, and nature, our attention claim:
That, nature is the glass reflecting God,
As, by the sea, reflected is the sun,
Too glorious to be gaz'd on in his sphere:
That, mind immortal loves immortal aims:
That, boundless mind affects a boundless space:
That vast surveys, and the sublime of things,
The soul assimilate, and make her great:
That, therefore, heaven her glories, as a fund
Of inspiration, thus spreads out to man,
Such are their doctrines; such the night inspir'd.
And what more true? What truth of greater weight?
The soul of man was made to walk the skies;
Delightful outlet of her prison here!
There, disincumber'd from her chains, the ties
Of toys terrestrial, she can rove at large,
There, freely can respire, dilate, extend,
In full proportion let loose all her powers;
And, undeluded, grasp at something great.
Nor, as a stranger, does she wander there;
But, wonderful herself, through wonder strays;
Contemplating their grandeur, finds her own;
Dives deep in their economy divine,
Sits high in judgment on their various laws,
And, like a master, judges not amiss.
Hence greatly pleas'd, and justly proud, the soul
Grows conscious of her birth celestial; breathes
More life, more vigour, in her native air;
And feels herself at home amongst the stars;
And, feeling, emulates our country's praise.
What call we, then, the firmament, Lorenzo!
As earth the body, since, the skies sustain
The soul with food, that gives immortal life,
Call it, the noble pasture of the mind;
Which there expatiates, strengthens, and exults,
And riots through the luxuries of thought.
Call it, the garden of the Deity,
Blossom'd with stars, redundant the growth
Of fruit ambrosial; moral fruit to man.
Call it, the breast-plate of the true high-priest,
Ardent with gems oracular, that give,
In points of highest moment, right response;
And ill neglected, if we prize our peace.
Thus, have we found a true astrology;
Thus have we found a new, and noble sense,
In which alone stars govern human fates.
O that the stars (as some have feign'd) let fall
Bloodshed, and havock, on embattled realms,
And rescued monarchs from so black a guilt!
Bourbon! this wish how generous in a foe!
Wouldst thou be great, wouldst thou become a god,
And stick thy deathless name among the stars,

For mighty conquests on a needle's point?
Instead of forging chains for foreigners,
Bastile thy tutor: Grandeur all thy aim?
As yet thou know'st not what it is: how great,
How glorious, then, appears the mind of man,
When in it all the stars, and planets, roll!
And what it seems, it is: Great objects make
Great minds, enlarging as their views enlarge;
Those still more godlike, as these more divine.
And more divine than these, thou canst not see.
Dazzled, o'er-power'd, with the delicious draught
Of miscellaneous splendors, how I reel
From thought to thought, inebriate, without end!
An Eden, this! a Paradise unlost!
I meet the Deity in every view,
And tremble at my nakedness before him!
O that I could but reach the tree of life!
For here it grows, unguarded from our taste;
No flaming sword denies our entrance here;
Would man but gather, he might live for ever.
Lorenzo! much of moral hast thou seen.
Of curious arts art thou more fond? Then mark
The mathematic glories of the skies,
Its number, weight, and measure, all ordain'd.
Lorenzo's boasted builders, chance and fate,
Are left to finish his aërial towers;
Wisdom and choice, their well-known characters
Here deep impress; and claim it for their own.
Though splendid all, no splendor void of use;
Use rivals beauty; art contends with power;
No wanton waste, amid effuse expence;
The great economist adjusting all
To prudent pomp, magnificently wise.
How rich the prospect! and for ever new!
And newest to the man that views it most;
For newer still infinite succeeds.
Then, these aërial racers, O how swift!
How the shaft loiters from the strongest string!
Spirit alone can distance the career.
Orb above orb ascending without end!
Circle in circle, without end, enclos'd!
Wheel, within wheel; Ezekiel! like to thine!
Like thine, it seems a vision or a dream;
Though seen, we labour to believe it true!
What involution! what extent! what swarms
Of worlds, that laugh at earth! immensely great!
Immensely distant from each other's spheres!
What, then, the wondrous space through which they roll?
At once it quite ingulfs all human thought;
'Tis comprehension's absolute defeat.
Nor think thou feest a wild disorder here;
Through this illustrious chaos to the sight,
Arrangement neat, and chastest order, reign.
The path prescrib'd, inviolably kept,
Upbraids the lawless sallies of mankind.
Worlds, ever thwarting, never interfere;
What knots are ty'd! How soon are they dissolv'd
And set the seeming marry'd planets free!
They rove for ever, without error rove;
Confusion unconfus'd! nor less admire
This tumult untumultuous; all on wing!
In motion, all! yet what profound repose!
What fervid action, yet no noise! as aw'd
To silence, by the presence of their Lord;
Or hush'd by his command, in love to man,
And bid let fall soft beams on human rest,
Restless themselves. On yon cerulean plain,
In exultation to their God and thine,
They dance, they sing eternal jubilee,
Eternal celebration of his praise,
But, since their song arrives not at our ear,
Their dance perplex'd exhibits to the sight
Fair hieroglyphic of his peerless power.
Mark, how the labyrinthian turns they take,
The circles intricate, and mystic maze,
Weave the grand cypher of Omnipotence;
To gods, how great! how legible to man!
Leaves so much wonder greater wonder still?
Where are the pillars that support the skies?
What more than Atlantean shoulder props
Th' incumbent load? what magic, what strange art,
In fluid air these ponderous orbs sustains?
Who would not think them hung in golden chains?—
And so they are; in the high will of heaven,
Which fixes all; makes adamant of air,
Or air of adamant; makes all of nought,
Or nought of all; if such the dread decree.
Imagine from their deep foundations torn
The most gigantic sons of earth, the broad
And towering Alps, all tost into the sea;
And, light as down, or volatile as air,
Their bulks enormous, dancing on the waves,
In time, and measure, exquisite; while all
The winds, in emulation of the spheres,
Tune their sonorous instruments aloft;
The concert swell, and animate the ball.
Would this appear amazing? What, then, worlds
In a far thinner element sustain'd,
And acting the same part, with greater skill,
More rapid movement, and for noblest ends?
More obvious ends to pass, are not these stars
The seats majestic, proud imperial thrones,
On which angelic delegates of heaven,
At certain periods, as the sovereign nods,
Discharge high trusts of vengeance, or of love;
To clothe, in outward grandeur, grand design,
And acts most solemn still more solemnize?
Ye citizens of air! what ardent thanks,
What full effusion of the grateful heart,
Is due from man indulg'd in such a sight!
A sight so noble! and a sight so kind!
It drops new truths at every new survey!
Feels not Lorenzo something stir within,
That sweeps away all period? As these spheres
Measure duration, they no less inspire
The godlike hope of ages without end. [take
The boundless space, through which these rovers
Their restless roam, suggests the sister thought
Of boundless time. Thus, by kind nature's skill,
To man unlabour'd, that important guest,
Eternity, finds entrance at the sight:
And an eternity, for man ordain'd,
Or these his destin'd midnight counsellors,
The stars, had never whisper'd it to man.
Nature informs, but ne'er insults her sons.
Could she then kindle the most ardent wish
To disappoint it!—That is blasphemy.
Thus, of thy creed a second article,

Momentous, as the existence of a God,
Is found (as I conceive) where rarely sought;
And thou may'st read thy soul immortal, here.
Here, then, Lorenzo! on these glories dwell;
Nor want the gilt-illuminated roof.
That calls the wretched gay to dark delights.
Assemblies?—This is one divinely bright;
Here, unendanger'd in health, wealth, or fame,
Range through the fairest, and the sultan scorn.
He, wise as thou, no crescent holds so fair,
As that, which on his turban awes a world;
And thinks the moon is proud to copy him.
Look on her, and gain more than worlds can give,
A mind superior to the charms of power.
Thou muffled in delusions of this life!
Can yonder moon turn ocean in his bed,
From side to side, in constant ebb and flow,
And purify from stench his watery realms?
And fails her moral influence? wants she power
To turn Lorenzo's stubborn tide of thought
From stagnating on earth's infected shore,
And purge from nuisance his corrupted heart?
Fails her attraction when it draws to heaven?
Nay, and to what thou valuest more, earth's joy!
Minds elevate, and panting for unseen,
And defecate from sense, alone obtain
Full relish of existence un-deflower'd,
The life of life, the zest of worldly bliss:
All else on earth amounts—to what? To this:
"Bad to be suffer'd; blessings to be left:"
Earth's richest inventory boasts no more.
Of higher scenes be, then, the call obey'd.
O let me gaze! —of gazing there is no end.
O let me think!—Thought too is wilder'd here;
In mid-way flight imagination tires;
Yet soon re-prunes her wing to soar anew,
Her point unable to forbear, or gain;
So great the pleasure, so profound the plan!
A banquet, this, where men and angels meet,
Eat the same manna, mingle earth and heaven.
How distant some of these nocturnal suns!
So distant (says the sage), 'twere not absurd
To doubt, if beams, set out at nature's birth,
Are yet arriv'd at this so foreign world;
Though nothing half so rapid as their flight.
An eye of awe and wonder let me roll,
And roll for ever: who can satiate sight
In such a scene? in such an ocean wide
Of deep astonishment? where depth, height, breadth,
Are lost in their extremes; and where to count
The thick-sown glories in this field of fire,
Perhaps a seraph's computation fails.
Now, go, ambition!, boast thy boundless might
In conquest o'er the tenth-part of a grain.
And yet Lorenzo calls for miracles,
To give his tottering faith a solid base.
Why call for less than is already thine?
Thou art no novice in theology;
What is a miracle?—'Tis a reproach,
'Tis an implicit satire on mankind;
And while it satisfies, it censures too.
To common sense, great nature's course proclaims
A Deity; when mankind falls asleep,
A miracle is sent, as an alarm;
To wake the world, and prove him o'er again,
By recent argument, but not more strong.
Say, which imports more plentitude of power,
Or nature's laws to fix, or to repeal?
To make a sun, or stop his mid career?
To countermand his orders, and send back
The flaming courier to the frighted east,
Warm'd, and astonish'd, at his evening ray?
Or bid the moon, as with her journey tir'd,
In Ajalon's soft flowery vale repose?
Great things are these; still greater to create.
From Adam's bower look down through the whole train
Of miracles;—resistless is their power?
They do not, can not, more amaze the mind,
Than this, call'd unmiraculous survey,
If duly weigh'd, if rationally seen,
If seen with human eyes. The brute, indeed,
Sees nought but spangles here; the fool no more.
Say'st thou, "The course of nature governs all?"
The course of nature is the art of God.
The miracles thou call'st for, this attest;
For say, could nature nature's course controul?
But, miracles apart, whose sees him not,
Nature's controller, author, guide, and end!
Who turns his eye on nature's midnight face,
But must inquire—"What hand behind the scene,
"What arm Almighty, put these wheeling globes
"In motion, and wound up the vast machine?
"Who rounded in his palm these spacious orbs?
"Who bow'd them flaming through the dark pro-
" found,
"Numerous as glittering gems of morning dew,
"Or sparks from populous cities in a blaze,
"And set the bosom of old night on fire?
"Peopled her desert, and made horror smile?"
Or, if the military style delights thee, [man)
(For stars have fought their battles leagu'd with
"Who marshals this bright host? enrolls their " names?
"Appoints their post, their marches, and returns
"Punctual at stated periods? who disbands
"These veteran troops, their final duty done,
"If e'er disbanded?"—He, whose potent word,
Like the loud trumpet, levy'd first their powers
In night's inglorious empire, where they slept
In beds of darkness: arm'd them with fierce flames,
Arrang'd, and disciplin'd, and cloth'd in gold;
And call'd them out of chaos to the field,
Where now they war with vice and unbelief.
O let us join this army! joining these,
Will give us hearts intrepid, at that hour,
When brighter flames shall cut a darker night;
When these strong demonstrations of a God
Shall hide their heads, or tumble from their spheres,
And one eternal curtain cover all!
Struck at that thought, as new awak'd, I lift
A more enlighten'd eye, and read the stars
To man still more propitious; and their aid
(Though guiltless of idolatry) implore;
Nor longer rob them of their noblest name.
O ye dividers of my time! Ye bright
Accountants of my days, and mouths, and years,
In your fair kalendar distinctly mark'd!

Since that authentic, radiant register, [him;
Though man inspects it not, stands good against Since you, and years, roll on, though man stands still;
Teach me my days to number, and apply
My trembling heart to wisdom; now beyond
All shadow of excuse for fooling on.
Age smooths our path to prudence; sweeps aside
The snares keen appetite, and passion spread
To catch stray souls; and woe to that gray head,
Whose folly would undo what age has done!
Aid then, aid, all ye stars!—Much rather, thou,
Great Artist! Thou, whose finger set aright
This exquisite machine, with all its wheels,
Though intervolv'd, exact; and pointing out
Life's rapid and irrevocable flight,
With such an index fair as none can miss,
Who lifts an eye, nor sleeps till it is clos'd.
Open mine eye, dread Deity! to read
The tacit doctrine of thy works; to see
Things as they are, unalter'd through the glass
Of worldly wishes. Time, eternity!
('Tis these, mist-measur'd, ruin all mankind)
Set them before me; let me lay them both
In equal scale, and learn their various weight.
Let time appear a moment, as it is;
And let eternity's full orb, at once,
Turn on my soul, and strike it into heaven.
When shall I see far more than charms me now?
Gaze on creation's model in thy breast
Unveil'd, nor wonder at the transcript more?
When this vile foreign dust, which smothers all
That travel earth's deep vale, shall I shake off?
When shall my soul her incarnation quit,
And re-adopted to thy blest embrace,
Obtain her apotheosis in thee?
Dost think, Lorenzo, this is wandering wide?
No, 'tis directly striking at the mark;
To wake thy dead devotion was my point;
And how I bless night's consecrating shades,
Which to a temple turn an universe;
Fill us with great ideas, full of heaven,
And antidote the pestilential earth!
In every storm, that either frowns, or falls,
What an asylum has the soul in prayer!
And what a fane is this, in which to pray!
And what a God must dwell in such a fane!
O what a genius must inform the skies!
And is Lorenzo's salamander heart
Cold, and untouch'd, amid these sacred fires?
O ye nocturnal sparks! ye glowing embers,
On heaven's broad hearth! who burn, or burn
no more,
Who blaze, or die, as Great Jehovah's breath
Or blows you, or forbears: assist my song;
Pour your whole influence; exercise this heart,
So long possess; and bring him back to man.
And is Lorenzo a demurer still?
Pride in thy parts provokes thee to contest
Truths, which, contested, put thy parts to shame.
Nor shame they more Lorenzo's head than heart,
A faithless heart, how despicably small!
Too streight, ought great, or generous, to receive!
Fill'd with an atom! fill'd, and foul'd with self!
And self-mistaken! self, that lasts an hour!

Instincts and passions, of the nobler kind,
Lie suffocated there; or they alone,
Reason apart, would wake high hope; and open,
To ravish'd thought, that intellectual sphere,
Where order, wisdom, goodness, providence,
Their endless miracles of love display,
And promise all the truly great desire.
The mind that would be happy, must be great;
Great, in its wishes; great in its surveys.
Extended views a narrow mind extend;
Push out its corrugate, expansive make,
Which, ere long, more than planets shall embrace.
A man of compass makes a man of worth;
Divine contemplate, and become divine.
As man was made for glory, and for bliss,
All littleness is in approach to woe;
Open thy bosom, set thy wishes wide,
And let in manhood; let in happiness;
Admit the boundless theatre of thought
From nothing, up to God; which makes a man.
Take God from nature, nothing great is left;
Man's mind is in a pit, and nothing sees;—
Man's heart is in a jakes, and loves the mire.
Emerge from thy profound; erect thine eye;
See thy distress! how close thou art besieg'd!
Besieg'd by nature, the proud sceptic's foe!
Enclos'd by these innumerable worlds,
Sparkling conviction on the darkest mind,
As in a golden net of providence.
How art thou caught, sure captive of belief!
From this thy blest captivity, what art,
What blasphemy to reason sets thee free!
This scene is heaven's indulgent violence:
Canst thou bear up against this tide of glory?
What is earth bosom'd in these ambient orbs,
But faith in God impos'd, and press'd on man?
Dar'st thou still litigate thy desperate cause,
Spite of these numerous, awful, witnesses,
And doubt the deposition of the skies?
O how laborious is thy way to ruin!
Laborious! 'tis impracticable quite;
To sink beyond a doubt, in this debate,
With all his weight of wisdom and of will,
And crime flagitious, I defy a fool.
Some wish they did; but no man disbelieves.
God is a Spirit; Spirit cannot strike
These gross, material organs; God by man
As much is seen, as man a God can see,
In these astonishing exploits of power.
What order, beauty, motion, distance, size;
Conception of design, how exquisite!
How complicate, in their divine police!
Apt means! great ends! consent to general good!
Each attribute of these material gods,
So long (and that with specious pleas) ador'd,
A separate conquest gains o'er rebel thought;
And leads in triumph the whole mind of man.
Lorenzo! this may seem harangue to thee;
Such all is apt to seem, that thwarts our will.
And dost thou, then, demand a simple proof
Of this great master moral of the skies,
Unskill'd, or disinclin'd, to read it there?
Since 'tis the basis, and all drops without it,
Take it, in one compact, unbroken chain.
Such proof insists on an attentive ear;

'Twill not make one amid a mob of thoughts,
And, for thy notice, ſtruggle with the world.
Retire;—the world ſhut out;—thy thoughts call home:—
Imagination's airy wing repreſs:—
Lock up thy ſenſes;—let no paſſion ſtir;—
Wake all to reaſon;—let her reign alone;
Then, in thy ſoul's deep ſilence, and the depth
Of nature's ſilence, midnight, thus inquire,
As I have done; and ſhall inquire no more.
In nature's channel, thus the queſtions run.
"What am I? and from whence?—I nothing know,
"But that I am; and, ſince I am, conclude
"Something eternal: had there e'er been nought,
"Nought ſtill had been: eternal there muſt be.—
"But what eternal?—Why not human race?
"And Adam's anceſtor's without an end?—
"That's hard to be conceiv'd; ſince every link
"Of that long-chain'd ſucceſſion is ſo frail;
"Can every part depend, and not the whole?
"Yet grant it true; new difficulties riſe;
"I'm ſtill quite out at ſea; nor ſee the ſhore.
"Whence earth, and theſe bright orbs?—Eternal too?
"Grant matter was eternal; ſtill theſe orbs
"Would want ſome other father;—much deſign
"Is ſeen in all their motions, all their makes;
"Deſign implies intelligence, and art;
"That can't be from themſelves—or man; that art
"Man ſcarce can comprehend, could man beſtow?
"And nothing greater yet allow'd than man.—
"Who, motion, foreign to the ſmalleſt grain,
"Shot through vaſt maſſes of enormous weight?
"Who bid brute matter's reſtive lump aſſume
"Such various forms, and gave it wings to fly?
"Has matter innate motion? then each atom,
"Aſſerting its indiſputable right
"To dance, would form an univerſe of duſt:
"Has matter none? Then whence theſe glorious forms
"And boundleſs flights, from ſhapeleſs, and repos'd?
"Has matter more than motion? has it thought,
"Judgment, and genius? is it deeply learn'd
"In mathematics? Has it fram'd ſuch laws,
"Which but to gueſs, a Newton made immortal?—
"If ſo, how each ſage atom laughs at me,
"Who think a clod inferior to a man!
"If art, to form; and counſel to conduct;
"And that with greater far, than human ſkill;
"Reſides not in each block;—a Godhead reigns.—
"Grant, then, inviſible, eternal, mind;
"That granted, all is ſolv'd—But, granting that,
"Draw I not o'er me a ſtill darker cloud?
"Grant I not that which I can ne'er conceive?
"A being without origin, or end!—
"Hail, human liberty! There is no God—
"Yet, why? on either ſcheme that knot ſubſiſts;
"Subſiſt it muſt, in God, or human race:
"If in the laſt, how many knots beſide,
"Indiſſoluble all?—Why chooſe it there,
"Where, choſen, ſtill ſubſiſt ten thouſand more?
"Reject it, where, that choſen, all the reſt
"Diſpers'd leave reaſon's whole horizon clear;
"This is not reaſon's dictate; reaſon ſays,
"Cloſe with the ſide where one grain turns the ſcale;
"What vaſt preponderance is here! can reaſon
"With louder voice exclaim---Believe a God?
"And reaſon heard, is the ſole mark of man.
"What things impoſſible muſt man think true,
"On any other ſyſtem! and how ſtrange
"To diſbelieve, through mere credulity!"
If, in this chain, Lorenzo finds no flaw,
Let it for ever bind him to belief.
And where the link, in which a flaw he finds?
And, if a God there is, that God how great!
How great that power, whoſe providential care
Through theſe bright orbs, dark centres darts a ray!
Of nature univerſal threads the whole!
And hangs creation, like a precious gem,
Though little, on the footſtool of his throne!
That little gem, how large! a weight let fall
From a fixt ſtar, in ages can it reach
This diſtant earth! Say, then, Lorenzo! where,
Where, ends this mighty building? Where, begin
The ſuburbs of creation? Where, the wall
Whoſe battlements look o'er into the vale
Of non-exiſtence? Nothing's ſtrange abode!
Say, at what point of ſpace Jehovah dropp'd
His ſlacken'd line, and laid his balance by;
Weigh'd worlds, and meaſur'd infinite, no more!
Where rears his terminating pillar high
Its extra-mundane head? and ſays, to gods,
In characters illuſtrious as the ſun,
"I ſtand, the plan's proud period; I pronounce
"The work accompliſh'd; the creation cloſ'd:
"Shout, all ye gods! nor ſhout ye gods alone;
"Of all that lives, or, if devoid of life,
"That reſts, or rolls, ye heights, and depths reſound!
"Reſound! reſound! ye depths, and heights, reſound!"
Hard are thoſe queſtions;—Anſwer harder ſtill.
Is this the ſole exploit, the ſingle birth,
The ſolitary ſon of power divine?
Or has th' Almighty Father, with a breath,
Impregnated the womb of diſtant ſpace?
Has he not bid, in various provinces,
Brother-creations the dark bowels burſt
Of night primeval; barren, now, no more?
And he the central ſun, tranſpiercing all
Thoſe giant generations, which diſport,
And dance, as motes, in his meridian ray;
That ray withdrawn, benighted, or abſorb'd
In that abyſs of horror, whence they ſprung;
While chaos triumphs, repoſſeſt of all
Rival creation raviſh'd from his throne?
Chaos! of nature both the womb and grave!
Think'ſt thou my ſcheme, Lorenzo, ſpreads too wide?
Is this extravagant?—No; this is juſt;
Juſt in conjecture, though 't were falſe in fact.
If 'tis an error, 'tis an error ſprung
From noble root, high-thought of the Moſt High.
But wherefore error? who can prove it ſuch?—
He that can ſet Omnipotence a bound.
Can man conceive beyond what God can do?
Nothing but quite impoſſible is hard.
He ſummons into being with like eaſe,

A whole creation, and a ſingle grain.
Speaks he the word? a thouſand worlds are born!
A thouſand worlds? there's ſpace for millions more;
And in what ſpace can his great fiat fail?
Condemn me not, cold critic! but indulge
The warm imagination: why condemn?
Why not indulge ſuch thoughts, as ſwell our hearts
With fuller admiration of that power, [ſwell?
Who gives our hearts with ſuch high thoughts to
Why not indulge in his augmented praiſe?
Darts not his glory a ſtill brighter ray,
The leſs is left to chaos, and the realms
Of hideous night, where fancy ſtrays aghaſt;
And, though moſt talkative, makes no report?
Still ſeems my thought enormous? Think again;
Experience ſelf ſhall aid thy lame belief.
Glaſſes (that revelation to the ſight!)
Have they not led us in the deep diſcloſe
Of fine ſpun nature, exquiſitely ſmall,
And, though demonſtrated, ſtill ill-conceiv'd?
If then, on the reverſe, the mind would mount
In magnitude, what mind can mount too far,
To keep the balance, and creation poiſe?
Defect alone can err on ſuch a theme;
What is too great, if we the cauſe ſurvey?
Stupendous Architect! thou, thou art all!
My ſoul flies up and down in thoughts of thee,
And finds herſelf but at the centre ſtill!
I Am, thy name! exiſtence, all thine own!
Creation's nothing; flatter'd much, if ſtyl'd
"The thin, the fleeting atmoſphere of God."
O for the voice—of what? of whom?—What voice
Can anſwer to my wants, in ſuch aſcent,
As dares to deem one univerſe too ſmall?
Tell me, Lorenzo! (for now fancy glows,
Fir'd in the vortex of Almighty power)
Is not this home creation, in the map
Of univerſal nature, as a ſpeck,
Like fair Britannia in our little ball;
Exceeding fair and glorious for its ſize,
But, elſewhere, far outmeaſur'd, far outſhone?
In fancy (for the fact beyond us lies)
Canſt thou not figure it, an iſle, almoſt
Too ſmall for notice, in the vaſt of being;
Sever'd by mighty ſeas of unbuilt ſpace
From other realms; from ample continents
Of higher life, where nobler natives dwell;
Leſs northern, leſs remote from deity,
Glowing beneath the line of the Supreme;
Where ſouls in excellence make haſte, put forth,
Luxuriant growths; nor the late autumn wait
Of human worth, but ripen ſoon to gods?
Yet why drown fancy in ſuch depths as theſe?
Return, preſumptuous rover! and confeſs
The bounds of man; nor blame them, as too ſmall.
Enjoy we not full ſcope in what is ſeen?
Full ample the dominions of the ſun!
Full glorious to behold! how far, how wide,
The matchleſs monarch, from his flaming throne,
Laviſh of luſtre, throws his beams about him,
Farther and faſter than a thought could fly,
And feeds his planets with eternal fires!
This Heliopolis, by greater far,
Than the proud tyrant of the Nile was built;
And he alone, who built it, can deſtroy.
Beyond this city, why ſtrays human thought?
One wonderful, enough for man to know!
One infinite! enough for man to range!
One firmament, enough for man to read!
O what voluminous inſtruction here!
What page of wiſdom is deny'd him? None.
If learning his chief leſſon makes him wiſe.
Nor is inſtruction here our only gain;
There dwells a noble pathos in the ſkies,
Which warms our paſſions, proſelytes our hearts;
How eloquently ſhines the glowing pole!
With what authority it gives its charge,
Remonſtrating great truths in ſtyle ſublime,
Though ſilent, loud! heard earth around; above
The planets heard; and not unheard in hell;
Hell has her wonder, though too proud to praiſe.
Is earth, then, more infernal? has ſhe thoſe,
Who neither praiſe (Lorenzo) nor admire?
Lorenzo's admiration, pre-engag'd,
Ne'er aſk'd the moon one queſtion; never held
Leaſt correſpondence with a ſingle ſtar;
Ne'er rear'd an altar to the queen of heaven
Walking in brightneſs; or her train ador'd.
Their ſublunary rivals long have ſince
Engroſs'd his whole devotion; ſtars malign,
Which made the fond aſtronomer run mad;
Darken his intellect, corrupt his heart;
Cauſe him to ſacrifice his fame and peace
To momentary madneſs, call'd delight.
Idolater, more groſs than ever kiſs'd
The lifted hand to Luna, or pour'd out
The blood to Jove!—O thou, to whom belongs
All ſacrifice! O thou great Jove unfeign'd;
Divine Inſtructor! Thy firſt volume, this,
For man's peruſal; all in capitals!
In moon, and ſtars (heaven's golden alphabet!)
Emblaz'd to ſeize the ſight; who runs, may read;
Who reads, can underſtand. 'Tis unconfin'd,
To Chriſtian land, or Jewry; fairly writ,
In language univerſal, to mankind:
A language, lofty to the learn'd: yet plain
To thoſe that feed the flock, or guide the plough,
Or, from his huſk, ſtrike out the bounding grain.
A language, worthy the great mind, that ſpeaks!
Preface, and comment, to the ſacred page!
Which oft refers its reader to the ſkies,
As pre-ſuppoſing his firſt leſſon there,
And ſcripture ſelf a fragment, that unread.
Stupendous book of wiſdom, to the wiſe;
Stupendous book! and open'd, night! by thee.
By thee much open'd, I confeſs, O night!
Yet more I wiſh; but how ſhall I prevail?
Say, gentle night! whoſe modeſt, maiden beams
Give us a new creation, and preſent
The world's great picture ſoften'd to the ſight;
Nay, kinder far, far more indulgent ſtill.
Say, thou, whoſe mild dominion's ſilver key
Unlocks our hemiſphere, and ſets to view
Worlds beyond number; worlds conceal'd by day
Behind the proud, and envious ſtar of noon!
Canſt thou not draw a deeper ſcene?—And ſhow
The mighty Potentate, to whom belong
Theſe rich regalia pompouſly diſplay'd

To kindle that high hope? Like him of Uz,
I gaze around; I search on every side—
O for a glimpse of him my soul adores!
As the chas'd hart, amid the desert waste, [her,
Pants for the living stream; for him who made
So pants the thirsty soul, amid the blank
Of sublunary joys. Say, goddess! where?
Where blazes his bright court? Where burns his throne? [round
Thou know'st; for thou art near him; by thee,
His grand pavilion, sacred fame reports
The sable curtain drawn. If not, can none
Of thy fair daughter-train, so swift of wing,
Who travel far, discover where he dwells?
A star his dwelling pointed out below.
Ye Pleiades! Arcturus! Mazaroth!
And thou, Orion! of still keener eye!
Say ye, who guide the wilder'd in the waves,
And bring them out of tempest into port!
On which hand must I bend my course to find him?
These courtiers keep the secret of their king;
I wake whole nights, in vain, to steal it from them.
I wake; and, waking, climb night's radiant scale,
From sphere to sphere; the steps by nature set
For man's ascent; at once to tempt and aid;
To tempt his eye, and aid his towering thought;
Till it arrives at the great God of all.
In ardent contemplation's rapid car,
From earth, as from my barrier, I set out.
How swift I mount! diminish'd earth recedes;
I pass the moon; and, from her farther side,
Pierce heaven's blue curtain; strike into remote;
Where, with his lifted tube, the subtle sage
His artificial, airy journey takes,
And to celestial lengthens human sight.
I pause at every planet on my road,
And ask for him who gives their orbs to roll,
Their foreheads fair to shine. From Saturn's ring,
In which, of earths an army might be lost,
With the bold comet, take my bolder flight,
Amid those sovereign glories of the skies,
Of independent, native lustre, proud;
The souls of systems! and the lords of life, [now?
Through their wide empires!—What behold I
A wilderness of wonder burning round;
Where larger suns inhabit higher spheres;
Perhaps the villas of descending gods.
Nor halt I here; my toil is but begun;
'Tis but the threshold of the Deity;
Or, far beneath it, I am groveling still.
Nor is it strange; I built on a mistake;
The grandeur on his works, whence folly sought
For aid, to reason sets his glory higher; [him)
Who built thus high for worms (mere worms to
O where, Lorenzo! must the builder dwell?
Pause, then; and, for a moment, here respire—
If human thought can keep its station here.
Where am I?—Where is earth?—Nay, where art thou,
O sun?—Is the sun turn'd recluse?—And are
His boasted expeditions short to mine?—
To mine, how short! On nature's Alps I stand,
And see a thousand firmaments beneath!
A thousand systems! as a thousand grains!
So much a stranger, and so late arriv'd,
How can man's curious spirit not inquire,
What are the natives of this world sublime,
Of this so foreign, un-terrestrial sphere,
Where mortal, untransplated, never stray'd?
" O ye, as distant from my little home,
" As swiftest sun-beams in an age can fly!
" Far from my native element I roam,
" In quest of new, and wonderful, to man.
" What province this, of his immense domain,
" Whom all obeys? or mortals here, or gods?
" Ye borderers on the coasts of bliss! what are " you?
" A colony from heaven? Or, only rais'd,
" By frequent visit from heaven's neighbouring
" realms,
" To secondary gods, and half divine?—
" Whate'er your nature, this is past dispute,
" Far other life you live, far other tongue
" You talk, far other thought, perhaps, you think,
" Than man. How various are the works of God,
" But say, what thought? is reason here inthron'd!
" And absolute? or sense in arms against her?
" Have you two lights? or need you no reveal'd?
" Enjoy your happy realms their golden age?
" And had your Eden an abstemious Eve?
" Our Eve's fair daughters prove their pedigree,
" And ask their Adams—" Who would not be
" wise?"
" Or, if your mother fell, are you redeem'd?
" And if redeem'd—is your Redeemer scorn'd?
" Is this your final residence? if not,
" Change you your scene, translated? or by death?
" And if by death; what death?—Know you dis-
" ease?"
" Or horrid war?—With war, this fatal hour,
" Europa groans (so call we a small field,
" Where kings run mad) In our world, death
" deputes
" Intemperance to do the work of age;
" And hanging up the quiver nature gave him,
" As slow of execution, for dispatch
" Sends forth imperial butchers; bids them slay
" Their sheep (the silly sheep they fleec'd before),
" And toss him twice ten thousand at a meal.
" Sit all your executioners on thrones?
" With you, can rage for plunder make a god?
" And bloodshed wash out every other stain?—
" But you, perhaps, can't bleed: from matter
" gross
" Your spirits clean, are delicately clad
" In fine-spun ether, privileg'd to soar,
" Unloaded, uninfected; how unlike
" The lot of man! How few of human race
" By their own mud unmurder'd! How we wage
" Self-war eternal! Is your painful day
" Of hardy conflict o'er? Or, are you still
" Raw candidates at school? And have you those " Who disaffect reversions, as with us?
" But what are we? You never heard of man;
" Or earth, the bedlam of the universe!
" Where reason (un-diseas'd with you) runs mad,
" And nurses folly's children as her own;
" Fond of the soulest. In the sacred mount
" Of holiness, where reason is pronounc'd

" Infallible; and thunders, like a god;
" Ev'n there, by ſaints, the demons are outdone;
" What theſe think wrong, our ſaints reſine to
" right;
" And kindly teach dull hell her own black arts;
" Satan, inſtructed, o'er their morals ſmiles.—
" But this, how ſtrange to you, who know not " man!
" Has the leaſt rumour of our race arriv'd?
" Call'd here Elijah in his flaming car?
" Paſt by you the good Enoch, on his road
" To thoſe fair fields, whence Lucifer was hurl'd;
" Who bruſh'd, perhaps, your ſphere in his de-
" ſcent,
" Stain'd your pure cryſtal ether, or let fall
" A ſhort eclipſe from his portentous ſhade?
" O! that the fiend had lodg'd on ſome broad orb
" Athwart his way; nor reach'd his preſent home,
" Then blacken'd earth with footſteps foul'd in
" hell,
" Nor waſh'd in ocean, as from Rome he paſt
" To Britain's iſle; too, too, conſpicuous there?"
But this is all digreſſion: where is he,
That o'er heaven's battlements the felon hurl'd
To groans, and chains, and darkneſs? Where is he,
Who ſees creation's ſummit in a vale?
He, whom, while man is man, he can't but ſeek;
And if he finds, commences more than man?
O for a teleſcope his throne to reach!
Tell me, ye learn'd on earth! or bleſt above!
Ye ſearching, ye Newtonian angels! tell,
Where, your great Maſter's orb? His planets, where?
Thoſe conſcious ſatellites, thoſe morning-ſtars,
Firſt-born of Deity! from central love,
By veneration moſt profound, thrown off;
By ſweet attraction, no leſs ſtrongly drawn;
Aw'd, and yet raptur'd; raptur'd, yet ſerene;
Paſt thought illuſtrious, but with borrow'd beams;
In ſtill approaching circles, ſtill remote,
Revolving round the ſun's eternal fire?
Or ſent, in lines direct, on embaſſies
To nations—in what latitude?—Beyond
Terreſtrial thought's horizon!—And on what
High errands ſent?—Here human effort ends;
And leaves me ſtill a ſtranger to his throne.
Full well it might! I quite miſtook my road.
Born in an age more curious than devout;
More fond to fix the place of heaven, or hell,
Than ſtudious this to ſhun, or that ſecure.
'Tis not the curious, but the pious path,
That leads me to my point: Lorenzo! know,
Without or ſar, or angel, for their guide,
Who worſhip God, ſhall find him. Humble love,
And not proud reaſon, keeps the door of heaven;
Love finds admiſſion, where proud ſcience fails.
Man's ſcience is the culture of his heart;
And not to loſe his plummet in the depths
Of nature, or the more profoand of God.
Either to know, is an attempt that ſets
The wiſeſt on a level with the fool.
To fathom nature (ill-attempted here!)
Paſt doubt is deep philoſophy above;
Higher degrees in bliſs archangels take,
As deeper learn'd; the deepeſt, learning ſtill.
For, what a thunder of Omnipotence
(So might I dare to ſpeak) is ſeen in all!
In man! in earth! in more amazing ſkies!
Teaching this leſſon, pride is loth to learn—
" Not deeply to diſcern, not much to know,
" Mankind was born to wonder, and adore."
And is there cauſe for higher wonder ſtill,
Than that which ſtruck us from our paſt ſurveys?
Yes; and for deeper adoration too.
From my late airy travel unconfin'd,
Have I learn'd nothing?—Yes, Lorenzo! This;
Each of theſe ſtars is a religious houſe;
I ſaw their altars ſmoke, their incenſe riſe;
And heard hoſannas ring through every ſphere,
A ſeminary fraught with future gods.
Nature all o'er is conſecrated ground,
Teeming with growths immortal and divine.
The Great Proprietor's all-bounteous hand
Leaves nothing waſte; but ſows theſe fiery fields
With ſeeds of reaſon, which to virtues riſe
Beneath his genial ray; and, if eſcap'd
The peſtilential blaſts of ſtubborn will,
When grown mature, are gather'd for the ſkies.
And is devotion thought too much on earth,
When beings, ſo ſuperior, homage boaſt,
And triumph in proſtration to the throne?
But wherefore more of planets, or of ſtars?
Ethereal journeys, and, diſcover'd there,
Ten thouſand worlds, ten thouſand ways devout,
All nature ſending incenſe to the throne,
Except the bold Lorenzos of our ſphere?
Opening the ſolemn ſources of my ſoul,
Since I have pour'd, like feign'd Eridanus,
My flowing numbers o'er the flaming ſkies,
Nor ſee, of fancy, or of fact, what more
Invites the muſe—Here turn we, and review
Our paſt nocturnal landſcape wide:—Then ſay,
Say, then, Lorenzo! with what burſt of heart,
The whole, at once, revolving in his thought,
Muſt man exclaim, adoring, and aghaſt?
" O what a root! O what a branch, is here!
" O what a father! What a family! [tions,
" Worlds! ſyſtems! and creations!—And crea-
" In one agglomerated cluſter, hung, [hangs;
" * Great Vine! On thee, on thee the cluſter
" The filial cluſter! infinitely ſpread
" In glowing globes, with various being fraught;
" And drinks (nectareous draught!) immortal
" life.
" Or, ſhall I ſay (for who can ſay enough?)
" A conſtellation of ten thouſand gems,
" And, O! of what dimenſion! of what weight!
" Set in one ſignet, flames on the right hand
" Of Majeſty Divine! The blazing ſeal,
" That deeply ſtamps, on all created mind,
" Indelible, his ſovereign attributes,
" Omnipotence, and love! That, paſſing bound;
" And this, ſurpaſſing that. Nor ſtop we here,
" For want of power in God, but thought in man.
" Ev'n this acknowledg'd, leaves us ſtill in debt:
" If greater aught, that greater all is thine,
" Dread ſire!—Accept this miniature of thee;
" And pardon an attempt from mortal thought.

* John xv. 1.

" In which archangels might have fail'd, un-
" blam'd."
How such ideas of th' Almighty's power,
And such ideas of th' Almighty's plan,
(Ideas not absurd) distend the thought
Of feeble mortals! Nor of them alone!
The fulness of the Deity breaks forth
In inconceivables to men, and gods.
Think, then, O think; nor ever drop the thought;
How low must man descend, when gods adore!
Have I not, then, accomplish'd my proud boast?
Did I not tell thee, " We would mount, Lo-
" renzo!
" And kindle our devotion at the stars?"
And have I fail'd? And did I flatter thee?
And art all adamant? And dost confute
All urg'd, with one irrefragable smile?
Lorenzo! mirth how miserable here!
Swear by the stars, by him who made them, swear,
Thy heart, henceforth, shall be as pure as they:
Then thou, like them, shalt shine; like them, shalt rise
From low to lofty; from obscure to bright;
By due gradation, nature's sacred law.
The stars, from whence?—Ask Chaos—He can tell.
These bright temptations to idolatry,
From darkness, and confusion, took their birth;
Sons of Deformity! from fluid dregs
Tartarean first they rose to masses rude,
And then to spheres opaque, then dimly shone,
Then brighten'd, then blaz'd out in perfect day.
Nature delights in progress; in advance
From worse to better; but, when minds ascend,
Progress in part depends upon themselves.
Heaven aids exertion; greater makes the great;
The voluntary little lessens more.
O be a man! and thou shalt be a god!
And half self-made!—Ambition how divine!
O thou, ambitious of disgrace alone!
Still undevout? unkindled?—Though high taught,
School'd by the skies, and pupil of the stars,
Rank coward to the fashionable world!
Art thou asham'd to bend thy knee to heaven?
Curst fume of pride, exhal'd from deepest hell!
Pride in religion is man's highest praise.
Bent on destruction! and in love with death!
Not all these luminaries, quench'd at once,
Were half so sad as one benighted mind,
Which gropes for happiness, and meets despair.
How, like a widow in her weeds, the night,
Amid her glimmering tapers, silent sits!
How sorrowful, how desolate, she weeps
Perpetual dews, and saddens nature's scene!
A scene more sad sin makes the darken'd soul,
All comfort kills, nor leaves one spark alive.
Though blind of heart, still open is thine eye:
Why such magnificence in all thou seest?
Of matter's grandeur, know one end is this,
To tell the rational, who gazes on it—
" Though that immensely great, still greater he,
" Whose breast, capacious, can embrace, and lodge,
" Unburden'd, nature's universal scheme;
" Can grasp creation with a single thought;
" Creation grasp, and not exclude its sire."—
To tell him farther—" It behoves him much
" To guard th' important, yet depending, fate
" Of being, brighter than a thousand suns:
" One single ray of thought outshines them all."—
And if man hears obedient, soon he'll soar
Superior heights, and on his purple wing,
His purple wing bedropt with eyes of gold,
Rising, where thought is now deny'd to rise,
Look down triumphant on these dazzling spheres.
Why then persist?—No mortal ever liv'd
But, dying, he pronounc'd (when words are true)
The whole that charms thee absolutely vain,
Vain, and far worse!—Think thou with dying
men;
O condescend to think as angels think!
O tolerate a chance for happiness!
Our nature such, ill choice ensues ill fate;
And hell had been, though there had been no God.
Dost thou not know, my new astronomer!
Earth, turning from the sun, brings night to man?
Man, turning from his God, brings endless night;
Where thou canst read no morals, find no friend,
Amend no manners, and expect no peace.
How deep the darkness! and the groan how loud!
And far, how far, from lambent are the flames!—
Such is Lorenzo's purchase! such his praise!
The proud, the politic, Lorenzo's praise!
Though in his ear, and levell'd at his heart,
I've half read o'er the volume of the skies.
For think not thou hast heard all this from me;
My song but echoes what great Nature speaks.
What has she spoken? Thus the goddess spoke,
Thus speaks for ever:—" Place at nature's head
" A sovereign, which o'er all things rolls his eye,
" Extends his wing, promulgates his commands,
" But, above all, diffuses endless good;
" To whom, for sure redress, the wrong may fly;
" The vile for mercy, and the pain'd for peace;
" By whom the various tenants of these spheres,
" Diversify'd in fortunes, place, and powers,
" Rais'd in enjoyment, as in worth they rise,
" Arrive at length (if worthy such approach)
" At that blest fountain-head from which they stream;
" Where conflict past redoubles present joy,
" And present joy looks forward on increase,
" And that on more; no period! every step
" A double boon! a promise, and a bliss."
How easy sits this scheme on human hearts!
It suits their make; it sooths their vast desires;
Passion is pleas'd, and reason asks no more;
'Tis rational! 'tis great!—But what is thine?
It darkens, shocks, excruciates, and confounds!
Leaves us quite naked both of help and hope,
Sinking from bad to worse; few years the sport
Of fortune; then the morsel of despair.
Say then, Lorenzo! (for thou know'st it well)
What vice?—Mere want of compass in our thought.
Religion, what?—The proof of common sense.
How art thou hooted where the least prevails!
Is it my fault, if these truths call thee fool?
And thou shalt never be miscall'd by me.
Can neither shame nor terror stand thy friend?
And art thou still an infect in the mire?
How, like thy guardian angel, have I flown; [all
Snatch'd thee from earth; escorted thee through

Th' ethereal armies; walk'd thee, like a God,
Through ſplendours of firſt magnitude, arrang'd
On either hand; clouds thrown beneath thy feet;
Cloſe-cruis'd on the bright paradiſe of God;
And almoſt introduc'd thee to the throne!
And art thou ſtill carouſing for delight,
Rank poiſon; firſt fermenting to mere froth,
And then ſubſiding into final gall?
To beings of ſublime, immortal make,
How ſhocking is all joy, whoſe end is ſure!
Such joy more ſhocking ſtill the more it charms!
And doſt thou chooſe what ends ere well begun,
And infamous as ſhort? And doſt thou chooſe
(Thou, to whoſe palate glory is ſo ſweet)
To wade into perdition, through contempt,
Not of poor bigots only, but thy own?
For I have peep'd into thy cover'd heart,
And ſeen it bluſh beneath a boaſtful brow;
For, by ſtrong guilt's moſt violent aſſault,
Conſcience is but diſabled, not deſtroy'd.
O thou moſt awful being, and moſt vain!
Thy will how frail! how glorious is thy power!
Though dread eternity has ſown her ſeeds
Of bliſs and woe in thy deſpotic breaſt,
Though heaven and hell depend upon thy choice,
A butterfly comes croſs, and both are fled.
Is this the picture of a rational?
This horrid image, ſhall it be moſt juſt?
Lorenzo! No; it cannot,—ſhall not be,
If there is force in reaſon, or in ſounds
Chanted beneath the glimpſes of the moon,
A magic, at this planetary hour,
When ſlumber locks the general lip, and dreams
Through ſenſeleſs mazes hunt ſouls uninſpir'd.
Attend—The ſacred myſteries begin—
My ſolemn night-born adjuration hear;
Hear, and I'll raiſe thy ſpirit from the duſt;
While the ſtars gaze on this enchantment new,
Enchantment, not infernal, but divine!
" By ſilence, death's peculiar attribute;
" By darkneſs, guilt's inevitable doom;
" By darkneſs, and by ſilence, ſiſters dread!
" That draw the curtain round night's ebon throne,
" And raiſe ideas ſolemn as the ſcene!
" By night, and all of awful night preſents
" To thought or ſenſe (of awful much to both
" The goddeſs brings!) By theſe her trembling fires,
" Like Veſta's, ever-burning, and like hers
" Sacred to thoughts immaculate and pure!
" By theſe bright orators, that prove, and praiſe,
" And preſs thee to revere the Deity;
" Perhaps too aid thee, when rever'd a while,
" To reach his throne; as ſtages of the ſoul,
" Through which at different periods ſhe ſhall paſs;
" Refining gradual for her final height,
" And purging off ſome droſs at every ſphere!
" By this dark pall thrown o'er the ſilent world,
" By the world's kings, and kingdoms, moſt renown'd,
" From ſhort ambition's zenith ſet for ever;
" Sad preſage to vain boaſters now in bloom!
" By the long liſt of ſwift mortality,
" From Adam downward to this evening knell,
" Which midnight waves in fancy's ſtartled eye,
" And ſhocks her with an hundred centuries,
" Round death's black banner throng'd in human thought!
" By thouſands now reſigning their laſt breath,
" And calling thee—wert thou ſo wiſe to hear!
" By tombs o'er tombs ariſing; human earth
" Ejected, to make room for—human earth;
" The monarch's terror, and the ſexton's trade,
" By pompous obſequies that ſhun the day,
" The torch funereal, and the nodding plume,
" Which makes poor man's humiliation proud;
" Baſt of our ruin! triumph of our duſt!
" By the damp vault that weeps o'er royal bones,
" And the pale lamp that ſhows the ghaſtly dead
" More ghaſtly, through the thick-incumbent gloom!
" By viſits (if there are) from darker ſcenes,
" The gliding ſpectre! and the groaning grave!
" By groans, and graves, and miſeries that groan
" For the grave's ſhelter! by deſponding men,
" Senſeleſs to pains of death, from pangs of guilt!
" By guilt's laſt audit! by yon moon in blood,
" The rocking firmament, the falling ſtars,
" And thunder's laſt diſcharge, great nature's knell!
" By ſecond chaos and eternal night"—
Be wiſe—Nor let Philander blame my charm,
But own not ill diſcharg'd my double debt,
Love to the living, duty to the dead.
For know I'm but executor; he left
This moral legacy; I make it o'er
By his command; Philander hear in me,
And heaven in both. If deaf to theſe, O! hear
Florello's tender voice; his weal depends
On thy reſolve; it trembles at thy choice;
For his ſake—love thyſelf: example ſtrikes
All human hearts; a bad example more;
More ſtill a father's; that enſures his ruin.
As parent of his being, wouldſt thou prove
The unnatural parent of his miſeries,
And make him curſe the being which thou gaveſt?
Is this the bleſſing of ſo fond a father;
If careleſs of Lorenzo! ſpare, Oh! ſpare
Florello's father, and Philander's friend!
Florello's father ruin'd, ruins him;
And from Philander's friend the world expects
A conduct, no diſhonour to the dead.
Let paſſion do what nobler motive ſhould;
Let love, and emulation riſe in aid
To reaſon, and perſuade thee to be—bleſt.
This ſeems not a requeſt to be deny'd;
Yet (ſuch the infatuation of mankind!)
'Tis the moſt hopeleſs man can make to man.
Shall I then riſe in argument and warmth,
And urge Philander's poſthumous advice
From topics yet unbroach'd?—
But Oh! I faint! My ſpirits fail!—Nor ſtrange
So long on wing, and in no middle clime!
To which my great Creator's glory call'd;
And calls—but now in vain. Sleep's dewy wand
Has ſtrok'd my drooping lips, and promiſes
My long arrear of reſt; the downy god
(Wont to return with our returning peace)
Will pay ere long, and bleſs me with repoſe, [coſt,
Haſte, haſte, ſweet ſtranger! from the peaſant's
The ſhip-boy's hammock, or the ſoldier's ſtraw,

Whence sorrow never chas'd thee; with thee bring,
Not hideous visions, as of late, but draughts
Delicious of well-tasted cordial rest,
Man's rich restorative, his balmy bath,
That supples, lubricates, and keeps in play
The various movements of this nice machine,
Which asks such frequent periods of repair.
When tir'd with vain rotations of the day,
Sleep winds us up for the succeeding dawn;
Fresh we spin on, till sickness clogs our wheels,
Or death quite breaks the spring, and motion ends.
When will it end with me?
——" Thou only know'st,
" Thou, whose broad eye the future and the past
" Joins to the present; making one of three
" To moral thought! Thou know'st, and thou

" Opaque, or lucid; rapid, or at rest;
" Minute, or passing bound! in each extreme
" Of like amaze and mystery to man.
" Father of these bright millions of the night!
" Of which the least full godhead had proclaim'd,
" And thrown the gazer on his knee—or say,
" Is appellation higher still, thy choice?
" Father of matter's temporary lord!
" Father of spirits! nobler offspring! sparks
" Of high paternal glory; rich endow'd
" With various measures, and with various modes

* Prov. chap. viii.

What words are theſe—And did they come from heaven?
And were they ſpoke to man? to guilty man?
What are all myſteries to love like this?
The ſongs of angels, all the melodies
Of choral gods, are waſted in the ſound;
Heal and exhilerate the broken heart;
Though plung'd before in horrors dark as night:
Rich prelibation of conſummate joy!
Nor wait we diſſolution to be bleſt.
This final effort of the moral muſe,
How juſtly * titted? not for me alone:
For all that read; what ſpirit of ſupport,
What heights of conſolation, crown my ſong!
Then, farewell night! of darkneſs, now, no
more!
Joy breaks; ſhines; triumphs; 'tis eternal day.
Shall that which riſes out of nought complain
Of a few evils, paid with endleſs joys?
My ſoul! henceforth, in ſweeteſt union join
The two ſupports of human happineſs,
Which ſome, erroneous, think can never meet;
True taſte of life, and conſtant thought of death!
The thought of death, ſole victor of its dread!
Hope be thy joy; and probity thy ſkill;
Thy patron he, whoſe diadem has dropp'd
Yon gems of heaven; Eternity thy prize:
And leave the racers of the world their own,
Their feather, and their froth, for endleſs toils:
They part with all for that which is not bread;
They mortify, they ſtarve on wealth, fame, power;
And laugh to ſcorn the fools that aim at more.
How muſt a ſpirit, late eſcap'd from earth,
Suppoſe Philander's, Lucia's, or Narciſſa's,
The truth of things new-blazing in its eye,
Look back, aſtoniſh'd, on the ways of men,
Whoſe lives whole drift is to forget their graves!
And when our preſent privilege is paſt,
To ſcourge us with due ſenſe of its abuſe,
The ſame aſtoniſhment will ſeize us all.
What then muſt pain us, would preſerve us now.
Lorenzo! 'tis not yet too late; Lorenzo!
Seize wiſdom ere 'tis torment to be wiſe;
That is, ſeize wiſdom ere ſhe ſeizes thee.
For what, my ſmall philoſopher! is hell?
'Tis nothing but full knowledge of the truth,
When truth reſiſteth long, is ſworn our foe:
And calls Eternity to do her right.
Thus, darkneſs aiding intellectual light,
And ſacred ſilence whiſpering truths divine,
And truths divine converting pain to peace,
My ſong the midnight raven has outwing'd,
And ſhot, ambitious of unbounded ſcenes,
Beyond the flaming limits of the world,
Her gloomy flight. But what avails the flight
Of fancy, when our hearts remain below?
Virtue abounds in flatterers and foes;
'Tis pride to praiſe her; penance to perform.
To more than words, to more than worth of tongue,
Lorenzo! riſe, at this auſpicious hour;
An hour, when heaven's moſt intimate with man;
When, like a falling ſtar, the ray divine

* The Conſolation.

Glides swift into the bosom of the just;
And just are all, determin'd to reclaim;
Which sets that title high within thy reach.
Awake, then: thy Philander calls: awake!
Thou, who shalt wake, when the creation sleeps;
When, like a taper, all these suns expire;
When time, like him of Gaza in his wrath,
Plucking the pillars that support the world,
In nature's ample ruins lies entomb'd;
And midnight, universal midnight! reigns.

RESIGNATION.

IN TWO PARTS.

"My soul shall be satisfied even as if it were with marrow and fatness? when my mouth praiseth "thee with joyful lips." PSALM lxiii. 6.

ADVERTISEMENT.

THIS was not intended for the public, there were many and strong reasons against it; and are so still; but some extracts of it, from the few copies which were given away, being got into the printed papers, it was thought necessary to publish something, lest a copy still more imperfect than this should fall into the press: and it is hoped, that this unwelcome occasion of publication may be some excuse for it.

As for the following stanzas, God Almighty's infinite power, and marvellous goodness to man, is dwelt on, as the most just and cogent reason for our cheerful and absolute resignation to his will; nor are any of those topics declined, which have a just tendency to promote that supreme virtue: such as the vanity of this life, the value of the next, the approach of death, &c.

PART I.

THE days how few, how short the years
Of man's too rapid race,
Each leaving, as it swiftly flies,
A shorter in its place!

They who the longest lease enjoy,
Have told us with a sigh,
That to be born seems little more,
Than to begin to die.

Numbers there are who feel this truth
With fears alarm'd; and yet,
In life's delusions lull'd asleep,
This weighty truth forget:

And am not I to these akin?
Age slumbers o'er the quill;
Its honour blots, whate'er it writes;
And am I writing still?

Conscious of nature in decline,
And languor in my thoughts;
To soften censure, and abate
Its rigour on my faults;

Permit me, Madam! ere to you
The promis'd verse I pay,
To touch on felt infirmity,
Sad sister of decay.

One world deceas'd, another born,
Like Noah they behold,
O'er whose white hairs, and furrow'd brows,
Too many suns have roll'd:

Happy the patriarch! he rejoic'd
His second world to see:
My second world, though gay the scene,
Can boast no charms for me.

To me this brilliant age appears
With desolation spread;
Near all with whom I liv'd, and smil'd,
Whilst life was life, are dead;

And with them dy'd my joys; the grave
Has broken nature's laws;
And clos'd, against this feeble frame,
Its partial cruel jaws;

Cruel to spare! condemn'd to life!
A cloud impairs my sight;
My weak hand disobeys my will,
And trembles as I write.

What shall I write? Thalia, tell;
Say, long abandon'd muse!
What field of fancy shall I range?
What subject shall I choose?

A choice of moment high inspire,
And rescue me from shame,

For doating on thy charms ſo late,
By grandeur in my theme.

Beyond the themes which moſt admire,
Which dazzle, or amaze,
Beyond renown'd exploits of war,
Bright charms, or empire's blaze,

Are themes, which, in a world of woe,
Can beſt appeaſe our pain;
And, in an age of gaudy guilt,
Gay folly's flood reſtrain;

Amidſt the ſtorms of life ſupport
A calm unſhaken mind;
And with unfading laurels crown
The brow of the reſign'd.

O Reſignation! yet unſung,
Untouch'd by former ſtrains;
Though claiming every muſe's ſmile,
And every poet's pains,

Beneath life's evening, ſolemn ſhade,
I dedicate my page
To thee, thou ſafeſt guard of youth!
Thou ſole ſupport of age!

All other duties creſcents are
Of virtue faintly bright,
The glorious conſummation, thou!
Which fills her orb with light:

How rarely fill'd! the love divine
In evils to diſcern,
This the firſt leſſon which we want,
The lateſt which we learn;

A melancholy truth! for know,
Could our proud hearts reſign,
The diſtance greatly would decreaſe
'Twixt human and divine.

But though full noble is my theme,
Full urgent is my call
To ſoften ſorrow, and forbid
The burſting tear to fall;

The taſk I tread; dare I to leave
Of humble proſe the ſhore,
And put to ſea? a dangerous ſea?
What throngs have ſunk before!

How proud the poet's billow ſwells!
The God! the God! his boaſt:
A boaſt how vain! what wrecks abound!
Dead bards ſtench every coaſt.

What then am I? Shall I preſume,
On ſuch a moulten wing,
Above the general wreck to riſe,
And in my winter, ſing;

When nightingales, when ſweeteſt bards
Confine their charming ſong,
To ſummer's animating heats,
Content to warble young?

Yet write I muſt; a * lady ſues,
How ſhameful her requeſt!

My brain in labour for dull rhyme!
Her's teeming with the beſt!

But you a ſtranger will excuſe,
Nor ſcorn his feeble ſtrain;
To you a ſtranger, but through fate,
No ſtranger to your pain.

The ghoſt of grief deceas'd aſcends,
His old wound bleeds anew;
His ſorrows are recall'd to life
By thoſe he ſees in you;

Too well he knows the twiſting ſtrings
Of ardent hearts combin'd,
When rent aſunder, how they bleed,
How hard to be reſign'd:

Thoſe tears you pour, his eyes have ſhed;
The pang you feel, he felt;
Thus nature, loud as virtue, bids
His heart at yours to melt.

But what can heart, or head, ſuggeſt?
What ſad experience ſay?
Through truths auſtere, to peace we work
Our rugged, gloomy way:

What are we? Whence? For what? and Whither?
Who know not, needs muſt mourn;
But thought, bright daughter of the ſkies!
Can tears to triumph turn.

Thought is our armour, 'tis the mind's
Impenetrable ſhield,
When, ſent by fate, we meet our foes,
In ſore affliction's field;

It plucks the frightful maſk from ills,
Forbids pale fear to hide,
Beneath that dark diſguiſe, a friend,
Which turns affection's tide.

Affection frail! train'd up by ſenſe,
From reaſon's channel ſtrays:
And whilſt it blindly points at peace,
Our peace to pain betrays.

Thought winds its fond, erroneous ſtream
From daily-dying flowers,
To nouriſh rich immortal blooms,
In amaranthine bowers;

Whence throngs, in extaſy, look down
On what once ſhock'd their ſight;
And thank the terrors of the paſt
For ages of delight.

All withers here; who moſt poſſeſs
Are loſers by their gain,
Stung by full proof, that, bad at beſt,
Life's idle all is vain:

Vain, in its courſe, life's murmuring ſtream;
Did not its courſe offend,
But murmur ceaſe; life, then, would ſeem
Still vainer, from its end.

How wretched! who, through cruel fate,
Have nothing to lament!
With the poor alms this world affords
Deplorably content!

* Mrs. M——

Had not the Greek his world miſtook,
His wiſh had been moſt wiſe;
To be content with but one world,
Like him we ſhould deſpiſe.

Of earth's revenue would you ſtate
A full account, and fair?
We hope; and hope; and hope; then caſt
The total up——

Deſpair.

Since vain all here, all future, vaſt,
Embrace the lot aſſign'd;
Heaven wounds to heal; its frowns are friends;
Its ſtroke ſevere, moſt kind.

But in laps'd nature, rooted deep,
Blind error domineers;
And on fools errands, in the dark,
Sends out our hopes and fears;

Bids us for ever pains deplore,
Our pleaſures overpriſe;
Theſe oft perſuade us to be weak;
Thoſe urge us to be wiſe.

From virtue's rugged path to right
By pleaſure are we brought
To flowery fields of wrong, and there
Pain chides us for our fault:

Yet whilſt it chides, it ſpeaks of peace,
If folly is withſtood;
And ſays, time pays an eaſy price,
For our eternal good.

In earth's dark cot, and in an hour,
And in deluſion great,
What an economiſt is man
To ſpend his whole eſtate,

And beggar an eternity!
For which as he was born,
More worlds than one againſt it weigh'd,
As feathers he ſhould ſcorn,

Say not, your loſs in triumph leads
Religion's feeble ſtrife;
Joys future amply reimburſe
Joys bankrupts of this life.

But not deferr'd your joy ſo long,
It bears an early date;
Affliction's ready pay in hand,
Befriends our preſent ſtate;

What are the tears, which trickle down
Her melancholy face,
Like liquid pearl? Like pearls of price,
They purchaſe laſting peace.

Grief ſoftens hearts, and curbs the will,
Impetuous paſſion tames,
And keeps inſatiate, keen deſire
From launching in extremes.

Through time's dark womb, our judgment right,
If our dim eye was thrown,
Clear ſhould we ſee, the will divine
Has but foreſtall'd our own;

At variance with our future wiſh,
Self-ſever'd we complain;
If ſo, the wounded, not the wound,
Muſt anſwer for the pain:

The day ſhall come, and ſwift of wing
Though you may think it flow,
When, in the liſt of fortune's ſmiles,
You'll enter frowns of woe.

For mark the path of Providence;
This courſe it has purſued
" Pain is the parent, woe the womb,
" Of ſound important good:"

Our hearts are faſten'd to this world
By ſtrong and endleſs ties:
And every ſorrow cuts a ſtring,
And urges us to riſe:

'Twill ſound ſevere—Yet reſt aſſur'd
I'm ſtudious of your peace;
Though I ſhould dare to give you joy—
Yes, joy of his deceaſe:

An hour ſhall come (you queſtion this)
An hour, when you ſhall bleſs,
Beyond the brighteſt beams of life,
Dark days of your diſtreſs.

Hear then without ſurpriſe a truth,
A daughter-truth to this,
Swift turns of fortune often tie
A bleeding heart to bliſs:

Eſteem you this a paradox?
My ſacred motto read;
A glorious truth! divinely ſung,
By one, whoſe heart had bled;

To Reſignation ſwift he flew,
In her a friend he found,
A friend, which bleſt him with a ſmile
When gaſping with his wound.

On earth nought precious is obtain'd
But what is painful too;
By travel, and to travel born,
Our Sabbaths are but few:

To real joy we work our way,
Encountering many a ſhock,
Ere found what truly charms; as found
A Venus in the block.

In ſome diſaſter, ſome ſevere
Appointment for our ſins,
That mother bleſſing (not ſo call'd),
True happineſs, begins.

No martyr e'er defy'd the flames,
By ſtings of life unvext;
Firſt roſe ſome quarrel with this world,
Then paſſion for the next.

You ſee, then, pangs are parent pangs,
The pangs of happy birth;
Pangs, by which only can be born
True happineſs on earth.

The peopled earth look all around,
Or through time's records run;

And ſay, what is a man unſtruck?
It is a man undone.

This moment, am I deeply ſtung—
My bold pretence is try'd;
When vain man boaſts, Heaven puts to proof
The vauntings of his pride;

Now need I, Madam! your ſupport.—
How exquiſite the ſmart;
How critically tim'd the * news
Which ſtrikes me to the heart!

The pangs of which I ſpoke, I feel:
If worth like thine, is born,
O long-belov'd! I bleſs the blow,
And triumph, whilſt I mourn.

Nor mourn I long; by grief ſubdued
By reaſon's empire ſhown;
Deep anguiſh comes by Heaven's decree,
Continues by our own;

And when continued paſt its point,
Indulg'd in length of time,
Grief is diſgrace, and, what was fate,
Corrupts into a crime:

And ſhall I, criminally mean,
Myſelf and ſubject wrong?
No; my example ſhall ſupport
The ſubject of my ſong.

Madam! I grant your loſs is great;
Nor little is your gain;
Let that be weigh'd; when weigh'd aright,
It richly pays your pain;

When Heaven would kindly ſet us free,
And earth's enchantment end;
It takes the moſt effectual means,
And robs us of a friend.

But ſuch a friend! and ſigh no more?
'Tis prudent; but ſevere:
Heaven aid my weakneſs, and I drop,
All ſorrow—with this tear.

Perhaps your ſettled grief to ſooth,
I ſhould not vainly ſtrive,
But with ſoft balm your pain aſſuage,
Had he been ſtill alive;

Whoſe frequent aid brought kind relief,
In my diſtreſs of thought,
Ting'd with his beams my cloudy page
And beautify'd a fault:

To touch our paſſions, ſecret ſprings
Was his peculiar care;
And deep his happy genius div'd
In boſoms of the fair;

Nature, which favours to the few,
All art beyond, imparts,
To him preſented at his birth,
The key of human hearts.

* Whilſt the Author was writing this, he received the news of Mr. Samuel Richardſon's death, who was then printing the former part of the Poem.

But not to me by him bequeath'd
His gentle, ſmooth addreſs;
His tender hand to touch the wound
In throbbing of diſtreſs;

Howe'er, proceed I muſt, unbleſs'd
With Eſculapian art:
Know, love ſometimes, miſtaken love!
Plays diſaffection's part:

Nor lands, nor ſeas, nor ſuns, nor ſtars,
Can ſoul from ſoul divide
They correſpond from diſtant worlds,
Though tranſports are deny'd:

Are you not, then, unkindly kind?
Is not your love ſevere?
O! ſtop that cryſtal ſource of woe;
Nor wound him with a tear.

As thoſe above from human bliſs
Receive increaſe of joy;
May not a ſtroke from human woe,
In part, their peace deſtroy?

He lives in thoſe he left;—to what?
Your, now, paternal care,
Clear from its cloud your brighten'd eye,
It will diſcern him there;

In features, not of form alone,
But thoſe, I truſt, of mind;
Auſpicious to the public weal,
And to their fate reſign'd.

Think on the tempeſts he ſuſtain'd;
Revolve his battles won;
And let thoſe prophecy your joy
From ſuch a father's ſon:

Is conſolation what you ſeek?
Fan, then, his martial fire;
And animate to flame the ſparks
Bequeath'd him by his ſire:

As nothing great is born in haſte,
Wiſe nature's time allow;
His father's laurels may deſcend,
And flouriſh on his brow.

Nor, Madam! be ſurpris'd to hear
That laurels may be due
Not more to heroes of the field,
(Proud boaſters!) than to you:

Tender as is the female frame,
Like that brave man you mourn,
You are a ſoldier, and to fight
Superior battles born;

Beneath a banner nobler far
Than ever was unfurl'd
In fields of blood; a banner bright!
High wav'd o'er all the world.

It, like a ſtreaming meteor, caſts
An univerſal light;
Sheds day, ſheds more, eternal day
On nations whelm'd in night.

Beneath that banner, what exploit
Can mount our glory higher,

Than to ſuſtain the dreadful blow,
When thoſe we love expire?

Go forth a moral Amazon;
Arm'd with undaunted thought;
The battle won, though coſting dear
You'll think it cheaply bought:

The paſſive hero, who ſits down
Unactive, and can ſmile
Beneath affliction's galling load,
Out acts a Cæſar's toil:

The billows ſtain'd by ſlaughter'd foes
Inferior praiſe afford;
Reaſon's a bloodleſs conqueror,
More glorious than the ſword.

Nor can the thunders of huzzas
From ſhouting nations, cauſe
Such ſweet delight, as from your hear
Soft whiſpers of applauſe:

The dear deceas'd ſo fam'd in arms,
With what delight he'll view
His triumphs on the main outdone,
Thus conquer'd, twice, by you,

Share his delight; take heed to ſhun
Of boſoms moſt diſeas'd
That odd diſtemper, an abſurd
Reluctance to be pleas'd:

Some ſeem in love with ſorrow's charms,
And that foul fiend embrace:
This temper let me juſtly brand,
And ſtamp it with diſgrace:

Sorrow! of horrid parentage!
Thou ſecond-born of hell!
Againſt heaven's endleſs mercies pour'd
How dar'ſt thou to rebel?

From black and noxious vapours bred
And nurs'd by want of thought,
And to the door of frenzy's ſelf
By perſeverance brought,

Thy moſt inglorious, coward tears
From brutal eyes have ran;
Smiles, incommunicable ſmiles!
Are radiant marks of man;

They caſt a ſudden glory round
Th' illumin'd human face;
And light in ſons of honeſt joy
Some beams of Moſes' face:

Is Reſignation's leſſon hard?
Examine, we ſhall find
That duty gives up little more
Than anguiſh of the mind;

Reſign; and all the load of life
That moment you remove,
Its heavy tax, ten thouſand cares
Devolve on one above;

Who bids us lay our burden down
On his Almighty hand,
Softens our duty to relief,
To bleſſing a command.

For joy what cauſe? how every ſenſe
Is courted from above
The year around, with preſents rich,
The growth of endleſs love?

But moſt o'erlook the bleſſings pour'd,
Forget the wonders done,
And terminate, wrapp'd up in ſenſe,
Their proſpect at the ſun;

From that, their final point of view,
From that their radiant goal,
On travel infinite of thought,
Sets out the nobler ſoul,

Broke looſe from time's tenacious ties,
And earth's involving gloom,
To range at laſt its vaſt domain,
And talk with worlds to come:

They let unmark'd, and unemploy'd,
Life's idle moments run;
And, doing nothing for themſelves,
Imagine nothing done;

Fatal miſtake! their fate goes on,
Their dread account proceeds,
And their not-doing is ſet down
Amongſt their darkeſt deeds;

Though man ſits ſtill, and takes his eaſe;
God is at work on man;
No means, no moment unemploy'd,
To bleſs him, if he can.

But man conſents not, boldly bent
To faſhion his own fate;
Man, a mere bungler in the trade,
Repents his crime too late;

Hence loud laments: let me thy cauſe,
Indulgent Father! plead;
Of all the wretches we deplore,
Not one by thee was made.

What is thy whole creation fair?
Of love divine the child;
Love brought it forth; and from its birth,
Has o'er it fondly ſmil'd:

Now, and through periods diſtant far,
Long ere the world began,
Heaven is, and has in travel been,
Its birth the good of man;

Man holds in conſtant ſervice bound
The bluſtering winds and ſeas;
Nor ſuns diſdain to travel hard
Their maſter, man, to pleaſe:

To final good the worſt events
Through ſecret channels run;
Finiſh for man their deſtin'd courſe
As 'twas for man begun.

One point (obſerv'd, perhaps, by few)
Has often ſmote, and ſmites
My mind, as demonſtration ſtrong;
That heaven in man delights:

What's known to man of things unſeen,
Of future worlds, or fates?

So much, nor more, than what to man's Sublime affairs relates;

Weat's Revelation then? a liſt,
An inventory juſt
Of that poor inſect's goods, ſo late
Call'd out of night and duſt.

What various motives to rejoice!
To render joy ſincere,
Has this no weight? our joy is felt
Beyond this narrow ſphere:

Would we in heaven new heaven create,
And double its delight?
A ſmiling world, when heaven looks down,
How pleaſing in its ſight!

Angels ſtoop forward from their thrones
To hear its joyful lays;
As incenſe ſweet enjoy, and join,
Its aromatic praiſe:

Have we no cauſe to fear the ſtroke
Of heaven's avenging rod?
When we preſume to counteract
A ſympathetic God?

If we reſign, our patience makes
His rod an armleſs wand;
If not, it darts a ſerpent's ſting,
Like that in Moſes' hand;

Like that, it ſwallows up whate'er
Earth's vain magicians bring,
Whoſe baffled arts would boaſt below
Of joys a rival ſpring.

Conſummate love! the liſt how large
Of bleſſings from thy hand!
To baniſh ſorrow, and be bleſt,
Is thy ſupreme command.

Are ſuch commands but ill obey'd?
Of bliſs, ſhall we complain?
The man, who dares to be a wretch,
Deſerves ſtill greater pain,

Joy is our duty, glory, health;
The ſunſhine of the ſoul;
Our beſt encomium on the power
Who ſweetly plans the whole:

Joy is our Eden ſtill poſſeſs'd:
Be gone, ignoble grief!
'Tis joy makes gods, and men exalts,
Their nature, our relief;

Relief, for man to that muſt ſtoop,
And his due diſtance know;
Tranſport's the language of the ſkies,
Content the ſtyle below.

Content is joy, and joy in pain
Is joy and virtue too;
Thus, whilſt good preſent we poſſeſs
More precious we purſue:

Of joy the more we have in hand,
The more have we to come;
Joy, like our money, intereſt bears,
Which daily ſwells the ſum.

"But how to ſmile; to ſtem the tide
"Of nature in our veins;
"Is it not hard to weep in joy?
"What then to ſmile in pains?"

Victorious joy! which breaks the clouds,
And ſtruggles through a ſtorm;
Proclaims the mind as great, as good;
And bids it doubly charm:

If doubly charming in our ſex,
A ſex, by nature, bold;
What then in yours? 'tis diamond there,
Triumphant o'er our gold.

And ſhould not this complaint repreſs?
And check the riſing ſigh?
Yet farther opiate to your pain
I labour to ſupply.

Since ſpirits greatly damp'd diſtort
Ideas of delight,
Look through the medium of a friend,
To ſet your notions right:

As tears the ſight, grief dims the ſoul;
Its object dark appears;
True friendſhip, like a riſing ſun,
The ſoul's horizon clears.

A friend's an optic to the mind
With ſorrow clouded o'er;
And gives it ſtrength of ſight to ſee
Redreſs unſeen before.

Reaſon is ſomewhat rough in man;
Extremely ſmooth and fair,
When ſhe, to grace her manly ſtrength,
Aſſumes a female air:

A * friend you have, and I the ſame,
Whoſe prudent, ſoft addreſs
Will bring to life thoſe healing thoughts
Which dy'd in your diſtreſs;

That friend, the ſpirit of my theme
Extracting for your eaſe,
Will leave to me the dreg, in thoughts
Too common; ſuch as theſe;

Let thoſe lament, to whom full bowls
Of ſparkling joys are given;
That triple bane inebriates life,
Imbitters death, and hazards heaven:

Woe to the ſoul at perfect eaſe!
'Tis brewing perfect pains;
Lull'd reaſon ſleeps, the pulſe is king;
Deſpotic body reigns:

Have you † ne'er pity'd joys gay ſcenes,
And deem'd their glory dark?
Alas! poor envy! ſhe's ſtone-blind,
And quite miſtakes her mark:

Her mark lies hid in ſorrow's ſhades,
But ſorrow well ſubdued;

* Mrs. Montague. † Ibid.

And in proud fortune's frown defy'd
By meek, unborrow'd good.

By Reſignation; all in that
A double friend may find,
A wing to heaven, and, while on earth,
The pillow of mankind:

On pillows void of down, for reſt
Our reſtleſs hopes we place,
When hopes of heaven lie warm at heart,
Our hearts repoſe in peace:

The peace, which Reſignation yields,
Who feel alone can gueſs;
'Tis diſbeliev'd by murmuring minds,
They muſt conclude it leſs:

The loſs, or gain, of that alone
Have we to hope, or fear;
That fate controls, and can invert
The ſeaſons of the year:

O! the dark days, the year around,
Of an impatient mind?
Through clouds, and ſtorms, a ſummer breaks,
To ſhine on the reſign'd:

While man by that of every grace,
And virtue, is poſſeſs'd;
Foul vice her pandæmonium builds
In the rebellious breaſt;

By Reſignation we defeat
The worſt that can annoy;
And ſuffer, with far more repoſe,
Than worldlings can enjoy.

From ſmall experience this I ſpeak;
O! grant to thoſe I love
Experience fuller far, ye Powers
Who form our fates above!

My love where due, if not to thoſe
Who, leaving grandeur, came
To ſhine on age in mean receſs,
And light me to my theme!

A theme themſelves! A theme, how rare!
The charms which they diſplay,
To triumph over captive heads,
Are ſet in bright array:

With his own arms proud man's o'ercome,
His boaſted laurels die:
Learning and genius, wiſer grown,
To female boſoms fly.

This revolution, fix'd by fate,
In fable was foretold;
The dark prediction puzzled wits,
Nor could the learn'd unfold:

But as thoſe * ladies works I read,
They darted ſuch a ray,
The latent ſenſe burſt out at once,
And ſhone in open day:

So burſt, full ripe, diſtended fruits,
When ſtrongly ſtrikes the ſun;

And from the purple grape unpreſs'd
Spontaneous nectars run.

Pallas ('tis ſaid), when Jove grew dull,
Forſook his drowſy brain;
And ſprightly leap'd into the throne
Of wiſdom's brighter reign;

Her helmet took; that is, ſhot rays
Of formidable wit;
And launce—or genius moſt acute,
Which lines immortal writ;

And gorgon ſhield—or power to fright
Man's folly, dreadful ſhone,
And many a blockhead (eaſy change!)
Turn'd inſtantly to ſtone.

Our authors male, as then did Jove,
Now ſcratch a damag'd head,
And call for what once quarter'd there,
But find the goddeſs fled.

The fruit of knowledge, golden fruit!
That once forbidden tree,
Hedg'd-in by ſurly man, is now
To Britain's daughters free:

In Eve (we know) of fruit ſo fair
The noble thirſt began;
And they, like her, have caus'd a fall,
A fall of fame in man:

And ſince of genius in our ſex,
O Addiſon! with thee
The ſun is ſet; how I rejoice
This ſiſter lamp to ſee!

It ſheds, like Cynthia, ſilver beams
On man's nocturnal ſtate;
His leſſen'd light, and languid powers,
I ſhow, whilſt I relate.

PART II.

But what in either ſex, beyond
All parts, our glory crowns!
"In ruffling ſeaſons to be calm,
"And ſmile, when fortune frowns."

Heaven's choice is ſafer than our own;
Of ages paſt inquire,
What the moſt formidable fate?
"To have our own deſire."

If, in your wrath, the worſt of foes
You wiſh extremely ill,
Expoſe him to the thunder's ſtroke,
Or that of his own will.

What numbers, ruſhing down the ſteep
Of inclination ſtrong,
Have periſh'd in their ardent wiſh!
Wiſh ardent, ever wrong!

'Tis Reſignation's full reverſe,
Moſt wrong, as it implies
Error moſt fatal in our choice,
Detachment from the ſkies.

By cloſing with the ſkies, we make
Omnipotence our own;

* Mrs. Montague. Mrs. Carter.

That done, how formidable ill's
Whole army is o'erthrown?

No longer impotent and frail,
Ourſelves above we riſe;
We ſcarce believe ourſelves below!
We treſpaſs on the ſkies!

The Lord, the ſoul, and ſource of all,
Whilſt man enjoys his eaſe,
Is executing human will,
In earth, and air, and ſeas;

Beyond us, what can angels boaſt?
Archangels what require?
Whate'er below, above, is done,
Is done as——we deſire.

What glory this for man ſo mean,
Whoſe life is but a ſpan?
This is meridian majeſty!
This the ſublime of man!

Beyond the boaſt of Pagan ſong
My ſacred ſubject ſhines!
And for a foil the luſtre takes
Of Rome's exalted lines.

"All that the ſun ſurveys ſubdued,
"But Cato's mighty mind."
How grand! moſt true; yet far beneath
The ſoul of the reſign'd:

To more than kingdoms, more than worlds,
To paſſion that gives law;
Its matchleſs empire could have kept
Great Cato's pride in awe;

That fatal pride, whoſe cruel point
Transfix'd his noble breaſt;
Far nobler! if his fate ſuſtain'd
Had left to heaven the reſt;

Then he the palm had borne away,
At diſtance Cæſar thrown;
Put him off cheaply with the world,
And made the ſkies his own.

What cannot Reſignation do?
It wonders can perform;
That powerful charm, "Thy will be done,"
Can lay the loudeſt ſtorm.

Come, Reſignation! then from fields,
Where mounted on the wing,
A wing of flame, bleſs martyr's ſouls
Aſcended to their King:

Who is it calls thee? one whoſe need
Tranſcends the common ſize;
Who ſtands in front againſt a foe
To which none equal riſe:

In front he ſtands, the brink he treads
Of an eternal ſtate;
How dreadful his appointed poſt!
How ſtrongly arm'd by fate:

His threatening foe! what ſhadows deep
O'erwhelm his gloomy brow!
His dart tremendous!——at fourſcore
My ſole aſylum thou!

Haſte then, O Reſignation! haſte,
'Tis thine to reconcile
My foe and me; at thy approach,
My foe begins to ſmile:

O! for that ſummit of my wiſh,
Whilſt here I draw my breath,
That promiſe of eternal life,
A glorious ſmile in death:

What ſight, heaven's azure arch beneath,
Haſt moſt of heaven to boaſt?
The man reſign'd; at once ſerene,
And giving up the ghoſt.

At death's arrival they ſhall ſmile,
Who not in life o'er gay,
Serious and frequent thought ſend out
To meet him on his way:

My gay coevals! (ſuch there are)
If happineſs is dear;
Approaching death's alarming day
Diſcreetly let us fear:

The fear of death is truly wiſe,
Till wiſdom can riſe higher;
And, arm'd with pious fortitude,
Death dreaded once, deſire:

Grand climacteric vanities
The vaineſt will deſpiſe;
Shock'd when beneath the ſnow of age,
Man immaturely dies:

But am not I myſelf the man?
No need abroad to roam
In queſt of faults to be chaſtis'd;
What cauſe to bluſh at home?

In life's decline, when men relapſe
Into the ſports of youth,
The ſecond child out-fools the firſt,
And tempts the laſh of truth;

Shall a mere truant from the grave
With rival boys engage?
His trembling voice attempt to ſing,
And ape the poet's rage?

Here, Madam! let me viſit one,
My fault who partly ſhares,
And tell myſelf, by telling him,
What more becomes our years;

And if your breaſt with prudent zeal
For Reſignation glows,
You will not diſapprove a juſt
Reſentment at its foes.

In youth, Voltaire! our foibles plead
For ſome indulgence due;
When heads are white, their thoughts and aims
Should change their colour too:

How are you cheated by your wit!
Old age is bound to pay,
By nature's law, a mind diſcreet,
For joys it takes away;

A mighty change is wrought by years,
Reverſing human lot;
In age 'tis honour to lie hid,
'Tis praiſe to be forgot;

The wiſe, as flowers, which ſpread at noon,
And all their charms expoſe,
When evening damps, and ſhades deſcend,
Their evolutions cloſe.

What though your muſe has nobly ſoar'd,
Is that our true ſublime?
Ours, hoary friend! is to preſer
Eternity to time:

Why cloſe a life ſo juſtly fam'd
With ſuch bold traſh as * this?
This for renown? yes ſuch as makes
Obſcurity a bliſs:

Your traſh with mine at open war
Is † obſtinately bent,
Like wits below, to ſow your tares
Of gloom and diſcontent:

With ſo much ſunſhine at command,
Why light with darkneſs mix?
Why daſh with pain our pleaſure? why
Your Helicon with Styx?

Your works in our divided minds
Repugnant paſſions raiſe,
Confound us with a double ſtroke,
We ſhudder whilſt we praiſe;

A curious web, as finely wrought
As genius can inſpire,
From a black bag of poiſon ſpun,
With horror we admire.

Mean as it is, if this is read
With a diſdainful air,
I can't forgive ſo great a foe
To my dear friend Voltaire:

Early I knew him, early prais'd,
And long to praiſe him late;
His genius greatly I admire,
Nor would deplore his fate;

A fate how much to be deplor'd!
At which our nature ſtarts;
Forbear to fall on your own ſword,
To periſh by your parts;

"But grant your name"—to feed on air,
Were then immortals born?
Nothing is great, of which more great,
More glorious is the ſcorn.

Can fame your carcaſe from the worm
Which gnaws us in the grave,
Or ſoul from that which never dies,
Applauding Europe ſave?

But fame you loſe; good ſenſe alone
Your idol, praiſe can claim;
When wild wit murders happineſs,
It puts to death our fame!

Nor boaſt your genius, talents bright,
Ev'n dunces will deſpiſe,
If in your weſtern beams is miſs'd
A genius for the ſkies;

Your taſte too fails; what moſt excels
True taſte muſt reliſh moſt!
And what, to rival palms above,
Can proudeſt laurels boaſt?

Sound heads ſalvation's * helmet ſeek,
Reſplendent are its rays,
Let that ſuffice; it needs no plume
Of ſublunary praiſe.

May this enable couch'd Voltaire
To ſee that—† "All is right,"
His eye, by flaſh of wit ſtruck blind,
Reſtoring to its ſight;

If ſo, all's well: who much have err'd,
That much have been forgiven;
I ſpeak with joy, with joy he'll hear,
"Voltaires are now in heaven."

Nay, ſuch philanthrophy divine,
So boundleſs in degree,
Its marvellous of love extends
(Stoop moſt profound!) to me:

Let others cruel ſtars arraign,
Or dwell on their diſtreſs;
But let my page, for mercies pour'd,
A grateful heart expreſs:

Walking, the preſent God was ſeen,
Of old, in Eden fair;
The God as preſent, by plain ſteps
Of providential care,

I behold paſſing through my life;
His awful voice I hear;
And, conſcious of my nakedneſs,
Would hide myſelf for fear:

But where the trees, or where the clouds,
Can cover from his ſight?
Naked the centre to that eye,
To which the ſun is night.

As yonder glittering lamps on high
Through night illumin'd roll;
May thoughts of him, by whom they ſhine,
Chaſe darkneſs from my ſoul.

My ſoul which reads his hand as clear
In my minute affairs,
As in his ample manuſcript
Of ſun, and moon, and ſtars;

And knows him not more bent aright
To wield that vaſt machine,
Than to correct one erring thought
In my ſmall world within;

A world that ſhall ſurvive the fall
Of all his wonders here;

Candide. † Second part.

* Epheſ. vi. 17.
† Which his romance ridicules.

Survive, when ſuns ten thouſand drop,
And leave a darken'd ſphere.

Yon matter groſs, how bright it ſhines!
For time how great his care!
Sure ſpirit and eternity
Far richer glories ſhare;

Let thoſe our hearts impreſs, on thoſe
Our contemplation dwell;
On thoſe my thoughts how juſtly thrown,
By what I now ſhall tell:

When backward with attentive mind
Life's labyrinth I trace,
I find him far myſelf beyond
Propitious to my peace:

Through all the crooked paths I trod
My folly he purſued;
My heart aſtray to quick return
Importunately woo'd.

Due reſignation home to preſs
On my capricious will,
How many reſcues did I meet,
Beneath the maſk of ill!

How many foes in ambuſh laid
Beneath my ſoul's deſire!
The deepeſt penitents are made
By what we moſt admire.

Have I not ſometimes (real good
So little mortals know!)
Mounting the ſummit of my wiſh,
Profoundly plung'd in woe?

I rarely plann'd, but cauſe I found
My plan's defeat to bleſs:
Oft I lamented an event,
It turn'd to my ſucceſs.

By ſharpen'd appetite to give
To good intenſe delight,
Through dark and deep perplexities
He led me to the right.

And is not this the gloomy path,
Which you are treading now?
The path moſt gloomy leads to light,
When our proud paſſions bow:

When labouring under fancy'd ill,
My ſpirits to ſuſtain,
He kindly cur'd with ſovereign draughts
Of unimagin'd pain.

Pain'd ſenſe from fancy'd tyranny
Alone can ſet us free;
A thouſand miſeries we feel,
Till ſunk in miſery.

Cloy'd with a glut of all we wiſh,
Our wiſh we reliſh leſs;
Succeſs, a ſort of ſuicide,
Is ruin'd by ſucceſs:

Sometimes he led me near to death,
And, pointing to the grave,
Bid terror whiſper kind advice;
And taught the tomb to ſave:

To raiſe my thoughts beyond where worlds
As ſpangles o'er us ſhine,
One day he gave, and bid the next
My ſoul's delight reſign.

We to ourſelves, but through the means
Of mirrors, are unknown;
In this my fate can you deſcry
No features of your own?

And if you can, let that excuſe
Theſe ſelf recording lines;
A record, modeſty forbids,
Or to ſmall bound confines:

In grief why deep ingulf'd? You ſee
You ſuffer nothing rare;
Uncommon grief for common fate!
That wiſdom cannot bear.

When ſtreams flow backward to their ſource,
And humbled flames deſcend,
And mountains wing'd ſhall fly aloft,
Then human ſorrows end.

But human prudence too muſt ceaſe,
When ſorrows domineer,
When fortitude has loſt its fire,
And freezes into fear:

The pang moſt poignant of my life
Now heightens my delight;
I ſee a fair creation riſe
From chaos, and old night.

From what ſeem'd horror, and deſpair,
The richeſt harveſt roſe;
And gave me in the nod divine
An abſolute repoſe.

Of all the plunders of mankind,
More groſs, or frequent, none,
Than in their grief and joy miſplac'd,
Eternally are ſhown.

But whither points all this parade?
It ſays, that near you lies
A book, perhaps, yet unperus'd,
Which you ſhould greatly prize:

Of ſelf-peruſal, ſcience rare!
Few know the mighty gain;
Learn'd prelates, ſelf-unread, may read
Their Bibles o'er in vain:

Self-knowledge, which from heaven itſelf
(So ſages tell us) came,
What is it but a daughter fair
Of my maternal theme?

Unletter'd, and untravell'd men
An oracle might find,
Would they conſult their own contents,
The Delphos of the mind.

Enter your boſom; there you'll meet
A revelation new,
A revelation perſonal;
Which none can read but you.

There will you clearly read reveal'd
In your enlighten'd thought,

By mercies manifold, through life,
To freſh remembrance brought,

A mighty Being! and in him
A complicated friend,
A father, brother, ſpouſe; no dread
Of death, divorce, or end:

Who ſuch a matchleſs friend embrace,
And lodge him in their heart,
Full well, from agonies exempt,
With other friends may part:

As when o'erloaded branches bear
Large cluſters big with wine,
We ſcarce regret one falling leaf
From the luxuriant vine.

My ſhort advice to you may ſound
Obſcure or ſomewhat odd,
Though 'tis the beſt that man can give,—
"Ev'n be content with God."

Through love he gave you the deceas'd,
Through greater took him hence;
This reaſon fully could evince,
Though murmur'd at by ſenſe.

This friend, far paſt the kindeſt kind,
Is paſt the greateſt great;
His greatneſs let me touch in points
Not foreign to your ſtate.

His eye, this inſtant, reads your heart;
A truth leſs obvious hear;
This inſtant its moſt ſecret thoughts
Are ſounding in his ear:

Diſpute you this? O! ſtand in awe,
And ceaſe your ſorrow; know,
That tears now trickling down, he ſaw
Ten thouſand years ago.

And twice ten thouſand hence, if you
Your temper reconcile
To reaſon's bound, will he behold
Your prudence with a ſmile.

A ſmile, which through eternity
Diffuſes ſo bright rays,
The dimmeſt deifies e'en guilt,
If guilt at laſt obeys.

Your guilt (for guilt it is to mourn,
When ſuch a ſovereign reigns)
Your guilt diminiſh; peace purſue;
How glorious peace in pains!

Here, then, your ſorrows ceaſe; if not,
Think how unhappy they,
Who guilt increaſe by ſtreaming tears,
Which guilt ſhould waſh away;

Of tears that guſh profuſe reſtrain;
Whence burſt thoſe diſmal ſighs?
They from the throbbing breaſt of one
(Strange truth.) moſt happy riſe.

Not angels (hear it, and exult!)
Enjoy a larger ſhare
Than is indulg'd to you, and yours,
Of God's impartial care.

Anxious for each, as if on each
His care for all was thrown;
For all his care as abſolute,
As all had been but one.

And is he then ſo near! ſo kind!—
How little then and great,
That riddle, man! O! let me gaze
At wonders in his fate.

His fate, who yeſterday did crawl
A worm from darkneſs deep,
And ſhall, with brother worms, beneath
A turf, to-morrow ſleep.

How mean!—And yet, if well obey'd
His mighty Maſter's call,
The whole creation for mean man
Is deem'd a boon too ſmall:

Too ſmall the whole creation deem'd
For emmets in the duſt!
Account amazing! yet moſt true;
My ſong is bold, yet juſt.

Man born for infinite, in whom
Nor period can deſtroy
The power, in exquiſite extremes,
To ſuffer, or enjoy.

Give him earth's empire (if no more)
He's beggar'd and undone!
Impriſon'd in unbounded ſpace!
Benighted by the ſun!

For what the ſun's meridian blaze
To the moſt feeble ray
Which glimmers from the diſtant dawn
Of uncreated day?

'Tis not the poet's rapture feign'd
Swells here the vain to pleaſe;
The mind moſt ſober kindles moſt
At truths ſublime as theſe;

They warm e'en me.—I dare not ſay,
Divine ambition ſtrove
Not to bleſs only, but confound,
Nay, fright us with its love.

And yet ſo frightful what, or kind,
As that the rending rock,
The darken'd ſun, and riſing dead,
So formidable ſpoke?

And are we darker than that ſun?
Than rocks more hard and blind?
We are;—if not to ſuch a God
In agonies reſign'd.

Yes, e'en in agonies forbear
To doubt Almighty love;
Whate'er endears eternity,
Is mercy from above;

What moſt embitters time, that moſt
Eternity endears,
And thus, by plunging in diſtreſs,
Exalts us to the ſpheres.

Joy's fountain head! where bliſs o'er bliſs,
O'er wonders wonders riſe,

And an Omnipotence prepares
Its banquet for the wiſe.

Ambroſial banquet! rich in wines
Nectareous to the ſoul!
What tranſports ſparkle from the ſtream,
As angels fill the bowl!

Fountain profuſe of every bliſs!
Good-will immenſe prevails;
Man's line can't fathom its profound;
An angel's plummet fails.

Thy love and might, by what they know,
Who judge, nor dream of more;
They aſk a drop, how deep the ſea!
One ſand, how wide the ſhore?

Of thy exuberant good-will,
Offended Deity!
The thouſandth part who comprehends,
A deity is he.

How yonder ample azure field
With radiant worlds is ſown!
How tubes aſtoniſh us with thoſe
More deep in ether thrown!

And thoſe beyond of brighter worlds
Why not a million more?—
In lieu of anſwer, let us all
Fall proſtrate, and adore.

Since thou art infinite in power,
Nor thy indulgence leſs;
Since man, quite impotent and blind,
Oft drops into diſtreſs;

Say, what is Reſignation? 'Tis
Man's weakneſs underſtood;
And wiſdom graſping, with an hand
Far ſtronger, every good.

Let raſh repiners ſtand appall'd,
In thee who dare not truſt;
Whoſe abject ſouls, like demons dark,
Are murmuring in the duſt;

For man to murmur, or repine
At what by thee is done,
No leſs abſurd, than to complain
Of darkneſs in the ſun.

Who would not, with an heart at eaſe,
Bright eye, unclouded brow,
Wiſdom and goodneſs at the helm,
The roughеſt ocean plough?

What, though I'm ſwallow'd in the deep?
Though mountains o'er me roar?
Jehovah reigns! as Jonah ſafe,
I'm landed, and adore:

Thy will is welcome, let it wear
Its moſt tremendous form;
Roar, waves; rage, winds! I know, that thou
Canſt ſave me by a ſtorm.

From thee immortal ſpirits born,
To thee, their fountain, flow.
If wiſe; as curl'd around to theirs
Meandering ſtreams below:

Nor leſs compell'd by reaſon's call,
To thee our ſouls aſpire,
Than to thy ſkies, by nature's law,
High mounts material fire;

To thee aſpiring they exult,
I feel my ſpirits riſe,
I feel myſelf thy ſon, and pant
For patrimonial ſkies;

Since ardent thirſt of future good,
And generous ſenſe of paſt,
To thee man's prudence ſtrongly ties,
And binds affection faſt;

Since great thy love, and great our want,
And men the wiſeſt blind,
And bliſs our aim; pronounce us all
Diſtracted, or reſign'd;

Reſign'd through duty, intereſt, ſhame;
Deep ſhame! dare I complain,
When (wondrous truth!) in heaven itſelf
Joy ow'd its birth to pain?

And pain for me! for me was drain'd
Gall's overflowing bowl;
And ſhall one drop to murmur bold
Provoke my guilty ſoul?

If pardon'd this, what cauſe, what crime
Can indignation raiſe?
The ſun was lighted up to ſhine,
And man was born to praiſe;

And when to praiſe the man ſhall ceaſe,
Or ſun to ſtrike the view;
A cloud diſhonours both; but man's
The blacker of the two:

For oh! Ingratitude how black!
With moſt profound amaze
At love, which man below'd o'erlooks,
Aſtoniſh'd angels gaze.

Praiſe cheers, and warms, like generous wine;
Praiſe, more divine than prayer;
Prayer points our ready path to heaven;
Praiſe is already there.

Let plauſive Reſignation riſe,
And baniſh all complaint;
All virtues thronging into one,
It finiſhes the ſaint;

Makes the man bleſs'd, as man can be;
Life's labours renders light;
Darts beams through fate's incumbent gloom,
And lights our ſun by night;

'Tis nature's brighteſt ornament,
The richeſt gift of grace,
Rival of angels, and ſupreme
Proprietor of peace;

Nay, peace beyond, no ſmall degree
Of rapture 't will impart;
Know, Madam! when your heart's in heaven,
"All heaven is in your heart."

But who to heaven their hearts can raiſe?
Deny'd divine ſupport,

All virtue dies; support divine
The wise with ardour court:

When prayer partakes the seraph's fire,
'Tis mounted on his wing,
Bursts through heaven's crystal gates, and gains
Sure audience of its king;

The labouring soul from sore distress
That blest'd expedient frees;
I see you far advanc'd in peace;
I see you on your knees:

How on that posture has the beam
Divine for ever shone!
An humble heart, God's * other seat!
The rival of his throne:

And stoops Omnipotence so low!
And condescends to dwell,
Eternity's inhabitant,
Well pleas'd, in such a cell?

Such honour how shall we repay?
How treat a guest divine?
The sacrifice supreme be slain!
Let self-will die: Resign.

Thus far, at large, on our disease;
Now let the cause be shown,
Whence rises, and will ever rise,
The dismal human groan:

What our sole fountain of distress?
Strong passion for this scene;
That trifles make important, things
Of mighty moment mean:

When earth's dark maxims poison shed
On our polluted souls,
Our hearts and interests fly as far
Asunder, as the poles;

Like princes in a cottage nurs'd,
Unknown their royal race,
With abject aims, and sordid joys,
Our grandeur we disgrace;

O! for an Archimedes new,
Of moral powers possess'd,
The world to move, and quite expel
That traitor from the breast.

No small advantage may be reap'd
From thought whence we descend;
From weighing well, and prizing weigh'd
Our origin, and end:

From far above the glorious sun
To this dim scene we came;
And may if wise, for ever bask,
In great Jehovah's beam:

Let that bright beam on reason rous'd
In awful lustre rise,
Earth's giant-ills are dwarf'd at once,
And all disquiet dies.

Earth's glories too their splendour lose,
Those phantoms charm no more;

* Isaiah lvii. 15.

Empire's a feather for a fool,
And Indian mines are poor;

Then levell'd quite, whilst yet alive,
The monarch and his slave;
Not wait enlighten'd minds to learn
That lesson from the grave:

A George the Third would then be low
As Lewis in renown,
Could he not boast of glory more
Than sparkles from a crown.

When human glory rises high
As human glory can;
When, though the king is truly great,
Still greater is the man;

The man is dead, where virtue fails;
And though the monarch proud
In grandeur shines, his gorgeous robe
Is but a gaudy shroud.

Wisdom! where art thou? None on earth,
Though grasping wealth, fame, power,
But what, O death! through thy approach,
Is wiser every hour;

Approach how swift, how unconfin'd!
Worms feast on viands rare,
Those little epicures have kings
To grace their bill of fare:

From kings what Resignation due
To that Almighty will,
Which thrones bestows, and, when they fail,
Can throne them higher still?

Who truly great? The good and brave,
The masters of a mind
The will divine to do resolv'd,
To suffer it resign'd.

Madam! if that may give it weight,
The trifle you receive
Is dated from a solemn scene,
The border of the grave;

Where strongly strikes the trembling soul
Eternity's dread power,
As bursting on it through the thin
Partition of an hour;

Hear this, Voltaire! but this from me,
Runs hazard of your frown;
However, spare it; ere you die
Such thoughts will be your own.

In mercy to yourself forbear
My notions to chastise,
Lest unawares the gay Voltaire
Should blame Voltaire the wise:

Fame's trumpet rattling in your ear,
Now, makes us disagree;
When a far louder trumpet sounds,
Voltaire will close with me:

How shocking is that modesty,
Which keeps some honest men,
From urging what their hearts suggest,
When brav'd by folly's pen

Assaulting truths, of which in all
Is sown the sacred seed!
Our constitution's orthodox,
And closes with our creed:

What then are they, whose proud conceits
Superior wisdom boast?
Wretches, who fight their own belief,
And labour to be lost!

Though vice, by no superior joys
Her heroes keeps in pay;
Through pure disinterested love
Of ruin they obey!

Strict their devotion to the wrong,
Though tempted by no prize;
Hard their commandments, and their creed
A magazine of lies

From fancy's forge: gay fancy smiles
At reason plain, and cool;
Fancy, whose curious trade it is
To make the finest fool.

Voltaire! long life's the greatest curse
That mortal's can receive,
When they imagine the chief end
Of living is to live;

Quite thoughtless of their day of death,
That birth-day of their sorrow!
Knowing, it may be distant far,
Nor crush them till—to-morrow.

These are cold, northern thoughts, conceiv'd
Beneath an humble cot;
Not mine, your genius, or your state,
No * castle is my lot:

But soon, quite level shall we lie;
And, what pride most bemoans,
Our parts, in rank so distant now,
As level as our bones;

Hear you that sound? Alarming sound?
Prepare to meet your fate!
One, who writes Finis to our works,
Is knocking at the gate;

Far other works will soon be weigh'd;
Far other judges sit;
Far other crowns be lost or won,
Than fire ambitious wit:

Their wit far brightest will be prov'd,
Who sunk it in good sense;
And veneration most profound
Of dread Omnipotence.

'Tis that alone unlocks the gate
Of blest eternity;
O! may'st thou never, never lose
That more than † golden key!

Whate'er may seem too rough excuse,
Your good I have at heart:
Since from my soul I wish you well;
As yet we must not part:

Shall you, and I, in love with life,
Life's future schemes contrive,
The world in wonder not unjust,
That we are still alive?

What have we left? How mean in man
A shadow's shade to crave!
When life, so vain! is vainer still,
'Tis time to take your leave:

Happier, than happiest life, is death,
Who falling in the field
Of conflict with his rebel will,
Writes Vici, on his shield;

So falling man, immortal heir
Of an eternal prize;
Undaunted at the gloomy grave,
Descends into the skies.

O! how disorder'd our machine,
When contradictions mix!
When nature strikes no less than twelve,
And folly points at six!

To mend the moments of your heart,
How great is my delight
Gently to wind your morals up,
And set your hand aright!

That hand which spread your wisdom wide
To poison distant lands:
Repent, recant; the tainted age
Your antidote demands.

To Satan dreadfully resign'd,
Whole herds rush down the steep
Of folly, by lewd wits possess'd,
And perish in the deep.

Men's praise your vanity pursues;
'Tis well, pursue it still;
But let it be of men deceas'd,
And you'll resign the will.

And how superior they to those
At whose applause you aim;
How very far superior they
In number and in name!

POSTSCRIPT.

Thus have I written, when to write
No mortal should presume;
Or only write, what none can blame,
Hic jacet—for his tomb.

The public frowns, and censures loud
My puerile employ;
Though just the censure, if you smile,
The scandal I enjoy;

But sing no more—no more I sing
Or reassume the lyre,
Unless vouchsaf'd an humble part
Where Raphael leads the choir.

What myriads swell the concert loud!
Their golden harps resound
High as the footstool of the throne,
And deep as hell profound;

---

* Letter to Lord Lyttelton.
† Alluding to Prussia.

Hell (horrid contraſt!) chord and ſong
Of raptur'd angels drowns
In ſelf-will's peal of blaſphemies,
And hideous burſt of groans;

But drowns them not to me; I hear
Harmonious thunders roll
(In language low of men to ſpeak)
From echoing pole to pole!

Whilſt this grand chorus ſhakes the ſkies---
"Above, beneath the ſun,
"Through boundleſs age, by men, by gods,
"Jehovah's will be done."

'Tis done in heaven; whence headlong hurl'd
Self-will with Satan fell;
And muſt from earth be baniſh'd too,
Or earth's another hell.

Madam! ſelf-will inflicts your pains;
Self-will's the deadly foe
Which deepens all the diſmal ſhades,
And points the ſhafts of woe.

Your debt to nature fully paid,
Now virtue claims her due:
But virtue's cauſe I need not plead,
'Tis ſafe; I write to you.

You know that virtue's baſis lies
In ever judging right,
And wiping error's clouds away,
Which dim the mental ſight.

Why mourn the dead? you wrong the grave,
From ſtorm that ſafe reſort;
We are ſtill toſſing out at ſea,
Our admiral in port.

Was death deny'd, this world a ſcene
How diſmal and forlorn!
To death we owe that 'tis to man
A bleſſing to be born;

When every other bleſſing fails,
Or ſapp'd by ſlow decay,
Or, ſtorm'd by ſudden blaſts of fate,
Is ſwiftly whirl'd away;

How happy! that no ſtorm or time
Of death can rob the juſt!
None pluck from their unaching heads
Soft pillows in the duſt!

Well pleas'd to bear heaven's darkeſt frown,
Your utmoſt power employ;
'Tis noble chemiſtry to turn
Neceſſity to joy.

Whate'er the colour of my fate,
My fate ſhall be my choice:
Determin'd am I, whilſt I breathe,
To praiſe and to rejoice.

What ample cauſe! triumphant hope!
O rich eternity!
I ſtart not at a world in flames,
Charm'd with one glimpſe of thee.

And thou! its great inhabitant!
How glorious doſt thou ſhine!
And dart through ſorrow, danger, death,
A beam of joy divine!

The void of joy (with ſome concern
The truth ſevere I tell)
Is an impenitent in guilt,
A fool or infidel.

Weigh this, ye pupils of Voltaire!
From joyleſs murmur free;
Or let us know which character
Shall crown you of the three.

Reſign, reſign; this leſſon none
Too deeply can inſtil;
A crown has been reſign'd by more
Than have reſign'd the will.

Though will reſign'd the meaneſt makes
Superior in renown,
And richer in celeſtial eyes
Than he who wears a crown.

Hence, in the boſom cold of age,
It kindled a ſtrange aim
To ſhine in ſong, and bid me boaſt
The grandeur of my theme.

But oh! how far preſumption falls
Its lofty theme below!
Our thoughts in life's December freeze,
And numbers ceaſe to flow.

Firſt! greateſt! beſt! grant what I wrote
For others ne'er may riſe
To brand the writer; thou alone
Canſt make our wiſdom wiſe.

And how unwiſe! how deep in guilt!
How infamous the fault!
"A teacher thron'd in pomp of words,
"Indeed beneath the taught!"

Means moſt infallible to make
The world an infidel;
And, with inſtructions moſt divine,
To pave a path to hell.

O! for a clean and ardent heart,
O! for a ſoul on fire,
Thy praiſe, begun on earth, to ſound
Where angels ſtring the lyre.

How cold is man! to him how hard
(Hard what moſt eaſy ſeems)
"To ſet a juſt eſteem on that
"Which yet he---moſt eſteems."

What ſhall we ſay, when boundleſs bliſs
Is offer'd to mankind,
And to that offer when a race
Of rationals is blind?

Of human nature ne'er too high
Are our ideas wrought;
Of human merit ne'er too low
Depreſs'd the daring thought.

ON THE LATE QUEEN'S DEATH,

AND HIS MAJESTY'S ACCESSION TO THE THRONE.

INSCRIBED TO JOSEPH ADDISON, ESQ.

SECRETARY TO THEIR EXCELLENCIES THE LORDS JUSTICES.

"— Gaudia Curis."——HOR.

MDCCXIV.

SIR, I have long, and with impatience, ſought
To eaſe the fullneſs of my grateful thought,
My fame at once and duty to purſue,
And pleaſe the public, by reſpect to you.
Though you, long ſince beyond Britannia known,
Have ſpread your country's glory with your own,
To me you never did more lovely ſhine,
Than when ſo late the kindled wrath divine
Quench'd our ambition in great Anna's fate,
And darken'd all the pomp of human ſtate.
Though you are rich in fame, and fame decay,
Though rais'd in life, and greatneſs fade away,
Your luſtre brightens; virtue cuts the gloom
With purer rays, and ſparkles near a tomb.
Know, Sir, the great eſteem and honour due,
I choſe that moment to profeſs to you,
When ſadneſs reign'd, when fortune, ſo ſevere,
Had warm'd our boſoms to be moſt ſincere.
And when no motives could have force to raiſe
A ſerious value, and provoke my praiſe,
But ſuch as riſe above, and far tranſcend
Whatever glories with this world ſhall end,
Then ſhining forth, when deepeſt ſhades ſhall blot
The ſun's bright orb, and Cato be forgot.
I ſing—but ah! my theme I need not tell,
See every eye with conſcious ſorrow ſwell:
Who now to verſe would raiſe his humble voice,
Can only ſhow his duty, not his choice.
How great the weight of grief our hearts ſuſtain!
We languiſh, and to ſpeak is to complain.
Let us look back (for who too oft can view
That moſt illuſtrious ſcene, for ever new!)
See all the ſeaſons ſhine on Anna's throne,
And pay a conſtant tribute not their own.
Her ſummer's heats nor fruits alone beſtow,
They reap the harveſt, and ſubdue the foe;
And when black ſtorms confeſs the diſtant ſun,
Her winters wear the wreaths her ſummers won.
Revolving pleaſures in their turns appear,
And triumphs are the product of the year.
To crown the whole, great joys in greater ceaſe,
And glorious victory is loſt in peace.
Whence this profuſion on our favour'd iſle?
Did partial fortune on our virtue ſmile?
Or did the ſceptre, in great Anna's hand,
Stretch forth this rich indulgence o'er our land?
Ungrateful Britain! quit thy groundleſs claim,
Thy queen and thy good fortune are the ſame.
Hear, with alarms our trumpets fill the ſky;
'Tis Anna reigns! the Gallic ſquadrons fly.
We ſpread our canvaſs to the ſouthern ſhore;
'Tis Anna reigns! the ſouth reſigns her ſtore.
Her virtue ſmooths the tumult of the main,
And ſwells the field with mountains of the ſlain.
Argyll and Churchill but the glory ſhare,
While millions lie ſubdu'd by Anna's prayer.
How great her zeal! how fervent her deſire!
How did her ſoul in holy warmth expire!
Conſtant devotion did her time divide,
Nor ſet returns of pleaſure or of pride,
Not want of reſt, or the ſun's parting ray,
But finiſh'd duty, limited the day.
How ſweet ſucceeding ſleep! what lovely themes
Smil'd in her thoughts, and ſoften'd all her dreams!
Her royal couch deſcending angels ſpread,
And join'd their wings a ſhelter o'er her head.
Though Europe's wealth and glory claim'd a part,
Religion's cauſe reign'd miſtreſs of her heart:
She ſaw, and griev'd to ſee, the mean eſtate
Of thoſe who round the hallow'd altar wait;
She ſhed her bounty piouſly profuſe,
And thought it more her own in ſacred uſe.
Thus on his furrow ſee the tiller ſtand,
And fill with genial ſeed his laviſh hand;
He truſts the kindneſs of the fruitful plain,
And providently ſcatters all his grain.
What ſtrikes my ſight? does proud Auguſta riſe
New to behold, and awfully ſurpriſe!
Her lofty brow more numerous turrets crown,
And ſacred domes on palaces look down:
A noble pride of piety is ſhown,
And temples caſt a luſtre on the throne.
How would this work another's glory raiſe!
But Anna's greatneſs robs her of the praiſe.
Drown'd in a brighter blaze it diſappears.
Who dry'd the widows and the orphans tears?
Who ſtoop'd from high to ſuccour the diſtreſs'd,
And reconcile the wounded heart to reſt?
Great in her goodneſs, well could we perceive,
Whoever ſought, it was a queen that gave.
Misfortune loſt her name; her guiltleſs frown
But made another debtor to the crown;

And each unfriendly ſtroke from fate we bore,
Became our title to the regal ſtore.
Thus injur'd trees adopt a foreign ſhoot,
And their wounds bloſſom with a fairer fruit.
Ye numbers, who on your misfortunes thriv'd,
When firſt the dreadful blaſt of fame arriv'd,
Say what a ſhock, what agonies you felt,
How did your ſouls with tender anguiſh melt!
That grief which living Anna's love ſuppreſs'd,
Shook like a tempeſt every grateful breaſt.
A ſecond fate our ſinking fortunes try'd!
A ſecond time our tender parents dy'd!
Heroes returning from the field we crown,
And deify the haughty victor's frown.
His ſplendid wealth too raſhly we admire,
Catch the diſeaſe, and burn with equal fire:
Wiſely to ſpend is the great art of gain;
And one reliev'd tranſcends a million ſlain.
When time ſhall aſk where once Ramillia lay,
Or Danube flow'd that ſwept whole troops away,
One drop of water, that refreſh'd the dry,
Shall riſe a fountain of eternal joy.
But ah! to that unknown and diſtant date;
Is virtue's great reward puſh'd off by fate;
Here random ſhafts in every breaſt are found,
Virtue and merit but provoke the wound.
Auguſt in native worth and regal ſtate,
Anna ſate arbitreſs of Europe's fate;
To diſtant realms did every accent fly,
And nations watch'd each moment of her eye.
Silent, nor longer awful to be ſeen,
How ſmall a ſpot contains the mighty queen!
No throng of ſuppliant princes mark the place,
Where Britain's greatneſs is compos'd in peace:
The broken earth is ſcarce diſcern'd to riſe,
And a ſtone tells us where the monarch lies.
Thus end matureſt honours of the crown!
This is the laſt concluſion of renown!
So when with idle ſkill the wanton boy [joy,
Breathes through his tube; he ſees, with eager
The trembling bubble, in its riſing ſmall;
And by degrees expands the glittering ball.
But when, to full perfection blown, it flies
High in the air, and ſhines in various dyes,
The little monarch, with a falling tear,
Sees his world burſt at once, and diſappear.
'Tis not in ſorrow to reverſe our doom,
No groans unlock th' inexorable tomb!
Why then this fond indulgence of our woe!
What fruit can riſe, or what advantage flow!
Yes, this advantage; from our deep diſtreſs
We learn how much in George the gods can bleſs.
Had a leſs glorious princeſs left the throne,
But half the hero had at firſt been ſhown:
An Anna falling all the king employs,
To vindicate from guilt our riſing joys:
Our joys ariſe and innocently ſhine,
Auſpicious monarch! what a praiſe is thine!
Welcome, great ſtranger, to Britannia's throne!
Nor let thy country think thee all her own.
Of thy delay how oft did we complain!
Our hopes reach'd out, and met thee on the main.
With prayer we ſmooth the billows for thy fleet;
With ardent wiſhes fill thy ſwelling ſheet;
And when thy foot took place on Albion's ſhore,
We bending bleſs'd the gods, and aſk'd no more.
What hand but thine ſhould conquer and compoſe,
Join thoſe whom intereſt joins, and chaſe our foes?
Repel the daring youth's preſumptuous aim,
And by his rival's greatneſs give him fame?
Now in ſome foreign court he may ſit down,
And quit without a bluſh the Britiſh crown.
Secure his honour, though he loſe his ſtore,
And take a lucky moment to be poor.
Nor think, great Sir, now firſt, at this late hour,
In Britain's favour, you exert your power;
To us, far back in time, I joy to trace
The numerous tokens of your princely grace.
Whether you choſe to thunder on the Rhine,
Inſpire grave councils, or in courts to ſhine;
In the more ſcenes your genius was diſplay'd,
The greater debt was on Britannia laid:
They all conſpir'd this mighty man to raiſe,
And your new ſubjects proudly ſhare the praiſe.
All ſhare; but may not we have leave to boaſt
That we contemplate, and enjoy it moſt?
This ancient nurſe of arts, indulg'd by fate
On gentle Iſis' bank, a calm retreat,
For many rolling ages juſtly fam'd,
Has through the world her loyalty proclaim'd;
And often pour'd (too well the truth is known!)
Her blood and treaſure to ſupport the throne!
For England's church her lateſt accents ſtrain'd;
And freedom with her dying hand retain'd,
No wonder then her various ranks agree
In all the fervencies of zeal for thee.
What though thy birth a diſtant kingdom boaſt,
And ſeas divide thee from the Britiſh coaſt?
The crown's impatient to encloſe thy head:
Why ſtay thy feet? the cloth of gold is ſpread.
Our ſtrict obedience through the world ſhall tell
That king's a Briton, who can govern well!

THE INSTALMENT.

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE SIR ROBERT WALPOLE.

KNIGHT OF THE MOST NOBLE ORDER OF THE GARTER.

"Quæſitam Meritis." HOR.

MDCCXXVI.

With invocations ſome their breaſts inflame;
I need no muſe, a Walpole is my theme.
Ye mighty dead, ye garter'd ſons of praiſe!
Our morning ſtars! our boaſt in former days!

Which hovering o'er, your purple wings display,
Lur'd by the pomp of this distinguish'd day,
Stoop, and attend: by one, the knee be bound;
One, throw the mantle's crimson folds around;
By that, the sword on his proud thigh be plac'd;
This, clasp the diamond-girdle round his waist;
His breast, with rays, let just Godolphin spread,
Wise Burleigh plant the plumage on his head,
And Edward own, since first he fix'd the race,
None prest fair glory with a swifter pace.

When fate would call some mighty genius forth
To wake a drooping age to godlike worth,
Or aid some favourite king's illustrious toil,
It bids his blood with generous ardour boil;
His blood, from virtue's celebrated source,
Pour'd down the steep of time, a lengthen'd course;
That men prepar'd may just attention pay,
Warn'd by the dawn to mark the glorious day,
When all the scatter'd merits of his line
Collected to a point, intensely shine.

See, Britain, see thy Walpole shine from far,
His azure ribbon, and his radiant star;
A star that, with auspicious beams, shall guide
Thy vessel safe, through fortune's roughest tide.

If peace still smiles, by this shall commerce steer
A finish'd course, in triumph round the sphere;
And, gathering tribute from each distant shore,
In Britain's lap the world's abundance pour.

If war's ordain'd, this star shall dart its beams
Through that black cloud which rising from the Thames,
With thunder, form'd of Brunswick's wrath, is sent
To claim the seas, and awe the continent.
This shall direct it, where the bolt to throw,
A star for us, a comet to the foe.

At this the muse shall kindle, and aspire:
My breast, O Walpole, glows with grateful fire.
The streams of royal bounty, turn'd by thee,
Refresh the dry domains of poesy.
My fortune shows, when arts are Walpole's care,
What slender worth forbids us to despair:
Be this thy partial smile from censure free;
'Twas meant for merit, though it fell on me.

Since Brunswick's smile has authoris'd my muse,
Chaste be her conduct, and sublime her views.
False praises are the whoredoms of the pen,
Which prostitute fair fame to worthless men:
This profanation of celestial fire
Makes fools despise, what wise men should admire.
Let those I praise to distant times be known,
Not by their author's merit, but their own.
If others think the task is hard, to weed
From verse rank flattery's vivacious seed,
And rooted deep; one means must set them free
Patron! and patriot! let them sing of thee.

While vulgar trees ignobler honours wear,
Nor those retain, when winter chills the year;
The generous Orange, favourite of the sun, [run;
With vigorous charms can through the seasons
Defies the storm with her tenacious green;
And flowers and fruits in rival pomp are seen:
Where blossoms fall, still fairer blossoms spring;
And midst their sweets the feather'd poets sing.

On Walpole, thus, may pleas'd Britannia view
At once her ornament and profit too;
The fruit of service, and the bloom of fame,
Matur'd, and gilded by the royal beam.
He, when the nipping blasts of envy rise,
Its guilt can pity, and its rage despise;
Lets fall no honours, but securely great
Unfaded holds the colour of his fate:
No winter knows, though riffling factions press;
By wisdom deeply rooted in success;
One glory sued, a brighter is display'd *;
And the charm'd muses shelter in his shade.

O how I long, enkindled by the theme,
In deep eternity to launch thy name!
Thy name in view, no rights of verse I plead,
But what chaste truth indites, old time shall read.

" Behold! a man of ancient faith and blood,
" Which, soon, beat high for arts, and public
" good;
" Whose glory great, but natural appears,
" The genuine growth of services and years;
" No sudden exhalation drawn on high,
" And fondly gilt by partial majesty:
" One bearing greatest toils with greatest ease,
" One born to serve us, and yet born to please:
" Whom, while our rights in equal scales he lays,
" The prince may trust, and yet the people praise,
" His genius ardent, yet his judgment clear,
" His tongue is flowing, and his heart sincere,
" His council guides, his temper cheers our isle,
" And, smiling, gives three kingdoms cause to
" smile."

Joy then to Britain, blest with such a son,
To Walpole joy, by whom the prize is won;
Who nobly-conscious meets the smiles of fate.
True greatness lies in daring to be great.
Let dastard souls, or affectation, run
To shades, nor wear bright honours fairly won;
Such men prefer, misled by false applause,
The pride of modesty to virtue's cause.
Honours, which make the face of virtue fair,
'Tis great to merit, and 'tis wise to wear;
'Tis holding up the prize to public view,
Confirms grown virtue, and inflames the new;
Hightens the lustre of our age and clime,
And sheds rich seeds of worth for future time.

Proud chiefs alone, in fields of slaughter fam'd,
Of old, this azure bloom of glory claim'd,
As when stern Ajax pour'd a purple flood,
The violet rose, fair daughter of his blood.
Now rival wisdom dares the wreath divide,
And both Minervas rise in equal pride;
Proclaiming loud, a monarch fills the throne,
Who shines illustrious not in wars alone.

Let fame look lovely in Britannia's eyes;
They coldly court desert, who fame despise.
For what's ambition, but fair virtue's sail?
And what applause, but her propitious gale?
When swell'd with that, she fleets before the wind
To glorious aims, as to the port design'd:
When chain'd, without it, to the labouring oar,
She toils! she pants! nor gains the flying shore,
From her sublime pursuits, or turn'd aside
By blasts of envy, or by fortune's tide:

* Knight of the Bath, and then of the Garter.

For one that has ſucceeded ten are loſt,
Of equal talents, ere they make the coaſt.
Then let renown to worth divine incite,
With all her beams, but throw thoſe beams aright.
Then merit droops, and genius downward tends,
When godlike glory, like our land, deſcends.
Cuſtom the garter long confin'd to few,
And gave to birth, exalted virtue's due:
Walpole has thrown the proud encloſure down;
And high deſert embraces fair renown.
Though rival'd, let the peerage ſmiling ſee
(Sh. iling, in juſtice to their own degree),
This proud reward by majeſty beſtow'd
On worth like that whence firſt the peerage flow'd.
From frowns of fate Britannia's bliſs to guard,
Let ſubjects merit, and let kings reward.
Gods are moſt gods by giving to excel,
And kings moſt like them, by rewarding well.
Though ſtrong the twanging nerve, and drawn aright.
Short is the winged arrow's upward flight;
But if an eagle it transfix on high,
Lodg'd in the wound, it ſoars into the ſky.
Thus while I ſing thee with unequal lays,
And wound perhaps that worth I mean to praiſe;
Yet I tranſcend myſelf, I riſe in fame,
Not lifted by my genius, but my theme.
No more: for in this dread ſuſpenſe of fate,
Now kingdoms fluctuate, and in dark debate
Weigh peace and war, now Europe's eyes are bent
On mighty Brunſwick, for the great event,
Brunſwick of kings the terror or defence!
Who dares detain thee at a world's expence?

EPISTLES.

To the Right Honourable GEORGE LORD LANSDOWNE. 1712.

" —Parnaſſia laurus
" Parva ſub ingenti matris ſe ſubjecit umbra."
VIRG.

WHEN Rome, my lord, in her full glory ſhone,
And great Auguſtus rul'd the globe alone,
While ſuppliant kings in all their pomp and ſtate,
Swarm'd in his courts, and throng'd his palace gate;
Horace did oft' the mighty man detain,
And ſooth'd his breaſt with no ignoble ſtrain;
Now ſoar'd aloft, now ſtruck an humbler ſtring;
And taught the Roman genius how to ſing.
Pardon, if I his freedom dare purſue,
Who know no want of Cæſar, finding you;
The muſe's friend is pleas'd the muſe ſhould preſs
Through circling crowds, and labour for acceſs,
That partial to his darling he may prove,
And ſhining throngs for her approach remove,
To all the world induſtrious to proclaim
His love of arts, and boaſt the glorious flame.
Long has the weſtern world reclin'd her head,
Pour'd forth her ſorrow, and bewail'd her dead;
Fell diſcord through her borders fiercely rang'd,
And ſhook her nations, and her monarchs chang'd;
By land and ſea its utmoſt rage employ'd;
Nor heaven repair'd ſo faſt as men deſtroy'd.
In vain kind ſummers plenteous fields beſtow'd,
In vain the vintage liberally flow'd;
Alarms from loaden boards all pleaſures chas'd,
And robb'd the rich Burgudian grape of taſte;
The ſmiles of nature could no bleſſing bring,
The fruitful autumn, or the flowery ſpring;
Time was diſtinguiſh'd by the ſword and ſpear,
Not by the various aſpects of the year;
The trumpet's ſound proclaim'd a milder ſky,
And bloodſhed told us when the ſun was nigh.
But now (ſo ſoon is Britain's bleſſings ſeen,
When ſuch as you are near her glorious queen!)
Now peace, though long repuls'd, arrives at laſt,
And bids us ſmile on all our labours paſt;
Bids every nation ceaſe her wonted moan,
And every monarch call his crown his own:
To valour gentler virtues now ſucceed;
No longer is the great man born to bleed;
Renown'd in councils, brave Argyll ſhall tell,
Wiſdom and proweſs in one breaſt may dwell:
Through milder tracts he ſoars to deathleſs fame,
And without trembling we reſound his name.
No more the riſing harveſt whets the ſword,
No longer waves uncertain of its lord;
Who caſt the ſeed, the golden ſheaf ſhall claim,
Nor chance of battle change the maſter's name.
Each ſtream unſtain'd with blood more ſmoothly flows;
The brighter ſun a fuller day beſtows;
All nature ſeems to wear a cheerful face,
And thank great Anna for returning peace.
The patient thus, when on his bed of pain,
No longer he invokes the gods in vain,
But riſes to new life; in every field
He finds Elyſium, rivers nectar yield;
Nothing ſo cheap and vulgar but can pleaſe,
And borrow beauties from his late diſeaſe.
Nor is it peace alone, but ſuch a peace,
As more than bids the rage of battle ceaſe,
Death may determine war, and reſt ſucceed,
'Cauſe nought ſurvives on which our rage may feed;
In faithful friends we loſe our glorious foes,
And ſtrifes of love exalt our ſweet repoſe.
See graceful Bolingbroke your friend advance,
Nor miſs his Lanſdowne in the court of France;

So well receiv'd, ſo welcome, ſo at home,
(Bleſs'd change of fate) in Bourbon's ſtately dome;
The monarch pleas'd, deſcending from his throne,
Will not that Anna call him all her own;
He claims a part, and looking round to find
Something might ſpeak the fulneſs of his mind,
A diamond ſhines, which oft had touch'd him near,
Renew'd his grief, and robb'd him of a tear;
Now firſt with joy beheld, well plac'd on one,
Who makes him leſs regret his darling ſon;
So dear is Anna's miniſter, ſo great
Your glorious friend in his own private ſtate.
To make our nations longer two, in vain
Does nature interpoſe the raging main:
The Gallic ſhore to diſtant Britain grows,
For Lewis Thames, the Seine for Anna flows:
From conflicts paſs'd each other's worth we find,
And thence in ſtricter friendſhip now are join'd;
Each wound receiv'd, now pleads the cauſe of love,
And former injuries endearments prove.
What Briton but muſt prize th' illuſtrious ſword,
That cauſe of fear to Churchill could afford?
Who ſworn to Bourbon's ſceptre, but muſt frame
Vaſt thoughts of him, that could brave Tallard tame?
Thus generous hatred in affection ends, [friends.
And war, which rais'd the foes, completes the
A thouſand happy conſequences flow
(The dazzling proſpect makes my boſom glow);
Commerce ſhall lift her ſwelling ſails, and roll
Her wealthy fleets ſecure from pole to pole;
The Britiſh merchant, who with care and pain
For many moons ſees only ſkies and main;
When now in view of his lov'd native ſhore,
The perils of the dreadful ocean o'er,
Cauſe to regret his wealth no more ſhall find,
Nor curſe the mercy of the ſea and wind;
By hardeſt fate condemn'd to ſerve a foe,
And give him ſtrength to ſtrike a deeper blow.
Sweet Philomela providently flies
To diſtant woods and ſtreams, for ſuch ſupplies,
To feed her young, and make them try the wing,
And with their tender notes attempt to ſing:
Meanwhile, the fowler ſpreads his ſecret ſnare,
And renders vain the tuneful mother's care.
Britannia's bold adventurer of late,
The foaming ocean plow'd with equal fate.
Goodneſs is greatneſs in its utmoſt height,
And power a curſe, if not a friend to right:
To conquer is to make diſſention ceaſe,
That man may ſerve the King of kings in peace.
Religion now ſhall all her rays diſpenſe,
And ſhine abroad in perfect excellence;
Elſe we may dread ſome greater curſe at hand,
To ſcourge a thoughtleſs and ungrateful land:
Now war is weary, and retir'd to reſt;
The meagre famine, and the ſpotted peſt,
Deputed in her ſtead, may blaſt the day,
And ſweep the relics of the ſword away.
When peaceful Numa fill'd the Roman throne,
Jove in the fulneſs of his glory ſhone;
Wiſe Solomon, a ſtranger to the ſword,
Was born to raiſe a temple to the Lord.
Anne too ſhall build, and every ſacred pile
Speak peace eternal to Britannia's iſle.
Thoſe mighty ſouls, whom military care
Diverted from their only great affair,
Shall bend their full united force, to bleſs
Th' Almighty Author of their late ſucceſs.
And what is all the world ſubdued to this?
The grave ſets bounds to ſublunary bliſs;
But there are conqueſts to great Anna known,
Above the ſplendour of an earthly throne;
Conqueſts! whoſe triumph is too great, within
The ſcanty bounds of matter to begin;
Too glorious to ſhine forth, till it has run
Beyond this darkneſs of the ſtars and ſun,
And ſhall whole ages paſt be ſtill, ſtill but begun.
Heroic ſhades! whom war has ſwept away,
Look down, and ſmile on this auſpicious day:
Now boaſt your deaths; to thoſe your glory tell,
Who or at Agincourt or Creſſy fell;
Then deep into eternity retire,
Of greater things than peace or war inquire;
Fully content, and unconcern'd, to know
What farther paſſes in the world below.
The braveſt of mankind ſhall now have leave
To die but once, nor piece-meal ſeek the grave:
On gain or pleaſure bent, we ſhall not meet
Sad melancholy numbers in each ſtreet
(Owners of bones diſpers'd on Flandria's plain,
Or waſting in the bottom of the main);
To turn us back from joy, in tender fear,
Leſt it an inſult of their woes appear,
And make us grudge ourſelves that wealth, their blood
Perhaps preſerv'd, who ſtarve, or beg for food.
Devotion ſhall run pure, and diſengage
From that ſtrange fate of mixing peace with rage.
On heaven without a ſin we now may call,
And guiltleſs to our Maker proſtrate fall;
Be Chriſtians while we pray, nor in one breath
Aſk mercy for ourſelves, for others death.
But O! I view with tranſport arts reſtor'd,
Which double uſe to Britain ſhall afford;
Secure her glory purchas'd in the field,
And yet for future peace ſweet motives yield:
While we contemplate on the painted wall,
The preſſing Briton, and the flying Gaul,
In ſuch bright images, ſuch living grace,
As leave the great Raphael but the ſecond place;
Our cheeks ſhall glow, our heaving boſoms riſe,
And martial ardors ſparkle in our eyes;
Much we ſhall triumph in our battles paſt,
And yet conſent thoſe battles prove our laſt;
Leſt, while in arms for brighter fame we ſtrive,
We loſe the means to keep that fame alive.
In ſilent groves the birds delight to ſing,
Or near the margin of a ſecret ſpring:
Now all is calm, ſweet muſic ſhall improve,
Nor kindle rage, but be the nurſe of love.
But what's the warbling voice, the trembling ſtring,
Or breathing canvaſs, when the muſes ſing?
The muſe, my Lord, your care above the reſt,
With riſing joy dilates my partial breaſt;
The thunder of the battle ceas'd to roar,
Ere Greece her godlike poets taught to ſoar;
Rome's dreadful foe, great Hannibal, was dead,
And all her warlike neighbours round her bled;

For Janus ſhut, her Io Pæans rung,
Before an Ovid or a Virgil ſung.
A thouſand various forms the muſe may wear
(A thouſand various forms become the fair);
But ſhines in none with more majeſtic mien,
Than when in ſtate ſhe draws the purple ſcene;
Calls forth her monarchs, bids her heroes rage,
And mourning beauty melt the crowded ſtage;
Charms back paſt ages, gives to Britain's uſe
The nobleſt virtues time did e'er produce;
Leaves fam'd hiſtorians' boaſted art behind;
They keep the ſoul alone, and that's confin'd,
Sought out with pains, and but by proxy ſpeaks:
The hero's preſence deep impreſſion makes;
The ſcenes his ſoul and body reunite,
Furniſh a voice, produce him to the ſight;
Make our contemporary him that ſtood
High in renown, perhaps before the flood;
Make Neſtor to this age advice afford,
And Hector for our ſervice draw his ſword.
More glory to an author what can bring,
Whence nobler ſervice to his country ſpring,
Than from thoſe labours, which, in man's deſpight,
Poſſeſs him with a paſſion for the right?
With honeſt magic make the knave inclin'd
To pay devotion to the virtuous mind;
Through all her toils and dangers bid him rove,
And with her wants and anguiſh fall in love?
Who hears the godlike Montezuma groan,
And does not wiſh the glorious pain his own?
Lend but your underſtanding, and their ſkill
Can domineer at pleaſure o'er your will:
Nor is the ſhort-liv'd conqueſt quickly paſt;
Shame, if not choice, will hold the convert faſt.
How often have I ſeen the generous bowl
With pleaſing force unlock a ſecret ſoul,
And ſteal a truth, which every ſober hour
(The proſe of life) had kept within her power?
The grape victorious often has prevail'd,
When gold and beauty, racks and tortures, fail'd:
Yet when the ſpirit's tumult was allay'd,
She mourn'd, perhaps, the ſentiment betray'd;
But mourn'd too late, nor longer could deny,
And on her own confeſſion charge the lie.
Thus they, whom neither the prevailing love
Of goodneſs here, or mercy from above,
Or fear of future pains, or human laws
Could render advocates in virtue's cauſe,
Caught by the ſcene, have unawares reſign'd
Their wonted diſpoſition of the mind:
By ſlow degrees prevails the pleaſing tale,
As circling glaſſes on our ſenſes ſteal;
Till throughly by the muſes' banquet warm'd,
The paſſions toſſing, all the ſoul alarm'd,
They turn mere zealots flush'd with glorious rage,
Riſe in their ſeats, and ſcarce forbear the ſtage,
Aſſiſtance to wrong'd innocence to bring,
Or turn the poignard on ſome tyrant king.
How can they cool to villains? how ſubſide
To dregs of vice, from ſuch a godlike pride?
To ſpoiling orphans how to-day return,
Who wept laſt night to ſee Monimia mourn?
In this gay ſchool of virtue, whom ſo fit
To govern, and control the world of wit,

As Talbot, Lanſdowne's friend, has Britain known?
Him poliſh'd Italy has call'd her own;
He in the lap of elegance was bred,
And trac'd the muſes to their fountain head:
But much we hope, he will enjoy at home
What's nearer ancient than the modern Rome.
Nor fear I mention of the court of France,
When I the Britiſh genius would advance;
There too has Shrewſbury improv'd his taſte;
Yet ſtill we dare invite him to our feaſt:
For Corneille's ſake I ſhall my thoughts ſuppreſs
Of Oroonoko, and preſume him leſs:
What though we wrong him? Iſabella's woe
Waters thoſe bays that ſhall for ever grow.
Our foes confeſs, nor we the praiſe refuſe,
The drama glories in the Britiſh muſe.
The French are delicate, and nicely lead
Of cloſe intrigue the labyrinthian thread;
Our genius more affects the grand, than fine,
Our ſtrength can make the great plain action ſhine:
They raiſe a great curioſity indeed,
From his dark maze to ſee the hero freed;
We rouſe th' affections, and that hero ſhow
Gaſping beneath ſome formidable blow:
They ſigh; we weep; the Gallic doubt and care
We heighten into terror and deſpair;
Strike home, the ſtrongeſt paſſions boldly touch,
Nor fear our audience ſhould be pleas'd too much.
What's great in nature we can greatly draw,
Nor thank for beauties the dramatic law.
The fate of Cæſar is a tale too plain
The fickle Gallic taſte to entertain;
Their art would have perplex'd, and interwove
The golden arras with gay flowers of love:
We know heaven made him a far greater man
Than any Cæſar, in a human plan,
And ſuch we draw him, nor are too refin'd,
To ſtand affected with what heaven deſign'd.
To claim attention, and the heart invade,
Shakſpeare but wrote the play th' Almighty made.
Our neighbour's ſtage art too bare-fac'd betrays,
'Tis great Corneille at every ſcene we praiſe;
On nature's ſurer aid Britannia calls,
None think of Shakſpeare till the curtain falls;
Then with a ſigh returns our audience home,
From Venice, Egypt, Perſia, Greece, or Rome.
France yields not to the glory of our lines,
But manly conduct of our ſtrong deſigns;
That oft they think more juſtly we muſt own,
Nor ancient Greece a truer ſenſe has ſhown:
Greece though but juſtly, they think juſtly too;
We ſometimes err by ſtriving more to do.
So well are Racine's meaneſt perſons taught,
But change a ſentiment you make a fault;
Nor dare we charge them with a want of flame:
When we boaſt more, we own ourſelves to blame.
And yet in Shakſpeare ſomething ſtill I find,
That makes me leſs eſteem all humankind;
He made one nature, and another found,
Both in his page with maſter-ſtrokes abound;
His witches, fairies, and inchanted iſle,
Bid us no longer at our nurſes ſmile;
Of loſt hiſtorians we almoſt complain,
Nor think it the creation of his brain,

Who lives, when his Othello's in a trance?
With his great Talbot * too he conquer'd France.
Long may we hope great Talbot's blood will run
In great deſcendants, Shakſpeare was but one;
And him, my lord, permit me not to name,
But in kind ſilence ſpare his rival's ſhame:—
Yet I in vain that author would ſuppreſs,
What can't be greater, cannot be made leſs:
Each reader will defeat my fruitleſs aim,
And to himſelf great Agamemnon name.
Should Shakſpeare riſe unbleſs'd with Talbot's ſmile,
Ev'n Shakſpeare's ſelf would curſe this barren iſle:
But if that reigning ſtar propitious ſhine,
And kindly mix his gentle rays with thine;
Ev'n I, by far the meaneſt of your age,
Shall not repent my paſſion for the ſtage.
Thus did the Will-almighty diſallow,
No human force could pluck the golden bough,
Which left the tree with eaſe at Jove's command,
And ſpar'd the labour of the weakeſt hand.
Auſpicious fate! that gives me leave to write
To you, the muſes glory and delight;
Who know to read, nor falſe encomiums raiſe,
And mortify an author with your praiſe:
Praiſe wounds a noble mind, when 'tis not due,
But cenſure's ſelf will pleaſe, my lord, from you;
Faults are our pride and gain, when you deſcend
To point them out, and teach us how to mend.
What though the great man ſet his coffers wide,
That cannot gratify the poet's pride;
Whoſe inſpiration, if 'tis truly good,
Is beſt rewarded, when beſt underſtood.
The muſes write for glory not for gold,
'Tis far beneath their nature to be ſold;
The greateſt gain is ſcorn'd, but as it ſerves
To ſpeak a ſenſe of what the muſe deſerves;
The muſe, which from her Lanſdowne fears no wrong,
Beſt judge, as well as ſubject of her ſong.
Should this great theme allure me farther ſtill,
And I preſume to uſe your patience ill,
The world would plead my cauſe, and none but you
Will take diſguſt at what I now purſue:
Since what is mean my muſe can't raiſe, I'll chooſe
A theme that's able to exalt my muſe. [name,
For who, not void of thought, can Granville
Without a ſpark of his immortal flame?
Whether we ſeek the patriot, or the friend,
Let Bolingbroke, let Anna recommend;
Whether we chooſe to love or to admire,
You melt the tender, and th' ambitious fire.
Such native graces without thought abound,
And ſuch familiar glories ſpread around,
As more incline the ſtander-by to raiſe
His value for himſelf, than you to praiſe.
Thus you befriend the moſt heroic way,
Bleſs all, on none an obligation lay;
So turn'd by nature's hand for all that's well,
'Tis ſcarce a virtue when you moſt excel.

Though ſweet your preſence, graceful is your mein,
You to be happy want not to be ſeen;
Though priz'd in public you can ſmile alone,
Nor court an approbation but your own:
In throngs, not conſcious of thoſe eyes that gaze
In wonder fix'd, though reſolute to pleaſe;
You, were all blind, would ſtill deſerve applauſe;
The world's your glory's witneſs, not its cauſe;
That lies beyond the limits of the day,
Angels behold it, and their God obey.
You take delight in others excellence;
A gift which nature rarely does diſpenſe:
Of all that breathe 'tis you, perhaps, alone
Would be well pleas'd to ſee yourſelf outdone.
You wiſh not thoſe, who ſhow your name reſpect,
So little worth, as might excuſe neglect;
Nor are in pain leſt merit you ſhould know;
Nor ſhun the well-deſerver as a foe;
A troubleſome acquaintance, that will claim
To be well us'd, or dye your cheek with ſhame.
You wiſh your country's good; that told ſo well
Your powers are known, th' event I need not tell.
When Neſtor ſpoke, none aſk'd if he prevail'd;
That god of ſweet perſuaſion never fail'd:
And ſuch great fame had Hector's valour wrought
Who meant he conquer'd, only ſaid he fought.
When you, my lord, to ſylvan ſcenes retreat,
No crowds around for pleaſure, or for ſtate,
You are not caſt upon a ſtranger land,
And wander penſive o'er the barren ſtrand;
Now are you by receiv'd example taught,
In toys to ſhun the diſcipline of thought;
But unconfin'd by bounds of time and place,
You chooſe companions from all human race;
Converſe with thoſe the deluge ſwept away,
Or thoſe whoſe midnight is Britannia's day.
Books not ſo much in form, as give conſent
To thoſe ideas your own thoughts preſent;
Your only gain from turning volumes o'er,
Is finding cauſe to like yourſelf the more:
In Grecian ſages you are only taught
With more reſpect to value your own thought:
Great Tully grew immortal, while he drew
Thoſe precepts we behold alive in you:
Your life is ſo adjuſted to their ſchools,
It makes that hiſtory they meant for rules.
What joy, what pleaſing tranſport, muſt ariſe
Within your breaſt, and lift you to the ſkies,
When in each learned page that you unfold,
You find ſome part of your own conduct told!
So pleas'd, and ſo ſurpris'd, Æneas ſtood,
And ſuch triumphant raptures fir'd his blood,
When far from Trojan ſhores the hero ſpy'd
His ſtory ſhining forth in all its pride;
Admir'd himſelf, and ſaw his actions ſtand
The praiſe and wonder of a foreign land.
He knows not half his being, who's confin'd
In converſe, and reflection on mankind:
Your ſoul, which underſtands her charter well,
Diſdains impriſon'd by thoſe ſkies to dwell;
Ranges eternity without the leave
Of death, nor waits the paſſage of the grave.

* An anceſtor of the Duke of Shrewſbury, who conquered France, drawn by Shakſpeare.

When pains eternal, and eternal bliſs,
When theſe high cares your weary thoughts diſmiſs
In heavenly numbers you your ſoul unbend,
And for your eaſe to deathleſs fame deſcend.
Ye kings! would ye true greatneſs underſtand,
Read Seneca grown rich in Granville's hand *.
Behold the glories of your life complete!
Still at a flow, and permanently great;
New moments ſhed new pleaſures as they fly,
And yet your greateſt is, that you muſt die.
Thus Anna ſaw, and rais'd you to the ſeat
Of honour, and confeſs'd her ſervant great;
Confeſs'd not made him ſuch; for faithful fame
Her trumpet ſwell'd long ſince with Granville's name;
Though you in modeſty the title wear,
Your name ſhall be the title of your heir;
Farther than ermine make his glory known,
And caſt in ſhades the favour of a throne.
From thrones the beam of high diſtinction ſprings;
The ſoul's diſtinction from the King of kings,
Lo! one great day calls forth ten mighty peers!
Produce ten Granville's in five thouſand years;
Anna, be thou content to fix the fate
Of various kingdoms, and controul the great;
But O! to bid thy Granville brighter ſhine!
To him that great prerogative reſign,
Who the ſun's height can raiſe at pleaſure higher,
His lamp illumine, ſet his flames on fire.
Yet ſtill one bliſs, one glory, I forbear,
A darling friend whom near your heart you wear;
That lovely youth, my lord, whom you muſt blame,
That I grow thus familiar with your name.
He's friendly, open, in his conduct nice,
Nor ſerve theſe virtues to atone for vice:
Vice he has none, or ſuch as none wiſh leſs,
But friends indeed, good-nature in exceſs.
You cannot boaſt the merit of a choice,
In making him your own, 'twas nature's voice,
Which call'd too loud by man to be withſtood,
Pleading a type far nearer than of blood;
Similitude of manners, ſuch a mind,
As makes you leſs the wonder of mankind.
Such eaſe his common converſe recommends,
As he ne'er felt a paſſion but his friend's.
Yet fix'd his principles, beyond the force
Of all beneath the ſun, to bend his courſe †.
Thus the tall cedar, beautiful and fair,
Flatters the motions of the wanton air;
Salutes each paſſing breeze with head inclin'd;
The pliant branches dance in every wind;
But fix'd the ſtem her upright ſtate maintains,
And all the fury of the north diſdains.
How are you bleſt in ſuch a matchleſs friend!
Alas! with me the joys of friendſhip end;
O Harriſon! I muſt, I will complain;
Tears ſooth the ſoul's diſtreſs, though ſhed in vain;
Didſt thou return, and bleſs thy native ſhore
With welcome peace, and is my friend no more?—
Thy taſk was early done, and I muſt own
Death kind to thee, but ah! to thee alone.
But 'tis in me a vanity to mourn,
The ſorrows of the great thy tomb adorn;
Stafford and Bolingbroke the loſs perceive,
They grieve, and make thee envy'd in the grave.
With aching heart, and a foreboding mind,
I night to day in painful journey join'd,
When firſt inform'd of his approaching fate;
But reach'd the partner of my ſoul too late:
'Twas paſt, his cheek was cold, that tuneful tongue,
Which Iſis charm'd with his melodious ſong,
Now languiſh'd, wanted ſtrength to ſpeak his pain,
Scarce rais'd a feeble groan, and ſunk again:
Each art of life, in which he bore a part,
Shot like an arrow through my bleeding heart.
To what ſerv'd all his promis'd wealth and power,
But more to load that moſt unhappy hour?
Yet ſtill prevail'd the greatneſs of his mind;
That, not in health, or life itſelf confin'd,
Felt through his mortal pangs Britannia's peace,
Mounted to joy, and ſmil'd in death's embrace.
His ſpirit now juſt ready to reſign,
No longer now his own, no longer mine,
He graſps my hand, his ſwimming eye-balls roll,
My hand he graſps, and enters in my ſoul;
Then with a groan—ſupport me, O! beware
Of holding worth, however great, too dear *!
Pardon, my lord, the privilege of grief,
That in untimely freedom ſeeks relief;
To better fate your love I recommend,
O may you never loſe ſo dear a friend!
May nothing interrupt your happy hours;
Enjoy the bleſſings peace on Europe ſhowers:
Nor yet diſdain thoſe bleſſings to adorn;
To make the muſe immortal you was born.
Sing, and in lateſt time, when ſtory's dark,
This period your ſurviving fame ſhall mark;
Save from the gulf of years this glorious age,
And thus illuſtrate their hiſtorian's page.
The crown of Spain in doubtful balance hung,
And Anna Britain ſway'd, when Granville ſung:
That noted year Europa ſheath'd her ſword,
When this great man was firſt ſaluted lord.

TWO EPISTLES TO MR. POPE;

CONCERNING THE AUTHORS OF THE AGE. 1730.

EPISTLE I.

WHILST you at Twickenham plan the future wood,
Or turn the volumes of the wiſe and good,
Our ſenate meets; at parties, parties bawl,
And pamphlets ſtun the ſtreets, and load the ſtall;
So ruſhing tides bring things obſcene to light,
Foul wrecks emerge, and dead dogs ſwim in ſight;
The civil torrent foams, the tumult reigns,
And Codrus' proſe works up, and Lico's ſtrains.
Lo! what from cellars riſe, what ruſh from high,
Where ſpeculation rooſted near the ſky;
Letters, eſſays, ſock, buſkin, ſatire, ſong,
And all the garret thunders on the throng!

* The author here bewails that moſt ingenious gentleman, Mr. William Harriſon, Fellow of New-College, Oxon.

O Pope! I burſt; nor can, nor will refrain;
I'll write; let others in their turn complain:
Truce, truce, ye Vandals! my tormented ear
Leſs dreads a pillory than a pamphleteer;
I've heard myſelf to death; and, plagu'd each hour,
Shan't I return the vengeance in my power?
For who can write the true abſurd like me?—
Thy pardon, Codrus! who I mean but thee?
Pope! if like mine or Codrus' were thy ſtyle,
The blood of vipers had not ſtain'd thy file;
Merit leſs ſolid, leſs deſpite had bred;
They had not bit, and then they had not bled.
Fame is a public miſtreſs none enjoys,
But more or leſs his rival's peace deſtroys;
With fame, in juſt proportion, envy grows;
The man that makes a character, makes foes:
Slight, peeviſh inſects round a genius riſe,
As a bright day awakes the world of flies;
With hearty malice, but with feeble wing,
(To ſhow they live) they flutter, and they ſting:
But, as by depredations waſps proclaim
The faireſt fruit, ſo theſe the faireſt fame.
Shall we not cenſure all the motley train,
Whether with ale irriguous, or champain?
Whether they tread the vale of proſe, or climb,
And whet their appetites on cliffs of rhyme;
The college ſloven, or embroider'd ſpark;
The purple prelate, or the pariſh clerk;
The quiet Quidnunc, or demanding Prig;
The plaintiff Tory, or defendant Whig;
Rich, poor, male, female, young, old, gay, or ſad;
Whether extremely witty, or quite mad;
Profoundly dull, or ſhallowly polite;
Men that read well, or men that only write;
Whether peers, porters, taylors, tune the reeds,
And meaſuring words to meaſuring ſhapes ſucceeds;
For bankrupts write, when ruin'd ſhops are ſhut,
As maggots crawl from out a periſh'd nut.
His hammer this, and that his trowel quits,
And wanting ſenſe for tradeſmen, ſerve for wits.
By thriving men ſubſiſts each other trade;
Of every broken craft a writer's made:
Thus his material, paper, takes its birth
From tatter'd rags of all the ſtuff on earth.
Hail, fruitful iſle! to thee alone belong
Millions of wits, and brokers in old ſong;
Thee well a land of liberty we name,
Where all are free to ſcandal and to ſhame;
Thy ſons, by print, may ſet their hearts at eaſe,
And be mankind's contempt, whene'er they pleaſe;
Like trodden filth, their vile and abject ſenſe
Is unperceiv'd, but when it gives offence:
This heavy proſe our injur'd reaſon tires;
Their verſe immortal kindles looſe deſires:
Our age they puzzle, and corrupt our prime,
Our ſport and pity, puniſhment and crime.
What glorious motives urge our authors on,
Thus to undo, and thus to be undone!
One loſes his eſtate, and down he ſits,
To ſhow (in vain!) he ſtill retains his wits:
Another marries, and his dear proves keen;
He writes as an Hypnotic for the ſpleen:
Some write, confin'd by phyſic; ſome by debt;
Some, for 'tis Sunday; ſome becauſe 'tis wet;
Through private pique ſome do the public right,
And love their king and country out of ſpight:
Another writes becauſe his father writ,
And proves himſelf a baſtard by his wit.
Has Lico learning, humour, thought profound?
Neither: why write then? He wants twenty pound:
His belly, not his brains, this impulſe give;
He'll grow immortal; for he cannot live:
He rubs his awful front, and takes his ream,
With no proviſion made, but of his theme;
Perhaps a title has his fancy ſmit,
Or a quaint motto, which he thinks has wit:
He writes, in inſpiration puts his truſt,
Though wrong his thoughts, the gods will make them juſt;
Genius directly from the gods deſcends,
And who by labour would diſtruſt his friends?
Thus having reaſon'd with conſummate ſkill,
In immortality he dips his quill:
And ſince blank paper is deny'd the preſs,
He mingles the whole alphabet by gueſs:
In various ſets, which various words compoſe,
Of which, he hopes, mankind the meaning knows;
So ſounds ſpontaneous from the Sibyl broke,
Dark to herſelf the wonders which ſhe ſpoke;
The prieſts found out the meaning, if they could;
And nations ſtar'd at what none underſtood.
Clodio dreſs'd, danc'd, drank, viſited, (the whole
And great concern of an immortal ſoul!)
Oft have I ſaid, "Awake! exiſt! and ſtrive
"For birth! nor think to loiter is to live!"
As oft I overheard the demon ſay,
Who daily met the loiterer in his way,
"I'll meet thee, youth, at White's:" the youth replies.
"I'll meet thee there," and falls his ſacrifice;
His fortune ſquander'd, leaves his virtue bare
To every bribe, and blind to every ſnare:
Clodio for bread his indolence muſt quit,
Or turn a ſoldier, or commence a wit,
Such heroes have we! all, but life, they ſtake;
How muſt Spain tremble, and the German ſhake;
Such writers have we! all, but ſenſe, they print,
Ev'n George's praiſe is dated from the mint.
In arms contemptible, in arts profane,
Such ſwords, ſuch pens, diſgrace a monarch's reign.
Reform your lives before you thus aſpire,
And ſteal (for you can ſteal) celeſtial fire.
O! the juſt contraſt! O! the beauteous ſtrife!
'Twixt their cool writings, and Pindaric life:
They write with phlegm, but then they live with fire;
They cheat the lender, and their works the buyer.
I reverence misfortune, not deride;
I pity poverty, but laugh at pride:
For who ſo fad, but muſt ſome mirth confeſs
At gay Caſtruchio's miſcellaneous dreſs?
Though there's but one of the dull works he wrote,
There's ten editions of his old lac'd coat.
Theſe nature's commoners, who want a home,
Claim the wide world for their majeſtic dome;
They make a private ſtudy of the ſtreet;
And, looking full on every man they meet;

Run ſouſe againſt his chaps; who ſtands amaz'd
To find they did not ſee, but only gaz'd.
How muſt theſe bards be rapt into the ſkies?
You need not read, you feel their ecſtaſies.
Will they perſiſt? 'Tis madneſs; Lintot, run,
See them confin'd—" O, that's already done."
Moſt, as by leaſes, by the works they print,
Have took, for life, poſſeſſion of the mint.
If you miſtake, and pity theſe poor men,
Eſt ulubris, they cry, and write again.
Such wits their nuiſance manfully expoſe,
And then pronounce juſt judges learning's foes;
O frail concluſion; the reverſe is true;
If foes to learning, they'd be friends to you:
Treat them, ye judges! with an honeſt ſcorn,
And weed the cockle from the generous corn:
There's true good-nature in your diſreſpect;
In juſtice to the good, the bad neglect:
For immortality, if hardſhips plead,
It is not theirs who write, but ours who read.
But, O! what wiſdom can convince a fool,
But that 'tis dullneſs to conceive him dull?
'Tis ſad experience takes the cenſor's part,
Conviction, not from reaſon, but from ſmart.
A virgin-author, recent from the preſs,
The ſheets yet wet, applauds his great ſucceſs;
Surveys them, reads them, takes their charms to bed,
Thoſe in his hand, and glory in his head:
'Tis joy too great; a fever of delight!
His heart bears thick, nor cloſe his eyes all night:
But, riſing the next morn to claſp his fame,
He finds that, without ſleeping, he could dream:
So ſparks, they ſay, take goddeſſes to bed,
And find next day the devil in their ſtead.
In vain advertiſements the town o'erſpread;
They 're epitaphs, and ſay the work is dead.
Who preſs for fame, but ſmall recruits will raiſe;
'Tis volunteers alone can give the bays.
A famous author viſits a great man,
Of his immortal work diſplays the plan,
And ſays, " Sir, I'm your friend; all fears diſmiſs;
" Your glory, and my own, ſhall live by this;
" Your power is fixt, your fame through time
" convey'd;
" And Britain Europe's queen—if I am paid."
A ſtateſman has his anſwer in a trice;
" Sir, ſuch a genius is beyond all price;
" What man can pay for this?"—Away he turns:
His work is folded, and his boſom burns:
His patron he will patroniſe no more;
But ruſhes like a tempeſt out of door.
Loſt is the patriot, and extinct his name!
Out comes the piece, another, and the ſame;
For A, his magic pen evokes an O,
And turns the tide of Europe on the foe:
He rams his quill with ſcandal and with ſcoff;
But 'tis ſo very foul, it won't go off:
Dreadful his thunders, while unprinted, roar;
But when once publiſh'd, they are heard no more.
Thus diſtant bugbears fright, but nearer draw,
The block's a block, and turns to mirth your awe.
Can thoſe oblige, whoſe heads and hearts are ſuch?
No; every party's tainted by their touch.
Infected perſons fly each public place;
And none, or enemies alone, embrace:
To the foul fiend their every paſſion's ſold:
They love and hate, extempore, for gold:
What image of their fury can we form?
Dullneſs and rage, a puddle in a ſtorm.
Reſt they in peace? If you are pleas'd to buy,
To ſwell your ſails, like Lapland winds, they fly:
Write they with rage? The tempeſt quickly flags;
And ſtate-Ulyſſes tames them with his bags;
Let him be what he will, Turk, Pagan, Jew:
For Chriſtian miniſters of ſtate are few.
Behind the curtain lurks the fountain head,
That pours his politics through pipes of lead;
Which far and near ejaculate, and ſpout
O'er tea and coffee, poiſon to the rout:
But when they have beſpatter'd all they may,
The ſtateſman throws his filthy ſquirts away:
With golden forceps, theſe another takes,
And ſtate elixirs of the vipers makes.
The richeſt ſtateſman wants wherewith to pay
A ſervile ſycophant, if well they weigh
How much it coſts the wretch to be ſo baſe;
Nor can the greateſt powers enough diſgrace,
Enough chaſtiſe, ſuch proſtitute applauſe,
If well they weigh how much it ſtains their cauſe.
But are our writers ever in the wrong?
Does virtue ne'er ſeduce the venal tongue?
Yes; if well brib'd, for virtue's ſelf they fight;
Still in the wrong, though champions for the right:
Whoe'er their crimes for intereſt only quit,
Sin on in virtue, and good deeds commit.
Nought but inconſtancy Britannia meets,
And broken faith in their abandon'd ſheets;
From the ſame hand how various is the page!
What civil war their brother pamphlets wage!
Tracts battle tracts, ſelf-contradictions glare;
Say, is this lunacy?—I wiſh it were.
If ſuch our writers, ſtartled at the fight,
Felons may bleſs their ſtars they cannot write!
How juſtly Proteus' tranſmigrations fit
The monſtrous changes of a modern wit!
Now ſuch a gentle ſtream of eloquence
As ſeldom riſes to the verge of ſenſe;
Now by mad rage tranſform'd into a flame,
Which yet fit engines, well apply'd, can tame;
Now, on immodeſt traſh, the ſwine obſcene
Invites the town to ſup at Drury-lane;
A dreadful lion, now he roars at power,
Which ſends him to his brothers at the Tower;
He's now a ſerpent, and his double tongue
Salutes, nay licks, the feet of thoſe he ſtung;
What knot can bind him, his evaſion ſuch?
One knot he well deſerves, which might do much.
The flood, flame, ſwine, the lion, and the ſnake,
Thoſe fivefold monſters, modern authors make:
The ſnake reigns moſt; ſnakes, Pliny ſays, are bred,
When the brain's periſh'd in a human head.
Ye groveling, trodden, whipt, ſtript, turncoat things,
Made up of venom, volumes, ſtains, and ſtings!
Thrown from the tree of knowledge, like you curſt
To ſcribble in the duſt, was Snake the firſt.

What if the figure should in fact prove true?
It did in Elkenah *, why not in you?
Poor Elkenah, all other changes past,
For bread in Smithfield dragons hist at last,
Spit streams of fire to make the butchers gape,
And found his manners suited to his shape:
Such is the fate of talents misapply'd;
So liv'd your prototype; and so he dy'd.
Th' abandon'd manners of our writing train
May tempt mankind to think religion vain;
But in their fate, their habit, and their mien,
That gods there are is eminently seen:
Heaven stands absolv'd by vengeance on their pen,
And marks the murderers of fame from men:
Through meagre jaws they draw their venal breath,
As gastly as their brothers in Macbeth:
Their feet through faithless leather meet the dirt,
And oftner chang'd their principles than shirt.
The transient vestments of these frugal men,
Hastens to paper for our mirth again:
Too soon (O merry-melancholy fate!)
They beg in rhyme, and warble through a grate:
The man lampoon'd forgets it at the sight; [spite;
The friend through pity gives, the foe through
And, though full conscious of his injur'd purse,
Lintot relents, nor Curll can wish them worse.
So fare the men, who writers dare commence
Without their patent, probity and sense.
From these, their politics our quidnuncs seek,
And Saturday's the learning of the week:
These labouring wits, like paviors, mend our ways,
With heavy, huge, repeated, flat essays; [dull;
Ram their coarse nonsense down, though ne'er so
And hem at every thump upon your skull:
These staunch-bred writing hounds begin the cry,
And honest folly echoes to the lie.
O how I laugh, when I a blockhead see,
Thanking a villain for his probity!
Who stretches out a most respectful ear,
With snares for woodcocks in his holy leer:
It tickles through my soul to hear the cock's
Sincere encomium on his friend the fox,
Sole patron of his liberties and rights!
While graceless Reynard listens—till he bites.
As when the trumpet sounds, th' o'erloaded state
Discharges all her poor and profligate;
Crimes of all kinds dishonour'd weapons wield,
And prisons pour their filth into the field;
Thus nature's refuse, and the dregs of men,
Compose the black militia of the pen.

EPISTLE II.

FROM OXFORD.

All write at London; shall the rage abate
Here, where it most should shine, the muses' seat?
Where mortal, or immortal, as they please,
The learn'd may choose eternity or ease?
Has not a † royal patron wisely strove
To woo the muse in her Athenian grove?
Added new strings to her harmonious shell,
And given new tongues to those who spoke so well?

Let these instruct with truth's illustrious ray,
Awake the world, and scare our owls away.
Meanwhile, O friend! indulge me, if I give
Some needful precepts how to write and live;
Serious should be an author's final views;
Who write for pure amusement, ne'er amuse.
An author! 'Tis a venerable name!
How few deserve it, and what numbers claim!
Unblest with sense above their peers refin'd,
Who shall stand up dictators to mankind?
Nay, who dare shine, if not in virtue's cause,
The sole proprietor of just applause?
Ye restless men, who pant for letter'd praise,
With whom would you consult to gain the bays?—
With those great authors whose fam'd works you read?
'Tis well: go then, consult the laurell'd shade,
What answer will the laurell'd shade return?
Hear it, and tremble! he commands you burn
The noblest works his envy'd genius writ,
That boast of nought more excellent than wit.
If this be true, as 'tis a truth most dread,
Woe to the page which has not that to plead!
Fontaine and Chaucer, dying, wish'd unwrote
The sprightliest efforts of their wanton thought:
Sidney and Waller, brightest sons of fame,
Condemn the charm of ages to the flame:
And in one point is all true wisdom cast,
To think that early we must think at last.
Immortal wits, ev'n dead, break nature's laws,
Injurious still to virtue's sacred cause;
And their guilt growing, as their bodies rot,
(Revers'd ambition!) pant to be forgot.
Thus ends your courted fame: does lucre then,
The sacred thirst of gold, betray your pen?
In prose 'tis blameable, in verse 'tis worse,
Provokes the muse, extorts Apollo's curse;
His sacred influence never should be sold;
'Tis arrant simony to sing for gold:
'Tis immortality should fire your mind;
Scorn a less paymaster than all mankind.
If bribes ye seek, know this, ye writing tribe!
Who writes for virtue has the largest bribe:
All 's on the party of the virtuous man;
The good will surely serve him, if they can;
The bad, when interest or ambition guide,
And 'tis at once their interest and their pride:
But should both fail to take him to their care,
He boasts a greater friend, and both may spare.
Letters to man uncommon light dispense;
And what is virtue, but superior sense?
In parts and learning ye who place your pride,
Your faults are crimes, your crimes are double-dy'd.
What is a scandal of the first renown,
But letter'd knaves, and atheists in a gown?
'Tis harder far to please than give offence;
The least misconduct damns the brightest sense;
Each shallow pate, that cannot read your name,
Can read your life, and will be proud to blame.
Flagitious manners make impressions deep
On those that o'er a page of Milton sleep:
Nor in their dulness think to save your shame,
True, these are fools; but wise men say the same.
Wits are a despicable race of men,
If they confine their talents to the pen;

* Settle, the city poet.
† King George I.

When the man ſhocks us, while the writer ſhines,
Our ſcorn in life, our envy in his lines.
Yet, proud of parts, with prudence ſome diſpenſe,
And play the fool, becauſe they're men of ſenſe.
What inſtances bleed recent in each thought,
Of men to ruin by their genius brought!
Againſt their wills what numbers ruin ſhun,
Purely through want of wit to be undone?
Nature has ſhown, by making it ſo rare,
That wit 's a jewel which we need not wear.
Of plain ſound ſenſe life's current coin is made;
With that we drive the moſt ſubſtantial trade.
Prudence protects and guides us, wit betrays;
A ſplendid ſource of ill ten thouſand ways;
A certain ſnare to miſeries immenſe;
A gay prerogative from common ſenſe;
Unleſs ſtrong judgment that wild thing can tame,
And break to paths of virtue and of fame.
But grant your judgment equal to the beſt,
Senſe fills your head, and genius fires your breaſt;
Yet ſtill forbear: your wit (conſider well)
'Tis great to ſhow, but greater to conceal;
As it is great to ſeize the golden prize
Of place or power; but greater to deſpiſe.
If ſtill you languiſh for an author's name,
Think private merit leſs than public fame,
And fancy not to write is not to live;
Deſerve, and take, the great prerogative.
But ponder what it is; how dear 't will coſt,
To write one page which you may juſtly boaſt.
Senſe may be good, yet not deſerve the preſs;
Who write, an awful character profeſs;
The world as pupil of their wiſdom claim,
And for their ſtipend an immortal fame:
Nothing but what is ſolid or refin'd,
Should dare aſk public audience of mankind.
Severely weigh your learning and your wit:
Keep down your pride by what is nobly writ:
No writer, fann'd in your own way, paſs o'er;
Much truſt example, but reflection more:
More had the ancients writ, they more had taught;
Which ſhows ſome work is left for modern thought.
This weigh'd perfection know; and, know
Toil, burn for that; but do not aim at more;
Above, beneath it, the juſt limits fix;
And zealouſly prefer four lines to ſix.
Write, and re-write, blot out, and write again,
And for its ſwiftneſs ne'er applaud your pen.
Leave to the jockeys that Newmarket praiſe,
Slow runs the Pegaſus that wins the bays.
Much time for immortality to pay,
Is juſt and wiſe; for leſs is thrown away.
Time only can mature the labouring brain;
Time is the father, and the midwife pain:
The ſame good ſenſe that makes a man excel,
Still makes him doubt he ne'er has written well.
Downright impoſſibilities they ſeek;
What man can be immortal in a week?
Excuſe no fault; though beautiful, 't will harm;
One fault ſhocks more than twenty beauties charm.
Our age demands correctneſs; Addiſon
And you this commendable hurt have done.
Now writers find, as once Achilles found,
The whole is mortal, if a part 's unſound.

He that ſtrikes out, and ſtrikes not out the beſt,
Pours luſtre in, and dignifies the reſt:
Give e'er ſo little, if what's right be there,
We praiſe for what you burn, and what you ſpare:
The part you burn, ſmells ſweet before the ſhrine,
And is an incenſe to the part divine.
Nor frequent write, though you can do it well;
Men may too oft, though not too much, excel.
A few good works gain fame; more ſink their price;
Mankind are fickle, and hate paying twice:
They granted you writ well, what can they more,
Unleſs you let them praiſe for giving o'er?
Do boldly what you do; and let your page
Smile, if it ſmiles, and if it rages, rage.
So faintly Lucius cenſures and commends,
That Lucius has no foes, except his friends.
Let ſatire leſs engage you than applauſe;
It ſhows a generous mind to wink at flaws:
Is genius yours? Be yours a glorious end,
Be your king's, country's, truth's religion's friend;
The public glory by your own beget;
Run nations, run poſterity, in debt.
And ſince the fam'd alone make others live,
Firſt have that glory you preſume to give.
If ſatire charms, ſtrike faults, but ſpare the man;
'Tis dull to be as witty as you can.
Satire recoils whenever charg'd too high;
Round your own fame the fatal ſplinters fly.
As the ſoft plume gives ſwiftneſs to the dart,
Good-breeding ſends the ſatire to the heart.
Painters and ſurgeons may the ſtructure ſcan;
Genius and morals be with you the man:
Defaults in thoſe alone ſhould give offence!
Who ſtrikes the perſon, pleads his innocence.
My narrow-minded ſatire can't extend
To Codrus' form; I'm not ſo much his friend:
Himſelf ſhould publiſh that (the world agree)
Before his works, or in the pillory.
Let him be black, fair, tall, ſhort, thin, or fat,
Dirty or clean, I find no theme in that.
Is that call'd humour? It has this pretence.
'Tis neither virtue, breeding, wit, or ſenſe.
Unleſs you boaſt the genius of a Swift,
Beware of humour, the dull rogue's laſt ſhift.
Can others write like you? Your taſk give o'er,
'Tis printing what was publiſh'd long before.
If nought peculiar through your labours run,
They're duplicates, and twenty are but one.
Think frequently, think cloſe, read nature, turn
Mens manners o'er, and half your volumes burn;
To nurſe with quick reflection be your ſtrife,
Thoughts born from preſent objects, warm from life;
When moſt unſought, ſuch inſpirations riſe,
Slighted by fools, and cheriſh'd by the wiſe:
Expect peculiar fame from theſe alone;
Theſe make an author, theſe are all your own.
Life, like their Bibles, coolly men turn o'er;
Hence unexperienc'd children of threeſcore.
True, all men think of courſe, as all men dream;
And if they ſlightly think, 'tis much the ſame.
Letters admit not of a half renown;
They give you nothing, or they give a crown.

No work e'er gain'd true fame, or ever can,
But what did honour to the name of man.
Weighty the subject, cogent the diſcourſe,
Clear be the ſtyle, the very ſound of force:
Eaſy the conduct, ſimple the deſign,
Striking the moral, and the ſoul divine:
Let nature art, and judgment wit, exceed;
O'er learning reaſon reign; o'er that, your Creed;
Thus virtue's ſeeds, at once, and laurel's grow;
Do thus, and riſe a Pope, or a Deſpreau:
And when your genius exquiſitely ſhines,
Live up to the full luſtre of your lines:
Parts but expoſe thoſe men who virtue quit;
A fallen angel is a fallen wit;
And they plead Lucifer's deteſted cauſe,
Who for bare talents challenge our applauſe.
Would you reſtore juſt honours to the pen?
From able writers riſe to worthy men.
" Who's this with nonſenſe, nonſenſe would
" reſtrain?
" Who's this (they cry) ſo vainly ſchools the vain?
" Who damns our traſh, with ſo much traſh re-
" plete?
" As, three ells round, huge Cheyne rails at meat?"
Shall I with Bavius then my voice exalt,
And challenge all mankind to find one fault?
With huge examens overwhelm my page,
And darken reaſon with dogmatic rage?
As if, one tedious volume writ in rhyme,
In proſe a duller could excuſe the crime?
Sure, next to writing, the moſt idle thing
Is gravely to harangue on what we ſing.
At that tribunal ſtands the writing tribe,
Which nothing can intimidate or bribe,
Time is the judge: time has nor friend nor foe;
Falſe fame muſt wither, and the true will grow.
Arm'd with this truth, all critics I defy;
For if I fall, by my own pen I die;
While ſnarlers ſtrive with proud but fruitleſs pain,
To wound immortals, or to ſlay the ſlain.
Sore preſt with danger, and in awful dread
Of twenty pamphlets levell'd at my head,
Thus have I forg'd a buckler in my brain,
Of recent form, to ſerve me this campaign;
And ſafely hope to quit the dreadful field
Delug'd with ink, and ſleep behind my ſhield:
Unleſs dire Codrus rouſes to the fray
In all his might, and damns me—for a day.
As turns a flock of geeſe, and, on the green,
Poke out their fooliſh necks in awkward ſpleen,
(Ridiculous in rage!) to biſs, not bite,
So war their quills, when ſons of dullneſs write.

TO THE

RIGHT HON. SIR ROBERT WALPOLE.

By Mr. Doddington.

AFTERWARDS LORD MELCOMBE.

" —Quæ cenſet Amiculus, ut ſi
" Cæcus iter monſtrare velit—" HOR.

THOUGH ſtrength of genius, by experience taught,
Gives thee to ſound the depths of human thought,
To trace the various workings of the mind,
And rule the ſecret ſprings, that rule mankind;
(Rare gift!) yet, Walpole, wilt thou condeſcend
To liſten, if thy unexperienc'd friend
Can aught of uſe impart, though void of ſkill,
And win attention by ſincere good-will;
For friendſhip, ſometimes, want of parts ſupplies,
The heart may furniſh what the head denies.
As when the rapid Rhone, o'er ſwelling tides,
To grace old Ocean's court, in triumph rides,
Though rich his ſource, he drains a thouſand
ſprings,
Nor ſcorns the tribute each ſmall rivulet brings.
So thou ſhalt, hence, abſorb each feeble ray,
Each dawn of meaning, in thy brighter day;
Shalt like, or, where thou canſt not like, excuſe,
Since no mean intereſt ſhall profane the muſe,
No malice, wrapt in truth's diſguiſe, offend,
Nor flattery taint the freedom of the friend.
When firſt a generous mind ſurveys the great,
And views the crowds that on their fortune wait;
Pleas'd with the ſhow (though little underſtood)
He only ſeeks the power, to do the good;
Thinks, till he tries, 'tis godlike to diſpoſe,
And gratitude ſtill ſprings, where bounty ſows;
That every grant ſincere affection wins,
And where our wants have end, our love begins:
But thoſe who long the paths of ſtate have trod,
Learn from the clamours of the murmuring crowd,
Which cramm'd, yet craving ſtill, their gates beſiege,
'Tis eaſier far to give, than to oblige.
This of thy conduct ſeems the niceſt part,
The chief perfection of the ſtateſman's art,
To give to fair aſſent a fairer face,
Or ſoften a refuſal into grace:
But few there are that can be truly kind,
Or know to fix their favours on the mind;
Hence, ſome, whene'er they would oblige, offend,
And while they make the fortune, loſe the friend;
Still give, unthank'd; ſtill ſquander, not beſtow;
For great men want not, what to give, but how.
The race of men that follow courts, 'tis true,
Think all they get, and more than all, their due;
Still aſk, but ne'er conſult their own deſerts,
And meaſure by their intereſt, not their parts:
From this miſtake ſo many men we ſee,
But ill become the thing they wiſh'd to be;
Hence diſcontent, and freſh demands ariſe,
More power, more favour in the great man's eyes;
All feel a want, though none the cauſe ſuſpects,
But hate their patron, for their own defects;
Such none can pleaſe, but who reforms their hearts,
And, when he gives them places, gives them
parts.
As theſe o'erprize their worth, ſo ſure the great
May ſell their favour at too dear a rate;
When merit pines, while clamour is preferr'd,
And long attachment waits among the herd;
When no diſtinction, where diſtinction's due,
Marks from the many the ſuperior few;
When ſtrong cabal conſtrains them to be juſt,
And makes them give at laſt—becauſe they muſt;
What hopes that men of real worth ſhould prize,
What neither friendſhip gives, nor merit buys?

The man who juſtly o'er the whole preſides,
His well-weigh'd choice with wiſe affection guides;
Knows when to ſtop with grace, and when advance,
Nor gives through importunity or chance;
But thinks how little gratitude is ow'd,
When favours are extorted, not beſtow'd.
When, ſafe on ſhore ourſelves, we ſee the crowd
Surround the great, importunate, and loud;
Through ſuch a tumult, 'tis no eaſy taſk
To drive the man of real worth to aſk:
Surrounded thus, and giddy with the ſhow,
'Tis hard for great men, rightly to beſtow;
From hence ſo few are ſkill'd, in either caſe,
To aſk with dignity, or give with grace.
Sometimes the great, ſeduc'd by love of parts,
Conſult our genius, and neglect our hearts;
Pleas'd with the glittering ſparks that genius flings,
They lift us, towering on their eagle's wings,
Mark out the flights by which themſelves begun,
And teach our dazzled eyes to bear the ſun;
Till we forget the hand that made us great,
And grow to envy, not to emulate:
To emulate, a generous warmth implies,
To reach the virtues, that make great men riſe;
But envy wears a mean malignant face,
And aims not at their virtues—but their place.
Such to oblige, how vain is the pretence!
When every favour is a freſh offence,
By which ſuperior power is ſtill imply'd,
And, while it helps their fortune, hurts their pride.
Slight is the hate, neglect or hardſhips breed;
But thoſe who hate from envy, hate indeed.
"Since ſo perplex'd the choice, whom ſhall we truſt?"
Methinks I hear thee cry—The brave and juſt;
The man by no mean fears or hopes controul'd,
Who ſerves thee from affection, not for gold.
We love the honeſt, and eſteem the brave,
Deſpiſe the coxcomb, but deteſt the knave;
No ſhow of parts the truly wiſe ſeduce,
To think that knaves can be of real uſe.
The man, who contradicts the public voice,
And ſtrives to dignify a worthleſs choice,
Attempts a taſk that on that choice reflects,
And lends us light to point out new defects.
One worthleſs man, that gains what he pretends,
Diſguſts a thouſand unpretending friends:
And ſince no art can make a counterpaſs,
Or add the weight of gold to mimic braſs,
When princes to bad ore their image join,
They more debaſe the ſtamp, than raiſe the coin.
Be thine the care, true merit to reward,
And gain the good—nor will that taſk be hard;
Souls form'd alike ſo quick by nature blend,
An honeſt man is more than half thy friend.
Him, no mean views, or haſte to riſe, ſhall ſway,
Thy choice to ſully, or thy truſt betray:
Ambition, here, ſhall at due diſtance ſtand;
Nor is wit dangerous in an honeſt hand:
Beſides, if failings at the bottom lie,
We view thoſe failings with a lover's eye;
Though ſmall his genius, let him do his beſt,
Our wiſhes and belief ſupply the reſt.
Let others barter ſervile faith for gold,
His friendſhip is not to be bought or ſold:
Fierce oppoſition he, unmov'd, ſhall face,
Modeſt in favour, daring in diſgrace,
To ſhare thy adverſe fate alone, pretend;
In power, a ſervant; out of power, a friend.
Here pour thy favours in an ample flood,
Indulge thy boundleſs thirſt of doing good:
Nor think that good to him alone confin'd;
Such to oblige, is to oblige mankind.
If thus thy mighty maſter's ſteps thou trace,
The brave to cheriſh, and the good to grace;
Long ſhalt thou ſtand from rage and faction free,
And teach us long to love the king, through thee:
Or fall a victim dangerous to the foe,
And make him tremble when he ſtrikes the blow;
While honour, gratitude, affection join
To deck thy cloſe, and brighten thy decline;
(Illuſtrious doom!) the great, when thus diſplac'd,
With friendſhip guarded, and with virtue grac'd,
In awful ruin, like Rome's ſenate, fall,
The prey and worſhip of the wondering Gaul.
No doubt, to genius ſome reward is due,
(Excluding that, were ſatirizing you:)
But yet, believe thy undeſigning friend,
When truth and genius for thy choice contend,
Though both have weight when in the balance caſt,
Let probity be firſt, and parts the laſt.
On theſe foundations if thou dar'ſt be great,
And check the growth of folly and deceit;
When party rage ſhall droop through length of days,
And calumny be ripen'd into praiſe,
Then future times ſhall to thy worth allow
That fame, which envy would call flattery now.
Thus far my zeal, though for the taſk unfit,
Has pointed out the rocks where others ſplit;
By that inſpir'd, though ſtranger to the nine,
And negligent of any fame—but thine,
I take the friendly, but ſuperfluous part;
You act from nature what I teach from art.

THE OLD MAN'S RELAPSE.

VERSES OCCASIONED BY THE FOREGOING EPISTLE.

"—Sopitos ſuſcitat ignes."—VIRG.

FROM man's too curious and impatient ſight,
The future, heaven involves in thickeſt night.
Credit gray hairs: though freedom much we boaſt,
Some leaſt perform, what they determine moſt.
What ſudden changes our reſolves betray?
To-morrow is a ſatire on to-day,
And ſhows its weakneſs. Whom ſhall men believe,
When conſtantly themſelves, themſelves deceive.

Long had I bid my once-lov'd muſe adieu;
You warm old age; my paſſion burns anew.
How ſweet your verſe! how great your force of mind!
What power of words! what ſkill in dark man-kind!
Polite the conduct; generous the deſign;
And beauty ſiles, and ſtrength ſuſtains each line.

Thus Mars and Venus are once more beſet;
Your wit has caught them in its golden net.

But what ſtrikes home with moſt exalted grace,
Is haughty genius taught to know its place;
And where worth ſhines, its humbled creſt to bend,
With zeal devoted to that godlike end.
When we diſcern ſo rich a vein of ſenſe,
Through the ſmooth flow of pureſt eloquence;
'Tis like the limpid ſtreams of Tagus roll'd
O'er boundleſs wealth, o'er ſhining beds of gold.

But whence ſo finiſh'd, ſo refin'd a piece?
The tongue denies it to old Rome and Greece;
The genius bids the moderns doubt their claim,
And ſlowly take poſſeſſion of the fame.
But I nor know, nor care by whom 'twas writ,
Enough for me that 'tis from human wit,
That ſooths my pride: all glory in the pen
Which has done honour to the race of men.

But this have others done; a like applauſe
An ancient and a * modern Horace draws.
But they to glory by degrees aroſe,
Meridian luſtre you at once diſcloſe.
'Tis continence of mind unknown before,
To write ſo well, and yet to write no more.
More bright renown can human nature claim,
Than to deſerve, and fly immortal fame?

Next to the godlike praiſe of writing well,
Is on that praiſe with juſt delight to dwell.
O for ſome god my drooping ſoul to raiſe!
That I might imitate, as well as praiſe;
For all commend: ev'n foes your fame confeſs;
Nor would Auguſtus' age have priz'd it leſs;
An age, which had not held its pride ſo long,
But for the want of ſo complete a ſong.

A golden period ſhall from you commence:
Peace ſhall be ſign'd 'twixt wit and manly ſenſe;
Whether your genius or your rank they view,
The muſes find their Halifax in you.
Like him ſucceed! nor think my zeal is ſhown
For you; 'tis Britain's intereſt, not your own;

* Boileau.

For lofty ſtations are but golden ſnares,
Which tempt the great to fall in love with cares.

I would proceed, but age has chill'd my vein,
'Twas a ſhort fever, and I'm cool again.
Though life I hate, methinks I could renew
Its taſteleſs, painful courſe, to ſing of you.
When ſuch the ſubject, who ſhall curb his flight?
When ſuch your genius, who ſhall dare to write?
In pure reſpect, I give my rhyming o'er,
And to commend you moſt, commend no more.

Adieu, whoe'er thou art! on death's pale coaſt
Ere long I'll talk thee o'er with Dryden's ghoſt;
The bard will ſmile. A laſt, a long farewell!
Henceforth I hide me in my duſky cell;
There wait the friendly ſtroke that ſets me free,
And think of immortality and thee—
My ſtrains are number'd by the tuneful nine;
Each maid preſents her thanks, and all preſent thee mine.

VERSES,

Sent by Lord Melcombe to Dr. Young, not long before his Lordſhip's Death *.

KIND companion of my youth,
Lov'd for genius, worth, and truth!
Take what friendſhip can impart,
Tribute of a feeling heart;
Take the muſe's lateſt ſpark,
Ere we drop into the dark.
He who parts and virtue gave,
Bade thee look beyond the grave:
Genius ſoars, and virtue glides;
Above the love of God preſides.
There's a gulf 'twixt us and God;
Let the gloomy path be trod:
Why ſtand ſhivering on the ſhore?
Why not boldly venture o'er?
Where unerring virtue guides,
Let us have the winds and tides:
Safe through ſeas of doubts and fears,
Rides the bark which virtue ſteers.

SEA-PIECE:

CONTAINING,

I. THE BRITISH SAILOR'S EXULTATION.
II. HIS PRAYER BEFORE ENGAGEMENT.

THE DEDICATION.

TO MR. VOLTAIRE.

MY muſe, a bird of paſſage, flies
From frozen clime to milder ſkies;
From chilling blaſts ſhe ſeeks thy cheering beam,
A beam of favour, here deny'd;
Conſcious of faults, her bluſhing pride
Hopes an aſylum in ſo great a name.

* To dive full deep in ancient days,
The warriors' ardent deeds to raiſe,
And monarch's aggrandize;—the glory thine;
Thine is the drama, how renown'd!
Thine epic's loftier trump to ſound;—
But let Arion's ſea-ſtrung harp be mine:

* Annals of the Emperor Charles XII. Lewis XIV.

But where's his dolphin? Know'ſt thou where?
May that be found in thee, Voltaire!
Save thou from harm my plunge into the wave:
How will thy name illuſtrious raiſe
My ſinking ſong! Mere mortal lays
So patronis'd, are reſcued from the grave.

"Tell me," ſay'ſt thou, who courts my ſmile?
"What ſtranger" ſtray'd from yonder iſle!—
No ſtranger, Sir! though born in foreign climes;
On Dorſet downs, when Milton's page,
With ſin and death, provok'd thy rage,
Thy rage provok'd, who ſooth'd with gentle rhymes?

Who kindly couch'd thy cenſure's eye,
And gave thee clearly to deſcry
Sound judgment giving law to fancy ſtrong?
Who half inclin'd thee to confeſs,
Nor could thy modeſty do leſs,
That Milton's blindneſs lay not in his ſong?

But ſuch debates long ſince are flown;
For ever ſet the ſuns that ſhone
On airy paſtimes, ere our brows were gray:
How ſhortly ſhall we both forget,
To thee my patron I my debt,
And thou to thine for Pruſſia's golden key.

The preſent in oblivion caſt,
Full ſoon ſhall ſleep, as ſleeps the paſt;
Full ſoon the wide diſtinction die between
The frowns and favours of the great;
High fluſh'd ſucceſs, and pale defeat;
The Gaelic gaiety, and Britiſh ſpleen.

Ye wing'd, ye rapid moments! ſtay:
Oh friend! as deaf as rapid they;
Life's little drama done, the curtain falls!—
Doſt thou not hear it? I can hear,
Though nothing ſtrikes the liſtening ear;
Time groans his laſt! Eternal loudly calls!

Nor calls in vain; the call inſpires
Far other counſels and deſires,
Than once prevail'd; we ſtand on higher ground;
What ſcenes we ſee —Exalted aim?
With ardours new our ſpirits flame;
Ambition bleſt! with more than laurels crown'd.

ODE I.

THE BRITISH SAILOR'S EXULTATION.

In lofty ſounds let thoſe delight
Who brave the foe, but fear the fight;
And bold in word, of arms decline the ſtroke:
'Tis mean to boaſt; but great to lend
To foes the counſel of a friend,
And warn them of the vengeance they provoke.

From whence ariſe theſe loud alarms?
Why gleams the ſouth with brandiſh'd arms?
War, bath'd in blood, from curſt ambition ſprings:
Ambition! mean, ignoble pride!
Perhaps their ardours may ſubſide,
When weigh'd the wonders Britain's ſailor ſings.

Hear, and revere.—At Britain's nod,
From each enchanted grove and wood
Haſtes the huge oak, or ſhadeleſs foreſt leaves;
The mountain pines aſſume new forms,
Spread canvas wings, and fly through ſtorms,
And ride o'er rocks, and dance on foaming waves.

She nods again: the labouring earth
Diſcloſes a tremend'ous birth;
In ſmoking rivers runs her molten ore;
Thence monſters of enormous ſize,
And hideous aſpect, threatening riſe,
Flame from the deck, from trembling baſtions roar.

Theſe miniſters of fate fulfil,
On empires wide, an iſland's will,
When thrones unjuſt wake vengeance: know, ye powers!
In ſudden night, and ponderous balls,
And floods of flame, the tempeſt falls,
When brav'd Britannia's awful ſenate lowers.

In her * grand council ſhe ſurveys,
In patriot picture, what may raiſe,
Of inſolent attempts, a warm diſdain;
From hope's triumphant ſummit thrown,
Like darted lightning, ſwiftly down
The wealth of Ind, and confidence of Spain.

Britannia ſheaths her courage keen,
And ſpares her nitrous magazine;
Her cannon ſlumber, till the proud aſpire,
And leave all law below them; then they blaze!
They thunder from reſounding ſeas,
Touch'd by their injur'd maſter's ſoul of fire.

Then furies riſe! the battle raves!
And rends the ſkies! and warms the waves!
And calls a tempeſt from the peaceful deep;
In ſpite of nature, ſpite of Jove,
While all-ſerene, and huſh'd above,
Tumultuous winds in azure chambers ſleep.

A thouſand deaths the burſting bomb
Hurls from her diſembowel'd womb;
Chain'd, glowing globes, in dread alliance join'd,
Red-wing'd by ſtrong, ſulphureous blaſts,
Sweep, in black whirlwinds, men and maſts;
And leave ſing'd, naked, blood-drown'd, decks behind.

Dwarf laurels riſe in tented fields;
The wreath immortal ocean yields;
There war's whole ſting is ſhot, whole fire is ſpent,
Whole glory blooms: how pale, how tame,
How lambent in Bellona's flame;
How her ſtorms languiſh on the continent!

From the dread front of ancient war
Leſs terror frown'd; her ſcythed car,
Her caſtled elephant, and battering beam,
Stoop to thoſe engines which deny
Superior terrors to the ſky,
And boaſt their clouds, their thunder, and their flame.

The flame, the thunder, and the cloud,
The night by day, the ſea of blood,
Hoſts whirl'd in air, the yell of ſinking throngs,
The graveleſs dead, an ocean warm'd,
A firmament by mortals ſtorm'd,
To patient Britain's angry brow belongs.

* Houſe of Lords.

Or do I dream? Or do I rave?
Or see I Vulcan's sooty cave,
Where Jove's red bolts the giant brothers frame?
Those swarthy gods of toil and heat,—
Loud peals on mountain anvils beat,
And panting tempests rouse the roaring flame.

Ye sons of Ætna! hear my call;
Unfinish'd let those baubles fall,
Yon shield of Mars, Minerva's helmet blue:
Your strokes suspend, ye brawny throng!
Charm'd by the magic of my song,
Drop the feign'd thunder, and attempt the true.

Begin: * and first take rapid flight,
Fierce flame, and clouds of thickest night,
And ghastly terror, paler than the dead;
Then borrow from the north his roar,
Mix groans and deaths; one phial pour
Of wrong'd Britannia's wrath; and it is made;
Gaul starts and trembles—at your dreadful trade.

ODE II:

IN WHICH IS

THE SAILOR'S PRAYER BEFORE ENGAGEMENT.

So form'd the bolt, ordain'd to break
Gaul's haughty plan, and Bourbon shake;
If Britain's crimes support not Britain's foes,
And edge their swords: O power divine!
If blest by thee the bold design,
Embattled hosts a single arm o'erthrows.

Ye warlike dead, who fell of old
In Britain's cause, by fame enroll'd
In deathless annal! deathless deeds inspire;
From oozy beds, for Britain's sake,
Awake, illustrious chiefs! awake;
And kindle in your sons paternal fire.

The day commission'd from above,
Our worth to weigh, our hearts to prove,
If war's full stock too feeble to sustain;
Or firm to stand its final blow,
When vital streams of blood shall flow,
And turn to crimson the discolour'd main;

That day's arriv'd, that fatal hour!—
"Hear us, O hear, Almighty Power!
" Our guide in counsel, and our strength in fight!
" Now war's important die is thrown,
" If left the day to man alone,
" How blind is wisdom, and how weak is might!

" Let prostrate hearts, and awful fear,
" And deep remorse, and sighs sincere
" For Britain's guilt the wrath divine appease;
" A wrath, more formidable far
" Than angry nature's wasteful war,
" The whirl of tempests, and the roar of seas.

" From out the deep to thee we cry,
" To thee at nature's helm on high!

" Steer thou our conduct, dread Omnipotence!
" To thee for succour we resort;
" Thy favour is our only port;
" Our only rock of safety, thy defence.

" O thou, to whom the lions roar,
" And, not unheard, thy boon implore!
" Thy throne our bursts of cannon loud invoke:
" Thou canst arrest the flying ball;
" Or send it back and bid it fall
" On those from whose proud deck the thunder
" broke.

" Britain in vain extends her care
" To climes * remote, for aids in war;
" Still farther must it stretch to crush the foe;
" There's one alliance, one alone,
" Can crown her arms, or fix her throne;
" And that alliance is not found below.

" Ally Supreme! we turn to thee;
" We learn obedience from the sea;
" With seas and winds, henceforth thy laws fulfil;
" 'Tis thine our blood to freeze, or warm;
" To rouse or hush the martial storm;
" And turn the tide of conquest at thy will.

" 'Tis thine to beam sublime renown,
" Or quench the glories of a crown;
" 'Tis thine to doom, 'tis thine from death to
" free;
" To turn aside his levell'd dart,
" Or pluck it from the bleeding heart:—
" There we cast anchor, we confide in thee.

" Thou, who hast taught the north to roar,
" And streaming † lights nocturnal pour
" Of frightful aspect! when proud foes invade,
" Their blasted pride with dread to seize,
" Bid Britain's flags as meteor's blaze;
" And George depute to thunder in thy stead.

" The right alone is bold and strong;
" Black, hovering clouds appal the wrong
" With dread of vengeance: nature's awful
" fire!
" Less than one moment should'st thou frown
" Where is puissance and renown?
" Thrones tremble, empires sink, or worlds ex-
" pire.

" Let George the just chastise the vain:
" Thou, who durst curb the rebel main,
" To mount the shore when boiling billows
" rave!
" Bid George repel a bolder tide,
" The boundless swell of Gallic pride;
" And check ambition's overwhelming wave.

" And when (all milder means withstood)
" Ambition, tam'd by loss of blood,
" Regains her reason; then, on angels wings,
" Let peace descend, and shouting greet,
" With peals of joy, Britannia's fleet,
" How richly freighted! It triumphant, brings
" The poise of kingdoms, and the fate of kings."

IMPERIUM PELAGI.

A NAVAL LYRIC:

WRITTEN IN IMITATION OF PINDAR'S SPIRIT.

OCCASIONED BY HIS MAJESTY'S RETURN, SEPT. 1729, AND THE SUCCEEDING PEACE.

" Monte decurrens velut amnis, imbres
" Quem ſuper notas aluere ripas,
" Fervet, immenſuſque ruit profundo. PIND.

" Concines lætoſque dies, & urbis
" Publicum ludum, ſuper impetrato
" Fortis AUGUSTI reditu." HOR.

PREFACE.

A PINDARIC carries a formidable ſound; but there is nothing formidable in the true nature of it; of which (with utmoſt ſubmiſſion) I conceive the critics have hitherto entertained a falſe idea. Pindar is as natural as Anacreon, though not ſo familiar. As a fixt ſtar is as much in the bounds of nature, as a flower of the field, though leſs obvious, and of greater dignity. This is not the received notion of Pindar; I ſhall therefore ſoon ſupport at large that hint which is now given.

Trade is a very noble ſubject in itſelf; more proper than any for an Engliſhman; and particularly ſeaſonable at this juncture.

We have more ſpecimens of good writing in every province, than in the ſublime; our two famous epic poems excepted. I was willing to make an attempt where I had feweſt rivals.

If, on reading this ode, any man has a fuller idea of the real intereſt, or poſſible glory of his country, than before; or a ſtronger impreſſion from it, or a warmer concern for it, I give up to the critic any farther reputation.

We have many copies and tranſlations that paſs for originals. This ode I humbly conceive is an original, though it profeſſes imitation. No man can be like Pindar, by imitating any of his particular works; any more than like Raphael, by copying the cartoons. The genius and ſpirit of ſuch great men muſt be collected from the whole; and when thus we are poſſeſſed of it, we muſt exert its energy in ſubjects and deſigns of our own. Nothing is ſo unpindarical as following Pindar on the foot. Pindar is an original, and he muſt be ſo too, who would be like Pindar in that which is his greateſt praiſe. Nothing ſo unlike as a cloſe copy, and a noble original.

As for length, Pindar has an unbroken ode of ſix hundred lines. Nothing is long or ſhort in writing, but relatively to the demand of the ſubject, and the manner of treating it. A diſtich may be long, and a folio ſhort. However, I have broken this ode into ſtrains, each of which may be conſidered as a ſeparate ode if you pleaſe. And if the variety and fullneſs of matter be conſidered, I am rather apprehenſive of danger from brevity in this ode, than from length. But lank writing is what I think ought moſt to be declined, if for nothing elſe, for our plenty of it.

The ode is the moſt ſpirited kind of poetry, and the Pindaric is the moſt ſpirited kind of ode; this I ſpeak at my own very great peril: but truth has an eternal title to our confeſſion, though we are ſure to ſuffer by it.

THE MERCHANT.

ODE I.

ON THE

BRITISH TRADE AND NAVIGATION.

TO HIS GRACE THE DUKE OF CHANDOS.

πλατεῖαι πάντοθεν λιγύοι-
σιν ἔνεστι πρόσοδοι
νᾶσον ἰυκλέα τάν-
δε κοσμεῖν. PIND. Nem. Od. VI.

THE PRELUDE.

The Propoſition. An addreſs to the veſſel that brought over the King. Who ſhould ſing on this occaſion. A Pindaric boaſt.

FAST by the ſurge my limbs are ſpread,
The naval oak nods o'er my head;
The winds are loud; the waves tumultuous roll;
Ye winds! indulge your rage no more;
Ye founding billows! ceaſe to roar;
The God deſcends; and tranſports warm my ſoul,

The waves are hush'd; the winds are spent!—
This kingdom, from the kingdoms rent,
I celebrate in song—Fam'd isle! no less,
By nature's favour, from mankind,
Than by the foaming sea, disjoin'd;
Alone in bliss! an isle, in happiness!

Though fate and time have damp'd my strains,
Though youth no longer fires my veins,
Though flow their streams in this cold climate run;
The royal eye dispels my cares,
Recals the warmth of blooming years,
Returning George supplies the distant sun.

Away, my soul! salute the * Pine,
That glads the heart of Caroline,
Its grand deposit faithful to restore;
Salute the bark that ne'er shall hold
So rich a freight in gems or gold,
And loaded from both Indies would be poor.

My soul! to thee, she spreads her sails;
Their bosoms fill with sacred gales;
With inspiration from the godhead warm;
Now bound for an eternal clime:
O send her down the tide of time,
Snatch'd from oblivion, and secure from storm.

Or teach this flag, like that to soar,
Which gods of old and heroes bore;
Bid her a British constellation rise—
The sea she scorns; and, now, shall bound
On lofty billows of sweet sound,
I am her pilot, and her port the skies!

Dare you to sing, ye tinkling train?
Silence, ye wretched! ye profane!
Who shakle prose, and boast of absent gods;
Who murder thought, and numbers maim,
Who write Pindarics cold and lame,
And labour stiff Anacreontic odes.

Ye lawful sons of genius rise!
Of genuine title to the skies;
Ye founts of learning! and ye mints of fame!
You, who file off the mortal part
Of glowing thought, with Attic art,
And drink pure song from Cam's or Isis' stream.

I glow, I burn! the numbers pure,
High-flavour'd, delicate, mature,
Spontaneous stream from my unlabour'd breast,
As, when full-ripened teems the vine,
The generous bursts of willing wine
Distil nectareous from the grape unpress'd.

STRAIN I.

THE ARGUMENT.

How the King attended. A prospect of happiness. Industry. A surprising instance of it in old Rome. The mischief of sloth. What happiness is. Sloth its greatest enemy. Trade natural to Britain. Trade invoked. Described. What the greatest human excellence. The praise of wealth. Its use, abuse, end. The variety of nature. The final moral cause of it. The benefit of man's necessities. Britain's naval stores. She makes all nature serviceable to her ends. Of reason. Its excellence. How we should form our estimate of things. Reason's difficult task. Why the first glory hers. Her effects in old Britain.

"Our monarch comes! nor comes alone!"
What shining forms surround his throne,
O sun! as planets thee!—To my loud strain
See peace, by wisdom led, advance;
The grace, the muse, the season, dance;
And plenty spreads behind her flowing train!

"Our monarch comes! nor comes alone:"
New glories kindle round his throne,
The visions rise! I triumph as I gaze:
By Pindar led, I turn'd of late
The volume dark, the folds of fate;
And, now, am present to the future blaze.

By George and Jove it is decreed,
The mighty months in pomp proceed,
Fair daughters of the sun!—O thou divine,
Blest Industry! a smiling earth
From thee alone derives its birth:
By thee the ploughshare and its master shine.

From thee, mast, cable, anchor, oar,
From thee the cannon and his roar;
On oaks nurst, rear'd by thee, wealth empire grows;
O golden fruit! oak well might prove
The sacred tree, the tree of Jove;
All Jove can give, the naval oak bestows.

What cannot industry complete?
When Punic war first flam'd, the great,
Bold, active, ardent, Roman fathers meet:
"Fell all your groves," a flamen cries;
As soon they fall; as soon they rise;
One moon a forest, and the next a fleet.

Is sloth indulgence! 'Tis a toil;
Enervates man, and damns the soil;
Defeats creation, plunges in distress,
Cankers our being, all devours;
A full exertion of our powers!
Thence, and thence only glows our happiness.

The stream may stagnate, yet be clear,
The sun suspend his swift career,
Yet healthy nature feel her wonted force;
Ere man his active springs resign'd,
Can rust in body and in mind,
Yet taste of bliss, of which he chokes the source.

Where, industry! thy daughter fair?
Recal her to her native air;
Here, was trade born, here bred, here flourish'd long
And ever shall she flourish here:
What though she languish'd? 'twas but fear,
She's found of heart; her constitution strong.

Wake, sting her up. Trade! lean no more
On thy fixt anchor, push from shore,
Earth lies before thee, every climate court.
And, see, she's rous'd absolv'd from fears,
Her brow, in cloudless azure, rears,
Spreads all her sail, and opens every port.

* The vessel that brought over the King.

See, cherish'd by her sister, Peace,
She levies gain on every place,
Religion, habit, custom, tongue, and name!
Again, she travels with the sun,
Again, she draws a golden zone [fame!
Round earth and main; bright zone of wealth and

Ten thousand active hands, that hung
In shameful sloth with nerves unstrung,
The nations languid load, defy the storms,
The sheets unfurl, and anchors weigh,
The long-moor'd vessel wing to sea,
Worlds, worlds salute, and peopled ocean swarms.

His sons, Po, Ganges, Danube, Nile,
Their sedgy foreheads lift, and smile;
Their urns inverted prodigally pour
Streams charg'd with wealth, and vow to buy
Britannia for their great ally, [more?
With climes paid down; what can the gods do

Cold Russia costly furs from far,
Hot China sends her painted jar,
France generous wines to crown it, Arab sweet
With gales of incense swells our sails,
Nor distant Ind our merchant fails,
Her richest ore the ballast of our fleet.

Luxuriant isle! What tide that flows,
Or stream that glides, or wind that blows,
Or genial sun that shines, or shower that pours,
But flows, glides, breathes, shines, pours for thee?
How every heart dilates to see
Each land's each season blending on thy shores!

All these one British harvest make!
The servant ocean for thy sake
Both sinks and swells: his arms thy bosom wrap,
And fondly give in boundless dower,
To mighty George's growing power,
The wafted world into thy loaded lap.

Commerce brings riches, riches crown
Fair virtue with the first renown:
A large revenue, and a large expence,
When hearts for others welfare glow,
And spend as free as gods bestow,
Gives the full bloom to mortal excellence.

Glow then my breast! abound my store!
This, and this boldly I implore,
Their want and apathy let Stoics boast:
Passions and riches, good or ill,
As us'd by man, demand our skill;
All blessings wound us, when discretion's lost.

Wealth, in the virtuous, and the wise,
'Tis vice and folly to despise:
Let those in praise of poverty refine,
Whose heads or hearts pervert its use,
The narrow-soul'd, or the profuse,
The truly great find morals in the mine;

Happy the man! who, large of heart,
Has learnt the rare illustrious art
Of being rich: stores starve us, or they cley;
From gold, if more than chemic skill,
Extract not what is brighter still:
'Tis hard to gain, much harder to enjoy.

Plenty's a means, and joy her end:
Exalted minds their joys extend:
A Chandos shines when others' joys are done:
As lofty turrets, by their height,
When humbler scenes resign their light,
Retain the rays of the declining sun.

Pregnant with blessings, Britain! swear
No sordid son of thine shall dare
Offend the donor of thy wealth and peace;
Who now his whole creation drains
To pour into my tumid veins
That blood of nations! commerce and increase.

How various nature! turgid grain
Here nodding floats the golden plain; [vines
There, worms weave silken webs; here, glowing
Lay forth their purple to the sun,
Beneath the soil, there harvests run,
And kings' revenues ripen in the mines.

What's various nature? Art divine
Man's soul to soften and refine;
Heaven different growths to different lands im-
parts,
That all may stand in need of all,
And interest draw around the ball,
A net to catch and join all human hearts.

Thus has the great Creator's pen
His law supreme, to mortal men,
In their necessities distinctly writ:
Ev'n appetites supplies the place
Of absent virtue, absent grace,
And human want performs for human wit.

Vast naval ensigns strow'd around
The wond'ring foreigner confound!
How stands the deep-aw'd continent aghast,
As her proud sceptre'd sons survey,
At every port, on every quay,
Huge mountains rise, of cable, anchor, mast?

The unwieldy tun! the ponderous bale!—
Each prince his own clime set to sale
Sees here, by subjects of a British king:
How earth's abridg'd! all nations range
A narrow spot, our throng'd Exchange!
And send the streams of plenty from their spring.

Nor earth alone, all nature bends
To aid in Britain's glorious ends:
Toils she in trade? or bleeds in honest wars?
Her keel each yielding sea enthrals,
Each willing wind her canvas calls,
Her pilot into service lists the stars.

In size confin'd, and humbly made,
What though we creep beneath the shade,
And seem as emmets on this point, the ball?
Heaven lighted up the human soul,
Heaven bid its rays transpierce the whole,
And, giving godlike reason, gave us all.

Thou golden chain 'twixt God and men,
Bless reason! guide my life and pen;
All ills, like ghosts, fly trembling at thy light:
Who thee obeys, reigns o'er all;
Smiles, though the stars around him fall;
A God is nought but reason infinite.

The man of reaſon is a God
Who ſcorns to ſtoop to fortune's nod;
Sole agent he beneath the ſhining ſphere,
Others are paſſive, are impell'd,
Are frighten'd, flatter'd, ſunk, or ſwell'd,
As accident is pleas'd to domineer.

Our hopes and fears are much to blame;
Shall monarchs awe? or crowns inflame?
From groſs miſtake our tumult ſprings;
Thoſe men the ſilly world diſarm,
Elude the dart, diſſolve the charm,
Who know the ſlender worth of men and things.

The preſent object, preſent day,
Are idle phantoms, and away;
What's laſting only does exiſt. Know this,
Life, fame, friends, freedom, empire, all,
Peace, commerce, freedom, nobly fall
To launch us on the flood of endleſs bliſs.

How foreign theſe, thou moſt in view!
Go, look your whole exiſtence through;
Thence, form your rules: thence fix your eſtimate,
For ſo the gods: but as the gains,
How great the toil! 'Twill coſt more pains,
To vanquiſh folly, than reduce a ſtate.

Hence, reaſon! the firſt palm is thine,
Old Britain learnt from thee to ſhine.
By thee, trades ſwarming throng, gay freedom's ſmile,
Armies, in war of fatal frown,
Of peace the pride, arts flowing down,
Enrich, exalt, defend, inſtruct our iſle.

STRAIN II.

THE ARGUMENT.

Arts from commerce. Why Britons ſhould purſue it. What wealth includes. An hiſtorical digreſſion, which kind is moſt frequent in Pindar. The wealth and wonderful glory of Tyre. The approach of her ruin. The cauſe of it. Her crimes through all ranks and orders. Her miſerable fall. The neighbouring kings juſt reflection on it. An awful image of the Divine Power and vengeance. From what Tyre fell, and how deep her calamity.

COMMERCE gives arts, as well as gain;
By commerce wafted o'er the main,
They barbarous climes enlighten as they run;
Arts, the rich traffic of the ſoul!
May travel, thus, from pole to pole,
And gild the world with learning's brighter ſun.

Commerce gives learning, virtue, gold!
Ply commerce, then, ye Britons bold,
Inur'd to winds and ſeas! leſt gods repent:
The gods that thron'd you in the wave,
And, as the trident's emblem, gave
A triple realm, that awes the continent:

And awes with wealth; for wealth is power:
When Jove deſcends a golden ſhower,
'Tis navies, armies, empire, all, in one.—
View, emulate, outſhine old Tyre;
In ſcarlet rob'd, with gems on fire,
Her merchants, princes! every deck, a throne!

She ſate an empreſs! aw'd the flood!
Her ſtable column Ocean trod;
She call'd the nations, and ſhe call'd the ſeas,
By both obey'd: the Syrian ſings;
The Cyprian's art her viol ſtrings;
Togarmagh's ſteed along her valley neighs.

The fir of Senir makes her floor,
And Baſhan's oak, transform'd, her oar;
High Lebanon her maſt; far Dedan warms
Her mantled hoſt; Arabia feeds;
Her ſail of purple Egypt ſpreads;
Arvad ſends mariners; the Perſian, arms.

The world's laſt limit bounds her fame;
The golden city was her name!
Thoſe ſtars on earth, the topaz, onyx, blaze
Beneath her foot: extent of coaſt,
And rich as Nile's, let others boaſt;
Hers the far nobler harveſt of the ſeas.

O merchant land! as Eden fair!
Antient of empires! Nature's care!
The ſtrength of Ocean! head of plenty's ſprings!
The pride of iſles! In wars rever'd!
Mother of crafts! lov'd! courted! fear'd!
Pilot of kingdoms! and ſupport of kings!

Great mart of nations!—But ſhe fell:
Her pamper'd ſons revolt! rebel!
Againſt his favourite iſle loud roars the main!
The tempeſt howls? her ſcu'ptur'd dome
Soon, the wolf's refuge; dragon's home!
The land, one altar! a whole people, ſlain!

The deſtin'd day puts on her frown;
The ſable hour is coming down:
She's on her march from yon Almighty throne:
The ſword and ſtorm are in her hand;
She trumpets ſhrill her dread command:
Dark be the light of earth! the boaſt, unknown!

For, oh! her ſins as red as blood,
As crimſon deep, outcry the flood;
The queen of trade is bought! once wiſe and juſt,
Now, venal is her council's tongue:
How riot, violence, and wrong,
Turn gold to droſs, her bloſſom into duſt!

To things inglorious, far beneath
Thoſe high-born ſouls they proudly breathe,
Her fordid noble ſinks! her mighty, bow!
Is it for this, the groves around
Return the tabret's ſprightly ſound?
Is it for this, her great ones toſs the brow?

What burning feuds 'twixt brothers reign!
To nuptials cold, how glows the vein,
Confounding kindred, and miſleading right?
The ſpurious lord it o'er the land!
Bold blaſphemy dares make a ſtand,
Aſſault the ſky, and brandiſh all her might:

Tyre's artizan, ſweet orator,
Her merchant ſage, big man of war,
Her judge, her prophet, nay her hoary heads,
Whoſe brows with wiſdom ſhould be crown'd,
Her very prieſts in guilt abound:
Hence, the world's cedar all her honours ſheds.

What death of truth! what thirſt of gold!
Chiefs warm in peace, in battle cold!
What youth unletter'd! baſe ones lifted high!
What public boaſts! what private views!
What deſert temples! crowded ſtews!
What women!—practis'd but to roll an eye!

O! foul of heart, her faireſt dames
Decline the ſun's intruding beams,
To mad the midnight in their gloomy haunts:
Alas! there is, who ſees them there;
There is, who flatters not the fair,
When cymbals tinkle, and the virgin chaunts.

He ſees, and thunders!—Now, in vain!
The courſer paws, and foams the rein;
And chariots ſtream along the printed ſoil:
In vain! Her high, preſumptuous air
In gorgeous veſtments rich and rare,
O'er her proud ſhoulder throws the poor man's toil.

In robes or gems, her coſtly ſtain,
Green, ſcarlet, azure, ſhine, in vain!
In vain! their golden heads her turrets rear;
In vain! high-flavour'd foreign fruits,
Sydonian oils, and Lydian lutes,
Glide o'er her tongue, and melt upon her ear.

In vain! wines flow in various ſtreams,
With helm and ſpear each pillar gleams;
Damaſcus, vain! unfolds the gloſſy ſtore;
The golden wedge from Ophir's coaſts,
From Arab incenſe vain, ſhe boaſts,
Vain are her gods, and vainly men adore.

Bell falls! the mighty Nebo bends!
The nations hiſs! her glory ends!
To ſhips, her confidence! ſhe flies from foes;
Foes meet her there: the wind, the wave,
That once aid, ſtrength, and grandeur gave,
Plunge her in ſeas, from which her glory roſe.

Her ivory deck, embroider'd ſail,
And maſt of cedar nought avail,
Or pilot learn'd! She ſinks, nor ſinks alone;
Her gods ſink with her! to the ſky,
Which never more ſhall meet her eye,
She ſends her ſoul out in one dreadful groan.

What though ſo vaſt her naval might,
In her firſt dawn'd the Britiſh right?
All flags abas'd her ſee-dominion greet:
What though ſhe longer warr'd than Troy?
At length her foes that iſle deſtroy
Whoſe conqueſt fail'd, as far as fail'd her fleet.

The kings ſhe cloth'd in purple ſhake
Their awful brows: "O foul miſtake!
"O fatal pride! (they cry) this, this is ſhe,
"Who ſaid—with my own art and arm,
"In the world's wealth I wrap me warm"—
And ſwell'd at heart, vain empreſs of the ſea!

"This, this is ſhe, who meanly ſoar'd:
"Alas! how low, to be ador'd,
"And ſtyle herſelf a god!—Through ſtormy wars
"This eagle-iſle her thunder bore,
"High-fed her young with human gore;
"And would have built her neſt among the ſtars.

"But ah, frail man! how impotent
"To ſtand heaven's vengeance, or prevent!
"To turn aſide the great Creator's aim!
"Shall iſland-kings with him contend,
"Who makes the poles beneath him bend?
"And ſhall drink up the ſea herſelf with flame?

"Earth, ether, empyreum bow,
"When from the brazen mountain's brow
"The god of battles takes his mighty bow:
"Of wrath prepares to pour the flood,
"Puts on his veſture dipt in blood,
"And marches out to ſcourge the world below.

"Ah! wretched iſle, once call'd the great!
"Ah! wretched iſle, and wiſe too late!
"The vengeance of Jehovah is gone out:
"Thy luxury, corruption, pride,
"And freedom loſt, the realms deride,
"Ador'd thee ſtanding, o'er thy ruins ſhout:

"To ſcourge with war, or peace beſtow,
"Was thine, O fallen! fallen low!
"'Twas thine, of jarring thrones to ſtill debates:
"How art thou fallen, down, down, down!
"Wide waſte, and night, and horror frown,
"Where empire flam'd in gold, and balanc'd
"ſtates."

STRAIN III.

THE ARGUMENT.

An inference from this hiſtory. Advice to Britain. More proper to her than other nations. How far the ſtroke of tyranny reaches. What ſupports our endeavours. The unconſidered benefits of liberty. Britain's obligation to purſue trade. Why above half the globe is ſea. Britain's grandeur from her ſituation. The winds, the ſeas, the conſtellations, deſcribed. Sir Iſaac Newton's praiſe. Britain compared with other ſtates. The Leviathan deſcribed. Britain's ſite, and ancient title to the ſeas. Who rivals her. Of Venice. Holland. Some deſpiſe trade as mean. Cenſured for it. Trade's glory. The late Czar. Solomon. A ſurpriſing inſtance of magnificence. The merchant's dignity. Compared with men of letters.

Hence learn, as hearts are foul or pure,
Our fortunes wither or endure:
Nations may thrive, or periſh by the wave.
What ſtorms from Jove's unwilling frown,
A people's crimes ſolicit down!
Ocean's the womb of riches, and the grave.

This truth, O Britain! ponder well;
Virtues ſhould riſe, as fortunes ſwell:
What is large property?—The ſign of good,
Of worth ſuperior: if 'tis leſs,
Another's treaſure we poſſeſs,
And charge the gods with favours miſbeſtow'd.

This council ſuits Britannia's iſle, [ſmile:
High-flush'd with wealth, and freedom's
To vaſſals priſon'd in the continent,
Who ſtarve, at home, on meager toil,
And ſuck to death their mother ſoil,
'Twere uſeleſs caution, and a truth miſ-ſpent.

Fell tyrants ſtrike beyond the bone,
And wound the ſoul; bow genius down,
Lay virtue waſte! for worth or arts, who ſtrain,
To throw them at a monſter's foot?
'Tis property ſupports purſuit:
Freedom gives eloquence; and freedom, gain.

She pours the thought, and forms the ſtyle,
She makes the blood and ſpirits boil;
I feel her now! and rouſe, and riſe, and rave
In Theban ſong: O muſe! not thine,
Verſe is gay freedom's gift divine:
The man that can think greatly, is no ſlave.

Others may traffic if they pleaſe;
Britain, fair daughter of the ſeas,
Is born for trade; to plough her field, the wave:
And reap the growth of every coaſt:
A ſpeck of land! but let her boaſt,
Gods gave the world, when they the waters gave.

Britain! behold the world's wide face;
Nor cover'd half with ſolid ſpace,
Three parts are fluid; empire of the ſea!
And why? for commerce. Ocean ſtreams
For that, through all his various names:
And, if for commerce, ocean flows for thee.

Britain, like ſome great potentate
Of eaſtern clime, retires in ſtate,
Shuts out the nations! Would a prince draw nigh?
He paſſes her ſtrong guards, the waves,
Of ſervant winds admiſſion craves,
Her empire has no neighbour but the ſky.

There are her friends; ſoft zephyr there,
Keen Eurus, Notus never fair,
Rough Boreas burſting from the pole: all urge,
And urge for her, their various toil;
The Caſpian, the broad Baltic boil,
And into life the dead Pacific ſcourge.

There are her friends, a marſhall'd train:
A golden hoſt! and azure plain!
By turns do duty, and by turns retreat:
They may retreat, but not from her;
The ſtar that quits this hemiſphere
Muſt quit the ſkies, to want a Britiſh fleet.

Hyad, for her, leans o'er her urn;
For her, Orion's glories burn,
The Pleiads gleam. For Britons ſet and riſe
The fair-fac'd ſons of Mazaroth,
Near the deep chambers of the ſouth,
The raging dog that fires the midnight ſkies.

Theſe nations Newton made his own;
All intimate with him alone.
His mighty ſoul did, like a giant, run
To the vaſt volume's cloſing ſtar;
Decypher'd every character:
His reaſon pour'd new light upon the ſun.

Let the proud brothers of the land
Smile at our rock and barren ſtrand,
Not ſuch the ſea: let Fohé's ancient line
Vaſt tracts and ample beings vaunt;
The camel low, ſmall elephant—
O, Britain! the leviathan is thine.

Leviathan! whom nature's ſtrife
Brought forth, her largeſt piece of life;
He ſleeps an iſle! his ſports the billows warm!
Dreadful leviathan! thy ſpout
Invades the ſkies; the ſtars are out:
He drinks a river, and ejects a ſtorm.

Th' Atlantic ſurge around our ſhore
German and Caledonian roar;
Their mighty genii hold us in their lap.
Hear Egbert, Edgar, Ethelred;
"The ſeas are ours."—The monarch ſaid—
The floods their hands, their hands the nations, clap.

Whence is a rival, then, to riſe?
Can he be found beneath the ſkies?
No, there, they dwell, that can give Britain fear:
The powers of earth, by rival aim
Her grandeur but the more proclaim;
And prove their diſtance moſt, as they draw near.

Proud Venice ſits amid the waves;
Her foot ambitious ocean laves:
Art's nobleſt boaſt! but O what wondrous odds
'Twixt Venice and Britannia's iſle!
'Twixt mortal and immortal toil!
Britannia is a Venice built by gods.

Let Holland triumph o'er her foes,
But not o'er friends by whom ſhe roſe;
The child of Britain! And ſhall ſhe contend?
It were no leſs than parricide:
What wonders riſe from out the tide!
Her high and mighty to the rudder bend.

And are there, then, of lofty brow,
Who think trade mean, and ſcorn to bow
So far beneath the ſtate of noble birth?
Alas! theſe chiefs but little know
Commerce how high, themſelves how low;
The ſons of nobles are the ſons of earth.

And what have earth's mean ſons to do,
But reap her fruits, and warm purſue
The world's chief good, nor glut on other's toil?
High commerce from the gods came down,
With compaſs, chart, and ſtarry crown,
Their delegate, to make the nations ſmile

Bluſh, and behold the Ruſſian bow,
From forty crowns, his mighty brow,
To trade.—To toil he turns his glorious hand:
That arm, which ſwept the bloody field,
See! the huge ax, or hammer, wield;
While ſceptres wait, and thrones impatient ſtand.

O ſhame to ſubjects! firſt renown,
Matchleſs example to the crown!
Old time is poor: what age boaſts ſuch a ſight?
Ye drones! adore the man divine—
No; virtue ſtill as mean decline,
Call Ruſſians barbarous, and yourſelves polite.

He too of Judah, great, as wiſe,
With Hiram ſtrove in merchandiſe:
Monarchs with monarchs ſtruggle for an ear;

That merchant * sinking to his grave,
A flood of treasure swells the cave;
The king left much, the merchant bury'd more.

Is merchant an inglorious name?
No; fit for Pindar such a theme,
Too great for me; I pant beneath the weight!
If loud as ocean's were my voice,
If words and thoughts to court my choice
Out-number'd sands, I could not reach its height.

Merchants o'er proudest heroes reign;
Those trade in blessing, these in pain,
At slaughter swell, and shout, while nations groan:
With purple monarchs, merchants vie;
If great to spend, what, to supply?
Priests pray for blessings; merchants pour them down.

Kings, merchants are in league and love;
Earth's odours pay soft airs above,
That, o'er the teeming field prolific range;
Planets are merchants; take, return,
Lustre and heat; by traffic burn;
The whole creation is one vast exchange.

Is merchant an inglorious name?
What says the sons of letter'd fame,
Proud of their volumes, swelling in their cells?
In open life, in change of scene,
Mid vari us manners, throngs of men,
Experience, arts, and solid wisdom dwells.

Trade, art's mechanic, nature's stores
Well weighs to starry science soars:
Reads warm in life (dead-colour'd by the pen)
The scites, tongues, interests, of the ball:
Who studies trade, he studies all;
Accomplish'd merchants are accomplish'd men.

STRAIN IV.

THE ARGUMENT.

Pindar invoked. His praise. Britain should decline war; but boldly assert her trade. Encouraged from the throne: Britain's condition without trade. Trade's character, and surprising deeds. Carthage Solomon's temple. St. Paul's church. The miser's character. The wonderful effects of trade. Why religion recommended to the merchant. What, false joy. What, true. What religion is to the merchant. Why trade more glorious in Britons than others. How warmly, and how long, to be pursued by us. The Briton's legacy Columbus. His praise. America described. Worlds still unknown. Queen Elizabeth. King George the Second. His glory navally represented

How shall I farther rouse the soul?
How Sloth's lascivious reign controul
By verse with unextinguish'd ardour wrought?
How every breast inflame with mine?
How bid my theme still brighter shine,
With wealth of words, and unexhausted thought?

O thou Dircæan swan, on high,
Round whom familiar thunders fly!
While Jove attends a language like his own:
Thy spirit pour, like vernal showers,
My verse shall burst out with the flowers,
While Britain's trade advances with her sun.

Though Britain was not born to fear,
Grasp not at bloody fame from war;
Nor war decline, if thrones your right invade:
Jove gathers tempest black as night:
Jove pours the golden flood of light;
Let Britain thunder, or let Britain trade.

Britain a comet, or a star,
In commerce this, or that in war,
Let Britons shout! earth, seas, and skies resound!
Commerce to kindle, raise, preserve,
And spirit dart through every nerve,
Hear from the throne * a voice through time renown'd.

So fall from heaven the vernal showers,
To cheer the glebe, and wake the flowers;
The gloom call'd forth sees azure skies display'd;
The bird of voice is proud to sing,
Industrious bees ply every wing,
Distend their cells, and urge their golden trade.

Trade once extinguish'd, Britain's sun
Is gone out too; his race is run;
He shines in vain! her isle's an isle indeed,
A spot too small to be o'ercome;
Ah, dreadful safety! wretched doom!
No foe will conquer what no foe can feed.

Trade's the source, sinew, soul of all:
Trade's all herself; hers, hers, the ball;
Where most unseen, the goddess still is there!
Trade leads the dance, trade lights the blaze;
The courtier's pomp! the student's ease!
'Twas trade at Blenheim fought, and clos'd the year.

What Rome and all her gods defies?
The Punic oar. Behold it rise
And battle for the world! trade gave the call;
Rich cordial from his naval art
Sent the strong spirits to his heart,
That bid an Afric merchant grasp the ball.

Where is, on earth, Jehovah's home?
Trade mark'd the soil, and built the dome,
In which his Majesty first deign'd to dwell;
The walls with silver sheets o'erlaid,
Rich, as the sun, through gold unweigh'd,
Bent the moon'd arch, and bid the column swell.

Grandeur unknown to Solomon!
Methinks the labouring earth should groan,
Beneath yon load † created sure, not made!
Servant and rival of the skies!
Heaven's arch alone can higher rise:
What hand immortal rais'd thee?—Humble trade.

Where hadst thou been, if left at large,
Those sinewy arms that tugg'd the barge,

* Vast treasure taken from Solomon's tomb 1300 years after his death.

* The King's speech.

† St. Paul's, built by the coal-tax.

Had caught at pleasure on the flowery green?
If they that watch'd the midnight ſtar
Had ſwung behind the rolling car,
Or fill'd it with diſgrace, where hadſt thou been?

As by repletion men conſume,
Abundance is the miſer's doom;
Expend it nobly; he that lets it ruſt,
Which, paſſing numerous hands, would ſhine;
Is not a man, but living mine,
Foe to the gods, and rival to the duſt.

Trade barbarous lands can poliſh fair;
Make earth well worth the wiſe man's care;
Call forth her foreſts, charm them into fleets;
Can make one houſe of human race;
Can bid the diſtant poles embrace;
Hers, every ſun; and India, India meets.

Trade monarchs crowns, and arts imports,
With bounty feeds, with laurel courts:
Trade gives fair virtue fairer ſtill to ſhine;
Enacts thoſe guards of gain, the laws;
Exalts ev'n freedom's glorious cauſe.—
Trade! warn'd by Tyre, O make religion thine!

You lend each other mutual aid:
Why is heaven's ſmile, in wealth, convey'd!
Not to place vice, but virtues in our power:
Pleaſure declin'd, is luxury,
Boundleſs in time and in degree:
Pleaſure enjoy'd, the tumult of an hour.

Falſe joy's a diſcompoſing thing,
That jars on Nature's trembling ſtring,
Tempeſts the ſpirits, and untunes the frame:
True joy, the ſunſhine of the ſoul,
A bright ſerene that calms the whole;
Which they ne'er knew, whom other joys inflame.

Merchant! religion is the care
To grow as rich—as angels are;
To know falſe coin from true; to ſweep the main;
The mighty ſtake ſecure, beyond
The ſtrongeſt tie of field, or fund:
Commerce gives gold, religion makes it gain.

Join, then, religion to thy ſtore,
Or India's mines will make thee poor:
Greater than Tyre! O bear a nobler mind
Sea-ſovereign iſle! proud war decline,
Trade patronize! what glory thine,
Ardent to bleſs, who couldſt ſubdue mankind!

Rich commerce ply with warmth divine
By day, by night; the ſtars are thine,
Wear out the ſtars in trade! eternal run
From age to age, the noble glow,
A rage to gain, and to beſtow,
While ages laſt! in trade burn out the ſun!

Trade, Britain's all, our fires ſent down
With toil, blood, treaſure, ages won;
This, Edgar great bequeath'd; this, Edward bold:
Let Forbiſhers, let Raleighs fire!
O let Columbus's ſhade inſpire!
New worlds diſcloſe, with Drake ſurround an old,
Columbus! ſcarce inferior fame
For thee to find, than heaven to frame
Tha t womb of gold and gem: her wide domain,
An univerſe! her rivers, ſeas!
Her fruits, both men and gods to pleaſe!
Heaven's faireſt birth! and, but for thee, in vain!

Worlds ſtill unknown deep ſhadows wrap;
Call wonders forth from nature's lap;
New glory pour on her Eternal Sire:
O noble ſearch! O glorious care!
Are ye not Britons? why deſpair?
New worlds are due to ſuch a godlike fire.

Swear by the great Eliza's ſoul,
That trade, as long as water's roll—
Ah! no; the gods chaſtiſe my raſh decree:
By great Eliza do not ſwear;
For thee, O George! the gods declare:
And thou for them! late time ſhall ſwear by thee.

Truth, bright as ſtars, with thee prevails;
Full be thy fame, as ſwelling ſails,
Conſtant, as tides, thy mind; as maſts, elate;
Thy juſtice, an unerring helm
To ſteer Britannia's fickle realm;
Thy numerous race, ſure anchor of her ſtate?

STRAIN V.

THE ARGUMENT.

What is the bound of Britain's power. Beyond that of the moſt famed in hiſtory. The ſign Lyra. What the conſtellations are. Argo. The whale. The Dolphin. Eridanus. The lion. Libra. Virgo. Bernice. The Britiſh ladies cenſured. The moon. What the ſea is. Apoſtrophe to the emperor. The Spaniſh armada. How Britain ſhould ſpeak her reſentment. What gives power. What navies do in war. The Tartar. Mogul. Africa. China. Who maſter of the world. What the hiſtory of the world is. The genealogy of glory. Miſtakes about it. Peace the merchant's harveſt. Ships of divine origin. Merchants ambaſſadors. The Briton's voyage. Praiſe the food of glory. Britain's record.

Britannia's ſtate what bounds confine!
(Of riſing thought O golden mine!
Mountains, Alps, ſtreams, gulfs, oceans, ſet no bound
She ſallies till ſhe ſtrikes the ſtar;
Expanding wide, and launching far
As wind can fly, or rolling wave reſound.

Small iſle! For Cæſars, for the ſon
Of Jove, who burſt from Macedon,
For gorgeous eaſterns blazing o'er mankind;
Then, when they call'd the world their own,
Not equal fame from fable ſhone:
They roſe to gods, in half thy ſphere confin'd.

Here, no demand for fancy's wing;
Plain truth's illuſtrious: as I ſing,
O hear yon ſpangled harp repeat my lay!
Your ſtarry lyre has caught the ſound,
And ſpreads it to the planets round,
Who beſt can tell where ends Britannia's ſway.

The skies (fair-printed page!) unfold
The naval fame of heroes old;
As in a mirror show th' adventurous throng:
The deeds of Grecian mariners
Are read by gods, are writ in stars,
And noble verse, that shall endure as long.

The skies are records of the main,
Thence Argo listens to my strain;
Chiron, for song renown'd, his noble rage
For naval fame and song renews,
As Britain's fame he hears, and views;
Chiron, the Shovell of a former age.

The whale (for late I sung his praise)
Pours grateful lustre on my lays;
How smiles Arion's friend * with partial beams!
Fridanus would flatter too,
But jealousies his smile subdue;
He fears a British rival in the Thames.

In pride the lion lifts his mane,
To see his British brothers reign
As stars below: the balance, George! from thine,
Which weighs the nations, learns to weigh
More accurate the night and day;
From thy fair daughters Virgo learns to shine.

Of Britain's court, ye lesser lights!
How could the wise man gaze whole nights
On Richmond's eye, on Berenice's hair!
But, oh! you practise shameful arts;
Your own retain. seize others' hearts,
Pirates, not merchants, are the British fair.

This truth I swear by Cynthia's beam.
Pale Queen! be flush'd at Britain's fame;
And, rolling, tell the nations—"o'er the main
"To scare her empire is thy pride."
He, mighty power! who curbs the tide,
Uncurbs, extends, throws wide Britannia's reign.

What is the main! Ye kings renown'd!
Britannia's centre, and your bound!
Austrian! where-e'er Leviathan can roll,
Is Britain's home! And Britain's mine,
Where'er the ripening sun can shine,
Parts are for emperors; for her the whole.

Why, Austrian! wilt thou hover still
On doubtful wing, and want the skill
To see thy welfare in the world's? Too late
Another Churchill thou may'st find,
Another Churchill, not so kind,
And other Blenheims, big with other fate.

Ill thou remember'st, ill dost own,
Who refused an ungrateful throne;
Ill thou consider'st, that the kind are brave;
Ill dost thou weigh, that in time's womb
A day may sleep, a day of doom,
As great to ruin, as was that to save.

How would'st thou smile to hear my strain,
Whose boasted inspiration's vain?

---

* The Dolphin.

Yet what if my prediction should prove true?
Know'st thou the fatal pair who shine
O'er Britain's trading empire thine
As one rejected, what, if one subdue?

What naval scene adorns the seat
Of awful Britain's high debate *,
Inspires her councils, and records her power?
The nations know, in glowing halls
On sinking thrones, the tempest falls,
When her august assembled senates lour.

O language fit for thoughts so bold!
Would Britain have her anger told;
Ah! never let a meaner language sound,
Than that which prostrates human souls,
Through heaven's dark vault impetuous rolls
And nature rocks, when angry Jove has frown'd.

Not realms unbounded, not a flood
Of natives, not expence of blood,
Or reach of counsel gives the world a lord:
Trade calls him forth, and sets him high,
As mortal man, o'er men can fly:
Trade leaves poor gleanings to the keenest sword.

Nay, her's the sword! for fleets have wings;
Like lightning fly to distant kings;
Like gods descend at once on trembling states:
Is war proclaim'd? Our wars are hurl'd
To farthest confines of the world,
Surprise your ports, and thunder at your gates.

The king of tempests, Æolus,
Sends forth his pinion'd people, thus,
On rapid errands: as they fly, they roar,
And carry sable clouds, and sweep
The land, the desert, and the deep!
Earth shakes! proud cities fall! and thrones adore!

The fools of nature ever strike
On bare outsides; and loath, or like,
As glitter bids; in endless error vie;
Admire the purple and the crown:
Of human welfare and renown,
Trade's the big heart; bright empire, but their eye.

Whence Tartar Grand? or Mogul Great?—
Trade gilt their titles, pour'd their state;
While Afric's black, lascivious, slothful breed,
To clasp their ruin, fly from toil;
That meanest product on their soil,
Their people fell: one half on t'other feed.

Of nature's wealth from commerce rent,
Afric's a glaring monument:
Mid citron forests and pomegranate groves
(Curst, in a paradise!) she pines;
O'er generous glebe, o'er golden mines
Her beggar'd, famish'd, tradeless native roves:

Not so thine, China, blooming-wide;
Thy numerous fleets might bridge the tide;
Thy products would exhaust both India's mines:
Shut be that gate of trade! or woe
To Britain's! Europe 'twill o'erflow.——
Ungrateful song! her growth † inspires thy lines.

† The Spanish Armada in the House of Lords.
‡ Coffee.

Britain! to these, and such as these,
The river broad, and foaming seas
Which sever lands to mortals less renown'd,
Devoid of naval skill or might;
Those sever'd parts of earth unite:
Trade's the full pulse, that sends their vigour round.

Could, O! could one engrossing hand
The various streams of trade command,
That, like the sun, would gazing nation's awe;
That awful power the world would brave.
Bold war, and empire proud, his slave;
Mankind his subjects; and his will, their law.

Hast thou look'd round the spacious earth?
From commerce, grandeur's humble birth:
To George from Noah, empires living, dead,
Their pride, their shame, their rise, their fall,
Time's whole plain chronicle is all
One bright encomium, undesign'd, on trade.

Trade springs from peace, and wealth from trade,
And power from wealth! of power is made
The god on earth: hail, then, the dove of peace!
Whose olive speaks the raging flood
Of war repress'd: what's loss of blood?
War is the death of commerce and increase.

Then perish war!—Detested war!
Shalt thou make gods? like Cæsar's star?
What calls man fool so loud as this has done,
From Nimrod's down to Bourbon's line?—
Why not adore too, as divine,
Wide-wasting storms, before the genial sun?

Peace is the merchant's summer clear!
His harvest! harvest round the year!
For peace with laurel every mast be bound;
Each deck carouse, each flag stream out,
Each cannon sound, each sailor shout!
For peace let every sacred ship be crown'd;

Sacred are ships, of birth divine!
An angel drew the first design;
With which the patriarch nature's ruins brav'd:
Two world's abroad, an old and new,
He safe o'er foaming billows flew:
The gods made human race, a pilot, sav'd.

How sacred too the merchant's name!*—
When Britain blaz'd meridian fame*; [law;
Bright shone the sword, but brighter trade gave
Merchants in distant courts rever'd,
Where prouder statesmen ne'er appear'd,
Merchants ambassadors! and thrones in awe.

'Tis theirs to know the tides, the times;
The march of stars; the births of climes;
Summer and winter theirs; theirs land and sea,
Theirs are the seasons, months, and years;
And each a different garland wears.—
O that my song could add eternity!

Praise is the sacred oil that feeds
The burning lamp of godlike deeds;

* In Queen Elizabeth's reign.

Immortal glory pays illustrious cares:
Whither, ye Britons! are you bound?
O noble voyage! glorious round!
Launch from the Thames, and end among the stars.

If to my subject rose my soul,
Your fame should last while oceans roll:
When other worlds in depths of time shall rise,
As we the Greeks of mighty name,
May they Britannia's fleet proclaim,
Look up, and read her story in the skies.

Ye Syrens, sing; ye Tritons, blow;
Ye Nereids, dance; ye billows, flow;
Roll to my measures, O ye starry throng;
Ye winds in concert breathe around;
Ye navies! to the concert bound
From pole to pole! to Britain all belong.

THE MORAL.

The most happy should be the most virtuous. Of eternity. What Britain's arts should be. Whence slavery.

Britain! thus blest, thy blessing know;
Or bliss, in vain! the gods bestow;
Its end fulfil, means cherish, source adore:
Vain swellings of thy soul repress;
They most may lose, who most possess;
Then let bliss awe, and tremble at thy store.

Nor be too fond of life at best,
Her cheerful, not enamour'd guest:
Let thought fly forward; 'twill gay prospects give;
Prospects immortal; that deride
A Tyrian wealth, a Persian pride,
And make it perfect fortitude to live.

O for eternity! a scene!
To fair adventurers serene?
O! on that sea to deal in pure renown!
Traffic with gods! what transports roll;
What boundless import to the soul!
The poor man's empire! and the subjects crown!

Adore the gods, and plough the seas:
These be thy arts, O Britain! these.
Let others pant for an immense command;
Let others breathe war's fiery god;
The proudest victor fears thy nod,
Long as the trident fills thy glorious hand.

Glorious, while heaven-born freedom lasts,
Which trade's soft spurious daughter blasts;
For what is tyranny? A monstrous birth
From luxury, by bribes caress'd,
By glowing power in shades compress'd,
Which stalks around, and chains the groaning earth.

THE CLOSE.

This subject now first sung. How sung. Preferable to Pindar's subjects. How Britain should be sung by all.

These, trade! I first, who boast no store,
Who owe the nought, thus snatch from shore

The ſhore of proſe, where thou haſt ſlumber'd long;
And ſend thy flag triumphant down
The tide of time, to ſure renown;
O bleſs my country! and thou pay'ſt my ſong.

Thou art the Briton's nobleſt theme,
Why, then, unſung? My ſimple aim
To dreſs plain ſenſe, and fire the generous blood;
Not ſpoft imaginations vain,
But liſt, with yon ethereal train,
The ſhining muſe, to ſerve the public good.

Of ancient art and ancient praiſe,
The ſprings are open'd in my lays:
Olympic heroes ghoſts around me throng,
And think their glory ſung anew;
Till chiefs of equal fame they view;
Nor grudge to Britons bold their Theban ſong.

Not Pindar's theme with mine compares,
As far ſurpaſt, as uſeful cares
Tranſcend diverſion light and glory vain:
The wreath fantaſtic, ſhouting throng,
And panting ſteed, to him belong
The charioteer's, not empire's golden rein.

Nor Chandos! thou the muſe deſpiſe
That would to glowing Ætna riſe
(Such Pindar's breaſt) thou Theron of our time!
Seldom to man the gods impart
A Pindar's head, or Theron's heart:
In life, or ſong, how rare the true ſublime!

None Britiſh-born, will ſure diſdain
This new, bold, moral, patriot ſtrain,
Though not with genius with ſome virtue crown'd;
(How vain the muſe!) the lay may laſt,
Thus twin'd around the Britiſh maſt,
The Britiſh maſt, with nobler laurels bound!

Weak ivy curls round naval oak,
And ſmiles at wind and ſtorm unbroke;
By ſtrength not hers ſublime: thus, proud to ſoar,
To Britain's grandeur cleaves my ſtrain:
And lives, and echoes through the plain,
While o'er the billow Britain's thunders roar.

Be dumb, ye groveling ſons of verſe,
Who ſing not actions, but rehearſe,
And fool the muſe with impotent deſire;
Ye ſacrilegious! who preſume
To tarniſh Britain's naval bloom,
Sing Britain's fame, with all her hero's fire.

CHORUS.

"Ye Syrens, ſing; ye Tritons, blow;
"Ye Nereids, dance; ye billows, flow;
"Roll to my meaſures, O ye ſtarry throng!
"Ye winds! in concert breathe around;
"Ye navies! to the concert bound
"From pole to pole; to Britain all belong;
"Britain to heaven; from heaven deſcends my "ſong."

Not that her blooms are mark'd with beauty's hue,
My ruſtic muſe her votive chaplet brings,
Unſeen, unheard, O GRAY, to thee ſhe ſings!
While ſlowly-pacing through the church-yard dew,
At curfeu-time, beneath the dark-green yew,
Thy penſive genius ſtrikes the moral ſtrings;
Or borne ſublime on inſpiration's wings,
Hears Cambria's bards devote the dreadful clue
Of Edward's race, with murthers foul defil'd:
Can aught my pipe to reach thine ear eſſay?
No bard divine! For many a care beguil'd
By the ſweet magic of thy ſoothing lay,
For many a raptur'd thought and viſion wild,
To thee this ſtrain of gratitude I pay.

Anno 1794.

THE LIFE OF GRAY.

THE life of GRAY, "the Britiſh Pindar," has been written by his friend and editor Mr. Maſon, from perſonal knowledge, and the intelligence obtained from his correſpondence with his friends.

The facts ſtated in the preſent account, are chiefly taken from Mr. Maſon's narrative, with the addition of ſuch particulars as ſubſequent information has ſupplied.

Thomas Gray, deſcended of a reputable family in the city of London, was born in Cornhill, December 26. 1716. His grandfather was a conſiderable merchant. His father, Philip Gray, was what was then called a money-ſcrivener, which was the profeſſion of Milton's father; but being of an unſocial and inactive diſpoſition, he rather diminiſhed than increaſed his paternal fortune. His mother's name was Dorothy Antrobus. They had many children, of whom the poet was the fifth born. All of them, except him, died in their infancy.

He was educated at Eton School, under the care of Mr. Antrobus, his mother's brother, then aſſiſtant to Dr. George, and alſo Fellow of St. Peter's College, Cambridge. While at ſchool, he contracted a friendſhip with Mr. Horace Walpole, the preſent Earl of Orford, who has been ſo long conſpicuous for his ſkill in the fine arts, and his love of letters, and Mr. Richard Weſt, ſon of the Right Honourable Richard Weſt, Eſq, Lord Chancellor of Ireland, a youth of great promiſe, on whom he ſet a high value.

In 1734, he removed from Eton to Cambridge, and entered a penſioner in St. Peter's College, and his friend Weſt to Chriſt-Church, Oxford, where they commenced a correſpondence, part of which is included in the collection of letters publiſhed by Mr. Maſon.

When he entered at St. Peter's College, his effeminacy and fair complexion drew upon him the name of Miſs Gray. It is remarkable that Milton had the ſame appellation of Miſs at the Univerſity.

Mr. Walpole was at that time of King's College in the ſame Univerſity. They frequently met, converſed on ſubjects of taſte, and drank nothing but tea.

In April 1738, Weſt left Chriſt-Church for the Inner Temple, and, in September following, Gray returned to London, intending likewiſe to apply himſelf to the ſtudy of the law, in the ſame Society, for which purpoſe his father had either hired or bought him a ſet of chambers.

It was his firſt ambition to excel in Latin poetry; and upon this occaſion he addreſſed a Sapphic Ode to his friend Weſt, which is the more curious, as Mr. Maſon informs us it was the firſt voluntary production of his muſe. A copy of Latin verſes in the Cambridge collections, and his tranſlation from Statius, are of an earlier date.

Barbaras ædes aditure mecum
Quas Eris ſemper fovet inquieta,
Lis ubi latè ſonat, et togatum
Æſtuat agmen!

Dulcius quanto, patulis ſub ulmi

Riſit et Ver me, facileſq. nymphæ
Nare captantem, nec ineleganti,
Manè quicquid de violis eundo
Surripit aura:

Me reclinatum teneram per herbam;
Quà leves curſes aqua cunque ducit,
Et moras dulci ſtrepitu lapillo
Nectit in omni.

Hæ novo noſtrum ferè pectus anno
Simplices curæ tenuere, cœlum
Quamdiù ſudum explicuit Favoni
Purior hora:

Otia et campos nec adhuc relinquo,
Nec magis Phœbo Clytie fidelis;
(Ingruant venti licet, et ſeneſcat

Namque, ſeu, lœtos hominum labores
Prataq. et montes recreante curru,
Purpurâ tractus oriens Eoos

Uſque dum, fulgore magìs magìs jam
Languido circum, variata nubes
Labitur furtim, viridiſq. in umbras

O ego felix, vice ſi (nec unquam

Parca me lenis ſineret quieto
Fallere Letho!

Multà flagranti radiiſq. cincto
Integris ah! quam nihil inviderem,
Cum Dei ardentes medius quadrigas
Sentit Olympus?

The ſplendor and picturesque turn of his genius are ſtrongly marked in this juvenile performance.

The following ſpring, upon an invitation which Mr. Walpole gave him to be his companion in his travels, his intention of ſtudying the law was laid aſide for the preſent, and never after put in execution. About the end of March 1739, they ſet out for France together, viſiting, in the courſe of their travels through that country, Paris, Chantilly, Rheims, Dijon, Lyons, the Chartreuſe, and other places.

In November they arrived at Turin; from thence they proceeded to Genoa, Bologna, Florence, Rome, Naples, &c. In July 1740, they returned to Florence, where they ſtaid till towards the end of April 1741, and then ſet out for Venice.

At Rome he wrote the following Alcaic Ode to Weſt, (Ad. C. Favonium Zephyrinum,) immediately after his journey to Freſcati and the Caſcades of Tivoli:

Mater roſarum, cui teneræ vigent
Auræ Favoni, cui Venus it comes
Laſciva, Nympharum choreis
Et volucrum celebrata cantu!

Dic, non inertem fallere quâ diem
Amat ſub umbrâ, ſeu ſinit aureum
Dormire plectrum, ſeu retentat
Pierio Zephyrinus antro
Furore dulci plenus, et immemor
Reptantis inter frigora Tuſculi
Umbroſa, vel colles Amici
Palladiæ ſuperantis Albæ.
Dilecta Fauno, et capridedum choris
Pineta, teſtor vos, Anio minax
Quæcunque per clivos volutus
Præcipiti tremefecit amne,
Illius altum Tibur, et Æſulæ
Audîſſe ſylvas nomen amabiles,
Illius et gratas Latinis
Naiaſin ingeminâſſe rupes:
Nam me Latinæ Naiades uvidâ
Vidêre ripâ, quâ niveas levi
Tam ſæpe lavit rore plumas
Dulcè canens Venuſinus ales;
Mirum! canenti conticuit nemus,
Sacrique fontes, et retinent adhuc
(Sic Muſa juſſit) ſaxa molles
Docta modos, vetereſque lauri.
Mirare nec tu me citharæ rudem
Claudis laborantem numeris: loca
Amæna, jucundumque ver in-compoſitum docuere carmen;
Hærent ſub omni nam folio nigri
Phœbea lucî (credite) ſomnia,
Argutiuſque et lympha et auræ
Neſcio quid ſolito loquuntur.

At Florence, Gray conceived the deſign, and wrote the firſt book of a didactic poem in Latin, entitled De Principiis Cogitandi, which he addreſſed to Weſt (ad Favonium), but unfortunately never completed.

An unfortunate diſagreement between the two travellers, ariſing from the difference of their tempers, occaſioned their ſeparation at Reggio. Gray being, even from his earlieſt years, curious, penſive, and philoſophical; Mr. Walpole, gay, lively, and conſequently inconſiderate. The latter, however, enjoined Mr. Maſon to charge him with the chief blame in their quarrel, confeſſing that more attention and complaiſance, more deference to a warm friendſhip, ſuperior judgment and prudence, might have prevented a rupture that gave much uneaſineſs to them both; though in 1744, a reconciliation was effected between them by a lady who wiſhed well to both parties.

Gray continued his journey to Venice, in a manner ſuitable to his own little fortune; and, having continued there till about the middle of July, he returned home through Padua, Verona, Milan and Turin, and, repaſſing the Alps, purſued almoſt the ſame route by which he had before gone to Italy

His Letters, publiſhed by Mr. Maſon, contain a very pleaſing account of many parts of his journey. His deſcriptions of Verſailles, of the amuſements at Rheims, of the confluence of the Rhone and Saone, viſit to the Grande Chartreuſe, and the paſſage of the Alps, bear more particular marks of his genius and diſpoſition. When he aſcends the Alps, we ſee even the native grandeur of his ideas heightened. He is hardly any longer a mortal being, nec vox ſonat hominem, particularly when he goes up to the Grande Chartreuſe, that wild magical enthuſiaſm ſo natural to him, ſeems to poſſeſs his whole ſoul.

On his return from his travels, and after the miſunderſtanding with Mr. Walpole, when his natural melancholy, heightened by chagrin, had led his wiſhes to a gloomy dereliction of ſociety, he again viſited the Chartreuſe. The ſituation was perfectly ſuitable to his ſtate of mind, and there he wrote, in the Album of the fathers, ſuch an Alcaic Ode as he himſelf only could have written. It is marked with all the fineſt touches of his melancholy muſe, and flows with ſuch an originality of expreſſion, that one can hardly lament he did not honour his own language, by making it the vehicle of this noble imagery and pathetic ſentiment:

Oh tu, ſeveri religio loci,
Quocunque gaudes nomine (non leve
Nativa nam certè fluenta
Numen habet, veterefque ſylvas;
Præſentiorem et conſpicimus Deum
Per invias rupes, fera per juga,
Clivoſque præruptos, ſonantes
Inter aquas, nemorumque noctem;
Quàm ſi repoſtus ſub trabe citreâ
Fulgèret auro, et Phidiacâ manu)
Salve vocanti ritè, feſſo et
Da placidam juveni quietem.
Quod ſi invidendis ſedibus, et frui
Fortuna ſacrâ lege ſilentii
Vetat volentem, me reſorbens
In medios violenta fluctus:
Saltem remoto des, Pater, angulo
Horas ſenectæ ducere liberas;
Tutumque vulgari tumultu
Surripias, hominumque curis.

He returned to England September 1. 1741, and, in about two months afterwards, buried his father; who, by the neglect of his buſineſs, and an injudicious waſte of money upon a new houſe at Wanſtead, ſo much leſſened his patrimony, that it would by no means enable him to proſecute the ſtudy of the law, without his becoming burthenſome to his mother and aunt.

Theſe two ſiſters had, for many years, kept an India warehouſe in Cornhill, under the joint names of Gray and Antrobus. Upon Mr. Gray's death, having acquired what would ſupport them decently for the reſt of their lives, they retired to Stoke, near Windſor, to the houſe of their other ſiſter Mrs. Rogers, lately become the widow of a gentleman of that name, who had, in the earlier part of his life, followed the profeſſion of the law, but retired from buſineſs many years before his death.

Gray, though he had taken his reſolution of declining the ſtudy of the law, was too delicate to hurt two perſons, for whom he had the tendereſt affection, by peremptorily declaring his real intentions; and therefore changed, or pretended to change the line of that ſtudy: And accordingly, towards the end of the ſubſequent year, went to Cambridge to take his bachelor's degree in civil law.

But the narrowneſs of his circumſtances was not the only thing that diſtreſſed him at this period. He had loſt the friendſhip of Mr. Walpole abroad. He had alſo loſt much time in his travels; and he well knew, that whatever improvement he might have made in this interval, either in taſte or ſcience, ſuch improvement would be of little uſe to him in his preſent ſituation and exigencies. This was not all. His other friend Weſt, he found, on his return, oppreſſed by ſickneſs and a load of family misfortunes. Theſe, the ſympathizing heart of Gray made his own. But his cares were vain. Weſt's health declined daily, and he left London in March 1742; and, for the benefit of the air, went to David Mitchell's, Eſq. at Pope's in Hertfordſhire.

During an interval of ſomething more than two months, they maintained a conſtant correſpondence on ſubjects of literature and their claſſical ſtudies. The laſt letter from Weſt is dated May 11. 1742. Gray returned an anſwer May 27. Immediately afterwards, he went upon a viſit to his relations at Stoke, where he wrote his Ode on the Spring. He ſent it, as ſoon as written, to his beloved friend; but he was dead before it reached Hertfordſhire.

There ſeems to be a kind of preſentiment in that pathetic piece, which readers of taſte will feel when they learn this anecdote, and which will make them read it with redoubled pleaſure. It will alſo throw a melancholy grace on the Ode on the Diſtant Proſpect of Eton, and on the Ode to Adverſity, both of them written the Auguſt following; for as both theſe poems abound with pathos, thoſe who have feeling hearts will feel this excellence the more ſtrongly, when they know the cauſe from whence it aroſe; and the unfeeling will perhaps learn to reſpect what they cannot taſte, when they are prevented from imputing to a ſplenetic melancholy, what, in fact, ſprung from the moſt benevolent of all ſenſations.

It is probable, that the Elegy in a Country Church-Yard was begun, if not finiſhed, about this time, though the concluſion, as it ſtands at preſent, is certainly different from what it was in the firſt manuſcript copy.

The firſt impulſe of his ſorrow, for the death of his friend, gave birth to a little ſonnet, in Engliſh, on the Petrarchian model, which is exceedingly tender and mournful.

In vain to me the ſmiling mornings ſhine,
And redd'ning Phœbus liſts his golden fire:
The birds in vain their amorous deſcant join;
Or cheerful fields reſume their green attire:
Theſe ears, alas! for other notes repine,
A different object do theſe eyes require:
My lonely anguiſh melts no heart but mine;
And in my breaſt the imperfect joys expire.

Yet morning ſmiles the buſy race to cheer,
And new-born pleaſure brings to happier men:
The fields to all their wonted tribune bear:
To warm their little loves the birds complain:
I fruitleſs mourn to him, that cannot hear,
And weep the more, becauſe I weep in vain.

The only addition he afterwards made to his didactic poem, De Principiis Cogitandi, is the apoſtrophe in hexameters to the friend he had loſt, written in the genuine ſtrain of claſſical majeſty, with which he intended to begin the fourth book.

Hactenus haud ſegnis Naturæ arcana retexi
Muſarum interpres, primuſque Britanna per arva
Romano liquidum deduxi flumine rivum.
Cum tu opere in medio, ſpes tanti et cauſa laboris,
Linquis, et æternam fari te condis in umbram!
Vidi egomet duro graviter concuſſa dolore
Pectora, in alterius non unquam lenta dolorem;
Et languere oculos vidi, et palleſcere amantem
Vultum, quo nunquam pietas niſi rara, fideſque,
Altus amor veri, et purum ſpirabat honeſtum.
Viſa tamen tardi demùm inclementia morbi
Ceſſare eſt, reducemque iterum roſeo ore Salutem
Speravi, atque unà tecum, dilecte Favoni!
Credulus heu longos, ut quondàm, fallere ſoles:
Heu ſpes nequicquam dulces, atque irrita vota!
Heu mœſtos ſoles, ſine te quos ducere flendo
Per deſideria, et queſtus jam cogor inanes!
At Tu, ſancta anima, et noſtri non indiga luctûs,
Stellanti templo, ſincerique ætheris igne,
Unde orta es, fruere; atque o ſi ſecura, nec ultra
Mortalis, motos olim miſerata labores
Reſpectes, tenuesque vacet cognoſcere curas;
Humanam ſi fortè alâ de ſede procellam
Contemplère, metus, ſtimuloſque cupidinis acres,
Gaudiaque et gemitus, parvoque in corde tumultum
Irarum ingentem, et ſævos ſub pectore fluctus;
Reſpice et has lacrymas, memori quas ictus amore
Fundo; quod poſſum, juxtà lugere ſepulchrum
Dum juvat, et mutæ vana hæc jactare favillæ.

Having made a viſit of ſome length at Stoke, where he wrote a conſiderable part of his more finiſhed poems, he returned to Cambridge, which, from this period, became his principal reſidence. He ſpent, indeed, during the lives of his mother and aunts, his ſummer vacations at Stoke, and after they died, in making little tours or viſits to his friends in different parts of the country.

The conveniences reſulting from that ſituation, to a perſon of circumſcribed fortune and a ſtudious life, were, in his eſtimation, more than a counterbalance for the diſlike, which, on ſeveral accounts, he bore to the place. He was admitted to the degree of Bachelor of the Civil Law in the winter 1742, as appears by his letter to his intimate friend, Dr. Wharton of Old Park, near Durham, formerly fellow of Pembroke-Hall, Cambridge, dated December 27. 1742, in which he employs his uſual vein of ridicule on the Univerſity. From this time he appears to have laid aſide compoſition almoſt entirely. Leſs pleaſed with exerting his own powers than in contemplating the exertions of others, he applied himſelf, with intenſe aſſiduity, to the ſtudy of the beſt Greek authors; inſomuch, that in the ſpace of about ſix years, there were hardly any writers of note in that language, which he had not only read but digeſted; remarking, by the mode of common-place, their contents, their difficult and corrupt paſſages; and all this with the accuracy of a critic, added to the diligence of a ſtudent.

During this interval, however, he was not ſo entirely occupied with his ſtated employment, as to have no time for expreſſing his averſion to the ignorance and dullneſs which appeared to ſurround him; but of what he intended on this ſubject, a ſhort fragment only remains, which ſeems to have been intended as a Hymn to Ignorance; and had he proceeded with it, would have contained much good ſatire upon falſe ſcience and ſcholaſtic pedantry. What he wrote of it is purely introductory; yet many of the lines are ſo ſtrong, and the general caſt of the verſification ſo muſical, that it will probably give the admirers of Dryden and Pope a higher opinion of his poetical talents, than many of his lyric productions have done.

Hail, horrors, hail! ye ever gloomy bowers,
Ye gothic fanes, and antiquated towers,
Where ruſhy Camus' ſlowly-winding flood
Perpetual draws his humid train of mud:
Glad I reviſit thy neglected reign,
Oh take me to thy peaceful ſhade again.
But chiefly thee, whoſe influence breath'd from high,
Augments the native darkneſs of the ſky;
Ah ignorance! ſoft ſalutary power!
Proſtrate with filial reverence I adore.
Thrice hath Hyperion roll'd his annual race,
Since weeping I forſook thy fond embrace.
Oh ſay, ſucceſsful doſt thou ſtill oppoſe
Thy leaden Ægis 'gainſt our ancient foes?
Still ſtreach, tenacious of thy right divine,
The maſſy ſceptre o'er thy ſlumbering line?
And dews Lethean through the land diſpenſe
To ſleep in ſlumbers each benighted ſenſe?
If any ſpark of wit's deluſive ray
Break out, and flaſh a momentary day,
With damp, cold touch forbid it to aſpire,
And huddle up in fogs the dangerous fire.
Oh ſay—ſhe hears me not, but careleſs grown,
Lethargic nods upon her ebon throne.
Goddeſs! awake, ariſe, alas my fears!
Can powers immortal feel the force of years?
Not thus of old, with enſigns wide unfurl'd,
She rode triumphant o'er the vanquiſh'd world;
Fierce nations own'd her unreſiſted might,
And all was ignorance, and all was night.
Oh ſacred age! Oh times for ever loſt!
(The ſchool-man's glory, and the churchman's boaſt.)
For ever gone—yet ſtill to fancy new,
Her rapid wings the tranſient ſcene purſue,
And bring the buried ages back to view.
High on her car, behold the grandam ride
Like old Seſoſtris with barbaric pride;
* * * * a team of harneſs'd monarchs bend
* * * * *

In 1744, he appears to have given up entirely his didactic poem, and to have relinquiſhed, for ſome time at leaſt, any farther ſolicitations of the muſe.

Mr. Walpole, notwithſtanding, being deſirous to preſerve what he had already written, and to perpetuate the merit of their deceaſed friend, importuned him to publiſh his own poems, together with thoſe of Weſt; but this he declined, from the apprehenſion, that the joint ſtock of both would hardly fill a ſmall volume.

In 1747, Mr. Maſon, then ſcholar of St. John's College, afterwards fellow of Pembroke-Hall, was introduced to his acquaintance. He had written the year before, his "Monody on the Death of Pope," and his "Il Bellicoſo," and "Il Pacifico," and Gray had reviſed them at the requeſt of a friend. This laid the foundation of an intimacy, which continued without interruption till the death of Gray.

The ſame year, a favourite cat, belonging to Mr. Walpole, happening to be drowned, Gray amuſed himſelf on the occaſion, with writing an elegant little Ode; in which he has happily united both humour and inſtruction.

But the following year was diſtinguiſhed by a far more important effort of his muſe, the initiatory fragment of an Eſſay on the Alliance of Education and Government, which is ſuperior to every thing in the ſame ſtyle of writing in our language. He meant to ſhew, that both muſt concur to produce great and uſeful men. It was intended to be addreſſed to the Preſident Monteſquieu, and poſſibly the intervening death of that great man might be a means of his relinquiſhing his purpoſe. It opens with two ſimiles, an uncommon kind of exordium; but which, it is probable, he intentionally choſe to intimate the analogical method he meant to purſue in his ſubſequent reaſonings.

As ſickly plants betray a nigard earth,
Whoſe barren boſom ſtarves her gen'rous birth,
Nor genial warmth, nor genial juice retains
Their roots to feed, and fill their verdant veins:
And as in climes, where winter holds his reign,
The ſoil, though fertile, will not teem in vain,
Forbids her gems to ſwell, her ſhades to riſe,
Nor truſts her bloſſoms to the churliſh ſkies:
To draw mankind in vain the vital airs,
Unform'd, unfriended, by thoſe kindly cares,
That health and vigour to the ſoul impart,
Spread the young thought, and warm the opening heart:
So fond inſtruction on the growing powers
Of nature idly laviſhes her ſtores,
If equal juſtice, with unclouded face,
Smile not indulgent on the riſing race,
And ſcatter with a free, though frugal hand,
Light golden ſhowers of plenty o'er the land:
But tyranny has fix'd her empire there,
To check their tender hopes with chilling fear,
And blaſt the blooming promiſe of the year.
This ſpacious animated ſcene ſurvey,
From where the rolling orb, that gives the day,
His fable ſons with nearer courſe ſurrounds
To either pole, and life's remoteſt bounds.
How rude ſoe'er th' exterior form we find,
Howe'er opinion tinge the varied mind,
Alike to all the kind, impartial heav'n
The ſparks of truth and happineſs has giv'n:
With ſenſe to feel, with memory to retain,
They follow pleaſure, and they fly from pain;
Their judgment mends the plan their fancy draws,
Th' event preſages, and explores the cauſe;
The ſoft returns of gratitude they know,
By fraud elude, by force repell the foe;
While mutual wiſhes, mutual woes endear
The ſocial ſmile and ſympathetic tear.
Say, then, through ages by what fate confin'd
To different climes ſeem different ſouls aſſign'd?
Here meaſur'd laws and philoſophic eaſe
Fix, and improve the poliſh'd arts of peace.

There induſtry and gain their vigils keep,
Command the winds, and tame th' unwilling deep.
Here force and hardy deeds of blood prevail;
There languid pleaſure ſighs in every gale.
Oft o'er the trembling nations from afar
Has Scythia breath'd the living cloud of war;
And, where the deluge burſt, with ſweepy ſway,
Their arms, their kings, their gods were roll'd away.
As oft have iſſued, hoſt impelling hoſt,
The blue-eyed myriads from the Baltic coaſt.
The proſtrate ſouth to the deſtroyer yields
Her boaſted titles, and her golden fields;
With grim delight the brood of winter view
A brighter day, and heav'ns of azure hue,
Scent the new fragrance of the breathing roſe,
And quaff the pendent vintage as it grows.
Proud of the yoke, and pliant to the rod,
Why yet does Aſia dread a monarch's nod,
While European freedom ſtill withſtands
Th' encroaching tide, that drowns her leſſening
And ſees far off with an indignant groan
Her native plains, and empires once her own.
Can opener ſkies and ſuns of fiercer flame
O'erpower the fire, that animates our frame;
As lamps, that ſhed at eve a cheerful ray,
Fade and expire beneath the eye of day?
Need we the influence of the northern ſtar
To ſtring our nerves and ſteel our hearts to war?
And, where the face of nature laughs around,
Muſt ſick'ning virtue fly the tainted ground?
Unmanly thought! what ſeaſons can controul,
What fancied zone can circumſcribe the ſoul,
Who, conſcious of the ſource from whence ſhe ſprings,
By reaſon's light, on reſolution's wings,
Spite of her rail companion, dauntleſs goes
O'er Lybia's deſerts and through Zembla's ſnows?
She bids each ſlumb'ring energy awake,
Another touch, another temper take,
Suſpends th' inferior laws, that rule our clay:
The ſtubborn elements confeſs her ſway;
Their little wants, their low deſires, refine,
And raiſe the mortal to a height divine.
Not but the human fabric from the birth
Imbibes a flavour of its parent earth.
As various tracts enforce a various toil,
The manners ſpeak the idiom of their ſoil.
An iron-race the mountain-cliffs maintain,
Foes to the gentler genius of the plain:
For where unwearied ſinews muſt be found
With ſide-long plough to quell the flinty ground,
To turn the torrent's ſwift-deſcending flood,
To brave the ſavage ruſhing from the wood,
What wonder, if to patient valour train'd
They guard with ſpirit, what by ſtrength they gain'd?
And while their rocky ramparts round they ſee,
The rough abode of want and liberty,
(As lawleſs force from confidence will grow)
Inſult the plenty of the vales below?
What wonder, in the ſultry climes, that ſpread,
Where Nile redundant o'er his ſummer bed
From his broad boſom life and verdure flings,
And broods o'er Egypt with his wat'ry wings,
If with advent'rous oar and ready ſail,
The duſky people drive before the gale;
Or on frail floats to neighb'ring cities ride
That riſe and glitter o'er the ambient tide.

How much it is to be wiſhed, that Gray had completed what he thus admirably begun! The deſign is the nobleſt which he ever attempted; and alſo, as far as he carried it into execution, the moſt exquiſitely finiſhed.

The Ode on Eton College was his firſt Engliſh production which appeared in print. It was publiſhed in folio, by Dodſley, in 1747; about the ſame time, at Mr. Walpole's requeſt, he ſat for his picture to Echart, in which, on a paper which he held in his hand, Mr. Walpole wrote the title of this ode; and to intimate his own high juſt opinion of it, added this line of Lucan by way of motto,

Nec licuit populis parvum temte, Nile, videre.
Phars. lib. x. l. 296.

This highly-finiſhed ode, together with his three other monoſtrophic odes on Spring, on a Favourite Cat, to Adverſity, was afterwards inſerted in "Dodſley's Miſcellany." The Ode to Adverſity was firſt printed under the title of an Hymn to Adverſity, which is here dropped for the ſake of uniformity. It is unqueſtionably as truly lyrical as any of his other odes.

In 1750, he put his laſt hand to the Elegy Written in a Country Church-Yard, which, when finiſhed, was communicated firſt to Mr. Walpole, and by him to ſeveral perſons of diſtinction. This brought Gray acquainted with Lady Cobham, and furniſhed an occaſion for his Long Story, a compoſition in ballad-meaſure, in which the different colours of wit and humour are peculiarly and intimately blended.

The Elegy, having found its way into the "Magazine of Magazines," he wrote Mr. Walpole, February 11. 1751, deſiring him that he would put his own manuſcript into the hands of Dodſley, and order him to print it immediately.

This was the moſt popular of all his productions. It ran through eleven editions in a very ſhort ſpace of time, was finely tranſlated into Latin by Meſſrs. Anſtey and Roberts, and in the ſame year another, though inferior, verſion of it was publiſhed by Lloyd. In the manuſcript copy, he gave it only the ſimple title of Stanzas Written in a Country Church-Yard. Mr. Maſon perſuaded him to call it an Elegy, becauſe the ſubject authoriſed him ſo to do, and the alternate meaſure in which it was written, ſeemed peculiarly fit for that ſpecies of compoſition.

In 1753, Mr. Bentley, wiſhing to ſupply every ornament that his pencil could contribute, drew not only for it, but alſo for the reſt of Gray's productions, a ſet of deſigns, which were handſomely repaid by the following complimentary ſtanzas, many of which are equal in merit to the beſt in his moſt finiſhed poems.

In ſilent gaze the tuneful choir among,
Half-pleas'd, half-bluſhing let the muſe admire,
While Bentley leads her ſiſter-art along,
And bids the pencil anſwer to the lyre.
See, in their courſe, each tranſitory thought
Fix'd by his touch a laſting eſſence take;
Each dream, in fancy's airy colouring wrought,
To local ſymmetry and life awake!
The tardy rhymes that us'd to linger on,
To cenſure cold, and negligent of fame,
In ſwifter meaſures animated run,
And catch a luſtre from his genuine flame.
Ah! could they catch his ſtrength, his eaſy grace,
His quick creation, his unerring line;
The energy of Pope they might efface,
And Dryden's harmony ſubmit to mine.
But not to one in this benighted age
Is that diviner inſpiration giv'n
That burns in Shakſpeare's or in Milton's page,
The pomp and prodigality of heav'n.
As when conſpiring in the diamond's blaze,
The meaner gems, that ſingly charm the ſight,
Together dart their intermingled rays,
And dazzle with a luxury of light.
Enough for me, if to ſome feeling breaſt
My lines a ſecret ſympathy impart;

And as their pleaſing influence flows confeſt,
A ſigh of ſoft reflection heave the heart.
* * * *

The paper on which the laſt ſtanza was written being broken, the words in Italics were ſupplied by Mr. Maſon, who very ingenuouſly and very juſtly expreſſes his diſſatisfaction with the termination of the third line: the end of the fourth, however, is not leſs exceptionable; perhaps it would be better if it ſtood thus:

Enough for me, if to ſome feeling breaſt,
My lines a ſecret ſympathy convey;
And as their pleaſing influence there ſhall reſt,
A ſigh of ſoft reflection ſteal away.

The panegyric is certainly carried too far; there is ſo much of groteſque fancy in the deſigns, that they have failed to pleaſe univerſally. Let the reader peruſe the ſecond ſtanza, and turn to the deſign for the Ode to Adverſity. Let him behold the Quarter Staff of Jupiter, the Horſe-Lock, the Hunting Whip, and the Talons, and bid deſiance to riſibility if he can. The original drawings, in Mr. Maſon's opinion, are infinitely ſuperior to the publiſhed engravings of them.

The head-pieces to the Long Story, exhibiting a view of Stoke-Pogis church and manſion, were copied from a ſketch by Gray. The Church-yard was the ſubject of his Elegy.

In the March following, Gray ſuſtained a loſs which he long and ſeverely felt; his mother, to whom his conduct was exemplary for the diſcharge of every filial duty, and who merited all the tenderneſs and attention ſhe received, was taken from him by death. She was buried in the ſame vault, where her ſiſter's remains had been depoſited, more than three years before, in the church-yard of Stoke. As the inſcription on the the tombſtone (at leaſt the latter part of it) is undoubtedly of Gray's writing, it here would claim a place, if it had not a peculiar pathos to recommend it, and at the ſame time a true inſcriptive ſimplicity.

In the vault beneath, are depoſited,
In hope of a joyful reſurrection,
The remains of
MARY ANTROBUS.
She died, unmarried, Nov. v. M,DCC,XLIX.
Aged LXVI.
In the ſame pious confidence,
Beſide her friend and ſiſter,
Here ſleep the remains of
Dorothy Gray,
Widow, the careful tender mother
Of many children, one of whom alone
Had the misfortune to ſurvive her.
She died March XI. M,DCC,LIII.
Aged LXVII.

The lines, in which Pope has expreſſed his piety, beautiful as they are, and much as they deſerve to be praiſed, appear, notwithſtanding, to excite leſs of ſympathy than a ſingle ſtroke in this inſcription, or a paſſage in a letter to Mr. Maſon, written the following December, on the deaths of his father and friend, Dr. Marmaduke Pricket, a young phyſician. "I have ſeen the ſcene you deſcribe, and know how dreadful it is; I know too, I am the better for it. We are all idle and thoughtleſs things, and have no ſenſe, no uſe in the world, any longer than that ſad impreſſion laſts; the deeper it is engraved the better."

Impreſſions of grief on the generality of mankind, like characters marked on the ſand of the ſea, are ſpeedily effaced by the influx of buſineſs or pleaſure; but the traces of them on the heart of Gray were too deeply inſcribed to be ſoon obliterated. He cheriſhed the remembrance of his loſs with a melancholy pleaſure, of which the preſent writer can eaſily comprehend the value; for he knows what it is to loſe perſons that his eyes and heart have been long uſed to, and he never deſires to part with the remembrance of that loſs.

Gray, as is evident by a letter to Dr. Wharton, finiſhed his Ode on the Progreſs of Poeſy, early in 1755; the Bard alſo was begun about that time, and the following beautiful fragment On the Pleaſure ariſing from Viciſſitude:

Now the golden morn aloft
Waves her dew-beſpangled wing,
With vermil cheek, and whiſper ſoft
She wooes the tardy ſpring:
Till April ſtarts, and calls around
The ſleeping fragrance from the ground;
And lightly o'er the living ſcene
Scatters his freſheſt, tendereſt green.

New born flocks, in ruſtic dance,
Friſking ply their feeble feet;
Forgetful of their wint'ry trance
The birds his preſence greet:
But chief, the ſky-lark warbles high
His trembling thrilling ecſtacy;
And, leſſening from the dazzled ſight,
Melts into air and liquid light.

Yeſterday the ſullen year
Saw the ſnowy whirlwind fly;
Mute was the muſic of the air,
The herd ſtood drooping by:
Their raptures now that wildly flow,
No yeſterday, nor morrow know;
'Tis man alone that joy deſcries
With forward and reverted eyes.

Smiles on paſt misfortune's brow,
Soft reflection's hand can trace;
And o'er the cheek of ſorrow throw
A melancholy grace:
While hope prolongs our happier hour;
Or deepeſt ſhades, that dimly lower
And blacken round our weary way,
Gilds with a gleam of diſtant day.

Still, where roſy pleaſure leads,
See a kindred grief purſue;
Behind the ſteps that miſery treads
Approaching comfort view:
The hues of bliſs more brightly glow,
Chaſtis'd by ſabler tints of woe;
And blended form, with artful ſtrife,
The ſtrength and harmony of life.

See the wretch, that long has toſt
On the thorny bed of pain,
At length repair his vigour loſt,
And breathe, and walk again:
The meaneſt floweret of the vale,
The ſimpleſt note that ſwells the gale,
The common ſun, the air, the ſkies,
To him are opening Paradiſe.

Humble quiet builds her cell
Near the courſe where pleaſure flows;
She eyes the clear cryſtalline well,
And taſtes it as it goes.

* * *

From the looſe hints in his common-place book, he appears to have planned a fourth Ode on the Connection between Genius and Grandeur; but it cannot now be aſcertained if any part of it was actually written.

In 1756, he removed from St. Peter's College to Pembroke-Hall, in conſequence of two or three young men of fortune, who lived in the ſame ſtair-caſe, having, for ſome time, intentionally diſturbed him with their riots. He complained to the governing part of the Society; and not thinking that his remonſtrance was ſufficiently attended to, he "left his lodgings," as he himſelf expreſſes it, "becauſe the rooms were noiſy, and the people of the houſe uncivil."

Upon the death of Cibber, in 1757, the Duke of Devonſhire, then Lord Chamberlain, made him an offer of the vacant office of Poet-Laureat, through the hands of Lord John Cavendiſh, his brother; but the diſgrace brought upon that office, by the inability of ſome who had filled it, probably induced him to decline the appointment, which was beſtowed on Whitehead.

The ſame year, he publiſhed the Progreſs of Poeſy, and the Bard, his two greateſt lyric performances. Their merit was not immediately perceived, nor generally acknowledged. Garrick wrote a few lines in their praiſe. Lloyd and Colman wrote in concert two Odes to "Oblivion" and "Obſcurity," in which they were ridiculed with much contempt and much ingenuity.

In 1759, his curioſity drew him away from Cambridge, to a lodging in Southampton-row, near the Muſeum, where he reſided near three years, reading and tranſcribing. His extracts, amounting in all to a tolerably-ſized folio, are at preſent in the hands of Lord Orford, who printed the ſpeech of Sir Thomas Wyat from them, in the ſecond number of his "Miſcellaneous Antiquities."

In 1762, when the Profeſſorſhip of Modern Languages and Hiſtory at Cambridge, became vacant by the death of Mr. Turner, he was, as he ſays, "cockered and ſpirited up," till he aſked it of Lord Bute, who ſent him a civil refuſal, and the place was given to Mr. Laurence Brocket, the tutor of Sir James Lowther.

His conſtitution was weak, and believing that his health was promoted by exerciſe and change of place, he undertook, in 1765, a journey into Scotland, of which his account, ſo far as it extends, is very curious and elegant: for, as his comprehenſion was ample, his curioſity extended to all the works of art, all the appearances of nature, and all the monuments of paſt events. He naturally contracted a friendſhip with Dr. Beattie, whom he found "a poet, a philoſopher, and a good man." The Mariſchal College at Aberdeen offered him the degree of Doctor of Laws, which, having omitted to take it at Cambridge, he thought it decent to refuſe.

In 1767, Dr. Beattie, deſirous that his country ſhould afford ſome teſtimony of its regard to Gray, ſolicited his permiſſion, to Mr. Foulis, to print, at the Univerſity preſs of Glaſgow, an elegant edition of his works. Dodſley had before aſked the ſame favour, and Gray, unwilling to refuſe, gratified both with a copy, containing a few notes, and the imitations of the Norſe poetry, intended to ſupplant the Long Story, which was printed at firſt only to illuſtrate Mr. Bentley's deſigns.

The death of Mr. Brocket, in July 1768, left another opening to the Profeſſorſhip, which he had before unſucceſsfully ſought. Lord Bute, however, was not then in office, and the Duke of Grafton, to preclude a requeſt, within two days of the vacancy, appointed Gray.

This place was valuable in itſelf, the ſalary being 400 l. a year; but what rendered it particularly acceptable to Gray, was its being given him without any ſolicitation.

On the Duke of Grafton being elected Chancellor of the Univerſity, in 1769, gratitude prompted Gray, unaſked, to furniſh an irregular Ode for Muſic, to be performed at his inſtallation; and whatever the celebrated Junius (notwithſtanding his compliment to Gray) might pretend, it was the offering of no venal muſe. The ode in its ſtructure is dramatic, and it contains nothing of the complimentary kind, which is not entirely ſuited to the characters employed. In point of lyrical arrangement and expreſſion, it is equal to moſt of his other odes.

Not long after the buſtle of the inſtallation was over, ill health made another journey neceſſary, and he viſited the lakes of Weſtmoreland and Cumberland. The impreſſions he received from the wonderful ſcenery that ſurrounded him, he tranſmitted to his friend, Dr. Wharton, in epiſtolary journals, with all the wildneſs of Salvator, and the ſoftneſs of Claude.

In May 1771, writing to the ſame friend, he complains of a violent cough, which had troubled him for three months, and which he called incurable; adding, that till this year he never knew what (mechanical) low ſpirits were.

The anxiety he felt from holding, as a ſinecure, an office, the duties of which he thought himſelf bound to perform, without doubt, contributed to the latter complaint.

The object of his profeſſorſhip being twofold, and the patent allowing him to effect one of its deſigns by deputy, it is underſtood, that he liberally rewarded, for that purpoſe, the teachers in the Univerſity of Italian and French.

The other part he himſelf prepared to execute; but though the profeſſorſhip was inſtituted in 1724, none of his predeceſſors had furniſhed a plan of lectures.

Embarraſſed by this and other difficulties, and retarded by ill health, the undertaking at length became ſo irkſome, that he ſeriouſly propoſed to reſign the office.

About the end of May he removed from Cambridge to London, after having ſuffered from irregular attacks of an hereditary gout, to which he had long been ſubject, and from which a life of ſingular temperance could not protect him.

In London his indiſpoſition having increaſed, Dr. Gilborne adviſed him to remove from his lodgings in Jermyn-ſtreet to Kenſington. This change was of ſo much benefit, that he was ſoon enabled to return to Cambridge, from whence he meditated a journey to Old Park, near Durham, the reſidence of his friend Dr. Wharton, which he hoped might re-eſtabliſh his health; but his intentions and hopes were deluſive.

On the 24th of July, while at dinner in the College-hall, he felt a ſudden nauſea, which obliged him to riſe from table, and retire to his chamber. The gout had fixed on his ſtomach, and reſiſted all the powers of medicine. On the 29th, he was ſeized with a ſtrong convulſion fit, which, on the 30th, returned with increaſed violence; and the next evening he expired, in the 55th year of his age.

He was ſenſible at times, almoſt to the laſt, and from the firſt aware of his extreme danger, but expreſſed no viſible concern at the thoughts of his approaching diſſolution. He was buried in the vault, in which his aunt and his mother were interred, in the church-yard of Stoke, agreeable to his own direction.

By his will, dated July 2. 1770, he appointed Mr. Maſon, and the Rev. Dr. Browne, Preſident of Pembroke-hall, his joint executors; and left "Mr. Maſon all his books, manuſcripts, coins, muſic, printed or written, and papers of all kinds, to preſerve or deſtroy at his own diſcretion."

His Poems and Letters were collected and publiſhed by Mr. Maſon, in one volume 4to, 1775, to which he prefixed "Memoirs of his Life and Writings," with "imitations, variations and additional notes," and republiſhed in 4 vols 8vo. 1778. The common editions of his Poems are too numerous to be ſpecified. To the edition in 8vo. 1786, were added notes and parallel paſſages by Mr. Wakefield. The notes are in general pertinent and judicious, and the parallel places diſcover extenſive erudition, and are ſelected with taſte and judgment. An edition, with a perpetual commentary, is preparing for the preſs, which the preſent writer is happy to announce as the production of his friend Alexander Thomſon, Eſq. author of "Whiſt," "The Paradiſe of Taſte," and other ingenious performances. The Latin language was enriched with an elegant and ſpirited tranſlation of the Bard, in 1775, and an admirable Greek verſion of the Elegy in a Country Church-Yard, proceeded from the claſſical pen of Dr. Norbury, in 1793. The imitations it has produced are innumerable.

It may be collected from the narrative of Mr. Maſon, that the greateſt part of Gray's life was ſpent in that kind of learned leiſure, which has only ſelf-improvement and ſelf-gratification for its object. He was remarkably diſintereſted in all his purſuits. He never read or wrote with a view of making labours uſeful to himſelf. He may be ſaid to have been one of thoſe few perſonages in the annals of literature eſpecially in the poetical claſs, who are devoid of ſelf-intereſt, and at the ſame time attentive to economy; and alſo was among mankind in general, one of theſe very few economiſts who poſſeſs that talent untinctured with the ſlighteſt ſtain of avarice. When his circumſtances were at the loweſt, he gave away ſuch ſums in charity, as would have done credit to an ampler purſe. But what chiefly deterred him from taking any advantage by his literary purſuits, was a certain degree of pride, which led him to deſpiſe the idea of being thought an author by profeſſion.

However, it is probable, that, early in life, he had an intention of publiſhing an edition of Strabo; for his papers contain a great number of notes and geographical diſquiſitions on that author, particularly with reſpect to that part of Aſia which comprehends Perſia and India. The indefatigable pains which he took with the writings of Plato, and the quantity of critical, as well as explanatory obſervations, which he has left upon almoſt every part of his works, plainly indicate that no man in Europe was better prepared to republiſh and illuſtrate that philoſopher than Gray. Another work, on which he beſtowed uncommon labour, was the Anthologia. In an interleaved copy of that collection of Greek epigrams, he has tranſcribed ſeveral additional ones, which he ſelected in his extenſive reading, has inſerted a great number of critical notes and emendations, and ſubjoined

a copious index, in which every epigram is arranged under the name of its reſpective author. But whether he intended this manuſcript for the preſs or not is uncertain. The only work which he meditated upon with that view from the beginning, was a Hiſtory of Engliſh Poetry, upon a plan ſketched out by Pope. He has mentioned this himſelf in an advertiſement prefixed to thoſe three fine imitations of Norſe and Welch poetry, which he gave to the world in the laſt edition of his poems. But after he had made ſome conſiderable preparations for the execution of this deſign, and Mr. Maſon had offered him his aſſiſtance, he was informed that Mr. Warton was engaged in a work of the ſame kind. The undertaking was therefore relinquiſhed by mutual conſent; and, in 1770, on Mr Warton's deſiring a ſight of the plan, he readily ſent him the following "ſketch of the arrangement of the ſubject" in a letter, which was publiſhed in the "Gentleman's Magazine" for February 1783.

"Introduction. On the poetry of the Galic or Celtic nations, as far back as it can be traced.—On that of the Goths, its introduction into theſe iſlands by the Saxons and Danes, and its duration.—On the origin of rhyme among the Franks, the Saxons, and Provençaux.—Some account of the Latin rhyming poetry, from its early origin, down to the fifteenth century.

"Part I. On the School of Provençe, which roſe about the year 1100, and was ſoon followed by the French and Italians. Their heroic poeſy, or Romances in verſe, Allegories, Fabliaux, Syrvientes, Comedies, Farces, Canzoni, Sonnets, Balades, Madrigals, Seſtines, &c. Of their imitators, the French: and of the firſt Italian School, commonly called the Sicilian, about the year 1200 brought to perfection by Dante, Petrarch, Boccace, and others.—State of Poetry in England from the Conqueſt, 1066, or rather, from Henry the Second's time, 1154, to the reign of Edward the Third, 1327.

"Part II. On Chaucer, who firſt introduced the manner of the Provençaux, improved by the Italians, into our country: his character and merits at large: the different kinds in which he excelled —Gower, Occleve, Lydgate, Hawes, Gawen Douglas, Lyndeſay, Bellenden, Dunbar, &c.

"Part III. Second Italian School, of Arioſto, Taſſo, &c. an improvement on the firſt, occaſioned by the revival of Letters, the end of the fifteenth century. The Lyric poetry of this and the former age introduced from Italy by Lord Surrey, Sir T. Wyat, Bryan, Lord Vaulx, &c. in the beginning of the ſixteenth century.

"Part IV. Spenſer, his character: ſubject of his poem, allegoric and romantic, of Provençal invention; but his manner of tracing it, borrowed from the Second Italian School.—Drayton, Fairfax, Phineas Fletcher, Golding, Phaer, &c. This School ends in Milton.—A Third Italian School, full of conceit, begun in Queen Elizabeth's reign, continued under James and Charles the Firſt, by Donne, Craſhaw, Cleiveland, carried to its height by Cowley, and ending perhaps in Sprat.

"Part V. School of France, introduced after the Reſtoration—Waller, Dryden, Addiſon, Prior, and Pope—Which has continued to our own times."

Among other ſciences, Gray had acquired a great knowledge of Gothic architecture. He endeavoured to trace this mode of building from the time it commenced, through its various changes, till it arrived at its perfection in the reign of Henry VIII., and ended in that of Elizabeth. For this purpoſe, he did not ſo much depend upon written accounts, as that internal evidence which the buildings themſelves give of their reſpective antiquity. On this account, he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of heraldry, as a preparatory ſcience, and has left behind him a number of genealogical papers, more than ſufficient to prove him a complete maſter of it. The Remarks on Saxon Churches in the Introduction to Mr. Bentham's "Hiſtory of Ely" were drawn up by Gray.

But the favourite ſtudy of Gray, for the laſt ten years of his life, was natural hiſtory, which he then rather reſumed than began; as by the inſtructions of his uncle Antrobus, he was a conſiderable botaniſt at fifteen. The marginal notes which he has left on Linnæus and other writers, on the vegetable, animal, and foſſile kingdoms, are very numerous. But the moſt conſiderable are on "Hudſon's Flora Anglica," and the tenth edition of the Syſtema Naturæ, which latter he interleaved and filled almoſt entirely. While employed on zoology, he alſo read Ariſtotle's treatiſe on that ſubject with great care, and explained many difficult paſſages of that obſcure ancient, from the lights he had acquired from modern naturaliſts. Excepting pure mathematics, and the ſtudies dependent on that ſcience, there was hardly any part of human learning, in which he had not acquired a competent ſkill; in moſt of them a conſummate maſtery.

Of his amuſements, the chief and almoſt the only one (excepting the frequent experiments he made on flowers, for the purpoſe of inveſtigating the proceſs of vegetation) was muſic. His taſte in this art was equal to his ſkill in any more important ſcience. Vocal muſic he chiefly preferred. His inſtrument was the harpſicord; on which, though he had little execution, yet he accommodated his voice ſo judiciouſly to his playing, as to give an auditor conſiderable pleaſure. His judgment in ſtatuary and painting was exquiſite, and formed from an almoſt inſtinctive perception of thoſe graces beyond the reach of art, in which the divine works of the great maſters abound. He had a fine taſte in prints, in his choice of which he obſerved the ſame judicious rule which he followed in making his collection of muſic; which was not ſo much to get together complete ſets of the works of any maſter, as to ſelect thoſe (the beſt in their kind) which would recal to his memory the capital pictures, ſtatues, and buildings, which he had ſeen and ſtudied.

Of Gray's religious opinions but little is known; there are, however, ſufficient traces left to ſhow him a believer. To Bolingbroke's ſcepticiſm he has written an anſwer. His ſentiments of Shaftesbury cannot be miſtaken; and both Voltaire and Hume he cenſures with freedom In private life he was moſt reſpected by thoſe who beſt knew him; he was a man of good-breeding, virtue, and humanity.

Mr. Maſon has declined drawing up any formal character of Gray; but has adopted one from a letter to James Boſwell, Eſq., by the Rev. Mr. Temple, Rector of St. Gluvias in Cornwall, firſt printed anonymouſly in the "London Magazine."

"Perhaps he was the moſt learned man in Europe. He was equally acquainted with the elegant and profound parts of ſcience, and that not ſuperficially but thoroughly. He knew every branch of hiſtory, both natural and civil; had read all the original hiſtorians of England, France, and Italy; and was a great antiquarian. Criticiſm, metaphyſics, morals, politics, made a principal part of his ſtudy; voyages and travels of all ſorts were his favourite amuſements, and he had a fine taſte in painting, prints, architecture, and gardening. With ſuch a fund of knowledge, his converſation muſt have been equally inſtructing and entertaining; but he was alſo a good man, a man of virtue and humanity. There is no character without ſome ſpeck, ſome imperfection; and I think the greateſt defect in his was an affectation in delicacy, or rather effeminacy, and a viſible faſtidiouſneſs, or contempt and diſdain of his inferiors in ſcience. He alſo had, in ſome degree, that weakneſs which diſguſted Voltaire ſo much in Mr. Congreve; though he ſeemed to value others chiefly according to the progreſs they had made in knowledge, yet he could not bear to be conſidered himſelf merely as a man of letters; and though without birth, or fortune, or ſtation, his deſire was to be looked upon as a private independent gentleman, who read for his amuſement. Perhaps it may be ſaid, What ſignifies ſo much knowledge, when it produced ſo little? Is it worth taking ſo much pains to leave no memorial but a few poems? But let it be conſidered that Mr. Gray was to others at leaſt innocently employed; to himſelf, certainly beneficially. His time paſſed agreeably; he was every day making ſome new acquiſition in ſcience; his mind was enlarged, his heart ſoftened, his virtue ſtrengthened; the world and mankind were ſhown to him without a maſk; and he was taught to conſider every thing as trifling, and unworthy of the attention of a wiſe man, except the purſuit of knowledge and practice of virtue, in that ſtate wherein God hath placed us."

The friendſhip of Mr. Maſon could not fail him here; yet his judgment ſurely has been ſuſpended; for to leave his friend under the idea of a faſtidious fribble, was, to ſay no more, unfavourable to his memory. That ſuch is the idea, no one, who reads the character, can doubt. It is true, the world knew it. There was a reſerve in his behaviour, too near reſembling faſtidiouſneſs; and he was apt to indulge himſelf in ſuch modiſh niceties of dreſs, as did not always correſpond with the [illegible] of an academic gown. After his return from his travels, he commonly wore a muff, an object of ſmall deriſion with the Univerſity lads. If he went to a coffee-houſe, he would call the waiter in a tone the moſt effeminate, to give him "that ſilly paper book," meaning the "Gentleman's Magazine," and ſometimes the "Review." Timorous, as effeminate and fearful of accidents, he had a ladder to let down from his window, in caſe of fire. Some young men of his college in-wantonly ſet up a falſe alarm, in order to draw him upon his ladder; and this, among other circumſtances was ſaid to be the occaſion of his removing to Pembroke-Hall.

Mr. Maſon has remarked, that Gray's effeminacy was affected moſt before thoſe whom "he did not wiſh to pleaſe;" and that he is unjuſtly charged, with making knowledge his ſole reaſon of preference, as he paid his eſteem to none, whom he did not likewiſe believe to be good.

As a poet, his excellence will be confeſſed by all who are entitled to judge of it, except now and then by a jealous critic educated at Oxford, and aſſiduous in depreciating the merit of every author, who flouriſhed at a rival Univerſity. On his poetry, it is needleſs to beſtow praiſes, or to repel the attacks of envy and rancour. If Gray was not a poet of the firſt order, there is no poetry exiſting; and if his bold expreſſions be nonſenſe, ſo are the moſt rapturous paſſages of Sophocles, Klopſtock, Shakſpeare and Milton, and the ſublimeſt figures of divine inſpiration. In ſublimity, pathos, and enthuſiaſm, he is perhaps excelled by Dryden and Collins; but in richneſs of imagery, glow of expreſſion, and harmony of numbers, he ſurpaſſes the two great maſters of Engliſh lyric poetry.

Gray's poems are not numerous; but all of them, at leaſt his ſerious pieces, have great merit; and whoever writes but as correctly as he has written, will not find himſelf able to write much. His pieces have all the marks of cloſe ſtudy and patient reviſion; and the ſmallneſs of their number, compared with the length of time he was known as a poet, ſufficiently ſhows, that they were kept long under his own eyes, before they were ſubmitted to thoſe of the public. They may, therefore, be regarded as a kind of ſtandard of the correctneſs to which Engliſh poetry has arrived in our days.

The Elegy Written in a Country Church-Yard, is, perhaps, the firſt of the kind in any language; its ſubject, like the ſubject of Milton's Epic, is univerſally intereſting, the allegorical imagery is ſublime, and the natural deſcription picturesque; the ſentiment is moſtly ſimple and pathetic, and the verſification has a melody, which has not often been attained, and cannot be ſurpaſſed.

The principal reſpect in which it has been ſuppoſed defective is want of plan. Dr. Knox, in his "Eſſays," has obſerved, "that it is thought by ſome to be no more than a confuſed heap of ſplendid ideas, thrown together without order, and without proportion." That it is, however, not deſtitute of plan, is ſufficiently demonſtrated by Scott, in his "Critical Eſſays." The analyſis ſhows, that it is perfectly regular, though ſimple in its general plan; but the arrangement might perhaps have been in ſome parts improved. Some paſſages have been cenſured by Mr. Kelly, in the "Babbler," with great injuſtice. Unacknowledged imitations of Collins, Young, Pope, Tickell, Thomſon, &c. have been pointed out by other critics. Theſe, however, are by no means certain. There are ſo many inſtances of a coincidence totally caſual, that it is difficult to aſcertain what is, or is not really a deſigned or accidental imitation. When Gray condeſcends to imitate, he recovers his level at leaſt by ſome new thoughts, ſome dignity of verſe, or ſome luminous embelliſhments of diction.

In the firſt copy of this exquiſite poem, the concluſion was different from that which he afterwards compoſed; and though his after-thought was unqueſtionably the beſt, yet there is a pathetic melancholy in the four rejected ſtanzas, following, With incenſe kindled at the muſe's flame, which highly claims preſervation.

The thoughtleſs world to majeſty may bow,
Exalt the brave, and idolize ſucceſs;
But more to innocence their ſafety owe,
Than pow'r, or genius, e'er conſpir'd to bleſs.

And thou, who mindful of th' unhonour'd dead,
Doſt in theſe notes their artleſs tale relate,
By night and lonely contemplation led
To wander in the gloomy walks of fate:

Hark! how the ſacred calm, that breathes around,
Bids every fierce tumultuous paſſion ceaſe;
In ſtill ſmall accents whiſpering from the ground,
A grateful earneſt of eternal peace.

No more, with reaſon and thyſelf at ſtriſe,
Give anxious cares and endleſs wiſhes room;
But through the cool ſequeſter'd vale of life
Purſue the ſilent tenor of thy doom.

And here the poem was originally intended to conclude, before the happy idea of the hoary-headed ſwain, &c. ſuggeſted itſelf to him. Mr. Maſon thinks the third of theſe rejected ſtanzas equal to any in the whole elegy.

After the ſtanza, ending, To meet the ſun upon the upland lawn, in the firſt copy, followed this ſtanza:

Him have we ſeen the greenwood ſide along,
While o'er the heath we hied, our labour done,
Oft as the woodlark pip'd her farewell ſong,
With wiſtful eyes purſue the ſetting ſun.

Mr. Maſon wonders that he rejected this ſtanza, as it not only has the ſame ſort of Doric delicacy, which charms us peculiarly in this part of the poem, but alſo completes the account of his whole day: whereas, this evening ſcene being omitted, we have only his morning walk, and his noon-tide repoſe.

The ſtanza, conſidered in itſelf, is not a bad one, but Gray was right in ſuppreſſing it. The poet's evening had been deſcribed before, at the opening of the poem; to have deſcribed it again would have been ſuperfluous, and an inſtance of that diſguſting redundance, which is ſure to create confuſion, and which we always meet with in the works of common writers. Diverſity of ſituation is alſo wanting; we had the wood before, Hard by yon wood, &c., and here we have it again, The greenwood ſide along, &c.

Between the line, Grav'd on the ſtone beneath yon aged thorn, and the epitaph, Gray originally inſerted a very beautiful ſtanza, which was printed in ſome of the firſt editions, but afterwards omitted; becauſe he thought, that it was too long a parentheſis in this place. The lines, however, are, in themſelves, exquiſitely fine, and demand preſervation.

There ſcatter'd oft, the earlieſt of the year,
By hands unſeen are ſhow'rs of violets found;
The redbreaſt loves to build and warble there,
And little footſteps lightly print the ground.

Mr. Edwards endeavoured to ſupply what he thought a defect in the Elegy, by adding after, Some Cromwell guiltleſs, &c., the two following ſtanzas, which are ſtrongly marked with the characters of ſimplicity, tenderneſs, and harmony:

Some lovely fair, whoſe unaffected charms
Shone with attraction to herſelf unknown;
Whoſe beauty might have bleſt a monarch's arms,
And virtue caſt a luſtre on the throne.

That humble beauty warm'd an honeſt heart,
And cheer'd the labours of a faithful ſpouſe;
That virtue form'd for every decent part,
The healthful offſpring that adorn'd their houſe.

Gray, in his Church-Yard Elegy, certainly ſhowed great excellence in dwelling on the tenderer intereſts of human nature. His eaſy native pathos brought thoſe intereſts to the heart. But his genius was not marked alone by that tender and melancholy ſenſibility, ſo intereſting in that inimitable performance. That impreſſion was only its bas-relief. There was a Gothic grandeur in the ſtructure, of the moſt ſtriking and powerful effect. Yet this could be felt, could be taſted only by the few, while the natural pictures of the former were caught by and melted in every eye.

It is obſervable, that ſublimity of genius has been generally attended with a ſtrong affection for the demonry of the ancient northern fable. Milton was particularly fond of it. It was the ſtudy of his youth and the dream of his age. This paſſion ſeems natural. There is ſomething ſublime in the Gothic mythology, in the idea of ancient hardihood, and the feats of former times, that is peculiarly adapted to a natural grandeur of imagination. In the mythology of the Greeks, every thing ſeems little, ſeems puerile in compariſon. Hence Gray's ſtrong attachment to every thing that breathed of the former. The hall of Odin was heaven itſelf to him, and Oſſian the very demon of poetry. It would be ſuperfluous for the preſent writer to enlarge on the effect this enthuſiaſm had on Gray's poetical writings. The readers of poetry are no ſtrangers to that ſublime expreſſion, and to that noble air of mind, which diſtinguiſh his two greater odes, the Progreſs of Poeſy, and the Bard. They breathe the high ſpirit of lyric enthuſiaſm; the tranſitions are ſudden and impetuous, the language full of fire and force, and the imagery carried, without impropriety, to the moſt daring height. They have been accuſed of obſcurity; but the one can be obſcure to thoſe only who have not read Pindar, and the other only to those who are unacquainted with the history of our own nation. Ample justice has been very lately done them by Mr. Potter, the justly celebrated translator of Eschylus and Euripides, in his "Cursory Examination of the Lyric Performances of Gray, &c." and by his ingenious commentator, Mr. Wakefield.

"These two Pindaric Odes of Gray," says Mr. Wakefield, "have a much greater resemblance to the Theban Bard, than any thing of the kind in our own, and probably in any other language. Wildness of thought, and irregularity of verse, had usually been esteemed the only way to resemble Pindar. The characteristic excellencies of Pindar's poetry are sublimity of conception, boldness of metaphor, dignity of style, rapidity of composition, and magnificence of phraseology. If a fair judgment can be formed upon those few specimens, which the desolations of time have spared; in grandeur of imagery, and regularity of thought, he is surpassed by Gray; as on the other hand, he may justly claim a superiority from the moral dignity of his compositions.

"These sublime and elaborate productions of genius chastised by learning, and of learning invigorated by genius, are, from their nature, by no means calculated to please the generality of readers, especially upon a slight acquaintance. A frequent and diligent contemplation of them is necessary to an adequate perception of their beauties; and perhaps no small tincture of that erudition which enabled the author to produce them. Indeed, that spirit of lyric inspiration which they breathe, that divine glow of pathos, which at the same time melts and inflames the reader, cannot operate with their full effect, but on a congenial soul, attuned to the bold vibrations of enthusiastic poesy. The motto justly proclaims—

To wisdom's ear 'tis sense and sweetness all,
Darkness and dissonance to vulgar minds.

"He who can continue amidst the blaze of splendor that bursts around him, amidst the torrent of sublimity that pours along, sedately speculating upon petty blemishes, is certainly a stranger to those sensations which animated Pindar and Gray; and deserves, for the punishment of his malice, that poetical curse denounced by the pathetic Collins, upon all those who could reflect on the author of the "Seasons," without emotions of benevolence and concern.

With him, sweet bard! may fancy die,
And joy desert the blooming year."

It must be acknowledged, however, that the The Progress of Poesy, though impregnated throughout with the fire and energy proper to lyric poetry, has a stiffness to which Pindar had certainly no recourse, and from which Dryden's "Alexander's Feast" is entirely exempt; and that the Bard, though adorned with those thoughts that breathe, and words that burn, that Gray's muse could so richly supply, is too artificial as opposed to natural, and sometimes loaded, rather than enriched with poetical imagery. But when every deduction is made that criticism requires, the Bard of Gray is entitled to rank with the "Alexander's Feast" of Dryden, and the "Passions" of Collins.

Of his other lyric pieces, the Ode on Spring, Ode on Eton College, Ode on a Favourite Cat, Ode to Adversity, and the Music Ode, please the generality of readers more than the Fatal Sisters, Descent of Odin, and Triumphs of Owen. They are by no means without faults, but the spirit of poetry, and exquisite charms of the verse, are sufficient almost to obtain reverence for their defects. The Ode on Eton College, is, in the opinion of the present writer, superior to the rest. The sentiments are natural and consonant to the feelings of humanity, and exhibited with perspicuity of method, and in an elegant, intelligible, and expressive language. The Sonnet on the Death of West, and the Epitaph on Sir William Williams, are the most perfect compositions of the kind in our language.

Indolence is an almost certain characteristic of genius, and irresolution is a natural effect of indolence. It is not to be wondered at, therefore, that Gray made many poetical essays and beginnings on subjects, from which, either by accident, or through a want of industry, he was afterwards diverted. Among these, was the following scene of a tragedy, taken from Tacitus, on the death of Agrippina, which leaves us to regret, that he only attempted a tragedy:

ACT I. SCENE I.

Agrippina, Aceronia.

Agrippina.

'Tis well, begone! your errand is perform'd:

[Speaks as to Anicetus entering.

The meſſage needs no comment. Tell your maſter,
His mother ſhall obey him. Say you ſaw her
Yielding due reverence to his high command:
Alone, unguarded, and without a lictor,
As ſits the daughter of Germanicus.
Say, ſhe retired to Antium; there to tend
Her houſehold cares, a woman's beſt employment.
What if you add, how ſhe turn'd pale, and trembled;
You think, you ſpied a tear ſtand in her eye,
And would have dropp'd, but that her pride reſtrain'd it?
(Go! you can paint it well) 'twill profit you,
And pleaſe the ſtripling. Yet 'twould daſh his joy
To hear the ſpirit of Britannicus
Yet walks on earth; at leaſt there are who know
Without a ſpell to raiſe, and bid it fire
A thouſand haughty hearts, unus'd to ſhake
When a boy frowns, nor to be lur'd with ſmiles
To taſte of hollow kindneſs, or partake
His hoſpitable board: They ate aware
Of th' unpledg'd bowl, they love not Aconite.

Aceronia

He's gone; and much I hope theſe walls alone,
And the mute air are privy to your paſſion.
Forgive your ſervant's fears, who ſees the danger
Which fierce reſentment cannot fail to raiſe
In haughty youth, and irritated power.

Agrippina.

And doſt thou talk to me, to me, of danger,
Of haughty youth, and irritated power,
To her that gave it being, her that arm'd
This painted Jove, and untaught his novice hand
To aim the forked bolt; whilſt he ſtood trembling
Scar'd at the ſound, and dazzled with its brightneſs?
'Tis like, thou haſt forgot, when yet a ſtranger
To adoration, to the grateful ſteam
Of flattery's incenſe, and obſequious vows
From voluntary realms, a puny boy,
Deck'd with no other luſtre, than the blood
Of Agrippina's race, he liv'd unknown
To fame, or fortune; haply ey'd at diſtance
Some edileſhip, ambitious of the power
To judge of weights, and meaſures; ſcarcely dar'd
On expectation's ſtrongeſt wing to ſoar
High as the conſulate, that empty ſhade
Of long-forgotten liberty: When I
Oped his young eye to bear the blaze of greatneſs;
Show'd him, where empire tower'd, and bad him ſtrike
The noble quarry. Gods! then was the time
To ſhrink from danger; fear might then have worn
The maſk of prudence: but a heart like mine,
A heart that glows with the pure Julian fire,
If bright ambition from her craggy ſeat
Diſplay the radiant prize, will mount undaunted,
Gain the rough heights, and graſp the dangerous honour.

Aceronia.

Through various life I have purſued your ſteps,
Have ſeen your ſoul, and wonder'd at its daring:
Hence riſe my fears. Nor am I yet to learn
How vaſt the debt of gratitude, which Nero
To ſuch a mother owes; the world, you gave him,
Suffices not to pay the obligation.
I well remember too (for I was preſent)
When in a ſecret and dead hour of night,
Due ſacrifice perform'd with barb'rous rites
Of mutter'd charms, and ſolemn invocation,
You bad the magi call the dreadful powers,
That read futurity, to know the fate
Impending o'er your ſon: Their anſwer was,

If the ſon reign, the mother periſhes.
Periſh (you cry'd) the mother! reign the ſon!
He reigns, the reſt is heav'n's; who oft has bade,
Ev'n when its will ſeem'd wrote in lines of blood,
Th' unthought event diſcloſe a whiter meaning.
Think too how oft in weak and ſickly minds
The ſweets of kindneſs laviſhly indulg'd
Rankle to gall; and benefits too great
To be repaid, ſit heavy on the ſoul,
As unrequited wrongs. The willing homage
Of proſtrate Rome, the ſenate's joint applauſe,
The riches of the earth, the train of pleaſures,
That wait on youth, and arbitrary ſway;
Theſe were your gift, and with them you beſtow'd
The very power he has to be ungrateful.

Agrippina.

Thus ever grave, and undiſturb'd reflection
Pours its cool dictates in the madding ear
Of rage, and thinks to quench the fire it feels not.
Say'ſt thou I muſt be cautious, muſt be ſilent,
And tremble at the phantom I have rais'd?
Carry to him thy timid counſels. He
Perchance may heed 'em: Tell him too, that one,
Who had ſuch liberal power to give, may ſtill
With equal power reſume that gift, and raiſe
A tempeſt, that ſhall ſhake her own creation
To its original atoms—tell me! ſay
This mighty emperor, this dreaded hero,
Has he beheld the glittering front of war?
Knows his ſoft ear the trumpet's thrilling voice,
And outcry of the battle? Have his limbs
Sweat under iron harneſs? Is he not
The ſilken ſon of dalliance, nurs'd in eaſe
And pleaſure's flowery lap?—Rubellius lives,
And Sylla has his friends, though ſchool'd by fear
To bow the ſupple knee, and court the times
With ſhows of fair obeiſance; and a call,
Like mine, might ſerve belike to wake pretenſions
Drowſier than theirs, who boaſt the genuine blood
Of our imperial houſe.

Aceronia.

Did I not wiſh to check this dangerous paſſion,
I might remind my miſtreſs that her nod
Can rouſe eight hardy legions, wont to ſtem
With ſtubborn nerves the tide, and face the rigour
Of bleak Germania's ſnows. Four, not leſs brave,
That in Armenia quell the Parthian force
Under the warlike Corbulo, by you
Mark'd for their leader: Theſe, by ties confirm'd,
Of old reſpect and gratitude, are yours.
Surely the Maſians too, and thoſe of Egypt,
Have not forgot your ſire: The eye of Rome
And the prætorian camp have long rever'd,
With cuſtom'd awe, the daughter, ſiſter, wife,
And mother of their Cæſars.

Agrippina.

Ha! by Juno,
It bears a noble ſemblance. On this baſe
My great revenge ſhall riſe; or ſay we ſound
The trump of liberty; there will not want,
Even in the ſervile ſenate, ears to own
Her ſpirit-ſtirring voice; Soranus there,
And Caſſius: Vetus too, and Thraſea,
Minds of the antique caſt, rough, ſtubborn ſouls,
That ſtruggle with the yoke. How ſhall the ſpark
Unquenchable, that glows within their breaſts,
Blaze into freedom, when the idle herd

(Slaves from the womb, created but to ſtare,
And bellow in the Circus) yet will ſtart,
And ſhake 'em at the name of liberty,
Stung by a ſenſeleſs word, a vain tradition,
As there were magic in it? wrinkled bedlams
Teach it their grandchildren, as ſomewhat rare
That anciently appear'd, but when, extends
Beyond their chronicle—oh! 'tis a cauſe
To arm the hand of childhood, and rebrace
The ſlacken'd ſinews of time-wearied age.
Yes, we may meet, ingrateful boy, we may!
Again the buried genius of old Rome
Shall from the duſt uprear his reverend head,
Rous'd by the ſhout of millions: There before
His high tribunal thou and I appear.
Let majeſty ſit on thy awful brow,
And lighten from thy eye: Around thee call
The gilded ſwarm that wantons in the ſunſhine
Of thy full favour; Seneca be there
In gorgeous phraſe of labour'd eloquence
To dreſs thy plea, and Burrhus ſtrengthen it
With his plain ſoldier's oath, and honeſt ſeeming.
Againſt thee, liberty and Agrippina:
The world, the prize; and fair befall the victors.
But ſoft! why do I waſte the fruitleſs hours
In threats unexecuted? Haſte thee, fly
Theſe hated walls, that ſeem to mock my ſhame,
And caſt me forth in duty to their lord.

Aceronia.

'Tis time we go, the ſun is high advanc'd,
And, ere mid-day, Nero will come to Baiæ.

Agrippina.

My thought aches at him; not the baſiliſk
More deadly to the ſight, than is to me
The cool injurious eye of frozen kindneſs.
I will not meet its poiſon. Let him feel
Before he ſees me.

Aceronia.

Why then ſtays my ſovereign,
Where he ſo ſoon may——

Agrippina.

Yes, I will be gone,
But not to Antium—all ſhall be confeſs'd,
Whate'er the frivolous tongue of giddy fame
Has ſpread among the crowd; things, that but whiſper'd
Have arch'd the hearer's brow, and riveted
His eyes in fearful ecſtaſy: No matter
What; ſo't be ſtrange, and dreadful.—Sorceries,
Aſſaſſinations, poiſonings—the deeper
My guilt, the blacker his ingratitude.
And you, ye manes of ambition's victims,
Enſhrined Claudius, with the pitied ghoſts
Of the Syllani, doom'd to early death,
(Ye unavailing horrors, fruitleſs crimes!)
If from the realms of night my voice ye hear,
In lieu of penitence, and vain remorſe,
Accept my vengeance. Though by me ye bled,
He was the cauſe. My love, my fears for him
Dried the ſoft ſprings of pity in my heart,
And froze them up with deadly cruelty.
Yet if your injur'd ſhades demand my fate,
If murder cries for murder, blood for blood,
Let me not fall alone; but cruſh his pride,
And ſink the traitor in his mother's ruin. Exeunt.

SCENE II.

Otho, Poppæa.

Otho.

Thus far we're ſafe. Thanks to the roſy queen
Of amorous theſts: And had her wanton ſon
Lent us his wings, we could not have beguil'd
With more eluſive ſpeed the dazzled ſight
Of wakeful jealouſy. Be gay ſecurely;
Diſpell, my fair, with ſmiles, the tim'rous cloud
That hangs on thy clear brow. So Helen look'd,
So her white neck reclin'd, ſo was ſhe borne
By the young Trojan to his gilded bark
With fond reluctance, yielding modeſty,
And oft reverted eye, as if ſhe knew not
Whether ſhe fear'd, or wiſh'd to be purſu'd.

* * * *

Theſe ſpeeches, it muſt be acknowledged, are too long for dramatic exhibition, and the language may be ſomewhat too poetical for the ſtage; yet had the play been finiſhed, theſe circumſtances might poſſibly have been accommodated; at all events, it muſt, in ſuch hands, have made a noble dramatic poem.

The following initiatory fragment of his poem, De Principiis Cogitandi, the moſt conſiderable in itſelf all his Latin compoſitions, and perhaps the moſt laboured of any of his poems, entitles him to rank with Jonſon, Donne, Craſhaw, Cowley, Milton, Addiſon, who cultivated Latin poetry with the greateſt ſucceſs:

Unde animus ſcire incipiat: quibus inchoet orſa
Principiis ſeriem rerum, tenuemque catenam
Mnemoſyne: Ratio unde rudi ſub pectore tardum
Augeat imperium; et primum mortalibus ægris
Ira, Dolor, Metus, et Curæ naſcantur inanes,
Hinc cancre aggredior. Nec dedignare canentem,
O decus! Angliacæ certe O lux altera gentis!
Si quà primus iter monſtras, veſtigia conor
Signare incertâ, tremulâque inſiſtere plantâ.
Quin potius duc ipſe (potes namque omnia) ſanctum

Obſcuræ reſerans Naturæ ingentia clauſtra.
Tu cæcas rerum cauſas, fontemque ſeverum
Pande, Pater; tibi enim, tibi, veri magne Sacerdos,
Corda patent hominum, atque altæ penetralia Mentis.
Tuque aures adhibe vacuas, facileſque, Favoni,

The firſt ſix lines of this fragment plainly intimate that his general deſign was to be compriſed in four books. Firſt, On the origin of our ideas. Second, On the diſtribution of the ideas in the memory. Third, On the province of reaſon, and its gradual improvement. Fourth, On the cauſe and effects of the paſſions. It is evident alſo, from the exordium, that he meant to make the ſame uſe of Locke's "Eſſay on the Human Underſtanding," that Lucretius did of the dogmas of Epicurus. His hexameters are, as far as modern ones can be, after the manner of Virgil; they move in the ſucceſſion of his pauſes, and cloſe with his eliſions.

The following Alcaic fragment is ſo happily executed, that it might impoſe upon the beſt critic as being a genuine ancient compoſition.

O lachrymarum fons, tenero ſacros
Ducentium ortus ex animo; quater
Felix! in imo qui ſcatentem
Pectore te, pia Nympha, ſenſit.

The following fragment of an Heroic Epiſtle from Sophoniſba to Maſſiniſſa, in pentameters, is the beſt, becauſe the only original ſpecimen of his Ovidian verſe. His copiouſneſs of language is ſuch as very few poſſeſs, and his verſification is ſkilfully conſtructed, and commonly leaves the ear fully ſatisfied.

Egregium accipio promiſſi Munus amoris,
Inque manu mortem, jam fruitura, fero:
Atque utinam citius mandaſſes, luce vel unâ;
Tranſieram Stygios non inhoneſta lacus.
Victoris nec paſſa toros, nova nupta, mariti
Nec fueram faſtus, Roma ſuperba, tuos.

Scilicet hæc partem tibi. Maſſiniſſa, triumphi
Detractam, hæc pompæ jura minora ſuæ
Imputat. atque uxor quòd non tua preſſa catenis,
Objecta et fævæ plauſibus urbis eo:
Quin tu pro tantis cepiſti præmia factis,
Magnum Romanæ pignus amicitiæ!
Scipiadæ excuſes, oro, ſi tardius utar
Munere. Non nimiùm vivere, crede, velim.
Parva mora eſt, breve ſed tempus mea fama requirit:
Detinet hæc animam cura ſuprema meam.
Quæ patriæ prodeſſe meæ Regina ferebar,
Inter Eliſæas gloria prima nurus,
Ne videar flammæ nimis indulſiſſe ſecundæ,
Vel nimis hoſtiles extimuiſſe manus.
Fortunam atque annos liceat revocare priores,
Gaudiaque heu! quantis noſtra repenſa malis.
Primitiaſne tuas meminiſti atque arma Syphacis
Fuſa, et per Tyrias ducta trophæa vias?
(Laudis at antiquæ forſan meminiſſe pigebit,
Quodque decus quondam cauſa ruboris erit.)
Tempus ego certe memini, felicia Pænis
Quo te non puduit ſolvere vota deis;
Mæniaque intrantem vidi: longo agmine duxit
Turba ſalutantum, purpureique patres
Fœminea ante omnes longe admiratur euntem
Hæret et aſpectu tota caterva tuo.
Sam flexi, regale decus, per colla capilli,
Jam decet ardenti fuſcus in ore color!
Commendat frontis generoſa modeſtia formam,
Seque cupit laudi ſurripuiſſe ſuæ.
Prima genas tenui ſignat vix flore juventas,
Et dextræ ſoli credimus eſſe virum.
Dum faciles gradiens oculos per ſingula jactas,
(Seu rexit caſus lumina, ſive Venus)
In me (vel certè viſum eſt) converſa morari
Senſi; virgineus perculit ora pudor.
Neſcio quid vultum molle ſpirare tuendo,
Credideramque tuos lentius ire pedes.
Quærebam, juxta æqualis ſi dignior eſſet,
Quæ poterat viſus detinuiſſe tuos:
Nulla fuit circum æqualis quæ dignior eſſet,
Aſſeruitque decus conſcia forma ſuum.
Pompæ finis erat. Totâ vix nocte quievi:
Sin premat invitæ lumina victa ſopor,
Somnus habet pompas, eademque recurſat imago;
Atque iterum heſterno munere victor ades.

* * * * * *

There is ſo much of nature in the ſentiment as well as poetry in the deſcription of the triumphal entry of young Maſſiniſſa, that it is much to be regretted he did not finiſh this epiſtle.

The moral and intellectual character of Gray, as given by Dr. Johnſon, entitles him to conſiderable, but not unalloyed praiſe. His pencil has thrown little into ſhade; at the ſame time that we ſee the great genius, we ſee a man of ſingularities, almoſt too violent for the commerce of ſociety. Of the rigorous examination to which he has ſubjected his poetry, the preſent writer is not inclined to make the eulogy. Declining all conſideration of the general plan and conduct of the pieces, he has confined himſelf ſolely to ſtrictures on the words and forms of expreſſion. Verbal criticiſm is an ordeal which the moſt perfect compoſition cannot paſs without injury.

The partial and uncandid mode of criticiſm adopted by Dr. Johnſon, in his remarks on Gray, ſeems to have given general, and indeed juſt offence. Particular reſentment has been expreſſed, as might be expected, by his Alma Mater the univerſity of Cambridge. An ingenious vindication of his "Lyric Performances" by Mr. Potter, appeared in 1782, which was followed in the ſame year, by an able defence of "his writings" in "Remarks on Dr. Johnſon's Life of Gray," &c. His atrabilious mode of criticiſing, and ſtyle of expreſſion, have been ſucceſsfully imitated by Profeſſor Young of Glaſgow, in an ironical continuation of his "Criticiſm on the Poems of Gray," intituled, "A Criticiſm on the Elegy written in a Country Church-Yard," 8vo. 1783. He has alſo fallen under Mr. Wakefield's ſevereſt indignation. The refutation of his ſtrictures upon Gray he thinks a neceſſary ſervice to the public, without which they might operate with a malignant influence upon the national taſte. His cenſure, however, is too general, and expreſſed with too much vehemence. Dr Johnſon's remarks, undoubtedly betray a blindneſs to poetic beauty, an unreaſonable faſtidiouſneſs of taſte, and an unbecoming illiberality of ſpirit, yet they are not without ſome foundation; particularly that his language is encumbered and harſh, and that his poetry was in a manner the effect of induſtry and perſeverance. He appears to have turned an unwilling eye upon the beauties of Gray, becauſe his jealouſy would not ſuffer him to ſee ſuch ſuperlative merit in a contemporary. yet he is compelled to paſs a panegyric on the Elegy in a Country Church-Yard, and the Ode to Adverſity. The preſent writer perfectly agrees with Mr. Wakefield in his general idea (though he ſhould not chooſe to adopt his mode of expreſſing it) that Dr. Johnſon was not poſſeſſed of delicate ſenſibility; and to this cauſe, as well as to his political and religious prejudices, he is inclined to impute the coldneſs with which he applauds ſome of the productions of our beſt writers, and the ſeverity with which he cenſures the lyric performances of Gray. It is perhaps certain, that no one poetical reader will univerſally ſubſcribe to his deciſions, but all may admire his vaſt intuitive knowledge and power of reaſoning.

What has occurred to me from the ſlight inſpection of his letters, is, that his mind had a large graſp; that his curioſity was unlimited, and his judgment cultivated; that he was a man likely to love much where he loved at all, but that he was faſtidious and hard to pleaſe. His contempt, however, is often employed, where I hope it will be approved, upon ſcepticiſm, and infidelity.

As a writer he had this peculiarity, that he did not write his pieces firſt rudely, and then correct them, but laboured every line as it aroſe in the train of compoſition; and he had a notion not very peculiar, that he could not write but at certain times, or at happy moments; a fanciful foppery, to which my kindneſs for a man of learning and of virtue wiſhes him to have been ſuperior.

"Gray's poetry is now to be conſidered; and I hope not to be looked on as an enemy to his name, if I confeſs that I contemplate it with leſs pleaſure than his life.

"His ode on Spring has ſomething poetical, both in the language and the thought; but the language is too luxuriant, and the thoughts have nothing new. There has of late ariſen a practice of giving to adjectives derived from ſubſtantives, the termination of participles; ſuch as the cultured plain, the daiſied bank; but I was ſorry to ſee, in the lines of a ſcholar like Gray, the honied Spring. The morality is natural, but too ſtale; the concluſion is pretty.

"The poem On the Cat was doubtleſs by its author conſidered as a trifle, but it is not a happy trifle. In the firſt ſtanza, "the azure flowers that blow," ſhow reſolutely a rhyme is ſometimes made when it cannot eaſily be found. Selima, the Cat, is called a nymph, with ſome violence both to language and ſenſe; but there is good uſe made of it when it is done; for of the two lines,

What female heart can gold deſpiſe?
What cat's averſe to fiſh?

the firſt relates merely to the nymph, and the ſecond only to the cat. The ſixth ſtanza contains a melancholy truth, that "a favourite has no friend;" but the laſt ends in a pointed ſentence of no relation to the purpoſe; if what gliſtered had been gold, the cat would not have gone into the water; and, if ſhe had, would not leſs have been drowned.

"The Proſpect of Eton College ſuggeſts nothing to Gray, which every beholder does not equally think and feel. His ſupplication to father Thames, to tell him who drives the hoop or toſſes the ball, is uſeleſs and puerile. Father Thames has no better means of knowing than himſelf. His epithet "buxom health" is not elegant; he ſeems not to underſtand the word. Gray thought his language more poetical as it was more remote from common uſe: finding in Dryden "honey redolent of Spring," an expreſſion that reaches the utmoſt limits of our language, Gray drove it a little more beyond common apprehenſion, by making "gales" to be "redolent of joy and youth."

"Of the Ode on Adverſity, the hint was at firſt taken from "O Diva, gratum quæ regis Antium;" but Gray has excelled his original by the variety of his ſentiments, and by their moral application. Of this piece, at once poetical and rational, I will not by ſlight objections violate the dignity.

"My proceſs has now brought me to the wonderful "Wonder of Wonders," the two Siſter Odes; by which, though either vulgar ignorance or common ſenſe at firſt univerſally rejected them, many have been ſince perſuaded to think themſelves delighted. I am one of thoſe that are willing to be pleaſed, and therefore would gladly find the meaning of the firſt ſtanza of the Progreſs of Poetry. Gray ſeems in his rapture to confound the images of "ſpreading ſound and running water." A "ſtream of muſic" may be allowed; but where does "muſic," however "ſmooth and ſtrong," after having viſited the "verdant vales, rowl down the ſteep amain," ſo as that "rocks and nodding groves rebellow to the roar?" If this be ſaid of muſic, it is nonſenſe; if it be ſaid of water, it is nothing to the purpoſe.

"The ſecond ſtanza, exhibiting Mars's car and Jove's eagle, is unworthy of further notice. Criticiſm diſdains to chaſe a ſchool-boy to his common-places.

"To the third, it may likewiſe be objected, that it is drawn from mythology, though ſuch as may be more eaſily aſſimilated to real life. Idalia's "velvet-green" has ſomething of cant. An epithet or metaphor drawn from nature ennobles art; an epithet or metaphor drawn from art degrades nature. Gray is too fond of words arbitrarily compounded. "Many-twinkling" was formerly cenſured as not analogical; we may ſay "many-ſpotted," but ſcarcely "many-ſpotting." This ſtanza, however, has ſomething pleaſing.

"Of the ſecond ternary of ſtanzas, the firſt endeavours to tell ſomething, and would have told it, had it not been croſſed by Hyperion: the ſecond deſcribes well enough the univerſal prevalence of poetry; but I am afraid that the concluſion will not riſe from the premiſes. The caverns of the North, and the plains of Chili, are not the reſidences of "glory and generous ſhame." But that poetry and virtue go always together, is an opinion ſo pleaſing, that I can forgive him who reſolves to think it true.

"The third ſtanza ſounds big with "Delphi," and "Egean," and "Iliſſus," and "Meander," and "hallowed fountain," and "ſolemn ſound;" but in all Gray's odes there is a kind of cumbrous ſplendour which we wiſh away. His poſition is at laſt falſe: in the time of Dante and Petrarch, from whom he derives our firſt ſchool of poetry, Italy was over-run by "tyrant power" and "coward vice;" nor was our ſtate much better when we firſt borrowed the Italian arts.

"Of the third ternary, the firſt gives a mythological birth of Shakſpeare. What is ſaid of that mighty genius is true, but it is not ſaid happily: the real effects of this poetical power are put out of ſight by the pomp of machinery. Where truth is ſufficient to fill the mind, fiction is worſe than uſeleſs; the counterfeit debaſes the genuine.

"His account of Milton's blindneſs if we ſuppoſed it cauſed by ſtudy in the formation of his poem, a ſuppoſition ſurely allowable, is poetically true, and happily imagined. But the car of Dryden, with his two courſers, has nothing in it peculiar; it is a car in which any other rider may be placed.

"The Bard appears, at the firſt view, to be, as Algarotti and others have remarked, an imitation of the prophecy of Nereus. Algarotti thinks it ſuperior to its original; and, if preference depends only on the imagery and animation of the two poems, his judgment is right. There is in the Bard more force, more thought, and more variety. But to copy is leſs than to invent; and the copy has been unhappily produced at a wrong time. The fiction of Horace was to the Romans credible; but its revival diſguſts us with apparent and unconquerable falſehood. Incredulus odi.

"To ſelect a ſingular event, and ſwell it to a giant's bulk, by fabulous appendages of ſpectres and predictions, has little difficulty; for he that forſakes the probable may always find the marvellous. And it has little uſe, we are affected only as we believe; we are improved only as we find ſomething to be imitated or declined. I do not ſee that the Bard promotes any truth, moral or political.

" His ſtanzas are too long, eſpecially his epodes; the ode is finiſhed before the ear has learned its meaſures, and conſequently before it can receive pleaſure from their conſonance and recurrence.

" Of the firſt ſtanza, the abrupt beginning has been celebrated; but technical beauties can give praiſe only to the inventor. It is in the power of any man to ruſh abruptly upon his ſubject, that has read the ballad of Johnny Armſtrong,

Is there ever a man in all Scotland—

" The initial reſemblances, or alliterations, " ruin, ruthleſs, helm, or hauberk," are below the grandeur of a poem that endeavours at ſublimity.

" In the ſecond ſtanza, the Bard is well deſcribed; but in the third we have the puerilities of obſolete mythology. When we are told that " Cadwallo huſh'd the ſtormy main," and that " Modred made huge Plinlimmon bow his cloud-top'd head," attention recoils from the repetition of a tale that, even when it was firſt heard, was heard with ſcorn.

" The weaving of the winding ſheet he borrowed, as he owns, from the northern bards; but their texture, however, was very properly the work of female powers, as the act of ſpinning the thread of life in another mythology. Theft is always dangerous; Gray has made weavers of ſlaughtered bards, by a fiction outrageous and incongruous. They are then called upon to " Weave the warp, and weave the woof," perhaps with no great propriety; for it is by croſſing the woof with the warp that men weave the web or piece; and the firſt line was dearly bought by the admiſſion of its wretched correſpondent, " Give ample room and verge enough." He has, however, no other line as bad.

" The third ſtanza of the ſecond ternary is commended, I think, beyond its merit. The perſonification is indiſtinct. Thirſt and hunger are not alike; and their features, to make the imagery perfect, ſhould have been diſcriminated. We are told, in the ſame ſtanza, how " towers are fed." But I will no longer look for particular faults; yet let it be obſerved that the ode might have been concluded with an action of better example, but ſuicide is always to be had without expence of thought.

" Theſe odes are marked by glittering accumulations of ungraceful ornaments; they ſtrike rather than pleaſe; the images are magnified by affectation; the language is laboured into harſhneſs. The mind of the writer ſeems to work with unnatural violence. " Double, double, toil and trouble." He has a kind of ſtrutting dignity, and is tall by walking on tiptoe. His art and his ſtruggle are too viſible, and there is too little appearance of eaſe and nature.

" To ſay that he has no beauties, would be unjuſt: a man like him, of great learning and great induſtry, could not but produce ſomething valuable. When he pleaſes leaſt, it can only be ſaid that a good deſign was ill directed.

" His tranſlations of Northern and Welſh poetry deſerve praiſe; the imagery is preſerved, perhaps often improved; but the language is unlike the language of other poets.

" In the character of his Elegy I rejoice to concur with the common reader; for by the common ſenſe of readers uncorrupted with literary prejudices, after all the refinements of ſubtilty, and the dogmatiſm of learning, muſt be finally decided all claim to poetical honours. The Church-Yard abounds with images which find a mirror in every mind, and with ſentiments to which every boſom returns an echo. The four ſtanzas, beginning " Yet even theſe bones," are to me original: I have never ſeen the notions in any other place; yet he that reads them here, perſuades himſelf that he has always felt them. Had Gray written often thus, it had been vain to blame, and uſeleſs to praiſe him."

ODE ON THE SPRING.

Lo! where the roſy-boſom'd hours,
Fair Venus' train appear,
Diſcloſe the long-expecting flowers,
And wake the purple year!
The Attic warbler pours her throat,
Reſponſive to the cuckoo's note,
The untaught harmony of ſpring:
While, whiſpering pleaſure as they fly,
Cool zephyrs through the clear blue ſky
Their gather'd fragrance fling.

Where'er the oak's thick branches ſtretch
A broader browner ſhade;
Where'er the rude and moſs-grown beech
O'er-canopies the glade *,
Beſide ſome water's ruſhy brink
With me the muſe ſhall ſit, and think
(At eaſe reclin'd in ruſtic ſtate)
How vain the ardour of the crowd,
How low, how little are the proud,
How indigent the great!

Still is the toiling hand of care:
The panting herd's repoſe:
Yet hark, how through the peopled air
The buſy murmur glows!
The inſect youth are on the wing,
Eager to taſte the honied ſpring,
And float amid the liquid noon †:
Some lightly o'er the current ſkim,
Some ſhow their gaily-gilded trim
Quick-glancing to the ſun ‡.

To contemplation's ſober eye §
Such is the race of man:
And they that creep, and they that fly,
Shall end where they began.
Alike the buſy and the gay
But flutter through life's little day.
In fortune's varying colours dreſt:
Bruſh'd by the hand of rough miſchance,
Or chill'd by age, their airy dance
They leave in duſt to reſt.

Methinks I hear in accents low
The ſportive kind reply;
Poor moraliſt! and what art thou?
A ſolitary fly!
Thy joys no glittering female meets,
No hive haſt thou of hoarded ſweets,
No painted plumage to diſplay:
On haſty wings thy youth is flown:
Thy ſun is ſet, thy ſpring is gone—
We frolic while 'tis May.

ODE

ON THE DEATH OF A FAVOURITE CAT,

Drowned in a Tub of Gold Fiſhes.

'Twas on a lofty vaſe's ſide,
Where China's gayeſt art had dy'd
The azure flowers that blow;
Demureſt of the tabby kind,
The penſive Selima reclin'd,
Gaz'd on the lake below.

Her conſcious tail her joy declar'd;
The fair round face, the ſnowy beard,
The velvet of her paws,
Her coat, that with the tortoiſe vies,
Her ears of jet, and emerald eyes,
She ſaw; and purr'd applauſe.

Still had ſhe gaz'd; but 'midſt the tide
Two angel forms were ſeen to glide,
The genii of the ſtream:
Their ſcaly armour's Tyrian hue
Through richeſt purple to the view
Betray'd a golden gleam.

The hapleſs nymph with wonder ſaw:
A whiſker firſt, and then a claw,
With many an ardent wiſh,
She ſtretch'd in vain to reach the prize;
What female heart can gold deſpiſe?
What cat's averſe to fiſh?

Presumptuous maid! with looks intent
Again she stretch'd, again she bent,
Nor knew the gulf between.
(Malignant fate sat by, and smil'd)
The slippery verge her feet beguil'd,
She tumbled headlong in.

Eight times emerging from the flood
She mew'd to every watery god,
Some speedy aid to send.
No dolphin came, no Nereid stirr'd;
Nor cruel Tom, nor Susan heard,
A favourite has no friend!

From hence, ye beauties, undeceiv'd,
Know, one false step is ne'er retriev'd,
And be with caution bold.
Not all, that tempts your wandering eyes
And heedless hearts, is lawful prize;
Not all that glisters, gold.

ODE

ON A DISTANT PROSPECT OF ETON COLLEGE.

Ἄνθρωπος' ἱκανὴ πρόφασις εἰς τὸ δυσυχεῖν.
MENANDER.

Ye distant spires, ye antique towers,
That crown the watery glade,
Where grateful science still adores
Her Henry's * holy shade;
And ye, that from the stately brow
Of Windsor's heights th' expanse below
Of grove, of lawn, of mead survey,
Whose turf, whose shade, whose flowers among
Wanders the hoary Thames along
His silver-winding way.

Ah, happy hills, ah, pleasing shade,
Ah, fields belov'd in vain,
Where once my careless childhood stray'd,
A stranger yet to pain?
I feel the gales, that from ye blow,
A momentary bliss bestow,
As waving fresh their gladsome wing,
My weary soul they seem to sooth,
And, † redolent of joy and youth,
To breathe a second spring.

Say, father Thames, for thou hast seen
Full many a sprightly race
Disporting on thy margent green
The paths of pleasure trace,
Who foremost now delight to cleave
With pliant arm thy glassy wave?
The captive linnet which enthrall?
What idle progeny succeed
To chase the rolling circle's speed,
Or urge the flying ball?

While some on earnest business bent
Their murmuring labours ply
'Gainst graver hours, that bring constraint
To sweeten liberty;
Some hold adventurers disdain
The limits of their little reign,
And unknown regions dare descry:
Still as they run they look behind,
They hear a voice in every wind,
And snatch a fearful joy.

Gay hope is theirs, by fancy fed,
Less pleasing, when possest;
The tear forgot as soon as shed,
The sunshine of the breast:
Theirs buxom health, of rosy hue:
Wild wit, invention ever new,
And lively cheer of vigour born;
The thoughtless day, the easy night,
The spirits pure, the slumbers light,
That fly th' approach of morn.

Alas, regardless of their doom,
The little victims play!
No sense have they of ills to come,
Nor care beyond to-day.
Yet see how all around them wait
The ministers of human fate,
And black misfortune's baleful train,
Ah, show them where in ambush stand
To seize their prey, the murderous band!
Ah, tell them, they are men!

These shall the fury passions tear,
The vultures of the mind,
Disdainful anger, pallid fear,
And shame that skulks behind;
Or pining love, shall waste their youth,
Or jealousy, with rankling tooth,
That inly gnaws the secret heart,
And envy wan, and faded care,
Grim-visag'd comfortless despair,
And sorrow's piercing dart.

Ambition this shall tempt to rise,
Then whirl the wretch from high,
To bitter scorn a sacrifice,
And grinning infamy,
The stings of falsehood those shall try,
And hard unkindness' alter'd eye,
That mocks the tear it forc'd to flow;
And keen remorse, with blood defil'd,
And moody madness * laughing wild
Amidst severest woe.

Lo, in the vale of years beneath
A grisly troop are seen,
The painful family of death,
More hideous than their queen:
This racks the joints, this fires the veins,
That every labouring sinew strains,
Those in the deeper vitals rage:
Lo, poverty, to fill the band,
That numbs the soul with icy hand,
And slow-consuming age.

To each his sufferings: all are men,
Condemn'd alike to groan;

HYMN TO ADVERSITY.

——Ζῆνα

ÆSCHYLUS, in AGAMEMNONE.

Daughter of Jove, relentleſs power,
Thou tamer of the human breaſt,
Whoſe iron ſcourge, and torturing hour,
The bad affright, amidſt the beſt!
Bound in thy adamantine chain
The proud are taught to taſte of pain,
And purple tyrants vainly groan
With pangs unfelt before, unpitied, and alone.

When firſt thy fire to ſend on earth
Virtue, his darling child, deſign'd,
To thee he gave the heavenly birth,
And bade to form her infant mind.
Stern rugged nurſe; thy rigid lore
With patience many a year ſhe bore:
What ſorrow was, thou bad'ſt her know,
And from her own ſhe learn'd to melt at others woe.

Scar'd at thy frown terrific, fly
Self-pleaſing folly's idle brood,
Wild laughter, noiſe, and thoughtleſs joy,
And leave us leiſure to be good.
Light they diſperſe, and with them go
The ſummer friend, the flattering foe;
By vain proſperity receiv'd,
To her they vow their truth, and are again believ'd.

Wiſdom, in ſable garb array'd,
Immers'd in rapturous thought profound,
And melancholy, ſilent maid,
With leaden eye, that loves the ground,
Still on thy ſolemn ſteps attend:
Warm charity, the general friend,
With juſtice, to herſelf-ſevere,
And pity, dropping ſoft the ſadly-pleaſing tear.

Oh, gently on thy ſuppliant's head,
Dread goddeſs, lay thy chaſtening hand!
Not in thy gorgon terrors clad,
Nor circled with the vengeful band
(As by the impious thou art ſeen)
With thundering voice, and threatening mien,
With ſcreaming horror's funeral cry,
Deſpair, and fell diſeaſe, and ghaſtly poverty.

Thy form benign, oh goddeſs wear,
Thy milder influence impart,
Thy philoſophic train be there
To ſoften, not to wound my heart.
The generous ſpark extinct revive.
Teach me to love and to forgive,
Exact my own defects to ſcan,
What others are, to feel, and know myſelf a man.

ELEGY

WRITTEN IN A COUNTRY CHURCH-YARD.

The curfew tolls * the knell of parting day,
The lowing herd wind ſlowly o'er the lea,
The plowman homeward plods his weary way,
And leaves the world to darkneſs and to me.

Now fades the glimmering landſcape on the ſight,
And all the air a ſolemn ſtillneſs holds,
Save where the beetle wheels his droning flight,
And drowſy tinklings lull the diſtant folds;

Save that, from yonder ivy-mantled tower,
The moping owl does to the moon complain
Of ſuch as, wandering near her ſecret bower,
Moleſt her ancient ſolitary reign.

Beneath theſe rugged elms, that yew-tree's ſhade,
Where heaves the turf in many a mouldering heap,
Each in his narrow cell for ever laid,
The rude forefathers of the hamlet ſleep.

The breezy call of incenſe-breathing morn,
The ſwallow twittering from the ſtraw-built ſhed,
The cock's ſhrill clarion, or the echoing horn,
No more ſhall rouſe them from their lowly bed.

For them no more the blazing hearth ſhall burn,
Or buſy houſewife ply her evening care:
No children run to liſp their ſire's return,
Or climb his knees the envied kiſs to ſhare.

Oft did the harveſt to their ſickle yield,
Their furrow oft the ſtubborn glebe has broke;
How jocund did they drive their team afield!
How bow'd the woods beneath their ſturdy ſtroke!

Let not ambition mock their uſeful toil,
Their homely joys, and deſtiny obſcure;
Nor grandeur hear with a diſdainful ſmile,
The ſhort and ſimple annals of the poor.

The boaſt of heraldry, the pomp of power,
And all that beauty, all that wealth e'er gave,
Await alike the inevitable hour
The paths of glory lead but to the grave.

Nor you, ye proud, impute to theſe the fault,
If memory o'er their tomb no trophies raiſe,
Where through the long-drawn aiſle and fretted vault,
The peeling anthem ſwells the note of praiſe.

Can ſtoried urn or animated buſt
Back to its manſion call the fleeting breath?
Can honour's voice provoke the ſilent duſt.
Or flattery ſooth the dull cold ear of death?

Perhaps in this neglected ſpot is laid
Some heart once pregnant with celeſtial fire;

* —"ſquilla di lontano
"Che paia 'l giorno pianger, che ſi muore."
Dante. Purgat. l. 8.

Hands, that the rod of empire might have ſway'd,
Or wak'd to ecſtaſy the living lyre.

But knowledge to their eyes her ample page,
Rich with the ſpoils of time, did ne'er unroll;
Chill penury repreſs'd their noble rage,
And froze the genial current of the ſoul.

Full many a gem of pureſt ray ſerene,
The dark unfathom'd caves of ocean bear:
Full many a flower is born to bluſh unſeen,
And waſte its ſweetneſs on the deſert air.

Some village-Hampden, that with dauntleſs breaſt
The little tyrant of his fields withſtood;
Some mute inglorious Milton here may reſt,
Some Cromwell guiltleſs of his country's blood.

Th' applauſe of liſtening ſenates to command,
The threats of pain and ruin to deſpiſe,
To ſcatter plenty o'er a ſmiling land,
And read their hiſtory in a nation's eyes,

Their lot forbade; nor circumſcrib'd alone
Their growing virtues, but their crimes confin'd;
Forbade to wade through ſlaughter to a throne,
And ſhut the gates of mercy on mankind.

The ſtruggling pangs of conſcious truth to hide,
To quench the bluſhes of ingenuous ſhame,
Or heap the ſhrine of luxury and pride
With incenſe kindled at the muſe's flame.

Far from the madding crowd's ignoble ſtrife,
Their ſober wiſhes never learn'd to ſtray;
Along the cool ſequeſter'd vale of life
They kept the noiſeleſs tenor of their way.

Yet ev'n theſe bones from inſult to protect
Some frail memorial ſtill erected nigh,
With uncouth rhymes and ſhapeleſs ſculpture deck'd,
Implores the paſſing tribute of a ſigh.

Their name, their years, ſpelt by th' unletter'd muſe,
The place of fame and elegy ſupply:
And many a holy text around ſhe ſtrews,
That teach the ruſtic moraliſt to die.

For who, to dumb forgetfulneſs a prey,
This pleaſing anxious being e'er reſign'd,
Left the warm precincts of the cheerful day,
Nor caſt one longing lingering look behind?

On ſome fond breaſt the parting ſoul relies,
Some pious drops the cloſing eye requires;
Ev'n from the tomb the voice of nature cries,
* Ev'n in our aſhes live their wonted fires.

For thee, who, mindful of th' unhonour'd dead,
Doſt in theſe lines their artleſs tale relate;
If chance, by lonely contemplation led,
Some kindred ſpirit ſhall inquire thy fate.

Haply ſome hoary-headed ſwain may ſay,
" Oft have we ſeen him at the peep of dawn
" Bruſhing with haſty ſteps the dews away
" To meet the ſun upon the upland lawn."

" There at the foot of yonder nodding beech,
" That wreathes its old fantaſtic roots ſo high,
" His liſtleſs length at noontide would he ſtretch,
" And pore upon the brook that bubbles by.

" Hard by yon wood, now ſmiling as in ſcorn,
" Muttering his wayward fancies he would rove,
" Now drooping woeful wan, like one forlorn,
" Or craz'd with care, or croſs'd in hopeleſs love.

" One morn I miſs'd him on the cuſtom'd hill,
" Along the heath and near his favourite tree;
" Another came; nor yet beſide the rill,
" Nor up the lawn, nor at the wood was he;

" The next with dirges due in ſad array
" Slow through the church-way path we ſaw him borne.
" Approach and read (for thou canſt read) the lay
" Grav'd on the ſtone beneath yon aged thorn."

THE EPITAPH.

Here reſts his head upon the lap of earth,
A youth to fortune and to fame unknown,
Fair ſcience frown'd not on his humble birth,
And melancholy mark'd him for her own.

Large was his bounty, and his ſoul ſincere,
Heaven did a recompenſe as largely ſend;
He gave to miſery all he had, a tear;
He gain'd from heaven ('twas all he wiſh'd) a friend.

No farther ſeek his merits to diſcloſe,
Or draw his frailties from their dread abode,
(There they alike in trembling hope repoſe),
The boſom of his Father and his God.

THE PROGRESS OF POESY.

A PINDARIC ODE.

Φωνανθα συνετοισιν ἐς
Δὲ τὸ παν ἑρμηνέων χαλιζει. PINDAR, OLYMP. II.

ADVERTISEMENT.

When the author firſt publiſhed this and the following ode, he was adviſed, even by his friends, to ſubjoin ſome few explanatory notes; but had too much reſpect for the underſtanding of his readers to take that liberty.

I. 1.

† Awake, Æolian lyre, awake,
And give to rapture all thy trembling ſtrings.
From Helicon's harmonious ſprings
A thouſand rills their mazy progreſs take:

* " Ch'i veggio nel penſier, dolce mio fuoco,
" Fredda una lingua, e due begli occhi chiuſi
" Rimaner doppo noi pien di faville."
Petrarch, Son. 169.

* —— preventoſa ſpemæ. Petrarch, Son. 114.

† " Awake, my glory: awake, lute and harp."
David's Pſalms.

The laughing flowers, that round them blow,
Drink life and fragrance as they flow.
Now the rich ſtream of muſic winds along,
Deep, majeſtic, ſmooth, and ſtrong,
Through verdant vales, and Ceres' golden reign:
Now rolling down the ſteep amain,
Headlong, impetuous, ſee it pour;
The rocks and nodding groves rebellow to the roar.

I. 2.

* Oh! ſovereign of the willing ſoul,
Parent of ſweet and ſolemn-breathing airs,
Enchanting ſhell! the ſullen cares,
And frantic paſſions, hear thy ſoft controul,
On Thracia's hills the lord of war
Has curb'd the fury of his car,
And dropp'd his thirſty lance at thy command.
† Perching on the ſcepter'd hand
Of Jove, thy magic lulls the feather'd king,
With ruffled plume, and flagging wing:
Quench'd in dark clouds of ſlumber lie
The terror of his beak, and lightning of his eye.

I. 3.

‡ Thee the voice, the dance, obey,
Temper'd to thy warbled lay,
O'er Idalia's velvet-green
The roſy-crowned loves are ſeen.
On Cytherea's day
With antic ſports, and blue-ey'd pleaſures,
Friſking light in frolic meaſures;
Now purſuing, now retreating,
Now in circling troops they meet:
To briſk notes in cadence beating
§ Glance their many-twinkling feet.
Slow melting ſtrains their queen's approach declare:
Where'er ſhe turns, the graces homage pay.
With arts ſublime, that float upon the air,
In gliding ſtate ſhe wins her eaſy way:
O'er her warm cheek, and riſing boſom, move
‖ The bloom of young deſire, and purple light of love.

Pindar ſtyles his own poetry with its muſical accompanyments, Αἰολὶς μολπή, Αἰόλιδες χορδαὶ, Αἰολίδων πνοαὶ αὐλῶν. Æolian ſong, Æolian ſtrings, the breath of the Æolian flute.

The ſubject and ſimile, as uſual with Pindar, are united. The various ſources of poetry, which gives life and luſtre to all it touches, is here deſcribed: its quiet majeſtic progreſs enriching every ſubject (otherwiſe dry and barren) with a pomp of diction and luxuriant harmony of numbers; and its more rapid and irreſiſtible courſe, when ſwoln and hurried away by the conflict of tumultuous paſſions.

* Power of harmony to calm the turbulent ſallies of the ſoul. The thoughts are borrowed from the firſt Pythian of Pindar.

‡ Power of harmony to produce all the graces of motion in the body.

II. 1.

* Man's feeble race what ills await,
Labour, and penury, the racks of pain,
Diſeaſe, and ſorrow's weeping train,
And death, ſad refuge from the ſtorms of fate!
The fond complaint, my ſong, diſprove,
And juſtify the laws of Jove.
Say, has he given in vain the heavenly muſe?
Night, and all her ſickly dews,
Her ſpectres wan, and birds of boding cry,
He gives to range the dreary ſky;
† Till down the eaſtern cliffs afar
Hyperion's march they ſpy, and glittering ſhafts of war.

II. 2.

‡ In climes beyond the ſolar ‖ road,
Where ſhaggy forms o'er ice-built mountains roam,
The muſe has broke the twilight-gloom
To cheer the ſhivering native's dull abode.
And oft, beneath the odorous ſhade
Of Chili's boundleſs foreſts laid,
She deigns to hear the ſavage youth repeat
In looſe numbers wildly ſweet
Their feather-cinctur'd chiefs, and duſky loves.
Her track, where'er the goddeſs roves,
Glory purſue, and generous ſhame,
Th' unconquerable mind, and freedom's holy flame.

II. 3.

§ Woods, that wave o'er Delphi's ſteep,
Iſles, that crown th' Ægean deep,
Fields, that cool Iliſſus laves,
Or where Mæander's amber waves
In lingering labyrinths creep,
How do your tuneful echoes languiſh
Mute, but to the voice of anguiſh?
Where each old poetic mountain
Inſpiration breath'd around:

---

* To compenſate the real and imaginary ills of life, the muſe was given to mankind by the ſame Providence that ſends the day, by its chearful preſence to diſpel the gloom and terrors of the night.

Come marching up the eaſtern hills afar."

"Tutta lontana dal camin del ſole."
Petrarch, Canzon, 2.

§ Progreſs of Poetry from Greece to Italy, and from Italy to England. Chaucer was not unacquainted with the writings of Dante, or of Petrarch. The Earl of Surrey, and Sir Thomas Wyatt, had travelled in Italy, and had formed their taſte there; Spenſer imitated the Italian writers; Milton improved on them: but this ſchool expired ſoon after the Reſtoration, and a new one aroſe on the French model, which has ſubſiſted ever ſince.

Every ſhade and hallow'd fountain
Murmur'd deep a ſolemn ſound:
Till the ſad nine, in Greece's evil hour,
Left their Parnaſſus, for the Latian plains.
Alike they ſcorn the pomp of tyrant-power,
And coward vice, that revels in her chains.
When Latium had her lofty ſpirit loſt, [coaſt.
They ſought, oh Albion! next thy ſea-encircled

Far from the ſun and ſummer-gale,
In thy green lap was Nature's darling laid,
What time, where lucid Avon ſtray'd,
To him the mighty mother did unveil
Her awful face: The dauntleſs child
Stretch'd forth his little arms and ſmil'd,
This pencil (take ſhe ſaid) whoſe colours clear
Richly paint the vernal year:
Thine too theſe golden keys, immortal boy!
This can unlock the gates of joy;
Of horror that, and thrilling fears,
Or ope the ſacred ſource of ſympathetic tears.

III. 2.

Nor ſecond he †, that rode ſublime
Upon the ſeraph-wings of ecſtaſy,
The ſecrets of th' abyſs to ſpy.
‡ He paſs'd the flaming bounds of place and time:
§ The living throne, the ſapphire-blaze,
Where angels tremble while they gaze,
He ſaw; but, blaſted with exceſs of light,
‖ Clos'd his eyes in endleſs night.
Behold, where Dryden's leſs preſumptuous car,

Oh! lyre divine, what daring ſpirit
Wakes thee now? though he inherit
Nor the pride, nor ample pinion,

Yet oft before his infant eyes would run
Such forms, as glitter in the muſe's ray
With orient hues, unborrow'd of the ſun:
Yet ſhall he mount, and keep his diſtant way
Beyond the limits of a vulgar fate,
Beneath the good how far—but far above the great.

THE BARD:

A PINDARIC ODE.

ADVERTISEMENT.

THE following Ode is founded on a tradition current in Wales, that Edward the Firſt, when he completed the conqueſt of that country, ordered all the Bards that fell into his hands, to be put to death.

I. 1.

' RUIN ſeize thee, ruthleſs king!
' Confuſion on thy banners wait,
' Though ſann'd by conqueſt's crimſon wing,
' † They mock the air with idle ſtate.
' Helm, nor ‡ hauberk's twiſted mail,
' Nor e'en thy virtues, tyrant, ſhall avail
' To ſave thy ſecret ſoul from nightly fears,
' From Cambria's curſe from Cambria's tears!
Such were the ſounds that o'er the § creſted pride
Of the firſt Edward ſcatter'd wild diſmay,
As down the ſteep of ‖ Snowdon's ſhaggy ſide
He wound with toilſome march his long array.

---

* Διος πρὸς ὄρνιχα θεῖον. Olymp. 2. Pindar compares himſelf to that bird, and his enemies to ravens that croak and clamour in vain below, while it purſues its flight, regardleſs of their noiſe.

‡ The hauberk was a texture of ſteel ringlets, or rings interwoven, forming a coat of mail, that ſat cloſe to the body, and adapted itſelf to every motion.

‖ Snowdon was a name given by the Savons to that mountainous tract, which the Welſh themſelves call Craigian-eryri: it included all the highlands of Caernarvonſhire and Merionethſhire, as far as eaſt the river Conway. R. Hygden, ſpeaking of the caſtle of Conway, built by King Edward the Firſt, ſays, " Ad ortum amnis " Conway ad clivum montis Erery;" and Matthew of Weſtminſter, (ad. ann. 1283,) " Apud Aberconway ad " pedes montis Snowdoniæfecit erigi caſtrum forte."

Stout * Clo'fter ſtood aghaſt in ſpeechleſs trance:
To arms cried † Mortimer, and couch'd his quivering lance.

I. 2.

On a rock, whoſe haughty brow
Frown's o'er old Conway's ſoaming flood,
Rob'd in the ſable garb of woe,
With haggard eyes the poet ſtood;
(‡ Looſe his beard, and hoary hair
§ Stream'd, like a meteor, to the troubled air)
And with a maſter's hand, and prophet's fire,
Struck the deep ſorrows of his lyre.
'Hark, how each giant oak, and deſert cave,
'Sighs to the torrents awful voice beneath!
'O'er thee, oh king! their hundred arms they weave,
'Revenge on thee in hoarſer murmurs breathe;
'Vocal no more, ſince Cambria's fatal day,
'To high-born Hoel's harp, or ſoft Llewellyn's lay.

I. 3.

'Cold is Cadwallo's tongue,
'That hush'd the ſtormy main:
'Brave Urien ſleeps upon his craggy bed:
'Mountains, ye mourn in vain
'Modred, whoſe magic ſong
'Made huge Plinlimmon bow his cloud-top'd head.
'‖ On dreary Arvon's ſhore they lie,
'Smear'd with gore, and ghaſtly pale:
'Far, far aloof th' affrighted ravens ſail:
'The famiſh'd ¶ eagle ſcreams and paſſes by.
'Dear loſt companions of my tuneful art,
' Dear as the light that viſits theſe ſad eyes,
'Dear as the ruddy drops that warm my heart,
'Ye died amidſt your dying country's cries—

'No more I weep. They do not ſleep.
'On yonder cliffs, a grieſly band,
'I ſee them ſit, they linger yet,
'Avengers of their native land:
'With me in dreadful harmony they join,
'And weave with bloody hands the tiſſue of thy line.

II. 1.

"Weave the warp, and weave the woof,
"The winding-ſheet of Edward's race,
"Give ample room, and verge enough
"The characters of hell to trace.
"Mark the year, and mark the night,
"† When Severn ſhall re-echo with affright,
"The ſhrieks of death, through Berkeley's roofs that ring:
"Shrieks of an agonizing king;
"‡ She-wolf of France, with unrelenting fangs,
"That tears the bowels of thy mangled mate,
"§ From thee be born, who o'er thy country hangs
"The ſcourge of Heaven. What terrors round him wait!
"Amazement in his van, with flight combin'd;
"And Sorrow's faded form, and Solitude behind.

II. 2.

"Mighty victor, mighty Lord,
"‖ Low on his funeral couch he lies!
"No pitying heart, no eye afford
"A tear to grace his obſequies.
"Is the ſable ¶ warrior fled?
"Thy ſon is gone. He reſts among the dead.

"Gone to ſalute the riſing morn.
"Fair laughs  the morn, and ſoft the zephyr blows,
"While proudly riding o'er the azure realm
"In gallant trim the gilded veſſel goes;
"Youth on the prow, and pleaſure at the helm;
"Regardleſs of the ſweeping whirlwind's ſway,
"That, hush'd in grim repoſe, expects his evening prey.

II. 3.

ſiderable body of troops into Ireland, to the aſſiſtance of Sictryg with the Silken-Beard, who was then making war on his father-in-law Brian, King of Dublin: the Earl and all his forces were cut to pieces; and Sictryg was in danger of a total defeat; but the enemy had a greater loſs, by the death of Brian, their king, who fell in the action. On Chriſtmas day (the day of the battle), a native of Caithneſs, in Scotland, ſaw at a diſtance, a number of perſons on horſeback, riding full ſpeed towards a hill, and ſeeming to enter into it. Curioſity led him to follow them, till, looking through an opening in the rocks, he ſaw twelve gigantic figures, reſembling women: they were all employed about a loom; and as they wove, they ſung the following dreadful ſong; which when they had finiſhed, they tore the web into twelve pieces, and (each taking her portion) galloped ſix to the north, and as many to the ſouth.

Now the ſtorm begins to lour,
(Haſte, the loom of hell prepare),
* Iron-fleet of arrowy ſhower
† Hurtles in the darken'd air.

Glittering lances are the loom,
Where the duſky warp we ſtrain,
Weaving many a ſoldier's doom,
Orkney's wo, and Randver's bane.

See the grieſly texture grow,
('Tis of human entrails made),
And the weights that play below,
Each a gaſping warrior's head.

Shafts for ſhuttles, dipt in gore,
Shoot the trembling cords along;
Sword, that once a monarch bore,
Keep the tiſſue cloſe and ſtrong.

In the Introduction to it he meant to have produced ſome ſpecimens of the ſtyle that reigned in ancient times among the neighbouring nations, or thoſe who had ſubdued the greater part of this iſland, and were our progenitors; the following three imitations made a part of them. He has long ſince dropped his deſign, eſpecially after he had heard that it was already in the hands of a perſon well qualified to do it juſtice, both by his taſte, and his reſearches into antiquity.

Note—The Valkyriur were female divinities, ſervants of Odin (or Woden) in the Gothic mythology. Their name ſignifies chooſers of the ſlain. They were mounted on ſwift horſes, with drawn ſwords in their hands; and in the throng of battle ſelected ſuch as were deſtined to ſlaughter, and conducted them to Valkalla, the hall of Odin, or paradiſe of the brave; where they attended the banquet, and ſerved the departed heroes with horns of mead and ale.

Miſta black, terrific maid,
Sangrida, and Hilda ſee,
Join the wayward work to aid:
'Tis the woof of victory.

Ere the ruddy ſun be ſet,

Blade with clattering buckler meet,
Hauberk craſh, and helmet ring.

(Weave the crimſon web of war),
Let us go, and let us fly,
Where our friends the conflict ſhare,
Where they triumph, where they die.

As the paths of fate we tread,
Wading through th' enſanguin'd field
Gondula, and Geira ſpread
O'er the youthful king your ſhield.

We the reins to ſlaughter give,
Ours to kill, and ours to ſpare:
Spite of danger he ſhall live.

Fate demands a nobler head;
Soon a king ſhall bite the ground.

Long his loſs ſhall Eirin weep,
Ne'er again his likeneſs ſee;
Long her ſtrains in ſorrow ſteep,
Strains of immortality!

Horror covers all the heath,
Clouds of carnage blot the ſun.
Siſters, weave the web of death;
Siſters, ceaſe, the work is done.

Hail the taſk, and hail the hands!
Songs of joy and triumph ſing!
Joy to the victorious bands;
Triumph to the younger king.

Learn the tenour of our ſong.
Scotland, through each winding vale
Far and wide the notes prolong.

Siſters, hence, with ſpurs of ſpeed:

THE DESCENT OF ODIN.

An Ode.

(FROM THE NORSE TONGUE,)

In Bartholinus, de cauſis contemnendæ mortis; Hafniæ, 1689, quarto.

UPREIS ODINN ALLDA GAUIR, &c.

UPROSE the King of Men with ſpeed,
And ſaddled ſtrait his coal-black ſteed;

Down the yawning steep he rode,
That leads to * Hela's drear abode,
Him the Dog of Darkness spied,
His shaggy throat he open'd wide,
While from his jaws, with carnage fill'd,
Foam and human gore distill'd;
Hoarse he bays with hideous din,
Eyes that glow, and fangs that grin;
And long pursues, with fruitless yell,
The father of the powerful spell.
Onward still his way he takes,
(The groaning earth beneath him shakes),
Till full before his fearless eyes
The portals nine of hell arise.
Right against the eastern gate,
By the moss-grown pile he sat;
Where long of yore to sleep was laid
The dust of the prophetic maid.
Facing to the northern clime,
Thrice he trac'd the Runic rhyme;
Thrice pronounc'd, in accents dread,
The thrilling verse that wakes the dead;
Till from out the hollow ground,
Slowly breath'd a sullen sound.

PR. What call unknown, what charms presume
To break the quiet of the tomb;
Who thus afflicts my troubled sprite,
And drags me from the realms of night?
Long on these mouldering bones have beat
The winter's snow, the summer's heat,
The drenching dews, and driving rain!
Let me, let me sleep again.
Who is he with voice unblest,
That calls me from the bed of rest?

O. A traveller, to thee unknown,
Is he that calls, a warrior's son.
Thou the deeds of light shalt know;
Tell me what is done below,
For whom yon glittering board is spread,
Dress'd for whom yon golden bed?

PR. Mantling in the goblet see
The pure beverage of the bee,
O'er it hangs the shield of gold;
'Tis the drink of Balder bold:
Balder's head to death is given,
Pain can reach the sons of heaven!
Unwilling I my lips unclose:
Leave me, leave me to repose.

O. Once again my call obey.
Prophetess, arise, and say,
What dangers Odin's child await,
Who the author of his fate?

PR. In Hoder's hand the hero's doom:
His brother sends him to the tomb.
Now my weary lips I close:
Leave me, leave me to repose.

O. Prophetess, my spell obey.
Once again arise, and say,
Who th' avenger of his guilt,
By whom shall Hoder's blood be spilt.

PR. In the caverns of the west,
By Odin's fierce embrace compress,
A wond'rous boy shall Rinda bear,
Who ne'er shall comb his raven-hair,
Nor wash his visage in the stream,
Nor see the sun's departing beam,
Till he on Hoder's corse shall smile,
Flaming on the funeral pile.
Now my weary lips I close:
Leave me, leave me to repose.

O. Yet a while my call obey.
Prophetess, awake, and say,
What virgins these, in speechless woe,
That bend to earth their solemn brow,
That their flaxen tresses tear,
And snowy veils, that float in air.
Tell me whence their sorrows rose,
Then I leave thee to repose.

PR. Ha! no traveller art thou
King of men, I know thee now,
Mightiest of a mighty line—

O. No boding maid of skill divine
Art thou, nor prophetess of good;
But mother of the giant-brood!

PR. Hie thee hence, and boast at home,
That never shall inquirer come
To break my iron-sleep again;
Till * Lok has burst his tenfold chain.
Never, till subsantial night
Has reassum'd her ancient right;
Till wrap'd in flames, in ruin hurl'd,
Sinks the fabric of the world.

THE TRIUMPHS OF OWEN †.

A FRAGMENT.

From Mr. Evans's Specimens of the Welsh Poetry, London, 1764, quarto.

OWEN's praise demands my song,
Owen swift, and Owen strong;
Fairest flower of Roderic's stem,
‡ Gwyneth's shield, and Britain's gem.
He nor heaps his brooded stores,
Nor all profusely pours;
Lord of every regal art,
Liberal hand, and open heart.
Big with hosts of mighty name,
Squadrons three against him came;
This the force of Eirin hiding,
Side by side as proudly riding,
On her shadow long and gay
§ Lochlin plows the watery way:

* Nifleheimr, the hell of the Gothic nations, consisted of nine worlds, to which were devoted all such as died of sickness, old age, or by any other means than in battle: Over it presided Hela, the Goddess of Death.

* Lok is the Evil Being, who continues in chains till the twilight of the gods approaches, when he shall break his bonds; the human race, the stars, and sun, shall disappear, the earth sink in the seas, and fire consume the skies; even Odin himself and his kindred deities shall perish. For a farther explanation of this mythology, see Mallet's Introduction to the History of Denmark, 1755, quarto.

† Owen succeeded his father Griffin in the principality of North Wales, A. D. 1120. This battle was fought near forty years afterwards.

‡ North Wales. § Denmark.

There the Norman sails afar,
Catch the winds, and join the war;
Black and huge along they sweep,
Burthens of the angry deep.
Dauntless on his native sands
* The Dragon-son of Mona stands;
In glittering arms and glory drest,
High he rears his ruby crest.
There the thundering strokes begin,
There the press, and there the din;
Talymalfra's rocky shore
Echoing to the battle's roar,
Where his glowing eye-balls turn,
Thousand banners round him burn.
Where he points his purple spear,
Hasty, hasty rout is there,
Marking with indignant eye
Fear to stop, and to shame fly.
There Confusion, Terror's child,
Conflict fierce, and Ruin wild,
Agony, that pants for breath,
Despair and honourable Death.

THE DEATH OF HOEL.

FROM THE WELSH †.

Had I but the torrent's might,
With headlong rage and wild affright
Upon Deira's squadrons hurl'd,
To rush, and sweep them from the world!
Too, too secure in youthful pride,
By them my friend, my Hoel, died,
Great Cian's son: of Madoc old,
He ask'd no heaps of hoarded gold;
Alone in nature's wealth array'd,
He ask'd and had the lovely maid.
To Cattraeth's vale, in glitt'ring row,
Twice two hundred warriors go;
Every warrior's manly neck
Chains of regal honour deck,
Wreath'd in many a golden link:
From the golden cup they drink
Nectar, that the bees produce,
Or the grape's ecstatic juice.
Flush'd with mirth and hope they burn:
But none from Cattraeth's vale return,
Save Aëron brave, and Conan strong,
(Bursting through the bloody throng)
And I, the meanest of them all,
That live to weep, and sing their fall.

EPITAPH,

AT BECKENHAM, ON MRS. CLARKE ‡.

Lo! where this silent marble weeps,
A friend, a wife, a mother, sleeps;
A heart, within whose sacred cell
The peaceful virtues lov'd to dwell:
Affection warm, and faith sincere,
And soft humanity, were there.
In agony, in death, resign'd,
She felt the wound she left behind.
Her infant image, here below,
Sits smiling on a father's woe;
Whom what awaits, while yet he strays
Along this lonely vale of days?
A pang, to secret sorrow dear;
A sigh, an unavailing tear;
Till time shall every grief remove,
With life, with memory, and with love.

STANZAS,

Suggested by a view of the Seat and Ruins at Kingsgate, in Kent, 1766.

Old, and abandon'd by each venal friend,
Here H——d took the pious resolution,
To smuggle a few years, and strive to mend
A broken character and constitution.

On this congenial spot he fix'd his choice;
Earl Goodwin trembled for his neighbouring sand;
Here sea-gulls scream, and cormorants rejoice,
And mariners, though shipwreck'd, fear to land.

Here reign the blustering north and blasting east,
No tree is heard to whisper, bird to sing;
Yet nature could not furnish out the feast,
Art he invokes new terrors still to bring.

Now mouldering fanes and battlements arise,
Turrets and arches nodding to their fall,
Unpeopled monasteries delude our eyes,
And mimic desolation covers all.

"Ah!" said the sighing peer, "had B—te been true,
Nor G——'s, nor B——d's promises been vain,
Far other scenes than this had grac'd our view,
And realiz'd the horrors which we feign.

"Purg'd by the sword, and purify'd by fire,
Then had we seen proud London's hated walls;
Owls should have hooted in St. Peter's choir,
And foxes stunk and litter'd in St. Paul's."

ODE FOR MUSIC.

Performed at the Senate-house at Cambridge, July 1. 1769, at the Installation of his Grace Augustus Henry Fitzroy, Duke of Grafton, Chancellor of the University.

"Hence, avaunt ('tis holy ground),
"Comus, and his midnight crew,
"And Ignorance with looks profound,
"And dreaming Sloth of pallid hue,
"Mad Sedition's cry profane,
"Servitude that hugs her chain,
"Nor in these consecrated bowers [flowers.
"Let painted Flattery hide her serpent-train in
"Nor Envy base, nor creeping Gain,
"Dare the Muse's walk to stain,

‡ Wife to a physician; she died April 27. 1757

" While bright-ey'd Science watches round:
" Hence, away, 'tis holy ground!"

From yonder realms of empyrean day
Bursts on my ear th' indignant lay:
There fit the fainted sage, the bard divine,
The few whom Genius gave to shine
Through every unborn age and undiscover'd clime.
Rapt in celestial transport they,
Yet hither oft a glance from high
They send of tender sympathy
To bless the place, where on their opening soul
First the genuine ardor stole.
'Twas Milton struck the deep-ton'd shell,
And, as the choral warblings round him swell,
Meek Newton's self bends from his state sublime,
And nods his hoary head, and listens to the rhyme.

Ye brown o'erarching groves,
That Contemplation loves,
Where willowy Camus lingers with delight!
Oft at the blush of dawn
I trod your level lawn,
Oft woo'd the gleam of Cynthia silver-bright
In cloisters dim, far from the haunts of Folly,
With Freedom by my side, and soft-ey'd Melan-
" choly."

But hark! the portails sound, and pacing forth
With solemn steps and slow,
High potentates, and dames of royal birth,
And mitred fathers in long order go:
Great * Edward, with the lilies on his brow,
From haughty Gallia torn,
And sad †Chatillon, on her bridal morn
That wept her bleeding love, and princely ‡ Clare,
And ‖ Anjou's Heroine, and § the paler Rose,
The rival of her crown and of her woes,
And  either Henry there,
The murder'd saint, and the majestic lord,
That broke the bonds of Rome.
(Their tears, their little triumphs o'er,
Their human passions now no more,
Save Charity, that glows beyond the tomb)
All that on Granta's fruitful plain
Rich streams of regal bounty pour'd,
And bade these awful fanes and turrets rise,
To hail their Fitzroy's festal morning come;
And thus they speak, in soft accord,
The liquid language of the skies:

" What is grandeur, what is power?
" Heavier toil, superior pain.
" What the bright reward we gain?
" The grateful memory of the good.
" Sweet is the breath of vernal shower,
" The bee's collected treasure's sweet,
" Sweet Music's melting fall, but sweeter yet
" The still small voice of Gratitude."

Foremost, and leaning from her golden cloud,
The † venerable Marg'ret see!
" Welcome, my noble son," she cries aloud,
" To this, thy kindred train, and me:
" Pleas'd in thy lineaments, we trace
" A ‡ Tudor's fire, a Beaufort's grace.
" Thy liberal heart, thy judging eye,
" The flower unheeded shall descry,
" And bid it round heaven's altars shed
" The fragrance of its blushing head:
" Shall raise from earth the latent gem,
" To glitter on the diadem.

" Lo! Granta waits to lead her blooming band,
" Not obvious, not obtrusive, she
" No vulgar praise, no venal incense flings;
" Nor dares with courtly tongue refin'd
" Profane thy inborn royalty of mind:
" She reveres herself and thee.
" With modest pride to grace thy youthful brow,
" The laureat-wreath, ‖ that Cecil wore, she
" brings,
" And to thy just, thy gentle hand
" Submits the fasces of her sway,
" While spirits blest above, and men below,
" Join with glad voice the loud symphonious lay.

" Through the wild waves as they roar,
" With watchful eye and dauntless mien,
" Thy steady course of honour keep,
" Nor fear the rocks, nor seek the shore:
" The star of Brunswick smiles serene,
" And gilds the horrors of the deep."

‡ Elizabeth de Burg, Countess of Clare, was wife of John de Burg, son and heir of the Earl of Ulster, and daughter of Gilbert de Clare, Earl of Gloucester, by Joan of Acres, daughter of Edward the First. Hence the poet gives her the epithet of Princely. She founded Clare-Hall.

A LONG STORY§.

In Britain's isle, no matter where,
An ancient pile of building stands:

---

† Countess of Richmond and Derby; the mother of Henry the Seventh, foundress of St. John's and Christ's-Colleges.

‡ The countess was a Beaufort, and married to a Tudor; hence the application of this line to the Duke of Grafton, who claims descent from both these families.

‖ Lord Treasurer Burleigh was Chancellor of the University, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth.

§ Lady Cobham, who first lived at the mansion-house at Stoke-Pogis, having read and admired the Elegy in a Country Church-yard, in M. S. she wished to be acquaint-

The Huntingdons and Hattons there
Employ'd the power of fairy hands

To raise the ceiling's fretted height,
Each pannel in atchievements clothing,
Rich windows that exclude the light,
And passages, that lead to nothing *.

Full oft within the spacious walls,
When he had fifty winters o'er him,
† My grave Lord-keeper led the brawls;
The seal and maces danc'd before him.

His bushy beard, and shoe-strings green,
His high-crown'd hat, and sattin doublet,
Mov'd the stout heart of England's queen,
Though Pope and Spaniard could not trouble it.

What, in the very first beginning!
Shame of the versifying tribe!
Your history whither are you spinning!
Can you do nothing but describe?

A house there is (and that's enough)
From whence one fatal morning issues
‡ A brace of warriors, not in buff,
But rustling in their silks and tissues.

The first came cap-a-pee from France,
Her conquering destiny fulfilling,
Whom meaner beauties eye askance,
And vainly ape her art of killing.

The other amazon kind heaven
Had arm'd with spirit, wit, and satire:
But Cobham had the polish given,
And tipp'd her arrows with good-nature.

To celebrate her eyes, her air—
Coarse panegyrics would but tease her.
Melissa is her nom de guerre.
Alas, who would not wish to please her!

With bonnet blue and capuchine,
And aprons long, they hid their armour,
And veil'd their weapons bright and keen,
In pity to the country farmer.

Fame, in the shape of * Mr. P—t
(By this time all the parish know it),
Had told, that thereabouts there lurk'd
A wicked imp they call a poet:

Who prowl'd the country far and near,
Bewitch'd the children of the peasants,
Dried up the cows, and lam'd the deer,
And suck'd the eggs, and kill'd the pheasants.

My lady heard their joint petition,
Swore by her coronet and ermine,
She'd issue out her high commission,
To rid the manor of such vermin.

The heroines undertook the task,
Through lanes unknown, o'er stiles they ventur'd,
Rap'd at the door, nor stay'd to ask,
But bounce into the parlour enter'd.

The trembling family they daunt,
They flirt, they sing, they laugh, they tattle,
Rummage his mother, pinch his aunt,
And up stairs in a whirlwind rattle.

Each hole and cubboard they explore,
Each creek and cranny of his chamber,
Run hurry-skurry round the floor,
And o'er the bed and tester clamber;

Into the drawers and china pry,
Papers and books a huge imbroglio!
Under a tea-cup he might lie,
Or creas'd, like dogs-ears, in a folio.

On the first marching of the troops
The Muses, hopeless of his pardon,
Convey'd him, underneath their hoops,
To a small closet in the garden.

So Rumour says: (who will believe)
But that they left the door a-jar,
Where, safe and laughing in his sleeve,
He heard the distant din of war.

Short was his joy. He little knew
The power of magic was no fable;
Out of the window, wisk, they flew,
But left a spell upon the table.

The words too eager to unriddle,
The poet felt a strange disorder:
Transparent bird-lime form'd the middle,
And chains invisible the border.

So cunning was the apparatus,
The powerful pot-hooks did so move him,
That, will he, nill he, to the Great-house
He went, as if the devil drove him.

Yet on his way (no sign of grace,
For folks in fear are apt to pray), ed with the author; accordingly her relation, Miss Speed, and Lady Schaub, then at her house, undertook to bring this about by making him the first visit. He happened to be from home when the ladies arrived at his aunt's solitary mansion, and, when he returned, was surprised to find, written on one of his papers, in the parlour where he usually read, the following note: "Lady Schaub's compliments to Mr. Gray; she is sorry not to have found him at home, to tell him that Lady Brown is very well." This necessarily obliged him to return the visit, and soon after induced him to compose a ludicrous account of this little adventure, for the amusement of the ladies in question.

 The mansion-house at Stoke-Pogis, then in the possession of Viscountess Cobham. The style of building, which we now call Queen Elizabeth's, is here admirably described, both with regard to its beauties and defects; and the third and fourth stanzas delineate the fantastic manners of her time with equal truth and humour. The house formerly belonged to the Earls of Huntingdon, and the family of Hatton.*

† Sir Christopher Hatton, promoted by Queen Elizabeth for his graceful person and fine dancing. Brawls were a sort of figure dance, then in vogue.

‡ The reader is already apprised who these ladies were; the two descriptions are prettily contrasted; and nothing can be more happily turned than the compliment to Lady Cobham, in the eighth stanza.

 This gentleman, a neighbour and acquaintance of Gray's in the country, was much disposed at the liberty here taken with his name; yet, surely, without any great reason.*

To Phœbus he preferr'd his caſe,
And begg'd his aid that dreadful day.

The godhead would have back'd his quarrel;
But with a bluſh, on recollection,
Ow..'d that his quiver and his laurel
'Gainſt four ſuch eyes were no protection.

The court was ſat, the culprit there,
Forth from the gloomy manſions creeping,
The Lady Janes and Joans repair,
And from the gallery ſtand peeping:

Such as in ſilence of the night
Come (ſweep) along ſome winding entry,
(Styack * has often ſeen the ſight)
Or at the chapel-door ſtand centry:

In peaked hoods and mantles tarniſh'd,
Sour viſages, enough to ſcare ye,
High dames of honour once, that garniſh'd
The drawing-room of fierce Queen Mary.

The peereſs comes. The audience ſtare,
And doff their hats with due ſubmiſſion:
She curtſies, as ſhe takes her chair,
To all the people of condition.

The bard with many an artful fib,
Had in imagination fenc'd him,
Diſprov'd the arguments of † Squib,
And all that ‡ Groom could urge againſt him.

But ſoon his rhetoric forſook him,
When he the ſolemn hall had ſeen;
A ſudden fit of ague ſhook him.
He ſtood as mute as poor || Macleane.

Yet ſomething he was heard to mutter:
" How in the park, beneath an old tree
" (Without deſign to hurt the butter,
" Or any malice to the poultry),

" He once or twice had penn'd a ſonnet:
" Yet hop'd that he might ſave his bacon:
" Numbers would give their oaths upon it,
" He ne'er was for a conj'rer taken."

The ghoſtly prudes, with hagged § face,
Already had condemn'd the ſinner.
My lady roſe, and with a grace—
She ſmil'd, and bid him come to dinner ¶.

" Jeſu-Maria! Madam Bridget,
" Why, what can the Viſcounteſs mean?"
Cried the ſquare-hoods in woeful fidget,
" The times are alter'd quite and clean!

" Decorum's turn'd to mere civility;
" Her air and all her manners ſhow it.
" Commend me to her affability!
" Speak to a commoner and poet!"

[Here 500 ſtanzas are loſt.]

And ſo God ſave our noble king,
And guard us from long-winded lubbers,
That to eternity would ſing,
And keep my lady from her rubbers.

Third in the labours of the diſc came on,
With ſturdy ſtep and ſlow, Hippomedon;
Artful and ſtrong he pois'd the well known weight,
By Phlegyas warn'd, and fir'd by Mneſtheus fate,
That to avoid, and this to emulate.
His vigorous arm he try'd before he flung,
Brac'd all his nerves, and every ſinew ſtrung;
Then with a tempeſt's whirl and wary eye,
Purſu'd his caſt, and hurl'd the orb on high;
The orb on high tenacious of its courſe,
True to the mighty arm that gave it force,
Far overleaps all bound, and joys to ſee

The ponderous maſs ſtrikes in the cleaving ground,
While vales and woods and echoing hills rebound.
As when from Ætna's ſmoking ſummit broke,
The eyeleſs Cyclops heav'd the craggy rock;
Where ocean frets beneath the daſhing oar,
And parting ſurges round the veſſel roar;
'Twas there he aim'd the meditated harm,
And ſcarce Ulyſſes 'ſcap'd his giant arm.
A tiger's pride the victor bore away,
With native ſpots and artful labour gay,
A ſhining border round the margin roll'd,
And calm'd the terrors of his claws in gold.

THE LIFE OF THE AUTHOR.

In vain to me the ſmiling mornings ſhine,
And reddening Phœbus liſts his golden fire,
The birds in vain their am'rous deſcant join,
Or cheerful fields reſume their green attire.
Theſe ears, alas! for other notes repine,
A different object do theſe eyes require;
My lonely anguiſh melts no heart but mine,
And in my breaſt th' imperfect joys expire;
Yet morning ſmiles the buſy race to cheer,
And new-born pleaſure brings to happier men,
The fields to all their wonted tribute bear,
To warm their little loves the birds complain,
I fruitleſs mourn to him that cannot hear,
And weep the more becauſe I weep in vain.

GRAY'S SONNET ON THE DEATH OF WEST.

EDINBURGH:

PRINTED BY MUNDELL AND SON, ROYAL BANK CLOSE.

Anno 1794.

THE LIFE OF R. WEST.

THE few melancholy incidents which form the ſlender hiſtory of the life of WEST, were given to the world by Mr. Maſon, in his "Memoirs of the life of Gray," together with his poetical remains, and whatever was moſt valuable of his proſe writings, conſiſting chiefly of his correſpondence with Gray.

Richard Weſt was born in 1716. His father, Richard Weſt, Eſq. was Lord Chancellor of Ireland, during the two laſt years of the reign of George I. His grandfather, by the mother, the celebrated Biſhop Burnet.

He was educated at Eton School, where he formed an acquaintance with Gray, which was improved by a ſimilarity of taſte and of purſuits into a friendſhip of uncommon ardour and ſincerity.

He removed from Eton to Chriſt-Church College, Oxford, in 1734, about the ſame time that Gray left that place for Cambridge. Each of them carried with him the reputation of an excellent claſſical ſcholar; though, it is ſaid, that at the time Weſt's genius was reckoned the moſt brilliant of the two; a judgment which, in Mr. Maſon's opinion, was not well founded.

At the time of his leaving School, he commenced a correſpondence with Gray, which continued, with very little intermiſſion, for the ſpace of about eight years.

This correſpondence, which is included in the collection of letters publiſhed by Mr. Maſon, aſcertains not only the ſcope and turn of their genius, but of their temper. It includes alſo ſeveral ſpecimens of their juvenile compoſitions, and at the ſame time marks the progreſs they had made in literature.

"Though Mr. Weſt's part of that correſpondence," ſays Mr. Maſon, "will undoubtedly ſhow that he poſſeſſed very extraordinary talents, yet, on Mr. Gray's ſide, there ſeems, ſuperadded to theſe, ſuch a manly preciſion of taſte, and maturity of judgment, as would induce one to believe Mr. Walpole's phraſe not very hyperbolical, who has often aſſerted to me that "Gray never was a boy."

The letters are characterized by an elegant ſimplicity, derived from a diligent ſtudy of the beſt claſſical models, and cannot fail to be acceptable to ſuch ingenious youths, who being about the ſame age, have a reliſh for the ſame ſtudies, and boſoms ſuſceptible of the ſame warmth of friendſhip.

"Next to ſeeing you," ſays Weſt, in his letter to Gray, dated November 14. 1735, "is the pleaſure of ſeeing your handwriting; next to hearing you is the pleaſure of hearing from you. Really and ſincerely I wonder at you that you thought it not worth while to anſwer my laſt letter. I hope this will have better ſucceſs in behalf of your quondam ſchoolfellow; in behalf of one who has walked hand in hand with you, like the two children in the wood,

Through many a flowery path and ſhelly grot,
Where learning lull'd us in her private maze."

This laſt expreſſion prettily diſtinguiſhes their ſtudies, when out of the public ſchool, which would naturally, at their age, be vague and deſultory.

The reliſh he had contracted for polite literature, before his removal to Oxford, rendered the abſtruſe ſtudies which occupy the attention of young men, altogether taſteleſs and irkſome.

"Song was his favourite and firſt purſuit." Minſtrel, Book I. Stanza 57.

"As yet," he writes Gray, May 24. 1736, "I have not looked into Sir Iſaac. Public diſputations I hate; mathematics I reverence; hiſtory, morality, and natural philoſophy, have the greateſt charms in my eye; but who can forget poetry? they call it idleneſs, but it is ſurely the moſt enchanting thing in the world, "ac dulce otium et pœne omni negotio pulchrius."

In the December following, he exhorted his friend, whoſe thoughts were directed to the ſtudy of the law, as a profeſſion for life, "not to throw poetry, like a nauſeous weed, away, but to cheriſh its ſweets in his boſom."

Mix with your grave deſigns a little pleaſure,
Each day of buſineſs has its hour of leiſure.

As a proof of his attachment to his claſſic companions, "I have ſent you," ſays he, "an elegy of Tibullus tranſlated. Tibullus, you muſt know, is my favourite elegiac poet; for his language is more elegant, and his thoughts more natural than Ovid's. Ovid excels him only in wit, of which no poet had more, in my opinion. The reaſon I chooſe ſo melancholy a kind of poeſy, is becauſe my low ſpirits and conſtant ill health (things in me not imaginary as you ſurmiſe, but too real, alas! and I fear conſtitutional) have tuned my heart to elegies of woe." It is to be regretted that Mr. Maſon has omitted this verſion, only becauſe it is a mere verſion, and becauſe it is not written in alternate, but heroic rhyme, which he thinks is not the ſpecies of Engliſh meaſure adapted to elegiac poetry.

In 1737, he addreſſed to Gray, and his friends at Cambridge, the beautiful elegiac epiſtle, Ad Amicos, imitated from Elegy V. Book III. of Tibullus, and a letter of Pope's, in ſickneſs, to Steele. "This melancholy elegy, and this melancholy letter," ſays he, "I turned into a more melancholy epiſtle of my own, during my ſickneſs, in the way of imitation; and this I ſend to you and my friends at Cambridge, not to divert them, for it cannot; but merely to ſhow them how ſincere I was when ſick."

Almoſt all Tibullus's elegy is imitated in this epiſtle, from whence his tranſition to Pope's letter is very artfully contrived, and beſpeaks a degree of judgment much beyond his years.

In Spring 1738, he left Chriſt-Church for the Inner-Temple, and Gray removed from Cambridge to town the latter end of that year, intending alſo to apply himſelf to the ſtudy of the law in the ſame ſociety.

Upon this occaſion, Gray addreſſed to him the delicate "Sapphic Ode," beginning "Barbaras ædes aditure mecum," with the following beautiful Alcaic fragment:

O lachrymarum fons, tenero ſacros
Ducentium ortus ex animo; quater
Fœlix! in imo qui ſcatentem
Pectore te, pia Nympha, ſenſit.

It may perhaps be ſaid, without paying too great a compliment to Gray's genius, that no poet of the Auguſtan age ever produced four more perfect lines, or what would ſooner impoſe on the beſt critic, as being a genuine ancient compoſition.

To Gray's elegant ode, Weſt returned a Latin Elegy, beginning Quod mihi tam gratæ miſiſti dona Camœnæ, written September 17. 1738.

He ſpent the greateſt part of the winter with his mother and ſiſters at Epſom, during which time ſeveral letters paſſed between the two friends, on ſubjects of literature and their claſſical ſtudies.

In the ſpring 1739, Gray went abroad with Mr. Walpole, and ſpent near two years in travelling through France and Italy, from whence he tranſmitted to Weſt and his parents, from time to time, entertaining accounts of the places he viſited, interſperſed occaſionally with ſome exquiſitely finiſhed pieces of Latin poetry, which he compoſed on the ſpot, for the entertainment of his friend.

Nothing that Gray ſaw was ſuffered to eſcape him. From no relation, though purpoſely deſigned for the public eye, can ſo much information be drawn as from his caſual letters; and the elegant eaſe of his epiſtolary ſtyle has a charm in it for all readers of true taſte.

During this interval of his friend's abſence, Weſt reſided at the Temple, with little attention to the buſineſs of the place. His thoughts were directed towards the law; but he hung back with fond reluctance on the muſe.

While Gray was at Florence, 1740, he addreſſed to him a Latin Elegy, beginning, Ergo deſidiæ videor tibi crimine dignus, expreſſing his wiſhes to ſee Italy and Greece.

Finding that his averſion to the profeſſion for which he had deſtined himſelf, became almoſt inſuperable, he wrote to Gray on the ſubject, expreſſing, in the ſtrongeſt manner, the ennui that almoſt overwhelmed him, and intimating his having quitted the Temple.

" I lived at the Temple," he writes his friend, June 5. 1740, " till I was ſick of it. I have juſt left it; and I find myſelf as much a lawyer as I was when I was in it. It is certain, at leaſt, I may ſtudy the law here as well as I could there. My being in chambers did not ſignify to me a pinch of ſnuff. They tell me my father was a lawyer, and, as you know, eminent in the profeſſion; and ſuch a circumſtance muſt be of advantage to me. My uncle [Burnet] too makes ſome figure in Weſtminſter Hall; and there's another advantage: Then my grandfather's name would get me many friends. Is it not ſtrange that a young fellow that might enter the world with ſo many advantages will not know his own intereſt?" &c. &c.

To this letter, written apparently in much agitation of mind, which he endeavours to conceal by an unuſual careleſſneſs of manner, Gray returned an anſwer which preſents the fineſt picture of the writer's mind, and is replete with delicate feeling, manly ſenſe, and epiſtolary eaſe.

" You are yet young, have ſome advantages and opportunities, and an undoubted capacity, which you have never yet put to the trial. Set apart a few hours; ſee how the firſt year will agree with you, and at the end of it you are ſtill the maſter; if you change your mind, you will only have got the knowledge of a little, ſomewhat that can do no hurt, or give you cauſe of repentance. If your inclination be not fixed upon any thing elſe, it is a ſymptom that you are not abſolutely determined againſt this, and warns you not to miſtake mere indolence for inability."

In April 1741, he communicated to Gray the ſketch of a tragedy he had begun, under the title of Pauſanias, which Gray appears to have criticiſed with much freedom; but Mr. Maſon did not find among Gray's papers either the ſketch itſelf, or Gray's free critique upon it.

In the September following, Gray returned to England, and found Weſt ſinking under the preſſure of ſickneſs and a load of family misfortunes. Theſe the ſympathiſing heart of Gray made his own. He did all in his power, for he was now with him in London, to ſoothe the ſorrows of his friend; he endeavoured to alleviate them by every office of the pureſt and moſt cordial affection. But the diſtreſſes of Weſt's mind had already too far affected a body, from the firſt weak and delicate. His health viſibly declined during the winter, and as the ſpring advanced, his complaints terminated in a deep conſumption.

In March 1742, he left town, and, for the benefit of the air, went to Pope, the reſidence of David Mitchell, Eſq near Hatfield in Hertfordſhire.

His firſt letter to Gray from that place, is dated March 28. 1742; and during the two following months they maintained a conſtant correſpondence.

His letter, dated April 4. contains a maſterly critique on his friend's tragedy, and a deſcription of his own cough in Latin hexameters, which " has this remarkable in it, that it was the production of four o'clock in the morning, while he lay in his bed toſſing and coughing. and all unable to ſleep."

His health daily declined, yet he continued to amuſe himſelf with poetical compoſition, and, on May 5. addreſſed to his friend, the beautiful Ode to May, with this modeſt introduction: " I am going to write down a little ode (if it deſerves the name) for your peruſal, which I am afraid will hardly ſtand the teſt of criticiſm."

" I rejoice," ſays Gray, in the anſwer which he returned, May 8. " to ſee you putting up your prayers to the May. She cannot chooſe but come at ſuch a call. It is as light and genteel as herſelf. The firſt ſtanza (if what you ſay to me in it did not make me think it the beſt) I ſhould call the worſt of the five (except the fourth line). The two next are very picturesque, Miltonic and muſical; her bed is ſo ſoft and ſo ſnug that I long to lie with her. But theſe two lines, " Great Nature," are my favourites. The exclamation of the flowers is a little ſtep too far. The laſt ſtanza is full as good as the ſecond and third, the laſt line bold, but I think not too bold."

His laſt letter to Gray is dated May 11. in which he expoſtulates with him about his peculiar ſpecies of melancholy: " What, are there no joys among the living? Alphene immemor atque unanimis falſe ſodalibus," and concludes with, " I will take my leave of you for the preſent, with a vale et vive pauliſper cum vivis;" ſo little was the amiable youth then aware of the ſhort time that he himſelf would be numbered among the living. But this, it has been frequently remarked, is almoſt conſtantly the caſe with ſuch perſons as die of that moſt remedileſs, yet moſt flattering of all diſtempers, a conſumption.

"Shall humanity," ſays Mr. Maſon, "be thankful or ſorry that it is ſo? Thankful ſurely. For, as this malady generally attacks the young and the innocent, it ſeems the merciful intention of Heaven, that to theſe death ſhould come unperceived, and as it were by ſtealth, diveſted of one of its ſharpeſt ſtings, the lingering expectation of their diſſolution."

Gray returned an anſwer, May 27, and immediately afterwards went upon a viſit to his relations at Stoke, where he wrote the "Ode on Spring," which he ſent, as ſoon as written, to his beloved friend; but he was dead before it reached Hertfordſhire.

He died June 1. 1742, only twenty days after he had written the letter above mentioned, and was buried in the Chancel of Hatfield church, beneath a ſtone bearing the following inſcription: "Here lieth the body of Richard Weſt, Eſq. only ſon to the Right Honourable Richard Weſt, Eſq. Lord Chancellor of Ireland, who died the 1ſt of June 1742, in the 26th year of his age."

When the ode was returned to Gray with the melancholy news, the firſt impulſe of his ſorrow produced a tender "Sonnet" in Engliſh, and alſo a ſublime apoſtrophe in hexameters, with which he intended to begin one of his books, "De Principiis Cogitandi." Nothing can more pathetically diſplay the feelings of a heart, wounded by ſuch a loſs, than that apoſtrophe and the "Sonnet" in which he gave them vent.

In 1747, Mr. Walpole recommended to Gray the taſk of printing Weſt's poems, and his own, in the ſame volume, which it appears from his letter he was not averſe from doing: "But I much fear," he ſays, "our joint ſtock would hardly compoſe a ſmall volume: what I have is leſs conſiderable than you would imagine, and of that little we would not be willing to publiſh all."

After the death of Gray, his friend and editor, Mr. Maſon, interſperſed in his "Epiſtolary Correſpondence," 1775, as much of the poetry of Weſt as he was perſuaded his friend would have publiſhed had he proſecuted the taſk which Mr. Walpole recommended.

The collection is ſingularly ſmall, conſiſting chiefly of the Ode to May, the epiſtle Ad Amicos, and ſome ſpecimens of Latin poetry.

On his character, which appears to have been truly amiable and excellent, it is unneceſſary to enlarge. The reader will acquire the beſt idea of it, if, after peruſing his letters and poems, he uſe his own memory as a mirror, and collect into one aſſemblage the ſcattered features.

As a poet, it is ſufficient praiſe, that the "bloſſoms of his genius" were thought worthy of being aſſociated with the correct and manly performances of Gray. They ſhow what he would have been, if he had been allowed, like him, to produce "fruits worthy of Paradiſe." He reſembles Gray in many inſtances. Among others, they were both deeply enamoured with the excellencies of ancient literature, and ſtrongly attached to the cultivation of Latin poetry. Their Latin poems diſcover an extraordinary copiouſneſs and command of phraſeology, a remarkable perſpicuity of contexture, and a native facility and fluency. They may be juſtly conſidered as legitimate claſſical compoſitions. In his elegies, Tibullus was profeſſedly Weſt's model for language and verſification. With Tibullus in view, he has, however, a manner and character of his own, and ſhows inherent powers of invention and ſentiment. In his Engliſh Poetry, he diſcovers taſte and delicacy of ſentiment, joined to a great ſhare of poetical imagination. His images are pleaſing, his language chaſte and elegant, and his verſification correct and harmonious. The epiſtle ad Amicos, is characteriſed by that nervous and eloquent ſimplicity which appears ſo eaſy, and which is yet ſo difficult to imitate. It unites the ſpirit and propriety of Pope's verſification, with the elegance and harmony of Parnell. The Ode to May has not received from Gray more praiſe than it deſerves. It is an extraordinary effort of fancy, expreſſion, and verſification. It is characteriſed by energy and melody in the higheſt degree, and may be juſtly conſidered as the choiceſt ſpecimen of claſſical compoſition that Engliſh poetry can produce.

AD AMICOS.

(Imitated from Tibullus, Book iii. Elegy 5. and Mr. Pope's Letter in Sickneſs to Mr. Steele.)

YES, happy youths! on Cadmus' fedgy ſide
You feel each joy that friendſhip can divide,
Each realm of ſcience and of art explore,
And with the ancient blend the modern lore,
Studious alone to learn whate'er may tend
To raiſe the genius, or the heart to mend;
Now pleas'd along the cloiſter'd walks you rove,
And trace the verdant mazes of the grove,
Where ſocial oft and oft alone ye chooſe
To catch the zephyr, and to court the muſe;
Meantime at me (while all devoid of art
Theſe lines give back the image of my heart)
At me the pow'r that comes or ſoon or late,
Or aims, or ſeems to aim, the dart of Fate;
From you remote methinks alone I ſtand,
Like ſome ſad exile in a deſert land,
Around no friends their lenient care to join
In mutual warmth, and mix their heart with mine.
Or real pains, or thoſe which fancy raiſe,
For ever blot the funſhine of my days;
To ſickneſs ſtill, and ſtill to grief, a prey,
Health turns from me her roſy face away.
Juſt Heav'n! what ſin, ere life begins to bloom,
Devotes my head untimely to the tomb?
Did ere this hand againſt a brother's life
Drug the dire bowl, or point the murd'rous knife?
Did e'er this tongue the ſland'rer's tale proclaim,
Or madly violate my Maker's name?
Did e'er this heart betray a friend or foe,
Or know a thought but all the world might know?
As yet juſt ſtarted from the liſts of time
My growing years have ſcarcely told their prime;
Uſeleſs as yet through life I've idly run,
No pleaſures taſted, and few duties done.
Ah! who ere autumn's mellowing ſuns appear
Would pluck the promiſe of the vernal year,
Or ere the grapes their purple hue betray,
Tear the crude cluſter from the mourning ſpray?
Stern pow'r of fate! whoſe ebon ſceptre rules
The Stygian deſerts and Cimmerian pools,
Forbear, nor raſhly ſmite my youthful heart,
A victim yet unworthy of thy dart;
Ah! ſtay till age ſhall blaſt my with'ring face,
Shake in my head, and falter in my pace,
Then aim the ſhaft, then meditate the blow,
And to the dead my willing ſhade ſhall go.
How weak is man to reaſon's judging eye!
Born in this moment, in the next we die;
Part mortal clay, and part etherial fire,
Too proud to creep, too humble to aſpire.
In vain our plans of happineſs we raiſe;
Pain is our lot, and patience is our praiſe:
Wealth, lineage, honours, conqueſt, or a throne,
Are what the wiſe would fear to call their own.
Health is at beſt a vain precarious thing,
And fair-fac'd youth * is ever on the wing:

Vos tenet. Etruſcis manat quæ fontibus unda,
Unda ſub æſtivum non adeunda canem
Nunc autem ſacris Baiarum maxima lymphis,
Quum ſe purpureo vere remittit hiems
At mihi Perſephone nigram denuntiat horam
Inmerito juveni parce nocere, Dea.
Non ego tentavi nulli temeranda virorum
Audax laudandæ ſacra docere Deæ.
Nec mea mortiferis infecit pocula ſuccis
Dextera, nec quiquam tætra venena dedit.
Nec nos inſana meditantes jurgia mente
Impia in adverſos ſolvimus ora Deos.
Et nondum cani nigros læſere capillos,
Nec venit tardo curva Senecta pede.
Natalem noſtri primum videre parentes
(Quum cecidit fato conſul uterque pari.)
Quid fraudare juvat vitem creſcentibus uvis?
Et modo nata mala vellere poma manu?
Parcite, pallentes undas quicumque tenetis,
Duraque ſortiti tertia regna Dei.
Elyſios olim liceat cognoſcere campos,
Letheamque ratem, Cimmerioſque lacus,
Quum mea rugoſa pallebunt ora ſenecta,
* * * *
Atque utinam vano nequidquam terrear æſtu!

* Youth, at the very beſt, is but a betrayer of human life in a gentler and ſmoother manner than age, it is like the ſtream that nouriſhes a plant upon a bank, and

'Tis like the ſtream aſide whoſe wat'ry bed
Some blooming plant exalts his flow'ry head,
Nurs'd by the wave the ſpreading branches riſe,
Shade all the ground, and flouriſh to the ſkies;
The waves the while beneath in ſecret flow,
And undermine the hollow bank below;
Wide and more wide the waters urge their way,
Bare all the roots, and on their fibres prey:
Too late the plant bewails his fooliſh pride,
And ſinks untimely in the whelming tide.

But why repine? does life deſerve my ſigh?
Few will lament my loſs whene'er I die.
For thoſe the wretches * I deſpiſe or hate,
I neither envy nor regard their fate.
For me, whene'er all-conq'ring death ſhall ſpread
His wings around my unrepining head,
I care not †: though this face be ſeen no more,
The world will paſs as cheerful as before,
Bright as before the day-ſtar will appear,
The fields as verdant, and the ſkies as clear;
Nor ſtorms nor comets will my doom declare,
Nor ſigns on earth, nor portents in the air;
Unknown and ſilent will depart my breath,
Nor Nature e'er take notice of my death.
Yet ſome there are (ere ſpent my vital days)
Within whoſe breaſts my tomb I wiſh to raiſe:
Lov'd in my life, lamented in my end, [mend:
Their praiſe would crown me as their precepts
To them may theſe fond lines my name endear,
Not from the poet, but the friend ſincere ‡.

ODE TO MAY.

Dear Gray! that always in my heart
Poſſeſſes far the better part,
What mean theſe ſudden blaſts that riſe,
And drive the zephyrs from the ſkies?
O join with mine thy tuneful lay,
And invocate the tardy May.

Come, faireſt nymph! reſume thy reign,
Bring all the graces in thy train:
With balmy breath and flow'ry tread
Riſe from thy ſoft ambroſial bed,
Where in Elyſian ſlumber bound
Embow'ring myrtles veil thee round.

Awake, in all thy glories dreſt,
Recal the zephyrs from the weſt;
Reſtore the ſun, revive the ſkies,
At mine and nature's call ariſe!
Great nature's ſelf upbraids thy ſtay,
And miſſes her accuſtom'd May.

See! all her works demand thy aid,
The labours of Pomona fade;
A plaint is heard from ev'ry tree,
Each budding flow'ret calls for thee;
The birds forget to love and ſing,
With ſtorms alone the foreſts ring.

Come then, with pleaſure at thy ſide,
Diffuſe thy vernal ſpirit wide;
Create where'er thou turn'ſt thy eye
Peace, plenty, love, and harmony,
Till ev'ry being ſhare its part,
And heav'n and earth be glad at heart.

These are the sacred feelings of thy heart,
Thy heart inform'd by reason's purest ray,
O LYTTLETON the friend!——
——Oft, conducted by historic truth,
You tread the long extent of backward time,
Planning with warm benevolence of mind,
And honest zeal unwarp'd by party rage,
Britannia's weal; how from the venal gulf
To raise her virtue and her arts revive;
Or, turning thence thy view, these graver thoughts
The muses charm, while with pure taste refin'd
You draw th' inspiring breath of ancient song,
Till nobly rises emulous thy own.

POETICAL WORKS

OF

GEORGE LORD LYTTLETON.

THE LIFE OF LYTTLETON.

GEORGE LYTTLETON, afterwards Lord Lyttleton, was the eldeſt ſon of Sir Thomas Lyttleton, Bart. of Hagley in Worceſterſhire, and was born January 17. 1708-9. His mother, Chriſtian Temple, was ſiſter of Sir Richard Temple, Bart. of Stowe, in Buckinghamſhire, afterwards Lord Viſcount Cobham. He had ſix brothers and as many ſiſters.

He received the firſt rudiments of education at Eton School, where he was ſo much diſtinguiſhed, that his exerciſes were recommended as models to his ſchool-fellows. His poetical compoſitions procured him the reputation of an elegant and correct verſifier. His Soliloquy on a Beauty in the Country, and his verſes on Good Humour, were written at ſchool.

From Eton he went to Chriſt-Church, Oxford, where he retained the ſame reputation of ſuperiority, and diſplayed his abilities to the public in a poem on Blenheim, written in 1727.

In 1728, being then nineteen, he began his travels, and viſited France and Italy; but reſided ſome time at Luneville in Lorraine, as appears by his Letters to his Father, in which he deſcribes the places he viſited, and relates ſome of the principal incidents of his journey.

In one of his letters, he thus expreſſes his diſſatisfaction at the thought of returning to Luneville, "Luneville was my ſchool of breeding, and I was there more unavoidably ſubject to quelques bevues d'ecolier, as the politeſſe practiſed in that is fuller of ceremony than elſewhere, and a good deal peculiar to itſelf. This is the firſt and ſtrongeſt reaſon why I deſpair of being happy in Lorraine. I have already complained of the foppiſh ignorance and contempt for all I have been taught to value, but is ſo faſhionable there."

It is impoſſible to peruſe his Letters to his Father, without being charmed with the manly and virtuous ſentiments which he diſcovers, his ſtrong and hereditary averſion to vice and folly, and particularly with the unaffected ardour of filial affection which runs through the whole.

At Paris he amuſed himſelf with poetical compoſition, and wrote a very manly and correct Epiſtle to Dr. Ayſcough, who had been his tutor at Oxford, and afterwards married his aunt, became tutor to the young Princes, and Dean of Briſtol.

In 1730, he wrote a poetical Epiſtle to Pope, from Rome, and the ſame year returned to England, and addreſſed an Epiſtle to Lord Hervey, from Worceſterſhire.

When he returned, he obtained a ſeat in Parliament for Oakhampton in Devonſhire, and ſoon diſtinguiſhed himſelf among the moſt eager opponents of Walpole; though his father, who was one of the Lords of Admirality, from 1727 to 1741, always voted with the Court.

For many years his name was ſeen in every account of every debate in the Houſe of Commons. He oppoſed the Standing Army, he oppoſed the Exciſe, he ſupported the motion for petitioning the king to remove Walpole, and concurred with Pulteney, Pitt, &c. in all the meaſures of oppoſition.

His zeal for the public good, is the only motive that can juſtify the violence of his oppoſition to Walpole, from the charge of ingratitude: for it appears, from his letter to his father, dated at Luneville, that Walpole's recommendation procured him the friendſhip of Prince Craon: "You will let Sir Robert Walpole know how much I am obliged to his letter, and do juſtice to Prince Craon, who has expreſſed his regard to it in the ſtrongeſt manner, and by a kindneſs which I cannot enough acknowledge."

In 1735, he publiſhed his Perſian Letters, in imitation of thoſe of Monteſquieu, whom he had known in England. The character of a young man, Dr. Johnſon obſerves, is very viſible in them. They have something of that indistinct and headstrong ardour for liberty which a man of genius always catches when he enters the world, and always suffers to cool as he passes forward.

In 1736, he addressed an elegant copy of verses to his cousin, Pitt, on his losing his commission in the army, for his conduct in Parliament.

In 1737, the Prince of Wales established a separate court, and received with open arms the opponents of the minister. Upon the resignation of Mr. Pelham, he was made his secretary, with the addition of 240 l. annually of salary, as appears by his letter to his father, dated from Clifden: "I came here yesterday to thank his Royal Highness for having augmented my salary 240 l. a-year, by putting it upon the same foot with that of Mr. Molyneux under the king when he was prince."

He persuaded the prince, whose business it was now to be popular, that he would advance his character by the patronage of literature, and by his recommendation, Mallet was made under secretary, with 200 l.; and Thomson had a pension of 100 l. a-year. For Thomson he always retained his kindness, and was able at last to procure him the place of Surveyor-general of the Leeward Islands.

Moore courted his patronage by an apologetical poem, called the "Trial of Selim, the Persian," but was not equally successful.

He was now considered as a leader in the Opposition, and Pope, who was incited to direct his satire against the ministry, commended him among the other patriots. This drew upon him the reproaches of Fox, who, in the House of Commons, imputed to him as a crime, his intimacy with a lampooner, so unjust and licentious. Lyttleton supported his friend, and replied, that he thought it an honour to be received into the familiarity of so great a poet.

In 1741, he married Lucy, daughter of Hugh Fortescue, Esq. of Filleigh, in Devonshire, with whom he enjoyed the most perfect state of matrimonial felicity.

Walpole being at length, after a long struggle, driven from his places, Lyttleton was, in 1744, made one of the Lords of the Treasury; and from that time, as warmly supported as he had formerly opposed the schemes of the ministry.

When weary of faction and debate, he used very often, with Pitt, to visit his cousin West, at Wickham, from whose conversation, it is said, he received that conviction of the truth of Christianity, which produced, in 1747, his Dissertation on the Conversion of St. Paul, "a treatise to which infidelity has never been able to fabricate a specious answer."

This work his father had the happiness of seeing, and expressed his pleasure in a letter which deserves to be inserted.

"I have read your religious treatise with infinite pleasure and satisfaction. The style is fine and clear, the arguments close, cogent, and irresistible. May the King of kings, whose glorious cause you have so well defended, reward your pious labours, and grant that I may be found worthy, through the merits of Jesus Christ, to be an eye witness of that happiness which I do not doubt he will bountifully bestow on you! In the mean time, I shall never cease glorifying God for having endowed you with such useful talents, and giving me so good a son." The pleasure which such a letter must have given to such a son is inexpressible.

In January 1747, his wife, whom he tenderly loved, died in child-bed. Her sickness is feelingly described in his forty-first letter to his father; and he perpetuated her memory in a Monody, written in the same year, that will be read while conjugal affection, and a taste for poetry exist in this country. She was buried at Over-Arley in Staffordshire, but a very elegant monument is erected to her memory, in the chancel of the church at Hagley.

Though for some time inconsolable for her death, he sought happiness in a second marriage with Elizabeth, daughter of Field-Marshal Sir Robert Rich, in 1749. "She was an intimate and dear friend," says West, in a letter to Dr. Doddridge, June 17. 1749, "of his former wife's, which is some kind of proof of her merit: I mean the goodness of her heart, for that is the chief merit which Mr. Lyttleton esteems, and I hope she will not in this disappoint his expectations: in all other points she is well suited to him, being extremely well accomplished in languages, music, painting, and very sensible and well bred." It is said that the experiment was unsuccessful.

In 1751, his father died, when he inherited a Baronet's title, with a large eſtate; which, if he did not augment, he was at leaſt careful to adorn with expenſive buildings and rural decorations. Hagley-Park, the ſcene of theſe laviſh operations, is frequently deſcribed as a terreſtrial paradiſe.

Shenſtone was Lyttleton's neighbour, friend, and his rival in landſcape-gardening; and, it is ſaid, [that his improvements at the Leaſowes, excited, at firſt, the contempt, and afterwards the envy of the inhabitants of Hagley, "who took care," ſays Dr. Johnſon, "to defeat the curioſity which they could not ſuppreſs, by conducting their viſitants perverſely, to inconvenient points of view, and introducing them at the wrong end of a walk, to detect a deception; injuries of which Shenſtone would heavily complain."

This charge againſt the Lyttleton family has been denied by Mr. Greaves, who ſays, "that the Lyttleton family went ſo frequently with their company to the Leaſowes, that they were unwilling to break in upon Shenſtone's retirement upon every occaſion; and, therefore, often went to the principal points of view, without waiting for any one to conduct them regularly through the whole walks. Of this Shenſtone would ſometimes peeviſhly complain, though I am perſuaded he never really ſuſpected any ill-natured intention in his worthy and much valued neighbours." One cannot eaſily be perſuaded, that a mind ſo pure and benevolent as that of Lyttleton, was ever debaſed by ſuch unworthy paſſions.

As he continued his activity in parliament, he was gradually advancing his claim to preferment. In 1754, he reſigned his ſeat at the Treaſury-Board, on being appointed Cofferer to the Houſehold, and Privy Counſellor. In December 20. 1755, he exchanged the place of Cofferer, for the great office of Chancellor of the Exchequer; an office, however, that required ſome qualifications, which he ſoon perceived himſelf to want; and which he retained only till the appointment of Mr. Legge, November 16. 1756.

In 1756, he made a journey into Wales, of which he has given a pleaſing account in Two Letters to Mr. Bower, the celebrated hiſtorian of the Popes, a man whoſe Profeſſion of Proteſtantiſm he firmly believed, and whoſe intereſt and fame having once eſpouſed, he never was perſuaded by the univerſal outcry to diſown.

In an affectionate letter to Dr. Doddridge, on his removing to Liſbon, for the recovery of his health, October 5. 1751, he thus expreſſes his attachment to Bower; "You have brought on your diſtemper, by too continual ſtudy and labour in your ſpiritual functions, and remiſſion of mind is abſolutely neceſſary for your recovery. I therefore requeſt it of you not to write the preface to Bower's book; it will do more harm than good to him; the merit of the work will bear it up againſt all theſe attacks; and as to the ridiculous ſtory of my having diſcarded him, the intimate friendſhip in which we continue to live, will be a ſufficient anſwer to that, and better than any teſtimony formally given."

It appears by an atteſtation of Mrs. Bower, printed in the "London Chronicle," October 11. 1766, that, during "ſeventeen years that ſhe conſtantly lived with him, he always profeſſed himſelf a Proteſtant, and acted conformable to that profeſſion;" and that he died in the communion of the Church of England, and "made an edifying departure."

In 1757, when the inauſpicious commencement of the war with France made the diſſolution of the miniſtry unavoidable, he loſt with the reſt his employment; but his ſervices were rewarded with a peerage, being created Baron Lyttleton of Frankley, in the county of Worceſter.

In 1760, he publiſhed his Dialogues of the Dead, which were very eagerly read; though the production rather of leiſure than of ſtudy, rather effuſions than compoſitions. They ſhow the elegance of his taſte, rather than the power of his genius, or the ſtrength of his judgment. He has copied Fenelon more than Fontenelle.

His laſt literary production in proſe, was his Hiſtory of Henry the Second, in 3 vols., 4to, 1767 and 1771, the reſult of the reſearches and deliberations of twenty years.

The ſtory of this publication, as given by Dr. Johnſon, is remarkable. "The whole work was printed twice over; a great part of it three times, and many ſheets four or five times. The booksellers paid for the firſt impreſſion; but the charges and repeated operations of the preſs, were at the expence of the author, whose ambitious accuracy is known to have cost him at least a thousand pounds. He began to print in 1755. Three volumes appeared in 1764; a second edition of them in 1767; a third edition in 1768, and the conclusion in 1771. Andrew Reid, a man not without considerable abilities, and not unacquainted with letters or with life, was employed, I know not at what price, to point the pages of Henry the Second. Lyttleton took money for his copy; of which, when he had paid the pointer, he probably gave the rest away; for he was very liberal to the indigent. When time brought the History to a third edition, the superintendence of typography and punctuation, was committed to a man originally a comb-maker, but then known by the name of Dr. Sanders. To the Doctor's edition is appended, what the world had never seen before, a list of errors, in nineteen pages."

Every reader will wish, that in this passage, Dr. Johnson had observed his own humane maxim in the "Life of Addison," of not giving "a pang to a daughter, a brother, or a friend." The nice attention to punctuation, with which Henry the Second was published, is attributed to such anxiety as only vanity can dictate, when good motives were avowed by Lyttleton, and known to his friends; such as his desire to correct mistakes, his fear of being too harsh on the turbulent Becket, &c.

This work is justly ranked among the most valuable historical performances in the English language. It is executed with great fidelity, and with a strict regard to the authority of original writers. The style is perspicuous and unaffected: generally correct, and often elegant and masterly. The sentiments and remarks are judicious and pertinent; liberal with respect to religion, and friendly to the cause of liberty and the rights of mankind. The account of the state of our ancient government, laws, customs, and manners, is very copious, and eminently useful; so as to make the work strictly and properly a constitutional history.

His Verses to the Countess of Egremont, and Letter to Lord Hardwicke, in 1761, were his last poetical compositions.

He spent the latter part of his life in retirement; and, after a lingering illness, died at Hagley-Park, August 22. 1773, in the 64th year of his age. He was buried at Hagley; and the following inscription is cut on the side of his lady's monument.

This unadorned stone was placed here
By the particular desire and express
Directions, of the Right Honourable
George Lord Lyttleton;
Who died August 21. 1773, aged 64.

By his first lady he had one son, Thomas, who inherited his title and estates, and two daughters, Mary, who died an infant, and Lucy, married to Lord Valentia, of the kingdom of Ireland, 1767. His second lady brought him no issue. Thomas Lord Lyttleton, married Apphia, second daughter of Broome Witts, Esq., of Chipping-Norton, Oxfordshire, the widow of Colonel Peach, and died in 1780, leaving no issue. He was as remarkable for an early display as for a flagitious prostitution of great abilities. He attained no small consequence as a parliamentary speaker, and was appointed Chief Justice in Eyre, November 18. 1775; a place which his father, with better pretensions, could never procure.

A small collection of "Poems by a Young Nobleman lately deceased," &c. 4to, 1780, has been given to him, and two small volumes of "Letters," 1780 and 1782, are supposed to have been written by him, which few have read without pleasure. That they are spurious is generally understood; but as to composition, sentiment, and language, they are exactly the kind of letters he would have written; it is a sort of epistolary portrait, a picture of his mind, a strong likeness, and the work of no common hand. A similar deception seems to have been practised in "The Correspondents, an original novel," 12mo, 1775, which exhibits a series of letters, supposed to have been written by his father and Mrs. Peach. They bear indeed, notwithstanding a similarity of style, that runs through the whole series, many marks of originality, several touches relative to time, place, and circumstance, not likely to be founded on fiction. His uncle William Henry Lyttleton, Lord Westcote, of the kingdom of Ireland, created Lord Lyttleton of Frankley, in Worcestershire, August 15. 1794, is the present representative of the family.

Lyttleton, according to Dr. Johnſon, had never the appearance of a ſtrong or a healthy man; and had a ſlender uncompacted frame, and a meagre face. It is certain, however, that, at one period of his life, he entertained a more favourable opinion of his conſtitution; for, in a letter to his father, dated from the neighbourhood of Soiſſons in France, he ſays, "I believe there is not a young man alive, who has more happineſs to boaſt of than myſelf, being bleſt with a ſound conſtitution, affectionate friends, and eaſy fortune."

An affecting and inſtructive narrative of his death has been given by his phyſician Dr. Johnſtone; of Kidderminſter, which, as it is deſcriptive of his moral character, is here ſubjoined.

"On Saturday evening, the ſymptoms of his Lordſhip's diſorder, which for a week paſt had alarmed us, put on a fatal appearance, and his Lordſhip believed himſelf to be a dying man. From this time he ſuffered by reſtleſſneſs rather than pain; and although his nerves were apparently much fluttered, his mental faculties never ſeemed ſtronger when he was thoroughly awake.

"His Lordſhip's bilious and hepatic complaints ſeemed alone not equal to the expected mournful event: his long want of ſleep, whether the conſequence of irritation in the bowels, or, which is more probable, of cauſes of a different kind, accounts for his loſs of ſtrength, and for his death, very ſufficiently.

"Though his Lordſhip wiſhed his approaching diſſolution not to be lingering, he waited for it with reſignation. He ſaid, "It is a folly, a keeping me in miſery, now to attempt to prolong life;" yet he was eaſily perſuaded, for the ſatisfaction of others, to do or take any thing that he thought proper for him. On Saturday he had been remarkably better, and we were not without ſome hopes of his recovery.

"On Sunday, about 11 in the forenoon, his Lordſhip ſent for me, and ſaid he felt a great hurry, and wiſhed to have a little converſation with me in order to divert it. He then proceeded to open the fountains of that heart from whence goodneſs had ſo long flowed, as from a copious ſpring. "Doctor," ſaid he, "you ſhall be my confeſſor. When I firſt ſet out in the world, I had friends who endeavoured to ſhake my belief in the Chriſtian religion. I ſaw difficulties which ſtaggered me; but I kept my mind open to conviction. The evidences and doctrines of Chriſtianity, ſtudied with attention, made me a moſt firm and perſuaded believer of the Chriſtian religion. I have made it the rule of my life, and it is the ground of my future hopes. I have erred and ſinned; but have repented, and never indulged any vicious habit. In politics and public life, I have made public good the rule of my conduct. I never gave counſels which I did not at that time think the beſt. I have ſeen that I was ſometimes in the wrong; but I did not err deſignedly. I have endeavoured in private life to do all the good in my power, and never for a moment could indulge malicious or unjuſt deſigns againſt any perſon whatſoever."

"At another time, he ſaid, I muſt leave my ſoul in the ſame ſtate it was in before this illneſs; I find this a very inconvenient time for ſolicitude about any thing."

"On the evening, when the ſymptoms of death came on, he ſaid, I ſhall die; but it will not be your fault.—When Lord and Lady Valentia came to ſee his Lordſhip, he gave them his ſolemn benediction, and ſaid, "Be good, be virtuous my Lord; you muſt come to this." Thus he continued giving his dying benedictions to all around him. On Monday morning, a lucid interval gave ſome ſmall hopes; but theſe vaniſhed in the evening; and he continued dying, but with very little uneaſineſs, till Tueſday morning, Auguſt 22, when, between ſeven and eight o'clock, he expired almoſt without a groan."

The Works of George Lord Lyttleton, formerly printed ſeparately, with ſome other pieces never before printed, were collected and publiſhed by his nephew, George Edward Ayſcough, Eſq., in one volume 4to, 1774.

The pieces, formerly printed ſeparately, and collected into this publication, are, Obſervations on the Life of Cicero; Obſervations on the preſent State of Affairs, in a letter to a member of Parliament; Letters from a Perſian in England, to his Friend at Iſpahan; Obſervations on the Converſion and Apoſtleſhip of St. Paul; Dialogues of the Dead; Miſcellaneous Poems.

The pieces which were never before printed, are, Obſervations on the Roman Hiſtory; Four Dia- logues of the Dead; Four Speeches in Parliament; Letters to Sir Thomas Lyttleton; and An Account of a Journey into Wales, in two letters, to Mr Bower.

The name of Lyttleton, as a man of dignified ſentiment and excellent qualities, both of head and heart, is enrolled in the tablet of literary merit, by the general ſuffrages of his countrymen.

In the ſeveral characters of a judicious critic, an entertaining traveller, a wiſe and upright ſtateſman, and a good man, his reputation is ſo deciſively fixed, and ſo firmly eſtabliſhed, that it can receive little additional luſtre from encomium and panegyric; and is in no danger of ſuffering from the attacks of criticiſm or cenſure.

As a poet, his compoſitions are characteriſed by elegance, eaſe, and harmony, without much elevation, energy, or enthuſiaſm. In his Monody, the moſt popular of his productions, the virtues and accompliſhments of his excellent lady, are commemorated in numbers equally harmonious and tender. He who can read it without melting into tears, has little claim to ſenſibility. It appears to have flowed ſimply from the genuine feelings of a moſt ſuſceptible and deeply afflicted heart. His Progreſs of Love diſcovers delicacy of ſentiment, pleaſing imagery, and correct and harmonious verſification. It is not, however, entirely free from the ſtudied expreſſion and falſe ornaments by which paſtoral poetry is often fantaſtically diſguiſed. His Advice to Belinda, unites ſpirit and propriety, ſenſe and harmony, in the higheſt degree. His Epiſtle to Dr. Ayſcough, is vigorouſly and elegantly written. His Epiſtle to Pope is finely encomiaſtic; the concluſion highly poetical. His other Epiſtles have their brighter paſſages. His Songs and Epigrams are commonly ſprightly and eaſy.

Among his contemporaries, the teſtimonies to his merits, are too numerous to be ſpecified. Pope, Thomſon, Hammond, and Shenſtone, are laviſh in his praiſe. The following couplet of Pope is ſelected for the ſake of the candid and judicious criticiſm of the preſent reſpectable maſter of Wincheſter School.

Free as young Lyttleton her cauſe purſue;
Still true to virtue, and as warm as true.

"A juſt, and not overcharged encomium," ſays Dr. Warton, "on an excellent man, who always ſerved his friends with warmth (witneſs his kindneſs to Thomſon), and his country with activity and zeal. His Poems and Dialogues of the Dead, are written with elegance and eaſe; His obſervations on the Converſion of St. Paul, with clearneſs and cloſeneſs of reaſoning, and his Hiſtory of Henry the Second, with accuracy and knowledge of thoſe early times, and of the Engliſh conſtitution; and which was compiled from a laborious ſearch into authentic documents, and the records lodged in the Tower and at the Rolls. A little before he died, he told me that he had determined to throw out of the collection of all his works, which was then ſoon to be publiſhed, his firſt juvenile performance, the Perſian Letters, in which he ſaid there were principles and remarks that he wiſhed to retract and alter. Another little piece, written alſo in his early youth, does him much honour. The Obſervations on the Life of Tully, in which, perhaps, a more diſpaſſionate and impartial character of Tully is exhibited, than in the panegyrical volume of Middleton."

His poetical character, as given by Dr. Johnſon, is ſparing and invidious, and cannot be generally allowed, without ſome exceptions in favour of the Progreſs of Love and Blenheim. His inveterate prejudices againſt paſtoral poetry and blank verſe, are well known.

"Lord Lyttleton's poems are the works of a man of literature and judgment, devoting part of his time to verſification. They have nothing to be deſpiſed, and little to be admired. Of his Progreſs of Love, it is ſufficient blame to ſay, that it is paſtoral. His blank verſe in Blenheim, has neither much force nor much elegance. His little performances, whether Songs or Epigrams, are ſometimes ſprightly, and ſometimes inſipid. His Epiſtolary poems have a ſmooth equality, which cannot much tire, becauſe they are ſhort, but which ſeldom elevates or ſurpriſes. But from this cenſure ought to be excepted his Advice to Belinda, which though for the moſt part written when he was very young, contains much truth and much prudence, very elegantly and vigorouſly expreſſed, and ſhows a mind attentive to life, and a power of poetry which cultivation might have raiſed to excellence."

UNCERTAINTY. ECLOGUE I.

TO MR. POPE.

Pope, to whose reed beneath the beachen shade,
The nymphs of Thames a pleas'd attention paid;
While yet thy muse, content with humbler praise
Warbled in Windsor's grove her sylvan lays;
Though now, sublimely borne on Homer's wing
Of glorious wars and godlike chiefs she sing:
Wilt thou with me revisit once again
The crystal fountain, and the flowery plain?
Wilt thou, indulgent, hear my verse relate
The various changes of a lover's state;
And, while each turn of passion I pursue,
Ask thy own heart if what I tell be true?
To the green margin of a lonely wood,
Whose pendant shades o'erlook'd a silver flood,
Young Damon came, unknowing where he stray'd,
Full of the image of his beauteous maid:
His flock, far off, unfed, untended, lay,
To every savage defenceless prey;
No sense of interest could their master move,
And every care seem'd trifling now but love.
A while in pensive silence he remain'd,
But, though his voice was mute, his looks complain'd;
At length the thoughts within his bosom pent
Forc'd his unwilling tongue to give them vent.
"Ye nymphs," he cried, "ye Dryads, who so long
" Have favor'd Damon, and inspir'd his song;
" For whom, retir'd, I shun the gay resorts
" Of sportful cities, and of pompous courts;
" In vain I bid the restless world adieu,
" To seek tranquillity and peace with you.
" Though wild ambition and destructive rage,
" No factions here can form, no wars can wage:
" Though envy frowns not on your humble shades,
" Nor calumny your innocence invades:
" Yet cruel love, that troubler of the breast,
" Too often violates your boasted rest;
" With inbred storms disturbs your calm retreat,
" And taints with bitterness each rural sweet.
" Ah luckless day! when first with fond sur-
" On Delia's face I fix'd my eager eyes! [prise
" Then in wild tumults all my soul was tost,
" Then reason, liberty, at once were lost: [gone,
" And every wish, and thought, and care, was
" But what my heart employ'd on her alone.
" Then too she smil'd: can smiles our peace de-
" stroy,
" Those lovely children of content and joy!
" How can soft pleasure and tormenting woe
" From the same spring at the same moment flow:
" Unhappy boy! these vain inquiries cease,
" Thought could not guard, nor will restore, thy
" peace:
" Indulge the frenzy that thou must endure,
" And sooth the pain thou know'st not how to " cure,
" Come, flattering memory! and tell my heart
" How kind she was, and with what pleasing art
" She strove its fondest wishes to obtain,
" Confirm her power, and faster bind my chain,
" If on the green we danc'd, a mirthful band;
" To me alone she gave her willing hand:
" Her partial taste, if e'er I touch'd the lyre,
" Still in my song found something to admire.
" By none but her my crook with flowers was
" crown'd,
" By none but her my brows with ivy bound:
" The world that Damon, was her choice believ'd,
" The world, alas! like Damon, was deceiv'd.
" When last I saw her, and declar'd my fire
" In words as soft as passion could inspire,
" Coldly she heard, and full of scorn withdrew,
" Without one pitying glance, one sweet adieu.
" The frighted hind, who sees his ripen'd corn
" Up from the roots by sudden tempests torn,
" Whose fairest hopes destroy'd and blasted lie,
" Feels not so keen a pang of grief as I.

" Ah, now have I deſerv'd; inhuman maid,
" To have my faithful ſervice thus repaid?
" Where all the marks of kindneſs I receiv'd,
" But dreams of joy, that charm'd me and de-
" ceiv'd?
" Or did you only nurſe my growing love,
" That with more pain I might your hatred
" prove?
" Sure guilty treachery no place could find
" In ſuch a gentle, ſuch a generous mind:
" A maid brought up the woods and wilds among
" Could ne'er have learnt the art of courts ſo
" young:
" No; let me rather think her anger feign'd,
" Still let me hope my Delia may be gain'd;
" 'Twas only modeſty that ſeem'd diſdain,
" And her heart ſuffer'd when ſhe gave me pain."
Pleas'd with this flattering thought, the love-
ſick boy
Felt the faint dawning of a doubtful joy;
Back to his flock more chearful he return'd,
When now the ſetting ſun more fiercely burn'd,
Blue vapours roſe along the mazy rills,
And light's laſt bluſhes ting'd the diſtant hills.

HOPE. ECLOGUE II.

TO MR. DODDINGTON.

[Afterwards Lord Melcombe Regis.]

Hear, Doddington, the notes that ſhepherds ſing,
Like thoſe that warbling hail the genial ſpring.
Nor Pan, nor Phœbus, tunes our artleſs reeds:
From love alone their melody proceeds.
From love, Theocritus, on Enna's plains,
Learnt the wild ſweetneſs of his Doric ſtrains.
Young Maro, touch'd by his inſpiring dart,
Could charm each ear, and ſoften every heart:
Me too his power has reach'd, and bids with
thine
My ruſtic pipe in pleaſing concert join *.
Damon no longer ſought the ſilent ſhade,
No more in unfrequented paths he ſtray'd,
But call'd the ſwains to hear his jocund ſong,
And told his joy to all the rural throng.
" Bleſt be the hour," he ſaid, " that happy hour,
" When firſt I own'd my Delia's gentle power;
" Then gloomy diſcontent and pining care
" Forſook my breaſt, and left ſoft wiſhes there;
" Soft wiſhes there they left, and gay deſires,
" Delightful languors, and tranſporting fires.
" Where yonder limes combine to form a ſhade,
" Theſe eyes firſt gaz'd upon the charming maid;
" There ſhe appear'd, on that auſpicious day,
" When ſwains their ſportive rites to Bacchus
" pay: [ſhe mov'd!
" She led the dance—heavens! with what grace
" Who could have ſeen her then, and not have
" lov'd?
" I ſtrove not to reſiſt ſo ſweet a flame,
" But gloried in a happy captive's name;
" Nor would I now, could love permit, be free,
" But leave to brutes their ſavage liberty.

" And art thou then, fond youth, ſecure of joy?
" Can no reverſe thy flattering bliſs deſtroy?
" Has treacherous love no torment yet in ſtore?
" Or haſt thou never prov'd his fatal power?
" Whence flow'd thoſe tears that late bedew'd
" thy cheek?
" Why ſigh'd thy heart as if it ſtrove to break!
" Why were the deſert rocks invok'd to hear
" The plaintive accent of thy ſad deſpair?
" From Delia's rigour all thoſe pains aroſe,
" Delia, who now compaſſionates my woes,
" Who bids me hope; and in that charming word
" Has peace and tranſport to my ſoul reſtor'd.
" Begin my pipe, begin the gladſome lay;
" A kiſs from Delia ſhall thy muſic pay;
" A kiſs obtain'd 'twixt ſtruggling and conſent,
" Given with forc'd anger, and diſguis'd content.
" No laureat wreaths I aſk, to bind my brows,
" Such as the muſe on lofty bards beſtows:
" Let other ſwains to praiſe or fame aſpire;
" I from her lips my recompence require.
" Why ſtays my Delia in her ſecret bower?
" Light gales have chas'd the late impending
" ſhower;
" Th'emerging ſun more bright his beams extends;
" Oppos'd, its beauteous arch the rainbow bends!
" Glad youths and maidens turn the new-made
" hay:
" The birds renew their ſongs on every ſpray!
" Come forth, my love, thy ſhepherd's joys to " crown:
" All nature ſmiles.—Will only Delia frown!
" Hark how the bees with murmurs fill the " plain,
" While every flower of every ſweet they drain:
" See, how beneath yon hillock's ſhady ſteep,
" The ſhelter'd herds on flowery couches ſleep:
" Nor bees, nor herds, are half ſo bleſt as I,
" If with my fond deſires my love comply;
" From Delia's lips a ſweeter honey flows,
" And on her boſom dwells more ſoft repoſe.
" Ah how, my dear, ſhall I deſerve thy charms?
" What gift can bribe thee to my longing arms?
" A bird for thee in ſilken bands I hold,
" Whoſe yellow plumage ſhines like poliſh'd gold;
" From diſtant iſles the lovely ſtranger came,
" And bears the fortunate Canaries name;
" In all our woods none boaſts ſo ſweet a note,
" Not ev'n the nightingale's melodious throat.
" Accept of this; and could! add beſide
" What wealth the rich Peruvian mountains hide:
" If all the gems in eaſtern rocks were mine,
" On thee alone their glittering pride ſhould ſhine.
" But, if thy mind no gifts have power to move,
" Phœbus himſelf ſhall leave th' Aonian grove:
" The tuneful nine, who never ſue in vain,
" Shall come ſweet ſuppliants for their favourite
" ſwain.
" For him each blue-ey'd Naiad of the flood,
" For him each green-hair'd ſiſter of the wood,
" Whom oft beneath fair Cynthia's gentle ray
" His muſic calls to dance the night away.
" And you, fair nymphs, companions of my love,
" With whom ſhe joys the cowſlip meads to
" rove,

* Mr. Doddington had written ſome very pretty love verſes, which have never been publiſhed.

" I beg you, recommend my faithful flame,
" And let her often hear her shepherd's name:
" Shade all my faults from her inquiring sight,
" And show my merits in the fairest light;
" My pipe your kind assistance shall repay,
" And every friend shall claim a different lay.
" But see in yonder glade the heavenly fair
" Enjoys the fragrance of the breezy air—
" Ah, thither let me fly with eager feet;
" Adieu, my pipe; I go my love to meet—
" O, may I find her as we parted last,
" And may each future hour be like the past!
" So shall the whitest lamb these pastures feed,
" Propitious Venus, on thy altars bleed."

JEALOUSY. ECLOGUE III.

TO MR. EDWARD WALPOLE.

The gods, O Walpole, given no bliss sincere;
Wealth is disturb'd by care, and power by fear;
Of all the passions that employ the mind,
In gentle love the sweetest joys we find:
Yet ev'n those joys dire jealousy molests,
And blackens each fair image in our breasts.
O may the warmth of thy too tender heart
Ne'er feel the sharpness of his venom'd dart!
For thy own quiet, think thy mistress just,
And wisely take thy happiness on trust.
Begin, my muse, and Damon's woes rehearse,
In wildest numbers and disorder'd verse.
On a romantic mountain's airy head
(While browzing goats at ease around him fed)
Anxious he lay, with jealous cares oppress't;
Distrust and anger labouring in his breast—
The vale beneath a pleasing prospect yields
Of verdant meads and cultivated fields;
Through these a river rolls its winding flood,
Adorn'd with various tufts of rising wood;
Here half conceal'd in trees a cottage stands,
A castle there the opening plain commands;
Beyond, a town with glittering spires is crown'd,
And distant hills the wide horizon bound:
So charming was the scene, a while the swain
Beheld delighted, and forgot his pain:
But soon the stings infix'd within his heart
With cruel force renew'd their raging smart:
His flowery wreath, which long with pride he wore,
The gift of Delia, from his brows he tore,
Then cried, " May all thy charms, ungrateful maid,
" Like these neglected roses, droop and fade!
" May angry heaven deform each guilty grace,
" That triumphs now in that deluding face!
" Those alter'd looks may every shepherd fly,
" And ev'n thy Daphnis hate thee worse than I!
" Say, thou inconstant, what has Damon done,
" To lose the heart his tedious pains had won?
" Tell me what charms you in my rival find,
" Against whose power no ties have strength to bind?
" Has he, like me, with long obedience strove
" To conquer your disdain, and merit love?
" Has he with transport every smile ador'd,
" And died with grief at each ungentle word?
" Ah, no! the conquest was obtain'd with ease;
" He pleas'd you, by not studying to please,
" His careless indolence your pride alarm'd;
" And, had he lov'd you more, he less had charm'd.
" O pain to think! another shall possess
" Those balmy lips which I was wont to press:
" Another on her panting breast shall lie,
" And catch sweet madness from her swimming eye!—
" I saw their friendly flocks together feed,
" I saw them hand in hand walk o'er the mead:
" Would my clos'd eye had sunk in endless night,
" Ere I was doom'd to bear that hateful sight!
" Where'er they pass'd, he blasted every flower,
" And hungry wolves their helpless flocks devour!—
" Ah wretched swain could no examples move
" Thy heedless heart to shun the rage of love?
" Hast thou not heard how poor * Menalcas died
" A victim to Parthenia's fatal pride?
" Dear was the youth to all the tuneful plain,
" Lov'd by the nymphs, by Phœbus lov'd in vain:
" Around his tomb their tears the muses paid;
" And all things mourn'd, but the relentless maid.
" Would I could die like him, and be at peace?
" These torments in the quiet grave would cease;
" There my vex'd thoughts a calm repose would find
" And rest, as if my Delia still were kind.
" No, let me live, her falsehood to upbraid:
" Some god perhaps my just revenge will aid.—
" Alas! what aid, fond swain, wouldst thou receive!
" Could thy heart bear to see its Delia grieve?
" Protect her, heaven! and let her never know
" The slightest part of hapless Damon's woe:
" I ask no vengeance from the powers above;
" All I implore is never more to love.—
" Let me this fondness from my bosom tear,
" Let me forget that e'er I thought her fair.
" Come, cool indifference, and heal my breast;
" Wearied, at length, I seek thy downy rest:
" No turbulence of passion shall destroy
" My future ease with flattering hopes of joy.
" Hear mighty Pan, and, all ye sylvans, hear
" What by your guardian deities I swear;
" No more my eyes shall view her fatal charms,
" No more I'll court the traitoress to my arms;
" Not all her arts my steady soul shall move,
" And she shall find that reason conquers love!"—
Scarce had he spoke, when through the lawn below
Alone he saw the beauteous Delia go;
At once transported, he forgot his vow,
(Such perjuries the laughing gods allow!)
Down the steep hills with ardent haste he flew;
He found her kind, and soon believ'd her true.

POSSESSION. ECLOGUE IV.

TO LORD COBHAM.

Cobham, to thee this rural lay I bring,
Whose guiding judgment gives me skill to sing;

* See Mr. Gay's Dione.

Though far unequal to thoſe poliſh'd ſtrains,
With which thy Congreve charm'd the liſtening plains:
Yet ſhall its muſic pleaſe thy partial ear, [dear;
And ſooth thy breaſt with thoughts that once were
Recal thoſe years which time has thrown behind,
When ſmiling love with honour ſhar'd thy mind:
When all thy glorious days of proſperous ſight
Delighted leſs than one ſucceſsful night.
The ſweet remembrance ſhall thy youth reſtore,
Fancy again ſhall run paſt pleaſure's o'er;
And, while in Stowe's enchanting walks you ſtray,
This theme may help to cheat the ſummer's day.
Beneath the covert of a myrtle wood,
To Venus rais'd, a ruſtic altar ſtood.
To Venus and to Hymen, there combin'd,
In friendly league to favour human-kind.
With wanton Cupids, in that happy ſhade,
The gentle virtues and mild wiſdom play'd.
Nor there in ſprightly pleaſure's genial train,
Lurk'd ſick diſguſt, or late-repenting pain,
Nor force, nor intereſt, join'd unwilling hands,
But love conſenting tied the bliſsful bands,
Thither, with glad devotion, Damon came,
To thank the powers who bleſs'd his faithful flame:
Two milk-white doves he on their altar laid,
And thus to both his grateful homage paid:
" Hail, bounteous god! before whoſe hallow'd " ſhrine
" My Delia vow'd to be for ever mine,
" While, glowing in her cheeks, with tender love,
" Sweet virgin modeſty reluctant ſtrove!
" And hail to thee, fair queen of young deſires!
" Long ſhall my heart preſerve thy pleaſing fires,
" Since Delia now can all its warmth return,
" As fondly languiſh, and as fiercely burn.
" O the dear bloom of laſt propitious night!
" O ſhade more charming than the faireſt light!
" Then in my arms I claſp'd the melting maid,
" Then all my pains one moment overpaid:
" Then firſt the ſweet exceſs of bliſs I prov'd,
" Which none can taſte but who like me have " lov'd.
" Thou too, bright goddeſs, once, in Ida's grove,
" Didſt not diſdain to meet a ſhepherd's love;
" With him, while friſking lambs around you " play'd,
" Conceal'd you ſported in the ſecret ſhade:
" Scarce could Anchiſes' raptures equal mine,
" And Delia's beauties only yield to thine.
" What are ye now, my once moſt valued joys?
" Inſipid triſles all, and childiſh toys—
" Friendſhip itſelf ne'er knew a charm like this,
" Nor Colin's talk could pleaſe like Delia's kiſs.
" Ye muſes, ſkill'd in every winning art,
" Teach me more deeply to engage her heart;
" Ye nymphs, to her your freſheſt roſes bring,
" And crown her with the pride of all the " ſpring.
" On all her days let health and peace attend;
" May ſhe ne'er want, nor ever loſe, a friend!
" May ſome new pleaſure every hour employ:
" But let her Damon be her higheſt joy!
" With thee, my love, for ever will I ſtay,
" All night careſs thee, and admire all day;
" In the ſame field our mingled flocks we'll " feed,
" To the ſame ſpring our thirſty heifers lead,
" Together will we ſhare the harveſt toils,
" Together preſs the vine's autumnal ſpoils.
" Delightful ſtate, where peace and love com- " bine,
" To bid our tranquil days unclouded ſhine!
" Here limpid fountains roll through flowery " meads;
" Here riſing foreſts lift their verdant heads:
" Here let me wear my careleſs life away,
" And in thy arms inſenſibly decay.
" When late old age our heads ſhall ſilver o'er,
" And our ſlow pulſes dance with joy no more;
" When time no longer will thy beauties ſpare,
" And only Damon's eye ſhall think thee fair;
" Then may the gentle hand of welcome death,
" At one ſoft ſtroke, deprive us both of breath!
" May we beneath one common ſtone be laid,
" And the ſame cypreſs both our aſhes ſhade!
" Perhaps ſome friendly muſe, in tender verſe,
" Shall deign our faithful paſſion to rehearſe
" And future ages, with juſt envy mov'd,
" Be told how Damon and his Delia lov'd."

SOLILOQUY OF A BEAUTY IN THE COUNTRY.

Written at Eaton School.

'Twas night; and Flavia, to her room retir'd,
With evening chat and ſober reading tir'd;
There, melancholy, penſive, and alone,
She meditates on the forſaken town:
On her rais'd arm reclin'd her drooping head,
She ſigh'd and thus in plaintive accents ſaid:
" Ah, what avails it to be young and fair;
" To move with negligence, to dreſs with care?
" What worth have all the charms our pride can " boaſt,
" If all in envious ſolitude are loſt?
" Where none admire, 'tis uſeleſs to excel;
" Where none are beaux, 'tis vain to be a belle;
" Beauty, like wit, to judges ſhould be ſhown;
" Both moſt are valued, where they beſt are " known.
" With every grace of nature or of art,
" We cannot break one ſtubborn country heart:
" The brutes, inſenſible, our power defy:
" To love exceeds a 'ſquire's capacity.
" The town, the court, is beauty's proper ſphere;
" That is our heaven and we are angels there:
" In that gay circle thouſand Cupids rove,
" The court of Britain is the court of love.
" How has my conſcious heart with triumph " glow'd,
" How have my ſparkling eyes their tranſport " ſhow'd,
" At each diſtinguiſh'd birth-night ball, to ſee
" The homage, due to empire, paid to me!

" When every eye was fix'd on me alone,
" And dreaded mine more than the monarch's
" frown;
" When rival ſtateſmen for my favour, ſtrove,
" Leſs jealous in their power than in their love.
" Chang'd is the ſcene; and all my glories die,
" Like flowers tranſplanted to a colder ſky:
" Loſt is the dear delight of giving pain,
" The tyrant joy of hearing ſlaves complain.
" In ſtupid indolence my life is ſpent,
" Supinely calm, and dully innocent:
" Unbleſt I wear my uſeleſs time away;
" Sleep (wretched maid!) all night, and dream
" all day;
" Go at ſet hours to dinner and to prayer
" (For dullneſs ever muſt be regular.)
" Now with mamma at tedious whiſt I play;
" Now without ſcandal drink inſipid tea;
" Or in the garden breathe the country air,
" Secure from meeting any tempter there;
" From books to work, from work to books, I
" rove,
" And am (alas!) at leiſure to improve!—
" Is this the life a beauty ought to lead?
" Were eyes ſo radiant only made to read?
" Theſe fingers, at whoſe touch ev'n age would " glow,
" Are theſe of uſe for nothing but to ſew?
" Sure erring nature never could deſign
" To form a houſewife in a mould like mine!
" O Venus, queen and guardian of the fair,
" Attend propitious to thy votary's prayer:
" Let me reviſit the dear town again:
" Let me be ſeen!—could I that wiſh obtain,
" All other wiſhes my own power would gain."

BLENHEIM.

Written at the Univerſity of Oxford, in the Year 1727.

PARENT of arts, whoſe ſkilful hand firſt taught
The towering pile to riſe, and form'd the plan
With fair proportion; architect divine.
Minerva; thee to my adventurous lyre
Aſſiſtant I invoke, that means to ſing
Blenheim, proud monument of Britiſh fame,
Thy glorious work! for thou the lofty towers
Didſt to his virtue raiſe, whom oft thy ſhield
In peril guarded, and thy wiſdom ſteer'd
Through all the ſtorms of war.—Thee too I call,
Thalia, ſylvan muſe, who lov'ſt to rove
Along the ſhady paths and verdant bowers
Of Woodſtock's happy grove: there tuning ſweet
Thy rural pipe, while all the Dryad train
Attentive liſten; let thy warbling ſong
Paint with melodious praiſe the pleaſing ſcene,
And equal theſe to Pindus' honour'd ſhades.
When Europe freed, confeſs'd the ſaving power
Of Marlborough's hand; Britain, who ſent him forth
Chief of confederate hoſts, to fight the cauſe
Of liberty and juſtice, grateful rais'd
This palace, ſacred to her leader's fame:
A trophy of ſucceſs; with ſpoils adorn'd
Of conquer'd towns and glorying in the name
Of that auſpicious field, where Churchill's ſword
Vanquiſh'd the might of Gallia, and chaſtis'd
Rebel Bavar.—Majeſtic in its ſtrength,
Stands the proud dome, and ſpeaks its great deſign.
Hail, happy chief, whoſe valour could deſerve
Reward ſo glorious! grateful nation, hail,
Who paid'ſt his ſervice with ſo rich a meed!
Which moſt ſhall I admire, which worthieſt praiſe,
The hero or the people? honour doubts,
And weighs their virtues in an equal ſcale.
Not thus Germania pays th' uncancell'd debt
Of gratitude to us—Bluſh, Cæſar, bluſh,
When thou beholdſt theſe towers; ingrate, to thee
A monument of ſhame! can'ſt thou forget
Whence they are nam'd, and what an Engliſh arm
Did for thy throne that day? but we diſdain
Or to upbraid or imitate thy guilt.
Still thy obdurate heart againſt the ſenſe
Of obligation infinite; and know,
Britain, like heaven, protects a thankleſs world
For her own glory, nor expects reward.
Pleas'd with the noble theme, her taſk the muſe
Purſues untir'd, and through the palace roves
With ever-new delight. The tapeſtry rich
With gold, and gay with all the beauteous paint
Of various-colour'd ſilks, diſpos'd with ſkill,
Attracts her curious eye. Here Iſter rolls
His purple wave; and there the Granic flood
With paſſing ſquadrons foams: here hardy Gaul
Flies from the ſword of Britain; there to Greece
Effeminate Perſia yields.—In arms oppos'd,
Marlborough and Alexander vie for fame
With glorious competition; equal both
In valour and in fortune: but their praiſe
Be different, for with different views they fought;
This to ſubdue, and that to free mankind.
Now, through the ſtately portals iſſuing forth,
The muſe to ſoftet glories turns, and ſeeks
The woodland ſhade, delighted. Not the vale
Of Tempe fam'd in ſong, or Ida's grove,
Such beauty boaſts. Amid the mazy gloom
Of this romantic wilderneſs once ſtood
The bower of Roſamonda, hapleſs fair,
Sacred to grief and love; the cryſtal fount
In which ſhe us'd to bathe her beauteous limbs
Still warbling flows, pleas'd to reflect the face
Of Spencer, lovely maid, when tir'd ſhe ſits
Beſide its flowery brink, and views thoſe charms
Which only Roſamond could once excel.
But ſee where, flowing with a nobler ſtream,
A limpid lake of pureſt waters rolls
Beneath the wide-ſtretch'd arch, ſtupendous work,
Through which the Danube might collected pour
His ſpacious urn! Silent a while and ſmooth
The current glides, till with an headlong force
Broke and diſorder'd, down the ſteep it falls
In loud caſcades; the ſilver-ſparkling foam
Glitters reluctent in the dancing ray.
In theſe retreats repos'd the mighty ſoul
Of Churchill, from the toils of war and ſtate,
Splendidly private, and the tranquil joy
Of contemplation felt, while Blenheim's dome
Triumphal ever in his mind renew'd

The memory of his fame, and foothd his thoughts
With pleafing record of his glorious deeds.
So, by the rage of faction home recall'd,
Lucullus, while he wag'd fucceſsful war
Againſt the pride of Aſia, and the power
Of Mithridates, whoſe aſpiring mind
No loſſes could ſubdue, enrich'd with ſpoils
Of conquer'd nations, back return'd to Rome,
And in magnificent retirement paſt
The evening of his life.—But not alone,
In the calm ſhades of honourable eaſe,
Great Marlborough peaceful dwelt: indulgent heaven
Gave a companion to his ſofter hours,
With whom converſing, he forgot all change
Of fortune, or of ſtate, and in her mind
Found greatneſs equal to his own, and lov'd
Himſelf in her — Thus each by each admir'd
In mutual honour, mutual fondneſs join'd:
Like two fair ſtars, with intermingled light,
In friendly union they together ſhone,
Aiding each other's brightneſs, till the cloud
Of night eternal quench'd the beams of one.
Thee, Churchill, firſt the ruthleſs hand of death
Tore from thy conſort's ſide, and call'd thee hence
To the ſublimer ſeats of joy and love;
Where fate again ſhall join her ſoul to thine,
Who now, regardful of thy fame, erects
The column to thy praiſe, and ſoothes her woe
With pious honours to thy ſacred name
Immortal. Lo! where, towering in the height
Of yon aërial pillar, proudly ſtands
Thy image, like a guardian god, ſublime,
And awes the ſubject plain: beneath his feet,
The German eagles ſpread their wings; his hand
Graſps victory, its ſlave. Such was thy brow
Majeſtic, ſuch thy martial port, when Gaul
Fled from thy frown, and in the Danube fought
A refuge from thy ſword.—There, where the field
Was deepeſt ſtain'd with gore, on Hochſtet's plain,
The theatre of thy glory, once was rais'd
A meaner trophy, by the imperial hand;
Extorted gratitude! which now the rage
Of malice impotent, beſeeming ill
A regal breaſt, has level'd to the ground:
Mean inſult! this, with better auſpices,
Shall ſtand on Britiſh earth to tell the world
How Marlborough fought, for whom, and how repaid
His ſervices. Nor ſhall the conſtant love
Of her who rais'd this monument be loſt
In dark oblivion: that ſhall be the theme
Of future bards in ages yet unborn,
Inſpir'd with Chaucer's fire, who in theſe groves
Firſt tun'd the Britiſh harp, and little deem'd
His humble dwelling ſhould the neighbour be
Of Blenheim, houſe ſuperb; to which the throng
Of travellers approaching ſhall not paſs
His roof unnoted, but reſpectful hail
With reverence due. Such honour does the muſe
Obtain her favourites.—But the noble pile
(My theme) demands my voice.—O ſhade adored,
Marlborough! who now above the ſtarry ſphere
Dwell'ſt in the palaces of heaven, enthron'd
Among the demigods, deign to defend
This thy abode, while preſent here below,
And ſacred ſtill to thy immortal fame,
With tutelary care. Preſerve it ſafe
From time's deſtroying hand, and cruel ſtroke
Of factious envy's more relentleſs rage.
Here may, long ages hence, the Britiſh youth,
When honour calls them to the field of war,
Behold the trophies which thy valour rais'd;
The proud reward of thy ſucceſsful toils
For Europe's freedom, and Britannia's fame;
That fir'd with generous envy, they may dare
To emulate thy deeds.—So ſhall thy name,
Dear to thy country, ſtill inſpire her ſons
With martial virtue; and to high attempts
Excite their arms, till other battles won,
And nations ſav'd new monuments require,
And other Blenheims ſhall adorn the land.

TO THE REVEREND DR. AYSCOUGH,

AT OXFORD.

Written from Paris in the Year 1728.

Say, deareſt friend, how roll thy hours away?
What pleaſing ſtudy cheats the tedious day?
Doſt thou the ſacred volumes oft explore
Of wiſe antiquity's immortal lore,
Where virtue, by the charms of wit refin'd,
At once exalts and poliſhes the mind?
How different from our modern guilty art,
Which pleaſes only to corrupt the heart;
Whoſe curs'd refinements odious vice adorn,
And teach to honour what we ought to ſcorn!
Doſt thou in ſage hiſtorians joy to ſee
How Roman greatneſs roſe with liberty:
How the ſame hands that tyrants durſt controul
Their empire ſtretch'd from Atlas to the pole;
Till wealth and conqueſt into ſlaves refin'd
The proud luxurious maſters of mankind?
Doſt thou, in letter'd Greece each charm admire,
Each grace, each virtue, freedom could inſpire;
Yet in her troubled ſtate ſee all the woes,
And all the crimes, that giddy faction knows;
Till, rent by parties, by corruption ſold,
Or weakly careleſs, or too raſhly bold,
She ſunk beneath a mitigated doom,
The ſlave and tutoreſs of protecting Rome?
Does calm philoſophy her aid impart,
To guide the paſſions, and to mend the heart?
Taught by her precepts, haſt thou learnt the end
To which alone the wiſe their ſtudies bend;
For which alone by nature were deſign'd
The powers of thought—to benefit mankind?
Not, like a cloyſter'd drone, to read and doſe,
In undeſerving, undeſerv'd, repoſe;
But reaſon's influence to diffuſe; to clear
Th' enlighten'd world of every gloomy fear;
Diſpel the miſts of error, and unbind
Thoſe pedant chains that clog the freeborn mind.
Happy who thus his leiſure can employ!
He knows the pureſt hours of tranquil joy;
Nor vext with pangs that buſier boſoms tear,
Nor loſt to ſocial virtue's pleaſing care;

Safe in the port, yet labouring to ſuſtain
Thoſe who ſtill float on the tempeſtuous main.
So Locke the days of ſtudious quiet ſpent;
So Boyle in wiſdom found divine content;
So Cambray, worthy of a happier doom,
The virtuous ſlave of Louis and of Rome.
Good * Wor'ſter thus ſupports his drooping age,
Far from court flattery, far from party-rage;
He, who in youth a tyrant's frown defy'd,
Firm and intrepid on his country's ſide,
Her boldeſt champion then, and now her
mildeſt guide!
O generous warmth! O ſanctity divine!
To emulate his worth, my friend, be thine:
Learn from his life the duties of the gown;
Learn, not to flatter, nor inſult the crown;
Nor, baſely ſervile, court the guilty great,
Nor raiſe the church a rival to the ſtate:
To error mild, to vice alone ſevere,
Seek not to ſpread the lare of love by fear.
The prieſt who plagues the world can never mend:
No foe to man was e'er to God a friend.
Let reaſon and let virtue faith maintain;
All force but theirs is impious, weak, and vain.
Me other cares in other climes engage,
Cares that become my birth, and ſuit my age;
In various knowledge to improve my youth,
And conquer prejudice, worſt foe to truth;
By foreign arts domeſtic faults to mend,
Enlarge my notions, and my views extend;
The uſeful ſcience of the world to know,
Which books can never teach, or pedants ſhow.
A nation here I pity and admire,
Whom nobleſt ſentiments of glory fire,
Yet taught, by cuſtom's force and bigot fear,
To ſerve with pride, and boaſt the yoke they bear:
Whoſe nobles, born to cringe and to command,
(In courts a mean, in camps a generous band),
From each low tool of power, content receive
Thoſe laws, their dreaded arms to Europe give.
Whoſe people (vain in want, in bondage bleſt;
Though plunder'd, gay; induſtrious, though oppreſt)
With happy follies riſe above their fate,
The jeſt and envy of each wiſer ſtate.
Yet here the muſes deign'd a while to ſport
In the ſhort ſun-ſhine of a favouring court:
Here Boileau, ſtrong in ſenſe and ſharp in wit,
Who, from the ancients, like the ancients writ,
Permiſſion gain'd inferior vice to blame,
By flattering incenſe to his maſter's fame.
Here Moliere, firſt of comic wits, excell'd
Whate'er Athenian theatres beheld;
By keen, yet decent, ſatire ſkill'd to pleaſe,
With morals mirth uniting, ſtrength with eaſe.
Now, charm'd, I hear the bold Corneille inſpire
Heroic thoughts, with Shakſpeare's force and fire!
Now ſweet Racine, with milder influence, move
The ſoften'd heart to pity and to love.
With mingled pain and pleaſure, I ſurvey
The pompous works of arbitrary ſway;
Proud palaces, that drain'd the ſubjects' ſtore,
Rais'd on the ruins of th' oppreſt and poor;
Where ev'n mute walls are taught to flatter ſtate,
And painted triumphs ſtyle ambition GREAT *.
With more delight thoſe pleaſing ſhades I view,
Where Condé from an envious court withdrew †;
Where, ſick of glory, faction, power, and pride,
(Sure judge how empty all, who all had tried!)
Beneath his palms the weary chief repos'd,
And life's great ſcene in quiet virtue cloſ'd.
With ſhame that other fam'd retreat I ſee,
Adorn'd by art, diſgrac'd by luxury ‡;
Where Orleans waſted every vacant hour,
In the wild riot of unbounded power;
Where feveriſh debauch and impious love
Stain'd the mad table and the guilty grove.
With theſe amuſements is thy friend detain'd,
Pleas'd and inſtructed in a foreign land;
Yet oft a tender wiſh recals my mind
From preſent joys to dearer left behind?
O native iſle, fair freedom's happieſt ſeat!
At thought of thee, my bounding pulſes beat;
At thought of thee, my heart impatient burns,
And all my country on my ſoul returns.
When ſhall I ſee thy fields, whoſe plenteous grain
No power can raviſh from th' induſtrious ſwain?
When kiſs, with pious love, the ſacred earth
That gave a Burleigh or a Ruſſel birth?
When, in the ſhade of laws, that long have ſtood,
Propt by their care, or ſtrengthen'd by their blood,
Of fearleſs independence wiſely vain,
The proudeſt ſlave of Bourbon's race diſdain?
Yet, oh! what doubt, what ſad preſaging voice,
Whiſpers within, and bids me not rejoice;
Bids me contemplate every ſtate around,
From ſultry Spain to Norway's icy bound;
Bids their loſt rights, their ruin'd glories ſee;
And tells me, Theſe, like England, once were free!

TO MR. POYNTZ,

AMBASSADOR AT THE CONGRESS OF SOISSONS, IN 1728

Written at Paris.

O THOU, whoſe friendſhip is my joy and pride,
Whoſe virtues warm me, and whoſe precept guide;
Thou to whom greatneſs, rightly underſtood,
Is but a larger power of being good;
Say, Poyntz, amidſt the toil of anxious ſtate,
Does not thy ſecret ſoul deſire retreat?
Doſt thou not wiſh (the taſk of glory done)
Thy buſy life at length might be thy own;
That, to thy lov'd philoſophy reſign'd,
No care might ruffle thy unbended mind?
Juſt is the wiſh. For ſure the happieſt meed,
To favour'd man by ſmiling heaven decreed,
Is, to reflect at eaſe on glorious pains,
And calmly to enjoy what virtue gains.
Not him I praiſe, who, from the world retir'd,
By no enlivening generous paſſion fir'd,

On flowery couches ſlumbers life away,
And gently bids his active powers decay;
Who fears bright glory's awful face to ſee,
And ſhuns renown as much as infamy.
But bleſt is he, who, exercis'd in cares,
To private leiſure public virtue bears;
Who tranquil ends the race he nobly run,
And decks repoſe with trophies labour won.
Him honour follows to the ſecret ſhade,
And crowns propitious his declining head;
In his retreats their harps the muſes ſtring,
For him in lays unbought ſpontaneous ſing;
Friendſhip and truth on all his moments wait.
Pleas'd with retirement better than with ſtate;
And round the bower, where humbly great he lies,
Fair olives bloom, or verdant laurels riſe.
So when thy country ſhall no more demand
The needful aid of thy ſuſtaining hand;
When peace reſtor'd ſhall, on her downy wing,
Secure repoſe and careleſs leiſure bring;
Then, to the ſhades of learned eaſe retir'd,
The world forgetting, by the world admir'd,
Among thy books and friends, thou ſhalt poſſeſs
Contemplative and quiet happineſs:
Pleas'd to review a life in honour ſpent,
And painful merit paid with ſweet content.
Yet, though thy hours unclogg'd with ſorrow roll,
Though wiſdom calm, and ſcience feed thy ſoul,
One dearer bliſs remains to be poſſeſt,
That only can improve and crown the reſt.—
Permit thy friend this ſecret to reveal,
Which thy own heart perhaps would better tell;
The point to which our ſweeteſt paſſions move
Is, to be truly lov'd, and fondly love.
This is the charm that ſmooths the troubled breaſt,
Friend of our health, and author of our reſt:
Bids every gloomy vexing paſſion fly,
And tunes each jarring ſtring to harmony.
Ev'n while I write, the name of love inſpires
More pleaſing thoughts, and more enlivening fires;
Beneath his power my raptur'd fancy glows,
And every tender verſe more ſweetly flows.
Dull is the privilege of living free;
Our hearts were never form'd for liberty:
Some beauteous image, well imprinted there,
Can beſt defend them from conſuming care.
In vain to groves and gardens we retire,
And nature in her rural works admire;
Though grateful theſe, yet theſe but faintly charm;
They may delight us, but can never warm.
May ſome fair eyes, my friend, thy boſom fire
With pleaſing pangs of ever-gay deſire;
And teach thee that ſoft ſcience, which alone
Still to thy ſearching mind reſts ſlightly known!
Thy ſoul, though great, is tender and refin'd,
To friendſhip ſenſible, to love inclin'd,
And therefore long thou canſt not arm thy breaſt
Againſt the entrance of ſo ſweet a gueſt.
Hear what th' inſpiring muſes bid me tell,
For heaven ſhall ratify what they reveal:
" A choſen bride ſhall in thy arms be plac'd,
" With all th' attractive charms of beauty grac'd,
" Whoſe wit and virtue ſhall thy own expreſs,
" Diſtinguiſh'd only by their ſofter dreſs;
" Thy greatneſs ſhe, or thy retreat, ſhall ſhare;
" Sweeten tranquillity, or ſoften care;
" Her ſmiles the taſte of every joy ſhall raiſe,
" And add new pleaſure to renown and praiſe;
" Till charm'd you own the truth my verſe would prove,
" That happineſs is near allied to love."

VERSES

To be written under a Picture of Mr. Poyntz.

Such is thy form, O Poyntz, but who ſhall find
A hand, or colours, to expreſs thy mind?
A mind unmov'd by every vulgar fear,
In a falſe world that dares to be ſincere;
Wiſe without art; without ambition great;
Though firm, yet pliant; active, though ſedate;
With all the richeſt ſtores of learning fraught,
Yet better ſtill by native prudence taught;
That, fond the griefs of the diſtreſt to heal,
Can pity frailties it could never feel;
That, when misfortune ſued, ne'er ſought to know
What ſect, what party, whether friend or foe;
That, fix'd on equal virtue's temperate laws,
Deſpiſes calumny, and ſhuns applauſe;
That, to its own perfections ſingly blind,
Would for another think this praiſe deſign'd.

AN EPISTLE TO MR. POPE.

FROM ROME, 1730.

Immortal bard! for whom each muſe has wove
The faireſt garlands of th' Aonian grove;
Preſerv'd our drooping genius to reſtore,
When Addiſon and Congreve are no more;
After ſo many ſtars extinct in night,
The darken'd age's laſt remaining light!
To thee from Latian realms this verſe is writ,
Inſpir'd by memory of ancient wit; [boaſt,
For now no more theſe climes their influence
Fall'n is their glory, and their virtue loſt;
From tyrants, and from prieſts, the muſes fly,
Daughters of reaſon and of liberty!
Nor Baïæ now nor Umbria's plain they love,
Nor on the banks of Nar or Mincio rove;
To Thames's flowery borders they retire,
And kindle in thy breaſt the Roman fire.
So in the ſhades, where, cheer'd with ſummer rays,
Melodious linnets warbled ſprightly lays,
Soon as the faded, falling leaves complain
Of gloomy winter's unauſpicious reign,
No tuneful voice is heard of joy or love,
But mournful ſilence ſaddens all the grove.
Unhappy Italy! whoſe alter'd ſtate
Has felt the worſt ſeverity of fate:
Not that barbarian hands her faſces broke,
And bow'd her haughty neck beneath their yoke;
Nor that her palaces to earth are thrown,
Her cities deſart, and her fields unſown;
But that her ancient ſpirit is decay'd,
That ſacred wiſdom from her bounds is fled;
That there the ſource of ſcience flows no more,
Whence its rich ſtreams ſupplied the world before.
Illuſtrious names! that once in Latium ſhin'd,
Born to inſtruct, and to command mankind;

Chiefs, by whose virtue mighty Rome was rais'd,
And poets, who those chiefs sublimely prais'd;
Oft I the traces you have left explore,
Your ashes visit, and your urns adore;
Oft kiss, with lips devout, some mouldering stone,
With ivy's venerable shade o'ergrown;
Those horrid ruins better pleas'd to see
Than all the pomp of modern luxury.
As late on Virgil's tomb fresh flowers I strow'd,
While with th' inspiring muse my bosom glow'd,
Crown'd with eternal bays, my ravish'd eyes
Beheld the poet's awful form arise:
"Stranger, he said, whose pious hand has paid.
" These grateful rites to my attentive shade,
" When thou shalt breathe thy happy native air,
" To Pope this message from his master bear:
"Great bard, whose numbers I myself inspire,
" To whom I gave my own harmonious lyre,
" If, high exalted on the throne of wit,
" Near me and Homer thou aspire to sit,
" No more let meaner satire dim the rays
" That flow majestic from thy nobler bays;
" In all the flowery paths of Pindus stray,
" But shun that thorny, that unpleasing way;
" Nor, when each soft engaging muse is thine,
" Address the least attractive of the nine.
" Of thee more worthy were thy task, to raise " A lasting column to thy country's praise;
" To sing the land, which yet alone can boast
" That liberty corrupted Rome has lost;
" Where science in the arms of peace is laid,
" And plants her palm beneath the olive's shade.
" Such was the theme for which my lyre I strung,
" Such was the people whose exploits I sung;
" Brave, yet refin'd, for arms and arts renown'd,
" With different bays by Mars and Phœbus
" crown'd;
" Dauntless opposers of tyrannic sway,
" But pleas'd a mild Augustus to obey.
" If these commands submissive thou receive,
" Immortal and unblam'd thy name shall live,
" Envy to black Cocytus shall retire;
" And howl with furies in tormenting fire;
" Approving time shall consecrate thy lays,
" And join the patriot's to the poet's praise."

TO LORD HERVEY.

IN THE YEAR 1730. FROM WORCESTERSHIRE.

" Strenua nos exercet inertia: navibus atque [est;
" Quadrigis petimus bene vivere: quod petis, hic
" Est ulubris, animus si te non deficit æquus."
HOR.

Favourite of Venus and the tuneful nine,
Pollio, by Nature form'd in courts to shine,
Wilt thou once more a kind attention lend,
To thy long absent and forgotten friend;
Who, after seas and mountains wander'd o'er,
Return'd at length to his own native shore,
From all that's gay retir'd, and all that's great,
Beneath the shades of his paternal seat,
Has found that happiness he sought in vain
On the fam'd banks of Tiber and of Seine?
'Tis not to view the well-proportion'd pile,
The charms of Titian's and of Raphael's style;
At soft Italian sounds to melt away;
Or in the fragrant groves of myrtle stray;
That lulls the tumults of the soul to rest,
Or makes the fond possessor truly blest.
In our own breasts the source of pleasure lies,
Still open, and still flowing to the wise;
Not sorc'd by toilsome art and wild desire
Beyond the bounds of nature to aspire,
But, in its proper channels gliding fair;
A common benefit, which all may share.
Yet half mankind this easy good disdain,
Nor relish happiness unbought by pain;
False is their taste of bliss, and thence their search is vain.
So idle, yet so restless, are our minds,
We climb the Alps, and brave the raging winds;
Through various toils to seek content we roam,
Which with but thinking right were ours at home.
For not the ceaseless change of shifted place
Can from the heart a settled grief erase,
Nor can the purer balm of foreign air
Heal the distemper'd mind of aking care.
The wretch, by wild impatience driven to rove,
Vext with the pangs of ill-requited love,
From pole to pole the fatal arrow bears,
Whose rooted point his bleeding bosom tears;
With equal pain each different clime he tries,
And is himself that torment which he flies.
For how should ills, which from our passions flow,
Be chang'd by Afric's heat, or Russia's snow?
Or how can aught but powerful reason cure
What front unthinking folly we endure?
Happy is he, and he alone, who knows
His heart's uneasy discord to compose;
In generous love of others good, to find
The sweetest pleasures of the social mind;
To bound his wishes in their proper sphere;
To nourish pleasing hope, and conquer anxious fear;
This was the wisdom ancient sages taught,
This was the sovereign good they justly sought;
This to no place or climate is confin'd,
But the free native produce of the mind.
Nor think, my lord, that courts to you deny
The useful practice of philosophy:
Horace, the wisest of the tuneful choir,
Not always chose from greatness to retire;
But, in the palace of Augustus, knew
The same unerring maxims to pursue,
Which, in the Sabine or the Velian shade,
His study and his happiness he made.
May you, my friend, by his example taught,
View all the giddy scene with sober thought;
Undazzled every glittering folly see,
And in the midst of slavish forms be free;
In its own centre keep your steady mind,
Let prudence guide you, but let honour bind.
In show, in manners, act the courtier's part,
But be a country gentleman at heart.

ADVICE TO A LADY.

M.DCC.XXXI.

The counsels of a friend, Belinda, hear,
Too roughly kind to please a lady's ear,

Unlike the flatteries of a lover's pen,
Such truths as women ſeldom learn from men.
Nor think I praiſe you ill, when thus I ſhow
What female vanity might fear to know.
Some merit's mine, to dare to be ſincere;
But greater yours, ſincerity to hear.
Hard is the fortune that your ſex attends;
Women, like princes, find few real friends:
All who approach them their own ends purſue;
Lovers and miniſters are ſeldom true.
Hence oft from reaſon heedleſs beauty ſtrays,
And the moſt truſted guide the moſt betrays!
Hence, by fond dreams of fancied power amus'd,
When moſt ye tyrannize, you're moſt abus'd.
What is your ſex's earlieſt, lateſt care,
Your heart's ſupreme ambition?—To be fair.
For this, the toilet every thought employs,
Hence all the toils of dreſs, and all the joys:
For this, hands, lips, and eyes, are put to ſchool,
And each inſtructed feature has its rule:
And yet how few have learnt, when this is given,
Not to diſgrace the partial boon of heaven!
How few with all their pride of form can move!
How few are lovely, that are made for love!
Do you, my fair, endeavour to poſſeſs
An elegance of mind as well as dreſs;
Be that your ornament, and know to pleaſe
By graceful nature's unaffected eaſe.
Nor make to dangerous wit a vain pretence,
But wiſely reſt content with modeſt ſenſe;
For wit, like wine, intoxicates the brain,
Too ſtrong for feeble woman to ſuſtain:
Of thoſe who claim it more than half have none;
And half of thoſe who have it are undone.
Be ſtill ſuperior to your ſex's arts,
Nor think diſhoneſty a proof of parts:
For you the plaineſt is the wiſeſt rule:
A cunning woman is a knaviſh fool.
Be good yourſelf, nor think another's ſhame
Can raiſe your merit, or adorn your fame.
Prudes rail at whores, as ſtateſmen in diſgrace
At miniſters, becauſe they wiſh their place.
Virtue is amiable, mild, ſerene;
Without all beauty, and all peace within:
The honour of a prude is rage and ſtorm,
'Tis uglineſs in its moſt frightful form.
Fiercely it ſtands, defying gods and men,
As fiery monſters guard a giant's den.
Seek to be good, but aim not be great:
A woman's nobleſt ſtation is retreat:
Her faireſt virtues fly from public ſight,
Domeſtic worth, that ſhuns too ſtrong a light.
To tougher man ambition's taſk reſign:
'Tis ours in ſenates or in courts to ſhine;
To labour for a ſunk corrupted ſtate,
Or dare the rage of envy, and be great.
One only care your gentle breaſts ſhould move,
Th' important buſineſs of your life is love;
To this great point direct your conſtant aim,
This makes your happineſs, and this your fame.
Be never cool reſerve with paſſion join'd;
With caution chooſe; but then be fondly kind.
The ſelfiſh heart, that but by halves is given,
Shall find no place in love's delightful heaven;
Here ſweet extremes alone can truly bleſs:
The virtue of a lover is exceſs.
A maid unaſk'd may own a well-plac'd flame;
Not loving firſt, but loving wrong, is ſhame.
Contemn the little pride of giving pain,
Nor think that conqueſt juſtifies diſdain.
Short is the period of inſulting power:
Offended Cupid finds his vengeful hour;
Soon will reſume the empire which he gave,
And ſoon the tyrant ſhall become the ſlave.
Bleſt is the maid, and worthy to be bleſt,
Whoſe ſoul, entire by him ſhe loves poſſeſt,
Feels every vanity in fondneſs loſt,
And aſks no power but that of pleaſing moſt:
Here is the bliſs, in juſt return, to prove
The honeſt warmth of undiſſembled love;
For her, inconſtant man might ceaſe to range,
And gratitude forbid deſire to change.
But, leſt harſh care the lover's peace deſtroy,
And roughly blight the tender buds of joy,
Let reaſon teach what paſſion fain would hide,
That Hymen's bands, by prudence ſhould be tied,
Venus in vain the wedded pair would crown,
If angry fortune on their union frown:
Soon will the flattering dream of bliſs be o'er,
And cloy'd imagination cheat no more.
Then, waking to the ſenſe of laſting pain,
With mutual tears the nuptial couch they ſtain;
And that fond love, which ſhould afford relief,
Does but increaſe the anguiſh of their grief:
While both could eaſier their own ſorrows bear,
Than the ſad knowledge of each other's care.
Yet may you rather feel that virtuous pain,
Than ſell your violated charms for gain;
Than wed the wretch whom you deſpiſe or hate,
For the vain glare of uſeleſs wealth or ſtate.
The moſt abandon'd proſtitutes are they,
Who not to love, but avarice, fall a prey:
Nor aught avails the ſpecious name of wife;
A maid ſo wedded is a whore for life.
Ev'n in the happieſt choice, where favouring heaven
Has equal love and eaſy fortune given,
Think not, the huſband gain'd, that all is done:
The prize of happineſs muſt ſtill be won:
And oft, the careleſs find it to their coſt,
The lover in the huſband may be loſt;
The graces might alone his heart allure;
They and the virtues meeting muſt ſecure.
Let ev'n your prudence wear the pleaſing dreſs
Of care for him, and anxious tenderneſs.
From kind concern about his weal or woe,
Let each domeſtic duty ſeem to flow.
The houſehold ſceptre if he bids you bear,
Make it your pride his ſervant to appear:
Endearing thus the common acts of life,
The miſtreſs ſtill ſhall charm him in the wife;
And wrinkled age ſhall unobſerv'd come on,
Before his eye perceives one beauty gone:
Ev'n o'er your cold, your ever-ſacred urn,
His conſtant flame ſhall unextinguiſh'd burn.
Thus I, Belinda, would your charms improve,
And form your heart to all the arts of love.
The taſk were harder, to ſecure my own
Againſt the power of thoſe already known;

For well you twiſt the ſecret chains that bind
With gentle force the captivated mind,
Skill'd every ſoft attraction to employ,
Each flattering hope, and each alluring joy,
I own your genius; and from you receive
The rules of pleaſing, which to you I give.

SONG.

WRITTEN IN THE YEAR 1732.

When Delia on the plain appears,
Aw'd by a thouſand tender fears,
I would approach, but dare not move:
Tell me, my heart, if this be love?

Whene'er ſhe ſpeaks, my raviſh'd ear
No other voice but hers can hear,
No other wit but hers approve:
Tell me, my heart, if this be love?

If ſhe ſome other youth commend,
Though I was once his fondeſt friend,
His inſtant enemy I prove:
Tell me, my heart, if this be love?

When ſhe is abſent, I no more
Delight in all that pleas'd before,
The cleareſt ſpring, or ſhadieſt grove:
Tell me, my heart, if this be love?

When, fond of power, of beauty vain,
Her nets ſhe ſpread for every ſwain,
I ſtrove to hate, but vainly ſtrove:
Tell me, my heart, if this be love?

SONG.

WRITTEN IN THE YEAR 1733.

The heavy hours are almoſt paſt
That part my love and me:
My longing eyes may hope at laſt
Their only wiſh to ſee.

But how, my Delia, will you meet
The man you've loſt ſo long?
Will love in all your pulſes beat,
And tremble on your tongue?

Will you in every look declare
Your heart is ſtill the ſame;
And heal each idly-anxious care
Our fears in abſence frame?

Thus, Delia, thus I paint the ſcene,
When ſhortly we ſhall meet;
And try what yet remains between
Of loitering time to cheat.

But, if the dream that ſooths my mind
Shall falſe and groundleſs prove;
If I am doom'd at length to find
You have forgot to love:

All I of Venus aſk, is this;
No more to let us join:
But grant me here the flattering bliſs,
To die, and think you mine.

DAMON AND DELIA.

In Imitation of Horace and Lydia.

WRITTEN IN THE YEAR 1732.

Damon.

Tell me, my Delia, tell me why
My kindeſt, fondeſt looks you fly?
What means this cloud upon your brow?
Have I offended? Tell me how!—
Some change has happen'd in your heart,
Some rival there has ſtol'n a part;
Reaſon theſe fears may diſapprove:
But yet I fear, becauſe I love.

Delia.

Firſt tell me, Damon, why to-day
At Belvidera's feet you lay?
Why with ſuch warmth her charms you prais'd,
And every trifling beauty rais'd,
As if you meant to let me ſee
Your flattery is not all for me?
Alas! too well your ſex I knew,
Nor was ſo weak to think you true.

Damon.

Unkind! my falſehood to upbraid,
When your own orders I obey'd;
You bid me try, by this deceit,
The notice of the world to cheat,
And hide, beneath another name,
The ſecret of our mutual flame.

Delia.

Damon, your prudence I confeſs,
But let me wiſh it had been leſs;
Too well the lover's part you play'd,
With too much art your court you made;
Had it been only art, your eyes
Would not have join'd in the diſguiſe.

Damon.

Ah! ceaſe thus idly to moleſt
With groundleſs fears thy virgin breaſt.
While thus at fancied wrongs you grieve,
To me a real pain you give.

Delia.

Though well I might your truth diſtruſt,
My fooliſh heart believes you juſt:
Reaſon this faith may diſapprove;
But I believe, becauſe I love.

ODE.

In Imitation of Paſtor Fido.

("O primavera gioventu del anno.")

WRITTEN ABROAD IN 1729.

Parent of blooming flowers and gay deſires,
Youth of the tender year, delightful ſpring,
At whoſe approach, inſpir'd with equal fires,
The amorous nightingale and poet ſing!

Again doſt thou return, but not with thee
Return the ſmiling hours I once poſſeſt;
Bleſſings thou bring'ſt to others but to me
The ſad remembrance that I once was bleſt.

Thy faded charms, which winter ſnatch'd away,
Renew'd in all their former luſtre ſhine;
But, ah! no more ſhall hapleſs I be gay,
Or know the vernal joys that have been mine

Though linnets ſing, though flowers adorn the green,
Though on their wings ſoft zephyrs fragrance bear:
Harſh is the muſic, joyleſs is the ſcene,
The odour faint: for Delia is not there.

Cheerleſs and cold I feel the genial ſun,
From thee while abſent I in exile rove;
Thy lovely preſence, faireſt light, alone
Can warm my heart to gladneſs and to love.

PARTS OF AN ELEGY OF TIBULUS.

TRANSLATED, 1729 30.

("Divitias alius ſulvo ſibi congerat auro.")

Let others heap of wealth a ſhining ſtore,
And, much poſſeſſing, labour ſtill for more;
Let them, diſquieted with dire alarms,
Aſpire to win a dangerous fame in arms:
Me tranquil poverty ſhall lull to reſt,
Humbly ſecure, and indolently bleſt;
Warm'd by the blaze of my own cheerful hearth,
I'll waſte the wintery hours in ſocial mirth;
In ſummer pleas'd attend to harveſt toils,
In autumn preſs the vineyard's purple ſpoils,
And oft to Delia in my boſom bear
Some kid, or lamb, that wants its mother's care:
With her I'll celebrate each gladſome day,
When ſwains their ſportive rites to Bacchus pay:
With her new milk on Pales' altar pour,
And deck with ripen'd fruits Pomona's bower.
At night, how ſoothing would it be to hear,
Safe in her arms, the tempeſt howling near;
Or, while the wintery clouds their deluge pour,
Slumber aſſiſted by the beating ſhower!
Ah! how much happier, than the fool who braves,
In ſearch of wealth, the black tempeſtuous waves!
While I, contented with my little ſtore,
In tedious voyage ſeek no diſtant ſhore;
But, idly toiling on ſome ſhady ſeat,
Near cooling fountains ſhun the dog-ſtar's heat:
For what reward ſo rich could fortune give,
That I by-abſence ſhould my Delia grieve?
Let Great Meſſalla ſhine in martial toils,
And grace his palace with triumphal ſpoils;
Me beauty holds, in ſtrong though gentle chains,
Far from tumultuous war and duſty plains.
With thee, my love, to paſs my tranquil days,
How would I ſlight ambition's painful praiſe!
How would I joy with thee, my love, to yoke
The ox, and feed my ſolitary flock!
On thy ſoft breaſt might I but lean my head,
How downy ſhould I think the woodland bed!
The wretch, who ſleeps not by his fair-one's ſide,
Deteſts the gilded couch's uſeleſs pride,
Nor knows his weary, weeping eyes to cloſe,
Though murmuring rills invite him to repoſe.
Hard were his heart, who thee, my fair, could leave
For all the honours proſperous war can give;
Though through the vanquiſh'd eaſt he ſpread his fame,
And Parthian tyrants tremble at his name;
Though, bright in arms, while hoſts around him bleed,
With martial pride he preſt his foaming ſteed.
No pomps like theſe my humble vows require;
With thee I'll live, and in thy arms expire.
Thee may my cloſing eyes in death behold!
Thee may my faultering hand yet ſtrive to hold!
Then, Delia then, thy heart will melt in woe,
Then o'er my breathleſs clay thy tears will flow;
Thy tears will flow, for gentle is thy mind,
Nor doſt thou think it weakneſs to be kind.
But, ah! fair mourner, I conjure thee, ſpare
Thy heaving breaſts and looſe diſhevell'd hair:
Wound not thy form; left on th' Elyſian coaſt
Thy anguiſh ſhould diſturb my peaceful ghoſt.
But now nor death nor parting ſhould employ
Our ſprightly thoughts, or damp our bridal joy:
We'll live, my Delia; and from life remove
All care, all buſineſs, but delightful love.
Old age in vain thoſe pleaſures would retrieve
Which youth alone can taſte, alone can give;
Then let us ſnatch the moment to be bleſt,
This hour is love's—be fortune's all the reſt.

SONG.

WRITTEN IN THE YEAR 1732.

Say, Myra, why is gentle love
A ſtranger to that mind,
Which pity and eſteem can move
Which can be juſt and kind?

Is it, becauſe you fear to ſhare
The ills that love moleſt;
The jealous doubt, the tender care,
That rack the amorous breaſt?

Alas! by ſome degree of woe
We every bliſs muſt gain:
The heart can ne'er a tranſport know,
That never feels a pain.

VERSES,

Written at Mr. Pope's Houſe at Twickenham, which he had lent to Mrs. Greville.

IN AUGUST 1735.

Go, Thames, and tell the buſy town,
Not all its wealth or pride
Could tempt me from the charms that crown
Thy rural flowery ſide:

Thy flowery ſide, where Pope has plac'd
The muſe's green retreat,
With every ſmile of nature grac'd,
With every art complete,

But now, ſweet bard, thy heavenly ſong
Enchants us here no more;
Their darling glory loſt too long
Thy once-lov'd ſhades deplore.

Yet ſtill, for beateous Greville's ſake,
The muſe's here remain:
Greville, whoſe eyes have power to make
A Pope of every ſwain.

EPIGRAM.

None without hope e'er lov'd the brighteſt fair:
But love can hope, where reaſon would deſpair.

TO MR. WEST, AT WICKHAM*.

WRITTEN IN THE YEAR 1740.

Fair nature's ſweet ſimplicity,
With elegance refin'd,
Well in thy ſeat, my friend, I ſee,
But better in thy mind.

To both, from courts and all their ſtate,
Eager I fly, to prove
Joys far above a courtier's fate,
Tranquillity and love.

TO MISS LUCY FORTESCUE.

Once, by the muſe alone inſpir'd
I ſung my amorous ſtrains:
No ſerious love my boſom fir'd;
Yet every tender maid, deceiv'd,
The idly-mournful tale believ'd,
And wept my fancied pains.

But Venus now, to puniſh me
For having feign'd ſo well,
Has made my heart ſo fond of thee,
That not the whole Aonian choir
Can accents ſoft enough inſpire,
Its real flame to tell.

TO THE SAME;

WITH HAMMOND'S ELEGIES.

All that of love can be expreſs'd,
In theſe ſoft numbers ſee;
But, Lucy, would you know the reſt,
It muſt be read in me.

TO THE SAME.

To him who in an hour muſt die,
Not ſwifter ſeems that hour to fly,
Than ſlow the minutes ſeem to me,
Which keep me from the ſight of thee.

Not more that trembling wretch would give,
Another day or year to live;
Than I to ſhorten what remains
Of that long hour which thee detains

Oh! come to my impatient arms,
Oh! come, with all thy heavenly charms,
At once to juſtify and pay
The pain I feel from this delay.

---

* See the Inſcriptions in Mr. Weſt's Poems.

TO THE SAME.

To eaſe my troubled mind of anxious care,
Laſt night the ſecret caſket I explor'd,
Where all the letters of my abſent fair
His richeſt treaſure careful love had ſtor'd.

In every word a magic ſpell I found
Of power to charm each buſy thought to reſt;
Though every word increas'd the tender wound
Of fond deſire ſtill throbbing in my breaſt.

So to his hoarded gold the miſer ſteals,
And loſes every ſorrow at the ſight;
Yet wiſhes ſtill for more, nor ever feels
Entire contentment, or ſecure delight

Ah! ſhould I loſe thee, my too lovely maid,
Couldſt thou forget thy heart was ever mine,
Fear not thy letters ſhould the change upbraid;
My hand each dear memorial ſhall reſign:

Not one kind word ſhall in my power remain,
A painful witneſs of reproach to thee;
And leſt my heart ſhould ſtill their ſenſe retain,
My heart ſhall break, to leave thee wholly free.

A PRAYER TO VENUS,

IN HER TEMPLE AT STOWE.

To the ſame.

Fair Venus, whoſe delightful ſhrine ſurveys
Its front reflected in the ſilver lake,
Theſe humble offerings, which thy ſervant pays,
Freſh flowers, and myrtle wreaths, propitious take.

If leſs my love exceeds all other love,
Than Lucy's charms all other charms excel,
Far from my breaſt each ſoothing hope remove,
And there let ſad deſpair for ever dwell.

But if my ſoul is fill'd with her alone;
No other wiſh nor other object knows:
Oh! make her, goddeſs, make her all my own,
And give my trembling heart ſecure repoſe!

No watchful ſpies I aſk, to guard her charms,
No walls of braſs, no ſteel-defended door:
Place her but once within my circling arms,
Love's ſureſt fort, and I will doubt no more.

TO THE SAME.

ON HER PLEADING WANT OF TIME.

On Thames's bank, a gentle youth
For Lucy ſigh'd, with matchleſs truth,
Ev'n when he ſigh'd in rhyme;
The lovely maid his flame return'd,
And would with equal warmth have burn'd,
But that ſhe had not time.

Oft he repair'd with eager feet
In ſecret ſhades his fair to meet,
Beneath th' accuſtom'd lime:

She would have fondly met him there,
And heal'd with love each tender care,
But that she had not time.

"It was not thus, inconstant maid!
"You acted once," (the shepherd said)
"When love was in its prime:"
She griev'd to hear him thus complain;
And would have writ to ease his pain,
But that she had not time.

How can you act so cold a part?
No crime of mine has chang'd your heart,
If love be not a crime.—
We soon must part for months, for years—
She would have answer'd with her tears,
But that she had not time.

TO THE SAME.

Your shape, your lips, your eyes, are still the same,
Still the bright object of my constant flame;
But where is now the tender glance, that stole,
With gentle sweetness, my enchanted soul?
Kind fears, impatient wishes, soft desires,
Each melting charm that love alone inspires?
These, these are lost; and I behold no more
The maid my heart delighted to adore.
Yet, still unchang'd, still doating to excess,
I ought, but dare not try, to love you less;
Weakly I grieve, unpitied I complain;
But not unpunish'd shall your change remain;
For you, cold maid, whom no complaints can move,
Were far more blest, when you like me could love.

TO THE SAME.

When I think on your truth, I doubt you no more,
I blame all the fears I gave way to before:
I say to my heart, "Be at rest, and believe
"That whom once she has chosen she never will "leave."

But, ah! when I think on each ravishing grace
That plays in the smiles of that heavenly face;
My heart beats again; I again apprehend
Some fortunate rival in every friend.

These painful suspicions you cannot remove,
Since you neither can lessen your charms nor my love;
But doubts caus'd by passion you never can blame;
For they are not ill-founded, or you feel the same.

TO THE SAME.

WITH A NEW WATCH.

With me while present may thy lovely eyes
Be never turn'd upon this golden toy:
Think every pleasing hour too swiftly flies;
And measure time, by joy succeeding joy!

But when the cares that interrupt our bliss
To me not always will thy sight allow;
Then oft with kind impatience look on this,
Then every minute count—as I do now.

AN IRREGULAR ODE.

Written at Wickham in 1746.

TO THE SAME.

Ye sylvan scenes with artless beauty gay,
Ye gentle shades of Wickham, say,
What is the charm that each successive year,
Which sees me with my Lucy here,
Can thus to my transported heart
A sense of joy unfelt before, impart?

Is it glad summer's balmy breath, that blows
From the fair jasmine and the blushing rose?
Her balmy breath, and all her blooming store
Of rural bliss, was here before:
Oft have I met her on the verdant side
Of Norwood-hill, and in the yellow meads,
Where Pan the dancing Graces leads,
Array'd in all her flowery pride.
No sweeter fragrance now the gardens yield,
No brighter colours paint th' enamel'd field.

Is it to love these new delights I owe?
Four times has the revolving sun
His annual circle through the zodiac run;
Since all that love's indulgent power
On favour'd mortals can bestow,
Was given to me in this auspicious bower.

Here first my Lucy, sweet in virgin charms,
Was yielded to my longing arms;
And round our nuptial bed,
Hovering with purple wings, th' Idalian boy
Shook from his radiant torch the blissful fires
Of innocent desires,
While Venus scatter'd myrtles o'er her head.
Whence then this strange increase of joy?
He, only he, can tell, who, match'd like me,
(If such another happy man there be)
Has by his own experience tried
How much the wife is dearer than the bride.

TO THE MEMORY OF THE SAME LADY,

A Monody. A. D. 1747.

"Ipse cavâ solans ægrum testudine amorem,
"Te dulcis conjux, te solo in littore secum,
"Te veniente die, te decedente canebat."

At length escap'd from every human eye,
From every duty, every care,
That in my mournful thoughts might claim a share,
Or force my tears their flowing stream to dry;
Beneath the gloom of this embowering shade,
This lone retreat, for tender sorrow made,
I now may give my burden'd heart relief,
And pour forth all my stores of grief;
Of grief surpassing every other woe,
Far as the purest bliss, the happiest love
Can on th' ennobled mind bestow,
Exceeds the vulgar joys that move
Our gross desires, inelegant and low.

Ye tufted groves, ye gently-falling rills,
Ye high o'erſhadowing hills,
Ye lawns gay-ſmiling with eternal green,
Oft have you my Lucy ſeen!
But never ſhall you now behold her more:
Nor will ſhe now with fond delight
And taſte refin'd your rural charms explore.
Clos'd are thoſe beauteous eyes in endleſs night,
Thoſe beauteous eyes where beaming us'd to ſhine
Reaſon's pure light and virtue's ſpark divine.

Oft would the Dryads of theſe woods rejoice
To hear her heavenly voice;
For her deſpiſing, when ſhe deign'd to ſing,
The ſweeteſt ſongſters of the ſpring:
The woodlark and the linnet pleas'd no more;
The nightingale was mute,
And every ſhepherd's flute
Was caſt in ſilent ſcorn away,
While all attended to her ſweeter lay.
Ye larks and linnets, now reſume your ſong
And thou, melodious Philomel,
Again thy plaintive ſtory tell;
For death has ſtopt that tuneful tongue,
Whoſe muſic could alone your warbling notes excel.

In vain I look around
O'er all the well-known ground,
My Lucy's wonted footſteps to deſcry;
Where oft we us'd to walk,
Where oft in tender talk
We ſaw the ſummer ſun go down the ſky;
Nor by yon fountain's ſide,
Nor where its waters glide
Along the valley, can ſhe now be found:
In all the wide-ſtretch'd proſpects ample bound
No more my mournful eye
Can aught of her eſpy,
But the ſad ſacred earth where her dear relics lie.

O ſhades of Hagley, where is now your boaſt?
Your bright inhabitant is loſt.
You ſhe preferr'd to all the gay reſorts
Where female vanity might wiſh to ſhine,
The pomp of cities, and the pride of courts.
Her modeſt beauties ſhunn'd the public eye:
To your ſequeſter'd dales,
And flower embroider'd vales,
From an admiring world ſhe choſe to fly:
With nature there retir'd, and nature's God,
The ſilent paths of wiſdom trod,
And baniſh'd every paſſion from her breaſt,
But thoſe, the gentleſt and the beſt,
Whoſe holy flames with energy divine
The virtuous heart enliven and improve,
The conjugal and the maternal love.

Sweet babes, who, like the little playful fawns,
Were wont to trip along theſe verdant lawns
By your delighted mother's ſide,
Who now your infant ſteps ſhall guide?
Ah! where is now the hand whoſe tender care
To every virtue would have form'd your youth,
And ſtrew'd with flowers the thorny ways of truth?
O loſs beyond repair!
O wretched father! left alone,
To weep their dire misfortune, and thy own!
How ſhall thy weaken'd mind, oppreſs'd with woe,
And drooping o'er thy Lucy's grave,
Perform the duties that you doubly owe!
Now ſhe, alas! is gone,
From folly and from vice their helpleſs age to ſave?

Where were ye, Muſes, when relentleſs fate
From theſe fond arms your fair diſciple tore;
From theſe fond arms, that vainly ſtrove
With hapleſs ineffectual love
To guard her boſom from the mortal blow?
Could not your favouring power, Aonian maids,
Could not, alas! your power prolong her date,
For whom ſo oft in theſe inſpiring ſhades,
Or under Camden's moſs-clad mountains hoar,
You open'd all your ſacred ſtore,
What'er your ancient ſages taught,
Your ancient bards ſublimely thought,
And bade her raptur'd breaſt with all your ſpirit glow?

Nor then did Pindus or Caſtalia's plain,
Or Aganippe's fount your ſteps detain,
Nor in the Theſpian vallies did you play;
Nor then on * Mincio's bank
Beſet with oſiers dank,
Nor where † Clitumnus rolls his gentle ſtream,
Nor where through hanging woods,
Steep ‡ Anio pours his floods.
Nor yet where ‖ Meles or § Iliſſus ſtray.
Ill does it now beſeem,
That, of your guardian care bereft,
To dire diſeaſe and death your darling ſhould be left.

Now what avails it that in early bloom,
When light fantaſtic toys
Are all her ſex's joys,
With you ſhe ſearch'd the wit of Greece and Rome;
And all that in her latter days
To emulate her ancient praiſe
Italia's happy genius could produce;
Or what the Gallic fire
Bright ſparkling could inſpire,
By all the Graces temper'd and refin'd;
Or what in Britain's iſle,
Moſt favour'd with your ſmile,
The powers of reaſon and of fancy join'd
To full perfection have conſpir'd to raiſe?
Ah! what is now the uſe

Of all theſe treaſures that enrich her mind,
To black oblivion's gloom for ever now conſign'd.

At leaſt, ye nine, her ſpotleſs name
'Tis yours from death to ſave,
And in the temple of immortal fame
With golden characters her worth engrave.
Come then, ye virgin ſiſters, come,
And ſtrew with choiceſt flowers her hallow'd tomb:
But foremoſt thou, in ſable veſtment clad,
With accents ſweet and ſad, [urn
Thou, plaintive muſe, whom o'er his Laura's
Unhappy Petrarch call'd to mourn;
O come, and to this fairer Laura pay
A more impaſſion'd tear, a more pathetic lay.

Tell how each beauty of her mind and face
Was brighten'd by ſome ſweet peculiar grace!
How eloquent in every look [ſpoke!
Through her expreſſive eyes her ſoul diſtinctly
Tell how her manners, by the world refin'd,
Left all the taint of modiſh vice behind,
And made each charm of poliſh'd courts agree
With candid truth's ſimplicity,
And uncorrupted innocence!
Tell how to more than manly ſenſe
She join'd the ſoftening influence
Of more than female tenderneſs:
How, in the thoughtleſs days of wealth and joy,
Which oft the care of others' good deſtroy,
Her kindly-melting heart
To every want and every woe,
To guilt itſelf when in diſtreſs,
The balm of pity would impart,
And all relief that bounty could beſtow!
Ev'n for the kid or lamb that pour'd its life
Beneath the bloody knife,
Her gentle tears would fall,
Tears from ſweet virtue's ſource, benevolent to all.

Not only good and kind,
But ſtrong and elevated was her mind:
A ſpirit that with noble pride
Could look ſuperior down
On fortune's ſmile or frown;
That could without regret or pain
To virtue's loweſt duty ſacrifice
Or intereſt or ambition's higheſt prize;
That, injur'd or offended, never tried
Its dignity by vengeance to maintain,
But by magnanimous diſdain.
A wit that, temperately bright,
With inoffenſive light
All pleaſing ſhone; nor ever paſt
The decent bounds that wiſdom's ſober hand,
And ſweet benevolence's mild command,
And baſhful modeſty, before it caſt.
A prudence undeceiving, undeceiv'd,
That nor too little nor too much believ'd,
That ſcorn'd unjuſt ſuſpicion's coward fear,
And without weakneſs knew to be ſincere.
Such Lucy was, when, in her faireſt days,
Amidſt th' acclaim of univerſal praiſe,
In life's and glory's freſheſt bloom, [tomb.

So, where the ſilent ſtreams of Liris glide,
In the ſoft boſom of Campania's vale,
When now the wintery tempeſts all are fled,
And genial ſummer breathes her gentle gale,
The verdant orange lifts its beauteous head:
From every branch the balmy flowerets riſe,
On every bough the golden fruits are ſeen;
With odours ſweet it fills the ſmiling ſkies,
The wood-nymphs tend, and th' Idalian queen.
But, in the midſt of all its blooming pride,
A ſudden blaſt from Apenninus blows,
Cold with perpetual ſnows: [and dies.
The tender blighted plant ſhrinks up its leaves,

Ariſe, O Petrarch, from th' Elyſian bowers,
With never-fading myrtles twin'd,
And fragrant with ambroſial flowers,
Where to thy Laura thou again art join'd;
Ariſe, and hither bring the ſilver lyre,
Tun'd by thy ſkilful hand,
To the ſoft notes of elegant deſire,
With which o'er many a land
Was ſpread the fame of thy diſaſtrous love;
To me reſign the vocal ſhell,
And teach my ſorrows to relate
Their melancholy tale ſo well,
As may ev'n things inanimate, [move.
Rough mountain oaks, and deſert rocks, to pity

What were, alas! thy woes compar'd to mine?
To thee thy miſtreſs in the bliſsful band
Of Hymen never gave her hand;
The joys of wedded love were never thine:
In thy domeſtic care
She never bore a ſhare,
Nor with endearing art
Would heal thy wounded heart
Of every ſecret grief that feſter'd there:
Nor did her fond affection on the bed
Of ſickneſs watch thee, and thy languid head
Whole nights on her unwearied arm ſuſtain,
And charm away the ſenſe of pain:
Nor did ſhe crown your mutual flame
With pledges dear, and with a father's tender name.

O beſt of wives! O dearer far to me
Than when thy virgin charms
Were yielded to my arms,
How can my ſoul endure the loſs of thee?
How in the world, to me a deſert grown,
Abandon'd and alone,
Without my ſweet companion can I live?
Without thy lovely ſmile,
The dear reward of every virtuous toil,
What pleaſures now can pall'd ambition give?
Ev'n the delightful ſenſe of well-earn'd praiſe,
Unſhar'd by thee, no more my lifeleſs thoughts could raiſe.

For my diſtracted mind
What ſuccour can I find?
On whom for conſolation ſhall I call?
Support me every friend;
Your kind aſſiſtance lend,
To bear the weight of this oppreſſive woe.
Alas! each friend of mine,
My dear departed love, ſo much was thine,

That none has any comfort to beſtow.
My books, the beſt relief
In every other grief,
Are now with your idea ſadden'd all:
Each favourite author we together read
My tortur'd memory wounds, and ſpeaks of Lucy dead.

We were the happieſt pair of human kind;
The rolling year its varying courſe perform'd,
And back return'd again;
Another and another ſmiling came,
And ſaw our happineſs unchang'd remain:
Still in her golden chain
Harmonious concord did our wiſhes bind:
Our ſtudies, pleaſures, taſte, the ſame.
O fatal, fatal ſtroke,
That all this pleaſing fabric love had rais'd
Of rare felicity,
On which ev'n wanton vice with envy gaz'd,
And every ſcheme of bliſs our hearts had form'd,
With ſoothing hope, for many a future day,
In one ſad moment broke!—
Yet, O my ſoul, thy riſing murmurs ſtay;
Nor dare the all-wiſe Diſpoſer to arraign,
Or againſt his ſupreme decree
With impious grief complain,
That all thy full-blown joys at once ſhould fade;
Was his moſt righteous will—and be that will obey'd.

Would thy fond love his grace to her controul,
And in theſe low abodes of ſin and pain
Her pure exalted ſoul
Unjuſtly for thy partial good detain?
No—rather ſtrive thy grovelling mind to raiſe
Up to that unclouded blaze,
That heavenly radiance of eternal light,
In which enthron'd ſhe now with pity ſees
How frail, how inſecure, how ſlight,
Is every mortal bliſs;
Ev'n love itſelf, if riſing by degrees
Beyond the bounds of this imperfect ſtate,
Whoſe fleeting joys ſo ſoon muſt end,
It does not to its ſovereign good aſcend.
Riſe then, my ſoul, with hope elate,
And ſeek thoſe regions of ſerene delight,
Whoſe peaceful path and ever-open gate
No feet but thoſe of harden'd guilt ſhall miſs.
There death himſelf thy Lucy ſhall reſtore,
There yield up all his pow'r ne'er to divide you more.

ON THE SAME LADY.

To the
Memory of Lucy Lyttleton,
Daughter of Hugh Forteſcue of Filleigh,
in the county of Devon, Eſq.
Father to the preſent Earl of Clinton,
By Lucy his wife,
The daughter of Matthew Lord Aylmer,
Who departed this life the 19th of Jan. 1746-7.
Aged twenty-nine,
Having employed the ſhort time aſſigned to her here
In the uniform practice of religion and virtue.
Made to engage all hearts, and charm all eyes;
Though meek, magnanimous; though witty, wiſe;
Polite, as all her life in courts had been;
Yet good, as ſhe the world had never ſeen;
The noble fire of an exalted mind,
With gentle female tenderneſs combin'd.
Her ſpeech was the melodious voice of love,
Her ſong the warbling of the vernal grove;
Her eloquence was ſweeter than her ſong,
Soft as her heart, and as her reaſon ſtrong;
Her form each beauty of her mind expreſs'd,
Her mind was virtue by the Graces dreſs'd.

HORACE, BOOK IV. ODE IV.

WRITTEN AT OXFORD, 1725 *.

"Qualem miniſtrum fulminis alitem," &c.

As the wing'd miniſter of thundering Jove,
To whom he gave his dreadful bolts to bear,
Faithful † aſſiſtant of his maſter's love,
King of the wandering nations of the air,

When balmy breezes fann'd the vernal ſky,
On doubtful pinions left his parent neſt,
In flight eſſays his growing force to try,
While inborn courage fir'd his generous breaſt;

Then, darting with impetuous fury down,
The flocks he ſlaughter'd, an unpractis'd foe;
Now his ripe valour to perfection grown
The ſcaly ſnake and creſted dragon know:

Or, as a lion's youthful progeny,
Wean'd from his ſavage dam and milky food,
The gazing kid beholds with fearful eye,
Doom'd firſt to ſtain his tender fangs in blood:

Such Druſus, young in arms, his foes beheld,
The Alpine Rhæti, long unmatch'd in fight:
So were their hearts with abject terror quell'd;
So ſunk their haughty ſpirit at the ſight.

Tam'd by a boy, the fierce Barbarians find
How guardian prudence guides the youthful flame,
And how great Cæſar's fond paternal mind
Each generous Nero forms to early fame;

A valiant ſon ſprings from a valiant ſire:
Their race by mettle ſprightly courſers prove;
Nor can the warlike eagle's active fire
Degenerate to form the timorous dove.

But education can the genius raiſe,
And wiſe inſtructions native virtue aid;
Nobility without them is diſgrace,
And honour is by vice to ſhame betray'd.

Let red Metaurus, ſtain'd with Punic blood,
Let mighty Aſdrubal ſubdued, confeſs
How much of empire and of fame is ow'd
By thee, O Rome, to the Neronian race.

Of this be witneſs that auſpicious day,
Which, after a long, black, tempeſtuous night,

* Firſt printed with Weſt's tranſlation of Pindar. See the Preface to that Gentleman's Poems.

† In the rape of Ganymede, who was carried up to Jupiter by an eagle, according to the Poetical Hiſtory.

Firſt ſmil'd on Latium with a milder ray, [light.
And cheer'd our drooping hearts with dawning

Since the dire African with waſteful ire
Rode o'er the ravag'd towns of Italy;
As through the pine-trees flies the raging fire,
Or Eurus o'er the vext Sicilian ſea.

From this bright era, from this proſperous field,
The Roman glory dates her riſing power;
From hence 'twas given her conquering ſword to wield,
Raiſe her fall'n gods, and ruin'd ſhrines reſtore.

Thus Hannibal at length deſpairing ſpoke:
" Like ſtags to ravenous wolves an eaſy prey,
" Our feeble arms a valiant foe provoke,
" Whom to elude and 'ſcape were victory:

" A dauntleſs nation, that from Trojan fires,
" Hoſtile Auſonia, to thy deſtin'd ſhore
" Her gods, her infant ſons, and aged ſires,
" Through angry ſeas and adverſe tempeſts bore:

" As on high Algidus the ſturdy oak,
" Whoſe ſpreading boughs the axe's ſharpneſs
" feel,
" Improves by loſs, and, thriving with the ſtroke,
" Draws health and vigour from the wounding
" ſteel.

" Not Hydra ſprouting from her mangled head,
" So tir'd the baffled force of Hercules;
" Nor Thebes, nor Colchis, ſuch a monſter bred,
" Pregnant of hills, and ſam'd for prodigies.

" Plunge her in ocean like the morning ſun,
" Brighter ſhe riſes from the depths below:
" To earth with unavailing ruin thrown,
" Recruits her ſtrength, and foils the wonder-
" ing foe.

" No more of victory the joyful fame
" Shall from my camp to haughty Carthage fly;
" Loſt, loſt, are all the glories of her name!
" With Aſdrubal her hopes and fortune die!

" What ſhall the Claudian valour not perform
" Which Power Divine guards with propitious
" care, [ſtorm,
" Which wiſdom ſteers through all the dangerous
" Through all the rocks and ſhoals of doubtful
" war?"

VIRTUE AND FAME.

TO THE COUNTESS OF EGREMONT.

Virtue and Fame, the other day,
Happen'd to croſs each other's way;
Said Virtue, " Hark ye! madam Fame,
" Your ladyſhip is much to blame;
" Jove bids you always wait on me,
" And yet your face I ſeldom ſee:
" The Paphian queen employs your trumpet,
" And bids it praiſe ſome handſome ſtrumpet;
" Or thundering through the ranks of war,
" Ambition ties you to her car."
Saith Fame, " Dear madam, I proteſt,
" I never find myſelf ſo bleſt
" As when I humbly wait behind you!
" But 'tis ſo mighty hard to find you!
" In ſuch obſcure retreats you lurk!
" To ſeek you is an endleſs work."
" Well," anſwer'd Virtue, " I allow
" Your plea. But hear, and mark me now.
" I know (without offence to others)
" I know the beſt of wives and mothers;
" Who never paſs'd an uſeleſs day
" In ſcandal, goſſiping, or play:
" Whoſe modeſt wit, chaſtis'd by ſenſe,
" Is lively cheerful innocence;
" Whoſe heart nor envy knows, nor ſpite,
" Whoſe duty is her ſole delight;
" Nor rul'd by whim, nor ſlave to faſhion,
" Her parents joy, her huſband's paſſion."
Fame ſmil'd and anſwer'd, " On my life,
" This is ſome country parſon's wife,
" Who never ſaw the court nor town,
" Whoſe face is homely as her gown;
" Who banquets upon eggs and bacon—"
" No, madam, no—you're much miſtaken—
" I beg you'll let me ſet you right—
" 'Tis one with every beauty bright;
" Adorn'd with every poliſh'd art
" That rank or fortune can impart;
" 'Tis the moſt celebrated toaſt
" That Britain's ſpacious iſle can boaſt;
" 'Tis princely Petworth's noble dame;
" 'Tis Egremont—Go, tell it, Fame."

ADDITION EXTEMPORE,

BY EARL HARDWICKE.

Fame heard with pleaſure—ſtrait replied,
" Firſt on my roll ſtands Wyndham's bride;
" My trumpet oft I've rais'd, to ſound
" Her modeſt praiſe the world around!
" But notes were wanting—Canſt thou find
" A muſe to ſing her face, her mind?
" Believe me, I can name but one,
" A friend of yours—'tis Lyttleton."

LETTER TO EARL HARDWICKE:

OCCASIONED BY THE FOREGOING VERSES.

MY LORD,

A thousand thanks to your Lordſhip for your addition to my verſes. If you can write ſuch extempore, it is well for other poets, that you choſe to be Lord Chancellor, rather than a Laureat. They explain to me a viſion I had the night before.

Methought I ſaw before my feet,
With countenance ſerene and ſweet,
The muſe, who, in my youthful days,
Had oft inſpir'd my careleſs lays.
She ſmil'd, and ſaid, " Once more I ſee
" My fugitive return to me;
" Long had I loſt you from my bower,
" You ſcorn'd to own my gentle power;
" With me no more your genius ſported,
" The grave hiſtoric muſe you courted;
" Or, rais'd from earth, with ſtreaming eyes,
" Purſued Urania through the ſkies;

" But now, to my forſaken track,
" Fair Egremont has brought you back:
" Nor bluſh, by her and virtue led,
" That ſoft, that pleaſing path to tread;
" For there, beneath to-morrow's ray,
" Ev'n wiſdom's ſelf ſhall deign to play,
" Lo! to my flowery groves and ſprings
" Her favourite ſon the goddeſs brings,
" The council's and the ſenate's guide:
" Law's oracle, the nation's pride:
" He comes, he joys with thee to join,
" In ſinging Wyndham's charms divine:
" To thine he adds his nobler lays;
" Ev'n thee, my friend, he deigns to praiſe.
" Enjoy that praiſe, nor envy Pitt
" His fame with burgeſs or with cit;
" For ſure one line from ſuch a bard,
" Virtue would think her beſt reward."

HYMEN TO ELIZA.

MADAM, before your feet I lay
This ode upon your wedding-day,
The firſt indeed I ever made,
For writing odes is not my trade:
My head is full of houſehold cares,
And neceſſary dull affairs;
Beſides that ſometimes jealous frumps
Will put me into doleful dumps.
And then no clown beneath the ſky
Was e'er more ungallant than I;
For you alone I now think fit
To turn a poet and a wit—
For you whoſe charms, I know not how,
Have power to ſmooth the wrinkled brow,
And make me, though by nature ſtupid,
As briſk, and as alert as Cupid.
Theſe obligations to repay,
Whene'er your happy nuptial day
Shall with the circling years return,
For you my torch ſhall brighter burn
Than you firſt my power ador'd,
Nor will I call myſelf your lord,
But am, (as witneſs this my hand)
Your humble ſervant at command. HYMEN.

Dear child, let Hymen not beguile
You, who are ſuch a judge of ſtyle,
To think that he theſe verſes made,
Without an abler penman's aid;
Obſerve them well, you'll plainly ſee,
That every line was writ by me. CUPID

MISS CARTER'S POEMS IN MANUSCRIPT.

SUCH were the notes that ſtruck the wondering ear
Of ſilent night, when, on the verdant banks
Of Siloë's hallow'd brook, celeſtial harps,
According to ſeraphic voices, ſung
Glory to God on high, and on the earth
Peace and good-will to men!—Reſume the lyre,
Chauntreſs divine, and every Briton call
Its melody to hear—ſo ſhall thy ſtrains,
More powerful than the ſong of Orpheus, tame
The ſavage heart of brutal vice, and bend
At pure religion's ſhrine the ſtubborn knees
Of bold impiety.—Greece ſhall no more
Of Leſbian Sappho boaſt, whoſe wanton muſe,
Like a falſe Syren, while ſhe charm'd, ſeduc'd
To guilt and ruin. For the ſacred head
Of Britain's poeteſs, the virtues twine
A nobler wreath, by them from Eden's grove
Unfading gather'd, and direct the hand
Of ——— to fix it on her brows.

MOUNT EDGECUMBE.

THE gods, on thrones celeſtial ſeated,
By Jove with bowls of nectar heated,
All on Mount Edgecumbe turn'd their eyes;
" That place is mine," great Neptune cries:
" Behold how proud o'er all the main
" Thoſe ſtately turrets ſeem to reign!
" No views ſo grand on earth you ſee!
" The maſter too belongs to me:
" I grant him my domain to ſhare,
" I bid his hand my trident bear."
" The ſea is your's, but mine the land,"
Pallas replies; " by me were plann'd
" Thoſe towers, that hoſpital, thoſe docks,
" That fort, which crown thoſe iſland rocks:
" The lady too is of my choir,
" I taught her hand to touch the lyre;
" With every charm her mind I grac'd,
" I gave her prudence, knowledge, taſte."
" Hold, madam," interrupted Venus,
" The lady muſt be ſhar'd between us:
" And ſurely mine is yonder grove,
" So fine, ſo dark, ſo fit for love;
" Trees, ſuch as in th' Idalian glade,
" Or Cyprian lawn, my palace ſhade."
Then Oreads, Dryads, Naiads, came;
Each nymph alleg'd her lawful claim.
But Jove, to finiſh the debate,
Thus ſpoke, and what he ſpeaks is fate:
" Nor god nor goddeſs, great or ſmall,
" That dwelling his or hers may call;
" I made Mount Edgecumbe for you all."

INVITATION.

TO THE DOWAGER DUCHESS D'AIGUILLON.

WHEN peace ſhall, on her downy wing,
To France and England friendſhip bring,
Come, Aiguillon, and here receive
That homage we delight to give
To foreign talents, foreign charms,
To worth which envy's ſelf diſarms
Of jealous hatred: Come and love
That nation which you now approve.
So ſhall by France amends be made
(If ſuch a debt can e'er be paid)
For having with ſeducing art
From Britain ſtol'n her Hervey's heart.

TO COLONEL DRUMGOLD.

DRUMGOLD, whoſe anceſtors from Albion's ſhore
Their conquering ſtandards to Hiberna bore,

Though now thy valour, to thy country loſt,
Shines in the foremoſt ranks of Gallia's hoſt,
Think not that France ſhall borrow all thy fame—
From Britiſh ſires deriv'd thy genius came:
Its force its energy, to theſe it ow'd,
But the fair poliſh Gallia's clime beſtow'd:
The Graces there each ruder thought refin'd,
And livelieſt wit with ſoundeſt ſenſe combin'd.
They taught in ſportive Fancy's gay attire
To dreſs the graveſt of th' Aonian choir,
And gave to ſober Wiſdom's wrinkled cheek
The ſmile that dwells in Hebe's dimple ſleek.
Pay to each realm the debt that each may aſk:
Be thine, and thine alone, the pleaſing taſk,
In pureſt elegance of Gallic phraſe
To clothe the ſpirit of the Britiſh lays.
Thus every flower which every muſe's hand
Has rais'd profuſe in Britain's favourite land,
By thee tranſplanted to the banks of Seine,
Its ſweeteſt native odours ſhall retain.
And when thy noble friend, with olive crown'd,
In concord's golden chain has firmly bound
The rival nations, thou for both ſhalt raiſe
The grateful ſong to his immortal praiſe.
Albion ſhall think ſhe hears her Prior ſing;
And France, that Boileau ſtrikes the tuneful ſtring,
Then ſhalt thou tell what various talents join'd,
Adorn, embelliſh, and exalt his mind;
Learning and wit, with ſweet politeneſs grac'd;
Wiſdom by guile or cunning undebas'd;
By pride unſullied, genuine dignity;
A nobler and ſublime ſimplicity.
Such in thy verſe ſhall Nivernois be ſhown:
France ſhall with joy the fair reſemblance own;
And Albion ſighing bid her ſons aſpire
To imitate the merit they admire.

EPITAPH ON CAPTAIN GRENVILLE; *

KILLED IN LORD ANSON'S ENGAGEMENT IN 1747.

Ye weeping Muſes, Graces, Virtues, tell
If, ſince your all-accompliſh'd Sydney fell,
You, or afflicted Britain, e'er deplor'd
A loſs like that theſe plaintive lays record!
Such ſpotleſs honour; ſuch ingenious truth,
Such ripen'd wiſdom in the bloom of youth!
So mild, ſo gentle, ſo compos'd a mind,
To ſuch heroic warmth and courage join'd;
He, too, like Sydney, nurs'd in Learning's arms,
For nobler war forſook her ſofter charms:
Like him, poſſeſs'd of ev'ry pleaſing art,
The ſecret wiſh of every female's heart:
Like him, cut off in youthful glory's pride,
He, unrepining, for his country dy'd.

* Theſe verſes having been originally written when the Author was in Oppoſition, concluded thus:

" But nobler far, and greater is the praiſe
" So bright to ſhine in theſe degenerate days:
" An age of heroes kindled Sidney's fire;
" His inborn worth alone could Grenville's deeds
" inſpire."

But ſome years after, when his Lordſhip was with Miniſtry, he eraſed theſe four lines. See GENT. MAG. Vol. XLIX. p. 601.

ON GOOD HUMOUR.

WRITTEN AT ETON-SCHOOL, 1729.

Tell me, ye ſons of Phœbus, what is this
Which all admire, but few, too few, poſſeſs?
A virtue 'tis to ancient maids unknown,
And prudes who ſpy all faults except their own.
Lov'd and defended by the brave and wiſe,
Though knaves abuſe it, and like fools deſpiſe.
Say, Wyndham, if 'tis poſſible to tell,
What is the thing in which you moſt excel?
Hard is the queſtion, for in all you pleaſe;
Yet ſure good-nature is your nobleſt praiſe;
Secur'd by this, your parts no envy move,
For none can envy him whom all muſt love.
This magic power can make ev'n folly pleaſe,
This to Pitt's genius adds a brighter grace,
And ſweetens every charm in Celia's face.

SOME ADDITIONAL STANZAS

TO ASTOLFO'S VOYAGE TO THE MOON.

In Arioſto.

When now Aſtolfo, ſtor'd within a vaſe,
Orlando's wits had ſafely brought away;
He turn'd his eyes towards another place,
Where, cloſely cork'd, unnumber'd bottles lay.

Of fineſt cryſtal were thoſe bottles made,
Yet what was there enclos'd he could not ſee:
Wherefore in humble wiſe the Saint he pray'd,
To tell what treaſure there conceal'd might be,

" A wondrous thing it is," the Saint replied,
" Yet undefin'd by any mortal wight;
" An airy eſſence, not to be deſcried,
" Subtle and thin, that Maidenhead is hight.

" From earth each day in troops they hither come,
" And fill each hole and corner of the moon;
" For they are never eaſy while at home,
" Nor ever owner thought them gone too ſoon.

" When here arriv'd, they are in bottles pent,
" For fear they ſhould evaporate again;
" And hard it is a priſon to invent,
" So volatile a ſpirit to retain.

" Thoſe that to young and wanton girls belong
" Leap, bounce, and fly, as if they'd burſt the
" glaſs:
" But thoſe that have below been kept too long
" Are ſpiritleſs, and quite decay'd, alas!"

So ſpake the Saint, and wonder ſeiz'd the Knight,
As of each veſſel he th' inſcription read;
For various ſecrets there were brought to light;
Of which report on earth had nothing ſaid.

Virginities, that cloſe confin'd he thought
In t' other world, he found above the ſky;
His ſiſter's and his couſins there were brought,
Which made him ſwear, though good St. John was by.

But much his wrath increas'd, when he eſpied
That which was Chloe's once, his miſtreſs dear:
" Ah, falſe and treacherous fugitive!" he cried,
" Little I deem'd that I ſhould meet thee here.

" Did not thy owner, when we parted laſt,
" Promiſe to keep thee ſafe for me alone?
" Scarce of our abſence three ſhort months are paſt,
" And thou already from thy poſt art flown.

" Be not enrag'd, replied th' Apoſtle kind—
" Since that this maidenhead is thine by right,
" Take it away; and, when thou haſt a mind,
" Carry it thither whence it took its flight."

" Thanks, Holy Father!" quoth the joyous Knight,
" The moon ſhall be no loſer by your grace:
" Let me but have the uſe on't for a night,
" And I'll reſtore it to its preſent place."

TO A YOUNG LADY,

WITH THE TRAGEDY OF VENICE PRESERVED.

In tender Otway's moving ſcenes we find
What power the gods have to your ſex aſſign'd:
Venice was loſt, if on the brink of fate
A woman had not propt her ſinking ſtate:
In the dark danger of that dreadful hour,
Vain was her ſenate's wiſdom, vain its power;
But, fav'd by Belvidera's charming tears,
Still o'er the ſubject main her towers ſhe rears,
And ſtands a great example to mankind,
With what a boundleſs ſway you rule the mind,
Skilful the worſt or nobleſt ends to ſerve,
And ſtrong alike to ruin or preſerve.
In wretched Jaffier, we with pity view
A mind, to honour falſe, to virtue true,
In the wild ſtorm of ſtruggling paſſions toſt,
Yet ſaving innocence, though fame was loſt;
Greatly forgetting what he ow'd his friend—
His country, which had wrong'd him, to defend.
But ſhe, who urg'd him to that pious deed,
Who knew ſo well the patriot's cauſe to plead,
Whoſe conquering love her country's ſafety won,
Was, by that fatal love, herſelf undone.
* " Hence may we learn, what paſſion fain
" would hide,
" That Hymen's bands by prudence ſhould be tied.
" Venus in vain the wedded pair would crown,
" If angry Fortune on their union frown:
" Soon will the flattering dreams of joy be o'er,
" And cloy'd imagination cheat no more;
" Then, waking to the ſenſe of laſting pain,
" With mutual tears the bridal couch they ſtain;
" And that fond love, which ſhould afford relief,
" Does but augment the anguiſh of their grief:
" While both could eaſier their own ſorrows bear,
" Than the ſad knowledge of each other's care."
May all the joys in love and fortune's power
Kindly combine to grace your nuptial hour!
On each glad day may plenty ſhower delight,
And warmeſt rapture bleſs each welcome night!
May Heaven, that gave you Belvidera's charms,
Deſtine ſome happier Jaffier to your arms,
Whoſe bliſs misfortune never may allay,
Whoſe fondneſs never may through care decay:
Whoſe wealth may place you in the faireſt light,
And force each modeſt beauty into ſight!
So ſhall no anxious want your peace deſtroy,
No tempeſt cruſh the tender buds of joy;
But all your hours in one gay circle move,
Nor reaſon ever diſagree with love!

* The twelve following lines, with ſome ſmall variations, have been already printed in "Advice to a Lady;" but, as Lord Lyttelton choſe to introduce them here, it was thought more eligible to repeat theſe few lines, than to ſuppreſs the reſt of the poem.

ELEGY.

Tell me, my heart, fond ſlave of hopeleſs love,
And doom'd its woes, without its joys to prove,
Canſt thou endure thus calmly to eraſe
The dear, dear image of thy Delia's face?
Canſt thou exclude that habitant divine,
To place ſome meaner idol in her ſhrine?
O taſk, for feeble reaſon too ſevere!
O leſſon, nought could teach me but deſpair!
Muſt I forbid my eyes that heavenly ſight,
They've view'd ſo oft with languiſhing delight?
Muſt my ears ſhun that voice, whoſe charming ſound
Seem'd to relieve, while it increas'd, my wound?
O Waller! Petrarch! you who tun'd the lyre
To the ſoft notes of elegant deſire?
Though Sidney to a rival gave her charms,
Though Laura dying left her lover's arms,
Yet were your pains leſs exquiſite than mine,
'Tis eaſier far to loſe, than to reſign!

INSCRIPTION

For a Buſt of Lady Suffolk; deſigned to be ſet up in a Wood at Stowe, 1732.

Her wit and beauty for a court were made:
But truth and goodneſs fit her for a ſhade.

SULPICIA TO CERINTHUS,

IN HER SICKNESS. FROM TIBULLUS.

(Sent to a Friend, in a Lady's Name.)

Say, my Cerinthus, does thy tender breaſt
Feel the ſame feveriſh heats that mine moleſt?
Alas! I only wiſh for health again,
Becauſe I think my lover ſhares my pain:
For what would health avail to wretched me,
If you could, unconcern'd, my illneſs ſee?

SULPICIA TO CERINTHUS.

I'm weary of this tedious dull deceit;
Myſelf I torture, while the world I cheat:
Though prudence bids me ſtrive to guard my fame,
Love ſees the low hypocriſy with ſhame:
Love bids me all confeſs, and call thee mine,
Worthy my heart, as I am worthy thine:
Weakneſs for thee I will no longer hide;
Weakneſs for thee is woman's nobleſt pride.

CATO'S SPEECH TO LABIENUS,

IN THE NINTH BOOK OF LUCAN.

(" Quid quæri, Labiene, jubes," &c.)

What, Labienus, would thy fond deſire,
Of horned Jove's prophetic ſhrine inquire?

Whether to seek in arms a glorious doom,
Or basely live, and be a king in dome?
If life be nothing more than death's delay;
If impious force can honest minds dismay,
Or probity may fortune's frown disdain;
If well to mean is all that virtue can;
And right, dependant on itself alone,
Gains no addition from success?—'Tis known:
Fix'd in my heart these constant truths I bear,
And Ammon cannot write them deeper there.
Our souls, allied to God, within them feel
The secret dictates of the Almighty will;
This is his voice, be this our oracle.
When first his breath the seeds of life instill'd,
All that we ought to know was then reveal'd.
Nor can we think the Omnipresent mind
Has truth to Libya's desart sands confin'd,
There, known to few, obscur'd, and lost, to lie—
Is there a temple of the Deity,
Except earth, sea, and air, yon azure pole;
And chief, his holiest shrine, the virtuous soul?
Where'er the eye can pierce, the feet can move,
This wide, this boundless universe is Jove.
Let abject minds, that doubt because they fear,
With pious awe to juggling priests repair;
I credit not what lying prophets tell—
Death is the only certain oracle.
Cowards and brave must die one destin'd hour—
This Jove has told; he needs not tell us more.

TO MR. GLOVER;

ON HIS POEM OF LEONIDAS.

Written in the Year 1734.

Go on, my friend, the noble task pursue,
And think thy genius is thy country's due;
To vulgar wits inferior themes belong,
But liberty and virtue claim thy song.
Yet cease to hope, though grac'd with every charm,
The patriot verse will cold Britannia warm;
Vainly thou striv'st our languid hearts to raise,
By great examples drawn from better days:
No longer we to Sparta's fame aspire,
What Sparta scorn'd, instructed to admire;
Nurs'd in the love of wealth, and form'd to bend
Our narrow thoughts to that inglorious end:
No generous purpose can enlarge the mind,
No social care, no labour for mankind,
Where mean self-interest every action guides,
In camps commands, in cabinets presides;
Where luxury consumes the guilty store,
And bids the villain be a slave for more.
Hence, wretched nation, all thy woes arise,
Avow'd corruption, licens'd perjuries,
Eternal taxes, treaties for a day,
Servants that rule, and senates that obey.
O people, far unlike the Grecian race,
That deems a virtuous poverty disgrace,
That suffers public wrongs and public shame,
In council insolent, in action tame!
Say, what is now th' ambition of the great?
Is it to raise their country's sinking state;
Her load of debt to ease by frugal care,
Her trade to guard, her harals'd poor to spare?
Is it like honest Somers, to inspire
The love of laws, and freedom's sacred fire?
Is it, like wise Godolphin, to sustain
The balanc'd world, and boundless power restrain?
Or is the mighty aim of all their toil,
Only to aid the wreck, and share the spoil?
On each relation, friend, dependant, pour,
With partial wantonness, the golden shower,
And, fenc'd by strong corruption, to despise
An injur'd nation's unavailing cries!
Rouse, Britons, rouse! if sense of shame be weak,
Let the loud voice of threatening danger speak.
Lo! France, as Persia once, o'er every land
Prepares to stretch her all-oppressing hand.
Shall England sit regardless and sedate,
A calm spectatress of the general fate;
Or call forth all her virtue, and oppose,
Like valiant Greece, her own and Europe's foes?
O let us seize the moment in our power,
Our follies now have reach'd the fatal hour;
No later term the angry gods ordain;
This crisis lost, we shall be wise in vain.
And thou, great poet, in whose nervous lines
The native majesty of freedom shines,
Accept this friendly praise; and let me prove
My heart not wholly void of public love:
Though not like thee I strike the sounding string
To notes which Sparta might have deign'd to sing,
But, idly sporting in the secret shade,
With tender trifles sooth some artless maid.

TO WILLIAM PITT, ESQ.

ON HIS LOSING HIS COMMISSION,

In the Year 1736.

Long had thy virtues mark'd thee out for fame,
Far, far superior to a cornet's name;
This generous Walpole saw, and griev'd to find
So mean a post disgrace that noble mind.
The servile standard from thy freeborn hand
He took, and bade thee lead the patriot band.

PROLOGUE

TO THOMSON'S CORIOLANUS.

Spoken by Mr. Quin.

I come not here your candour to implore
For scenes, whose author is, alas! no more;
He wants no advocate his cause to plead;
You will yourselves be patrons of the dead.
No party his benevolence confin'd,
No sect—alike it flow'd to all mankind.
He lov'd his friends (forgive this gushing tear:
Alas! I feel, I am no actor here)
He lov'd his friends with such a warmth of heart,
So clear of interest, so devoid of art,
Such generous friendship, such unshaken zeal,
No words can speak it; but our tears may tell.—
O candid truth, O faith without a stain,
O manners gently firm, and nobly plain,
O sympathizing love of others' bliss,
Where will you find another breast like his?
Such was the man—the poet well you know:
Oft has he touch'd your hearts with tender woe;

Oft in his crowded houſe, with juſt applauſe,
You heard him teach fair virtue's pureſt laws;
For his chaſte muſe employ'd her heaven-taught lyre
None but the nobleſt paſſions to inſpire,
Not one immortal, one corrupted thought,
One line, which dying he could wiſh to blot.
Oh! may to-night your favourable doom
Another laurel add, to grace his tomb:
Whilſt he, ſuperior now to praiſe or blame,
Hears not the feeble voice of human fame.
Yet, if to thoſe whom moſt on earth he lov'd,
From whom his pious care is now remov'd,
With whom his liberal hand, and bounteous heart,
Shar'd all his little fortune could impart;
If to thoſe friends your kind regard ſhall give
What they no longer can from his receive;
That, that, ev'n now, above yon ſtarry pole,
May touch with pleaſure his immortal ſoul.

EPILOGUE TO LILLO'S ELMERICK.

You, who, ſupreme o'er every work of wit,
In judgment here, unaw'd unbiaſs'd, ſit,
The palatines and guardians of the pit;
If to your minds this merely modern play
No uſeful ſenſe, no generous warmth convey;
If fuſtian here, through each unnatural ſcene,
In ſtrain'd conceits found high, and nothing mean;
If lofty dullneſs for your vengeance call:
Like Elmerick judge, and let the guilty fall.
But if ſimplicity, with force and fire,
Unlabour'd thoughts and artleſs words inſpire:
If, like the action which theſe ſcenes relate,
The whole appear irregularly great;
If maſter-ſtrokes the nobler paſſions move;
Then, like the king, acquit us, and approve.

THE LIFE OF MOORE.

Of the perſonal hiſtory of Moore, the particulars which have been recorded by his biographers are inſufficient to ſatisfy curioſity, and diſproportionate to his reputation among the periodical eſſayiſts and the writers of verſe.

The additional intelligence which the preſent writer has obtained, is general and ſcanty; but he has this gratification from giving it to the world, that it affords him an opportunity of recording his obligations to the Rev. Joſhua Toulmin, the able and judicious "Hiſtorian of Taunton," and continuator of "Neale's Hiſtory of the Puritans," for a particular account of his deſcent, birth, and education, drawn up, principally, on the information of his only ſurviving ſiſter.

Edward Moore was born at Abingdon, in Berkſhire, March 22. 1711-12. He was the third ſon of the Rev. Thomas Moore, M. A. paſtor of a ſociety of Proteſtant diſſenters in that town, by Mary, daughter of Thomas Alder, gentleman, of Drayton, a neighbouring village. His grandfather, the Rev. John Moore of Brazen-Noſe College, Oxford, had the curacy of Holneſt in Dorſetſhire, from which he was ejected by the act of uniformity. He became afterwards paſtor to a large congregation of Proteſtant diſſenters at Bridgewater, in Somerſetſhire. His father, in conjunction with his brother, the Rev. John Moore, M. A. conducted the tuition of youth deſigned for the miniſtry, or deſirous of going through a courſe of academical learning, at Bridgewater, till he removed to Abingdon, where he died in the end of 1721, or the beginning of 1722.

The ſeminary at Bridgewater was ſupported by Mr. John Moore, through a period of more than fifty years (a ſmall interruption in the latter end of Queen Anne's reign excepted, when he was obliged to ſecrete himſelf), till the time of his death, Dec. 31. 1748, with great credit and honour to himſelf, and great benefit to the intereſts of literature and religion. The only publication attributed to his father, is a tract on the controverſy of the day, between the eſtabliſhed church and the diſſenters, intituled, "The Honeſty of Proteſtant Diſſenters vindicated, in anſwer to Mr. Peer's Character of an Honeſt Diſſenter, in twelve marks, with ſome Remarks on the additional Preface;" written on liberal principles, with temper, judgment, and ability, not without a ſeaſoning of ſmartneſs and wit.

He left ſeven children. John, born July 3. 1708, a diſſenting miniſter, ſettled firſt at Swaffham, in Cambridgeſhire, and then at Abingdon, truly reſpectable for abilities and character. He died September 22. 1774. Thomas, born 1709; Edward, the poet; Samuel, born April 8. 1714; Mary, born September 8. 1716, who died at Taunton, December 6. 1761; Elizabeth, born April 30. 1719, ſtill living, on whoſe information this account is drawn up, and with whom the family will become extinct; Jane, born October 14. 1721, who died at Bridgewater, November 1790. His widow died in London about 1771, eighty-nine years of age, expreſſing to the laſt an affectionate remembrance of the excellencies of his character, and a mournful ſenſe of her great loſs in the removal of a moſt beloved huſband, after a moſt happy union of about 20 years.

His father dying when he was about ten years old, the direction of his education was kindly undertaken by his uncle at Bridgewater. With him he ſpent ſome years of his early life, and was then removed to the ſchool of Eaſt Orchard, in Dorſetſhire.

His original deſtination appears to have been for trade; and, at a proper age, he was placed with one Mr. Gibſon, a wholeſale linen-draper in London. When he left this houſe, he went to Ireland, in the capacity of a factor, to one Mr. Johnſon a merchant in the city, where he reſided ſome years.

On his return from Ireland, he entered into a partnerſhip in the linen trade with an Iriſh gentleman in London; but his ſucceſs in buſineſs, though he conducted himſelf in it with ability and expertneſs, not anſwering his expectations, the connection was diſſolved.

Whether from a ſtronger attachment to the ſtudy than the counter, from a more ardent zeal in the purſuit of fame than in the ſearch after fortune, or from the cauſe aſſigned by himſelf, in the preface to the quarto edition of his works, 1756, that "his marriage with the Muſes, like moſt other marriages, was more from neceſſity than inclination," he relinquiſhed the buſineſs for which he was bred, became a candidate for fame, and courted the Muſes.

It has been generally ſuppoſed that he never was in buſineſs on his own account; but that he had been engaged in buſineſs, will appear from the following ſtanza in his Ode to Garrick, on the Talk of the Town on his Marriage.

And then there's Belmont to be ſure—
Oho! my gentle Neddy Moore,
How does my good Lord Mayor?
And have you left Cheapſide, my dear?
And will you write again next year,
And ſhow your fav'rite player?

Attached to the Muſes, he early courted public attention; and in 1744 produced his firſt performance, intituled, Fables for the Female Sex, which was favourably received.

Three of theſe fables, The Sparrow and the Dove, The Female Seducers, and Love and Vanity, were the production of his ingenious and amiable friend Henry Brooke, Eſq. whoſe aſſiſtance he acknowledges in the preface, without diſtinguiſhing his ſhare.

"To avoid the misfortunes that may attend me from any accidental ſucceſs, I think it neceſſary to inform thoſe who know me, that I have been aſſiſted in the following papers by the author of "Guſtavus Vaſa." Let the crime of pleaſing be his whoſe talents as a writer, and whoſe virtues as a man, have rendered him a living affront to the whole circle of his acquaintance."

The eulogy of his poetical aſſociate, whoſe fables are no ſmall ornament to his collection, is not overcharged. Brooke, with many peculiarities, was a man of knowledge and genius, and, what is much better, a moſt worthy man, and an excellent citizen.

In 1748, he undertook the defence of Lyttleton, in an ironical poem, called The Trial of Selim the Perſian, for High Crimes and Miſdemeanors; in which he has ſhown himſelf a perfect maſter of the moſt elegant kind of panegyric, ſuch as is couched under the appearance of accuſation; and for which he was paid with kind words, which, as is common, raiſed great hopes, that were at laſt diſappointed.

The ſame year, he produced his firſt dramatic performance, The Foundling, a comedy, acted at Drury-Lane; but which, though aided by the performance of Garrick, Barry, Yates, Macklin, Mrs. Woffington, and Mrs. Cibber, and highly applauded and commended by Cibber, had but a moderate degree of ſucceſs. On the firſt night of its appearance, the character of Faddle (which, it is ſaid, was intended for one Ruſſel) gave great diſguſt, and was therefore conſiderably curtailed in all the enſuing repreſentations. It has not ſince that time been continued as an acting comedy, being generally conſidered as bearing too near a reſemblance to Steele's "Conſcious Lovers;" yet in ſome reſpects it is preferable to that play, as the intricacy of the plot is more natural, the characters of a more ſprightly turn, and drawn in general from higher life, unmixed with the pertneſs of a chambermaid coquet and kitchen coxcomb, on which the livelineſs of Steele's play principally depends. The prologue was written by Brooke.

About this time he wrote The Trial of Sarah * * *, alias Slim Sal, a jeu d'eſprit, occaſioned by the vivacity and good humour with which he ſpent an evening, in a lively party of friends, at the houſe of ——— Palmer, Eſq. at Eaton, near St. Neot's in Huntingdonſhire. The lady, his daughter, the ſubject of its genteel wit, is ſtill living.

In 1749, he complimented Garrick in an Ode, on his marriage with Madam Violetti; and the ſame year, Auguſt 10. he united himſelf in marriage with Miſs Jenny Hamilton, a beautiful and accompliſhed woman, daughter of Mr. Hamilton, table-decker to the princeſſes, on which occaſion Lyttleton ſtood father.

Miſs Hamilton, it is ſaid, had a poetical turn, and had expreſſed her partiality towards him in the following ſong, addreſſed to Miſs Duck, daughter of the famous Stephen Duck, in which ſhe quibbles on his name with great ingenuity and delicacy, and yet in a manner that expreſſes a ſincere affection. This ſpecimen of her poetry was handed about before their marriage, and printed in the "Gentleman's Magazine," and other miſcellaneous collections of the times.

According to Mr. Toulmin's information, his attachment to Miſs Hamilton, and the encouragement his addreſſes received, gave birth to this ſong, which was written by Dr. Francklin, the celebrated tranſlator of "Æſchylus" and "Lucian," perſonating Miſs Hamilton.

Would you think it, my Duck, (for the fault I muſt own),
Your Jenny at laſt is quite covetous grown;
Her millions, if fortune ſhould laviſhly pour,
I ſtill ſhould be wretched if I had not More.

As gay as I am, ſhould I ſpend half my days
In dances, and op'ras, ridottos, and plays,
Her fate your poor Jenny with tears would deplore,
For alas! my dear girl, what are thoſe without More.

'Tis the ſame thing with pleaſure, with money, with men,
And I think I ſhall never be happy again.
I've lovers, and danglers, and praters, good ſtore,
And yet, like true women, I ſtill ſigh for More.

Mama ſhe cries, Jenny, why all this ado,
You may have a huſband, you know child, or two;
But I pouted, and whimper'd, and fretted, and ſwore
That I would not have one unleſs I had More.

The giant, poor devil, has juſt now been here,
And has offer'd to ſettle eight hundred a-year;
But I anſwer'd the wretch as I once did before,
You know it won't do, Sir, for I muſt have More.

Though the fool I deſpiſe ſhould beſpatter my fame,
Yet I think I'm as wiſe as ſome folks I could name;
I but worſhip that idol which others adore,
For thoſe that have thouſands would gladly have More.

Now, in ſpite of this craving, I vow and proteſt
That avarice ne'er had a place in my breaſt;
For I ſwear I'd not envy the miſer his ſtore,
Had I but enough for myſelf and one More.

You will wonder, my girl, who this dear one can be,
Whoſe merit can boaſt ſuch a conqueſt as me;
But you ſhan't know his name, though I told you before
It begins with an M, but I dare not ſay More.

He had relied hitherto on his pen for ſupport; and had ſome hope, from the notice taken of him by Lyttleton, of receiving from his aſſiſtance ſome permanent ſupport. In this he was diſappointed. From Garrick's friendſhip, however, he obtained ſome advantages.

In 1751, his comedy of Gil Blas was acted at Drury-Lane; and, though violently oppoſed, was carried through nine nights. This is the leaſt meritorious of his dramas. The deſign is taken from the ſtory of Aurora in the novel of "Gil Blas;" but bears too near a reſemblance to the plot of the "Kind Impoſtor;" and he has deviated greatly from truth in the manners of his characters.

In 1753, his Gameſter, a tragedy, was acted at Drury-Lane, and met with but middling ſucceſs. As his Gil Blas had been forced upon the town ſeveral nights after the ſtrongeſt public diſapprobation of it had been expreſſed, it was thought by his friends that any piece acted under his name would be treated with vindictive ſeverity. Spence, therefore, permitted it for the firſt four nights to be imputed to him; but immediately afterwards threw aſide the maſk, as he ſuppoſed the ſucceſs of the play to be no longer doubtful; when ſome of the very perſons who had applauded it as his work, were among the foremoſt to condemn it as the performance of Moore.

This tragedy is written in proſe. Some part of it was originally compoſed in blank verſe, of which ſeveral veſtiges remain. It is his beſt dramatic performance; and ſtill keeps poſſeſſion of the ſtage, where it has lately received every poſſible recommendation, by the appearance of Mrs. Siddons in the character of Mrs. Beverley. The language is nervous, and yet pathetic; the plot is artful, yet well conducted, the characters are ſtrongly marked, yet not unnatural; and the cataſtrophe is truly tragic, yet not unjuſt. The diſtreſs was cenſured, on its firſt appearance, as too great to be borne, and the cataſtrophe as too horrible; for no other apparent reaſon, but becauſe it too nearly touched a favourite and faſhionable amuſement. It was ſhown in MS. to Young, who approved it greatly, with this remarkable expreſſion, that "gaming wanted ſuch a cauſtic as the concluding ſcene of the play preſented." In his preface, he ſays, "I ſhould humbly preſume that the working it up to any uncommon degree of horror is the merit of the play, and not its reproach. Nor ſhould ſo prevailing and deſtructive a vice as gaming, be attacked upon the theatre, without impreſſing upon the imagination all the horrors that attend it."

In each of theſe performances, Garrick exerted himſelf both as an actor and an author. In the latter, he "diſtinguiſhed himſelf," ſays his biographer, "by uncommon ſpirit in ſome ſcenes, and by great agonizing feelings in the laſt." Moore, in his preface, expreſſes his admiration of this inimitable performer: who, in the character of Beverley, exceeded every idea he had conceived of it in writing, and acknowledges himſelf indebted to him for many popular paſſages in the play. The ſcene, in particular, between Lewſon and Stukely, has been aſcribed wholly to Garrick.

In January 1753, he began a periodical paper, called The World, by Adam Fitz-Adam, which he carried on in weekly numbers, till February 1757. The deſign, as he explains it in the firſt number, "was to ridicule, with novelty and good humour, the faſhions, follies, vices, and abſurdities, of that part of the human ſpecies which we call the World, and to trace it through all its buſineſs, pleaſures, and amuſements." The wits of the age were invited to join in it, and gave it their aſſiſtance. The Hon. Horace Walpole, the preſent Earl of Orford, Richard Owen Cambridge, Eſq. the Earl of Corke, Sir David Dalrymple Lord Hailes, the Earl of Cheſterfield, Dr. Warton, Whitehead, Lovibond, Jenyns, and other writers of eminence, as he expreſſes it, "ornamented this publication with their bounty, and honoured it with eſſays." The demand for it greatly exceeded expectation; and, during its appearance, it was the only faſhionable vehicle in which men of rank and genius choſe to convey their ſentiments to the public.

The firſt paper that Lord Cheſterfield ſent, being without any notice from whence it came, underwent but a ſlight inſpection, and was very near being excluded on account of its length. This neglect would have ſtopped any further communications; but fortunately Lyttleton happening to call at Dodſley's, the paper was ſhown to him. He immediately knew the hand, and ſtill more the manner of writing. Moore, being informed of the diſcovery, read the paper more attentively, diſcerned its beauties, and thought proper not only to publiſh it directly, but to introduce it with an apology for the delay, and a compliment to the writer.

From this time, as Mr. Toulmin informs the preſent writer, on the authority of Dr. Farr of Taunton, Lord Cheſterfield carried his politeneſs and confidence in the publiſher's taſte and judgment ſo far, that when he ſent a paper to be inſerted, he gave him the liberty to publiſh it entirely, to alter any part of it, or to ſuppreſs it altogether.

On the ſame authority, it is alleged, that when Moore collected the papers for publication, he ſolicited leave to dedicate one of the volumes to Mr. Cambridge, who permitted it, upon condition that he himſelf ſhould write the dedication. The delicacy with which he executed the taſk, will be readily perceived by the intelligent reader acquainted with this fact.

It is much to be lamented, that either honour or emolument ſhould have been miſſed by Moore. All his exertions were, however, barely ſufficient to ward off the inconveniencies of poverty.

In 1755, he ſettled with his family at South Lambeth, and occupied the houſe which is now the property of Mr. Graham, where he had Cooke, the tranſlator of "Heſiod," for his neighbour, with whom he had been acquainted before the publication of his Fables.

They both met at a club held weekly at the Vine and Royal Oak inns; which was uſually compoſed, among others, of ſeveral literary characters; Dr. Howard, H. Hatſell, Sir Joſeph Mawbey, Bart. &c. They lived on friendly terms with each other, though their manners and habits were very diſſimilar.

"Cooke," ſays Sir Joſeph Mawbey, in the account of his life, "Gentleman's Magazine," 1792, began the world with little fortune, and he was early thrown upon thet own with ſtrong paſſions, which, it is ſuppoſed, he gratified very freely in the early part of his life. He was, when I knew him, regular and ſober, though convivial. No one enjoyed the pleatures of the table more than he, nor was more entertaining at it. Though he ſpoke with much freedom of men and things, and we did not think his ſtrictures of either well founded, he had ſuch a fund of general knowledge and anecdotes, without being in reality ill natured, that it was impoſſible for ſuch as knew him thoroughly to avoid being pleaſed.

"He was, however, not unfrequently dictatorial and aſſuming, which often diſguſted ſtrangers, and made him feared by many. Moore, H. Hatſell, Dr. Howard, and many other lively companions, were viſibly reſtrained by Cooke, who excelled them in learning, and whoſe ſpirits generally induced him to take the lead in company at times with infinite humour; at the ſame time, it muſt be allowed, few exceeded them in ſprightlineſs and witty converſation."

In 1756, he publiſhed his works in a quarto volume, by ſubſcription, with a dedication to the Duke of Newcaſtle; which contains a delicate compliment to his brother Mr. Pelham, who had honoured him with his patronage.

"Defects in this work," he ſays in the preface, "there are many, which I have wanted both time and abilities to mend as I could wiſh. Its merit (if it has any, and I may be allowed to name it), is its being natural and unaffected, and tending to promote virtue and good humour. I have ſent this my offspring into the world in as decent a dreſs as I was able; a legitimate one I am ſure it is; and if it ſhould be thought defective in ſtrength, ſpirit, or vigour, let it be conſidered, that its father's marriage with the Muſes, like moſt other marriages into that noble family, was more from neceſſity than inclination."

He continued The World until near the cloſe of his life. The laſt proof ſheet of the complete edition of that work was waiting for his correction, when he died at his houſe in South Lambeth, February 28. 1757, in the 45th year of his age. He was interred in the new burying-ground belonging to Lambeth pariſh, near the High-ſtreet, without a ſtone to mark the place of his duſt.

His death, it is ſaid, was owing to his apothecary's too cloſely and injudiciouſly adhering to the phyſician's preſcription. He had been viſited by a ſevere rheumatic fever, in which he had loſt the uſe of his limbs, ſo as not to be able to move a finger; but his recovery was faſt advancing, when the phyſician was called to a diſtance, and directing the uſe of the bark, left him, in confidence of his reſtoration, to a ſtate of convaleſcence. A cold and inflammation of the lungs coming on, and the uſe of the bark being continued, a fever enſued, which ſoon terminated fatally.

He left behind him an only ſon, of his own Chriſtian name. Lord Cheſterfield, with a kindneſs and generoſity which will reflect everlaſting honour on his name, took upon himſelf the care and expence of his education, till he was ſixteen years of age, when he gave him a fortune of 500 l. He had firſt a place in the Salt Office; but inclining to the ſea ſervice, he afterwards went on board a man of war as a midſhipman, and died at ſea in 1773.

Mrs. Moore, after his death, obtained the place of neceſſary woman to the queen's private apartments, and ſtill ſurvives; cheriſhing an indelible and mournful remembrance of the virtues of a moſt affectionate conſort, and much reſpected by a numerous and genteel acquaintance.

The World, which he juſt lived to complete, was publiſhed in 6 vols. 12mo, 1757. The ſubſequent editions, in 4 vols. are too numerous to be ſpecified. His Fables have been frequently reprinted, and with his other poems have been received into the collection of the "Works of the Engliſh poets," 1790. In the preſent edition, the Temple of Hymen is inſerted among the Fables contributed by Brooke, omitted in the former editions.

Of Brooke, this brief memorial may ſuffice. He was born in 1706. His father, the Rev. William Brooke of Rantavan, was rector of the pariſhes of Killinkare, Mullough, Mybullough, and Licowie, in the county of Cavan in Ireland. His mother was a Digby. He was educated at Dr. Sheridan's ſchool, and from thence removed to the Temple, in his ſixteenth year. The engaging ſweetneſs of his temper, and peculiar vivacity of his genius, caught the notice and eſteem of the reigning wits. Swift prophecied wonders of him. Pope affectionately loved him. Thus flattered and encouraged, he returned to Ireland, and married privately his couſin, Miſs Means, who had her firſt child before ſhe was fourteen. He went a ſecond time to London; but poetry was as fatal there as love had been in Ireland. The ſtudy of the law appeared drier than ever. He renewed his intimacy with Pope, and wrote his poem of "Univerſal Beauty" under his eye and criticiſm. Soon, however, he was obliged to return; family affairs demanded his preſence. He practiſed for ſome time as chamber counſel. In 1737, he went a third time to England, where Pope received him with open arms. Lyttleton ſoon diſtinguiſhed and cheriſhed a mind and genius ſimilar to his own. Pitt was particularly fond of him, and introduced him to the Prince of Wales, who careſſed him with uncommon liberality, and preſented him with many elegant and valuable tokens of his friendſhip. Here, fluſhed with ambition, glowing with emulation, and elevated with praiſe, he produced his tragedy of "Guſtavus Vaſa." Government took offence at the ſpirit of liberty which it breathed, and cloſed the theatres againſt it, but could not prevent its publication. Encouraged by his ſucceſs, he took a houſe at Twickenham, and ſent for Mrs. Brooke, who was propoſed by the Prince to be nurſe to his preſent Majeſty. While every proſpect ſmiled, he was ſeized with a violent and unconquerable ague, and ordered to return to his native air. He ſpent the remainder of his life in Ireland. While barrack maſter under Lord Cheſterfield, while writer of the "Farmers Letters," &c. he paſſed, no doubt, through many buſy and intereſting ſcenes, but the particulars are not ſufficiently known to be related with certainty. He left the country, and rented a houſe and farm in Kildare, where he reſided for a few years. He afterwards took and improved a farm in the vicinity of the family eſtate. Shortly after his wife died, and with her all his happineſs, and the beſt part of his exiſtence. At length he withdrew to his paternal ſeat, where he devoted himſelf wholly to the Muſes. He wrote ſeveral tragedies, and formed golden dreams of their ſucceſs upon the Engliſh ſtage, from his intereſt with Garrick, but was diſappointed. He tried the Iriſh ſtage, and was tolerably ſucceſsful, but not equal to his hopes and his occaſions. He was compelled to mortgage, and at laſt to ſell, his paternal eſtate. From this time he ſecluded himſelf entirely from the world. The powers of his mind decayed, and his genius flaſhed but by fits. This is perceivable in the latter volumes of the "Fool of Quality," and his ſubſequent novel of "Juliet Grenville," which were the laſt of his writings. He died October 10. 1783, in the 77th year of his age.

He died as he lived, a Chriſtian. With the meekneſs of a lamb, and the fortitude of a hero, he ſupported the tedious infirmities of age, the languors of ſickneſs, and the pains of diſſolution; and his death, like his life, was inſtructive.

Of nineteen children, two only ſurvived him; a ſon in the army, ſince dead; and a daughter, who inherited his genius. She publiſhed a quarto volume of poems in 1792, and died in 1793.

His "Poetical Works," including fifteen plays, were collected into 4 vols. 8vo, 1778. His Univerſal Beauty, a philoſophical poem in ſix books," "Two Books of Taſſo's Jeruſalem Delivered," Conſtantia, or the Man of Law's Tale," modernized from Chaucer, "Redemption, a poem, "Conrade, a fragment," "The Fox Chaſe, a poem," &c., were recommended by the compiler of this collection, to be inſerted with his Fables, in the "Works of the Britiſh Poets;" but have been excluded, in conſequence of ſome arrangement relative to the extent of the collection.

The character of Moore, who ſeems deſtined as a Fabuliſt, to be inſeparably connected with Brooke, was truly amiable and reſpectable. He had a peculiar ſweetneſs of temper, and was a moſt entertaining and pleaſing companion. The ſimplicity of his manners much endeared him to all his acquaintances, and makes them always ſpeak of him with particular fondneſs and attachment. From the names of his coadjutors in the World, and of the perſons to whom his ſeveral pieces are addreſſed, it appears that he was honoured with the friendſhip of almoſt all his contemporaries, who were themſelves remarkable for talents and for learning; and, it is but juſtice to obſerve, that the papers written by him, will ſuffer no injury by a compariſon with thoſe of his coadjutors.

The following letter, furniſhed by Mr. Toulmin, is a ſpecimen of the vivacity and wit, mingled with a ſtrong portion of the moral ſenſe, which was on all occaſions natural to Moore. It is addreſſed to the Rev. John Ward, a diſſenting miniſter at Taunton, who, venerable as he is himſelf for learning, worth, piety, and years, deems it an honour to have his name, connected with that of Moore. It was occaſioned by his being prevented by Fielding's illneſs, from appointing an evening on which he might invite Mr. Ward to meet at his lodgings, ſome of the firſt wits of the day.

" It is not owing to forgetfulneſs that you have not heard from me before. Fielding continues to be viſited for his ſins, ſo as to be wheeled about from room to room: When he mends, I am ſure to ſee him at my lodgings; and you may depend upon timely notice. What fine things are wit and beauty, if a man could be temperate with one, or a woman chaſte with the other! But he that will confine his acquaintance to the ſober and the modeſt, will generally find himſelf among the dull and the ugly. If this remark of mine ſhould be thought to ſhoulder itſelf in without an introduction, you will be pleaſed to note, that Fielding is a wit; that his diſorder is the gout, and intemperance the cauſe."

" Moore," ſays Sir Joſeph Mawbey, who knew him well, " was couſin german to Fuller the banker (partner with Honeywood). He told me he had been in Ireland, on ſome ſcheme of buſineſs, I believe in the linen trade. He was a well-bred amiable man, and a cheerful witty and entertaining companion. Cooke and Moore had often propoſed to themſelves, and to me, conſiderable pleaſure, in attending me at the next aſſizes of Surrey, of which it was known I was to be Sheriff in February 1757. Before ſuch aſſize meeting in March, I had, alas! to regret the death of both my neighbours and friends, Cooke being buried on the 1ſt of January in that year, and Moore on the 5th of March following."

As a poet, his compoſitions are characterized by a refined elegance of ſentiment, and a correſpondent happineſs of expreſſion. He writes with neatneſs and terſeneſs, but without much elevation or ſpirit. Though not a firſt-rate dramatiſt, his pleaſing tragedy of the Gameſter entitles him to rank above the middling claſs. The plots of his pieces are intereſting, his characters well drawn, his ſentiments delicate, and his language pleaſing; but his greateſt recommendation is the purity that runs through all his writings, and the apparent tendency of every piece towards the promotion of morality and virtue.

His Fables, the moſt popular of all his works, are equal to the beſt compoſitions of that kind in our language. In the freedom and caſe of the verſification, and in the forcibleneſs of the moral, and the poignancy of the ſatire, they approach nearer to the manner of Gay than any of the numerous imitations of that popular fabuliſt. In poetical ſpirit, beautiful imagery, and harmony of numbers, they poſſeſs an unqueſtionable ſuperiority. They have not only great merit of the moral kind, but they delight us as a juſt picture of human life.

The Four Fables of Brooke may vie with almoſt every production of the kind, for poetical colouring, facility of verſification, and ſtrength of ſentiment. They have all the flowing eaſe, clearneſs of expreſſion, and poignancy of ſatire, that are to be found in Gay, and Moore; with more warmth of poetry and glow of ſentiment. But, with all their merit, they are perhaps too extenſive for that kind of writing. Fable ſhould be ſhort, ſtrong in the application, quick in the effect, and poignant in the moral. The Temple of Hymen, is properly an allegorical tale: It is flowing, clear, and poetical; and ends with a well turned compliment to Lord Charlemont. The Sparrow and the Dove breathes throughout the true ſpirit of poetry; but perſpicuity is ſometimes loſt in the flight of the Muſe. Perhaps the connection and conduct of the fable would not be injured by the omiſſion of about 150 lines, beginning—Freedom reſtrain'd by reaſon's force, and ending—While ſwelling with the darling theme. The abſtruſe reaſoning and philoſophy, which might figure well in another place, are very improper in the character of the Dove. The Female Seducers is a ſuperlative performance; perſpicuity, without which genius wants its beſt ſupport, is ſometimes wanting: but all the pictures and deſcriptions are very highly coloured, and the verſification is exquiſitely poliſhed and harmonious. Love and Vanity has great ſtrength and vigour of poetry, and ſome of thoſe peculiarities which run through the great variety of his performances.

The " verſes written in a copy of Moore's fables," by Garrick, are not only a handſome compliment to the fair poſſeſſor of it, but truly deſcriptive of the nature and merit of the work, and indirectly a fine encomium on it.

While here the poet paints the charms
Which bleſs the perfect dame,
How unaffected beauty warms,
And art preſerves the flame.

How prudence, virtue, ſenſe, agree,
To form the happy wife;
In Lucy, and her book, I ſee
The picture and the life.

Sir Joſeph Mawbey has tranſcribed, from Cooke's Common-place-book, his " remarks on Moore's Fables;" which the worthy baronet believes " will be allowed to be very juſt by every lover of poetry."

" June 1743. I read ſixteen fables in manuſcript, wrote by Mr. Edward Moore. The ninth, The Farmer, the Spaniel, and the Cat, is a very pretty fable; and there are great elegancies in the introduction. The ſixteenth, and laſt fable, called The Female Seducers, is a charming, elegant poem. Theſe two fables are far ſuperior to the reſt, and are unexceptionably good. The diction is ſuch as the province of poetry requires; and there are many delicacies in ſentiment and expreſſion; and the imagery is ſtrong and delightful. The other fables have their merit; but have many imperfections which, I doubt not, the author will remove before they are printed. The verſification, through all, is ſweet, with very few exceptions. His images are, ſome of them, lovely, and lovelily clothed. The following four verſes are from the ninth fable, addreſſed to a lady.

Sweet are the flow'rs, that deck the field;
Sweet are the flowers the bloſſoms yield;
Sweet is the ſummer gale that blows;
And ſweet, though ſweeter you, the roſe."

" Here is true ſimplicity and ſweetneſs. Speaking in the laſt fable of the diſſolution of things, he has ſome of the beautifulleſt images I deſire to ſee in poetry; as theſe lines.

Gone like traces on the deep,
Like a ſceptre graſp'd in ſleep;
Dews exhal'd from ſunny glades,
Melting ſnows and gliding ſhades.

Sir Joſeph Mawbey juſtly obſerves, that Cooke " might have given many other extracts from them, equally beautiful." He appears to have been unacquainted with the real author of The Female Seducers.

Of his miſcellaneous pieces, the moſt conſiderable is, The Trial of Selim, which contains much fine irony, expreſſed in elegant verſification. His Odes are pleaſing and poetical; but have not the fire and enthuſiaſm, which belong to the higher kinds of lyric poetry. His Songs may be juſtly ranked among the beſt compoſitions of the kind in our language. They are ſimple, elegant, and ſprightly in the higheſt degree.

" His poetical works," ſays Sir Joſeph Mawbey, " have eſtabliſhed his name for genius, though they did not procure him much fortune, nor patrons to place him in a ſtate of independency. There is an eaſy elegance in his compoſitions, which renders them as pleaſing as any in the Engliſh language."

THE WORKS OF MOORE.

To His Grace

THOMAS HOLLES, DUKE OF NEWCASTLE.

My Lord,

Had I the honour of being perſonally known to your Grace, I had not thus preſumptuouſly addreſſed you, without previous ſolicitation for ſo great an indulgence. But that your Grace may neither be ſurpriſed nor offended at the liberty I am taking, my plea is, that the great and good man, whoſe name is prefixed to the firſt of theſe poems, was a friend and benefactor to me. The favours I have received at his hands, and the kind aſſurances he was pleaſed to give to me of their continuance, which his death only prevented, have left me to lament my own private loſs amidſt the general concern. It is from theſe favours and aſſurances that I flatter myſelf with having a kind of privilege to addreſs your Grace upon this occaſion, and to entreat your patronage of the following ſheets. I pretended to no merit with Mr. Pelham, except that of honouring his virtues, and wiſhing to have been ſerviceable to them: I pretend to no other with your Grace. My hopes are, that while you are fulfilling every generous intention of the brother whom you loved, your Grace will not think me unworthy of ſome ſmall ſhare of that notice, with which he was once pleaſed to honour me.

I will not detain your Grace to echo back the voice of a whole people in favour of your juſt and prudent adminiſtration of public affairs. That the ſalutary meaſures you are purſuing may be as productive of tranquillity and honour to your Grace, as they are of happineſs to theſe kingdoms, is the ſincere wiſh of,

My Lord,
Your Grace's
moſt humble,
moſt obedient,
and moſt devoted Servant,

Tully's Head, Pall-Mall,
Feb. 26. 1756.

Edward Moore.

PREFACE.

Moſt of the following poems have already made their appearance in detached pieces; but as many of them were printed without a name, I was adviſed by ſome particular friends to collect them into a volume, and publiſh them by ſubſcription. The painful taſk of ſoliciting ſuch a ſubſcription was chiefly undertaken by thoſe friends, and with ſuch ſpirit and zeal, that I ſhould be greatly wanting in gratitude, if I neglected any opportunity, either public or private, of making them my moſt ſincere acknowledgments. I am alſo obliged to a very valuable friend in Ireland for a conſiderable number of ſubſcribers in that kingdom, a liſt of whoſe names I have not been favoured with, and for which I was deſired not to delay publication. I mention this ſeeming neglect, that my friends on that ſide the water may not accuſe me of any diſreſpect.

Such as the work now is, I ſubmit it to the public. Defects in it there are many, which I have wanted both time and abilities to amend as I could wiſh. Its merit (if it has any, and I may be allowed to name it) is its being natural and unaffected, and tending to promote virtue and good-humour. Thoſe parts of it that have been publiſhed ſingly, had the good fortune to pleaſe; thoſe that are now added will, I hope, be no diſcredit to them. Upon the whole, I have ſent this my offſpring into the world in as decent a dreſs as I was able: a legitimate one I am ſure it is; and if it ſhould be thought defective in ſtrength, ſpirit, or vigour, let it be conſidered that its father's marriage with the Muſes, like moſt other marriages into that noble family, was more from neceſſity than inclination.

POEMS.

THE DISCOVERY:

AN ODE

To the Right Honourable

HENRY PELHAM.

——— Vir bonus eſt quis? HOR.

TAKE wing, my muſe! from ſhore to ſhore
Fly, and that happy place explore
Where virtue deigns to dwell;
If yet ſhe treads on Britiſh ground,
Where can the fugitive be found,
In city, court, or cell?

Not there, where wine and frantic mirth
Unite the ſenſual ſons of earth
In pleaſure's thoughtleſs train;
Nor yet where ſanctity's a ſhow,
Where ſouls nor joy nor pity know
For human bliſs or pain.

Her ſocial heart alike diſowns
The race, who ſhunning crowds and thrones,
In ſhades ſequeſter'd doze;
Whoſe ſloth no generous care can wake,
Who rot like weeds on Lethe's lake,
In ſenſeleſs, vile repoſe.

With theſe ſhe ſhuns the factious tribe,
Who ſpurn the yet unoffer'd bribe,
And at corruption lour;
Waiting till diſcord havoc cries,
In hopes, like Cataline, to riſe
On anarchy to pow'r!

Ye wits, who boaſt from ancient times,
A right divine to ſcourge our crimes,
Is it with you ſhe reſts?
No. Int'reſt, ſlander are your views,
And virtue now, with every muſe,
Flies your unhallow'd breaſts.

There was a time, I heard her ſay,
Ere females were ſedut'd by play,
When beauty was her throne;
But now, where dwelt the ſoft deſires,
The furies light forbidden fires,
To love and her unknown.

From theſe th' indignant goddeſs flies,
And where the ſpires of ſcience riſe,
A while ſuſpends her wing;
But pedant pride and rage are there,
And faction tainting all the air,
And pois'ning every ſpring.

Long through the ſky's wide pathleſs way
The muſe obſerv'd the wand'rer ſtray,
And mark'd her laſt retreat;
O'er Surrey's barren heaths ſhe flew,
Deſcending like the ſilent dew
On Eſher's peaceful ſeat.

There ſhe beholds the gentle Mole
His penſive waters calmly roll,
Amidſt Elyſian ground:
There through the windings of the grove
She leads her family of love,
And ſtrews her ſweets around.

I hear her bid the daughters fair
Oft to yon gloomy grott repair,
Her ſecret ſteps to meet;
Nor thou, ſhe cries, theſe ſhades forſake,
But come, lov'd conſort, come and make
The huſband's bliſs complete.

Yet not too much the ſoothing eaſe
Of rural indolence ſhall pleaſe
My Pelham's ardent breaſt;
The man whom virtue calls her own
Muſt ſtand the pillar of a throne,
And make a nation bleſt.

Pelham! 'tis thine with temp'rate zeal
To guard Britannia's public weal,
Attack'd on every part:
Her fatal diſcords to compoſe,
Unite her friends, diſarm her foes,
Demands thy head and heart.

When bold rebellion ſhook the land,
Ere yet from William's dauntleſs hand
Her barbarous army fled;
When valour droop'd, and wiſdom fear'd,
Thy voice-expiring credit heard,
And rais'd her languid head.

Now by thy ſtrong aſſiſting hand,
Fix'd on a rock I ſee her ſtand,
Againſt whoſe ſolid feet,
In vain, through every future age,
The loudeſt, moſt tempeſtuous rage
Of angry war ſhall beat.

And grieve not if the ſons of ſtrife
Attempt to cloud thy ſpotleſs life,
And ſhade its brighteſt ſcenes;
Wretches, by kindneſs unſubdu'd,
Who ſee, who ſhare the common good,
Yet cavil at the means.

Like theſe, the metaphyſic crew,
Proud to be ſingular and new,
Think all they ſee deceit;
Are warm'd and cheriſh'd by the day,
Feel and enjoy the heav'nly ray,
Yet doubt of light and heat.

THE TRIAL
SELIM THE PERSIAN *,
FOR DIVERS HIGH CRIMES AND MISDEAMEANORS.

The court was met; the pris'ner brought;
The counſel with inſtructions fraught;
And evidence prepar'd at large,
On oath, to vindicate the charge.
But firſt 'tis meet, where form denies
Poetic helps of fancy'd lies,
Gay metaphors, and figures fine,
And ſimiles to deck the line;
'Tis meet (as we before have ſaid)
To call deſcription to our aid.
Begin we then (as firſt 'tis fitting)
With the three chiefs in judgment ſitting.
Above the reſt, and in the chair,
Sat Faction with diſſembled air;
Her tongue was ſkill'd in ſpecious lies,
And murmurs, whence diſſentions riſe;
A ſmiling maſk her features veil'd,
Her form the patriot's robe conceal'd;
With ſtudy'd blandiſhments ſhe bow'd,
And drew the captivated crowd.
The next in place, and on the right,
Sat Envy, hideous to the ſight;
Her ſnaky locks, her hollow eyes,
And haggard form forbade diſguiſe;
Pale diſcontent and ſullen hate
Upon her wrinkled forehead ſat;
Her left hand, clench'd, her cheek ſuſtain'd,
Her right (with many a murder ſtain'd)
A dagger clutch'd, in act to ſtrike,
With ſtarts of rage, and aim oblique.
Laſt on the left was Clamour ſeen,
Of ſtature vaſt, and horrid mien;
With blotted cheeks, and frantic eyes,
She ſent her yellings to the ſkies;
Prepar'd with trumpet in her hand,
To blow ſedition o'er the land
With theſe, four more of leſſer fame,
And humbler rank, attendant came;
Hypocriſy with ſmiling grace,
And Impudence with brazen face,
Contention bold, with iron lungs,
And Slander with her hundred tongues.
The walls in ſculptur'd tale were rich,
And ſtatues proud (in many a nich)
Of chiefs, who fought in faction's cauſe,
And periſh'd for contempt of laws.
The roof in vary'd light and ſhade,
The ſeat of anarchy diſplay'd.
Triumphant o'er a falling throne
(By emblematic figures known)
Confuſion rag'd, and luſt obſcene,
And riot with diſtemper'd mien,
And outrage bold, and miſchief dire,
And devaſtation clad in fire.
Prone on the ground a martial maid
Expiring lay, and groan'd for aid;
Her ſhield with many a ſtab was pierc'd,
Her laurels torn, her ſpear revers'd;
And near her, crouch'd amidſt the ſpoils,
A lion panted in the toils.
With look compos'd the pris'ner ſtood,
And modeſt pride. By turns he view'd
The court, the counſel, and the crowd,
And with ſubmiſſive rev'rence bow'd.
Proceed we now, in humbler ſtrains,
And lighter rhymes, with what remains.
Th' indictment grievouſly ſet forth,
That Selim, loſt to patriot worth,
(In company with one Will Pitt *,
And many more, not taken yet)
In forty-five, the royal palace †
Did enter, and to ſhame grown callous,
Did then and there his faith forſake,
And did accept, receive, and take,
With miſchievous intent and baſe,
Value unknown a certain place.
He was a ſecond time indicted,
For that, by evil zeal excited,
With learning more than layman's ſhare,
(Which parſons want, and he might ſpare)
In letter to one Gilbert Weſt ‡,
He, the ſaid Selim, did atteſt,
Maintain, ſupport, and make aſſertion
Of certain points, from Paul's converſion,
By means whereof the ſaid apoſtle
Did many an unbeliever joſtle,
Starting unfaſhionable fancies,
And building truths on known romances.
A third charge ran, that knowing well
Wits only eat as pamphlets ſell,
He, the ſaid Selim, notwithſtanding,
Did fall to anſw'ring, ſhaming, branding
Three curious letters to the Whigs §;
Making no reader care three figs
For any facts contain'd therein;
By which uncharitable ſin

An author, modeſt and deſerving,
Was deſtin'd to contempt and ſtarving;
Againſt the king, his crown and peace,
And all the ſtatutes in that caſe.
The pleader roſe with brief full charg'd,
And on the pris'ner's crimes enlarg'd—
But not to damp the muſe's fire
With rhet'ric, ſuch as courts require,
We'll try to keep the reader warm,
And ſift the matter from the form.
Virtue and ſocial love, he ſaid,
And honour from the land were fled;
That patriots now, like other folks,
Were made the butt of vulgar jokes;
While Oppoſition dropp'd her creſt,
And courted pow'r for wealth and reſt.
Why ſome folks laugh'd, and ſome folks rail'd,
Why ſome ſubmitted, ſome aſſail'd,
Angry or pleas'd—all ſolv'd the doubt
With who were in, and who were out.
The ſons of Clamour grew ſo ſickly,
They look'd for diſſolution quickly;
Their weekly journals, finely written,
Were ſunk in privies all beſh——n;
Old-England *, and the London-Evening,
Hardly a ſoul was found believing in;
And Caleb †, once ſo bold and ſtrong,
Was ſtupid now, and always wrong.
Aſk ye whence roſe this foul diſgrace?
Why Selim has receiv'd a place,
And thereby brought the cauſe to ſhame;
Proving that people, void of blame,
Might ſerve their country and their king,
By making both the ſelf-ſame thing:
By which the credulous believ'd,
And others (by ſtrange arts deceiv'd)
That miniſters were ſometimes right,
And meant not to deſtroy us quite.
That bart'ring thus in ſtate affairs,
He next muſt deal in ſacred wares,
The clergy's rights divine invade,
And ſmuggle in the goſpel-trade:
And all this zeal to reinſtate
Exploded notions, out of date;
Sending old rakes to church in ſhoals,
Like children, ſniv'ling for their ſouls;
And ladies gay, from ſmut and libels,
To learn beliefs, and read their Bibles;
Erecting conſcience for a tutor,
To daran the preſent by the future:
As if to evils known and real
'Twas needful to annex ideal;
When all of human life we know
Is care, and bitterneſs, and woe,
With ſhort tranſitions of delight,
To ſet the ſhatter'd ſpirits right.
Then why ſuch mighty pains and care,
To make us humbler than we are?
Forbidding ſhort-liv'd mirth and laughter,
By fears of what may come hereafter?

Better in ignorance to dwell;
None fear, but who believe a hell;
And if there ſhould be one, no doubt,
Men of themſelves would find it out.
But Selim's crimes, he ſaid, went further,
And barely ſtopp'd on this ſide murder;
One yet remain'd to cloſe the charge,
To which (with leave) he'd ſpeak at large.
And, firſt, 'twas needful to premiſe,
That though ſo long (for reaſons wiſe)
The preſs inviolate had ſtood,
Productive of the public good;
Yet ſtill, too modeſt to abuſe,
It rail'd at vice, but told not whoſe.
That great improvements, of late days,
Were made, to many an author's praiſe,
Who, not ſo ſcrupulouſly nice,
Proclaim'd the perſon with the vice;
Or gave, where vices might be wanted,
The name, and took the reſt for granted.
Upon this plan, a champion * roſe,
Unrighteous greatneſs to oppoſe,
Proving the man "inventus non eſt,"
Who trades in pow'r, and ſtill is honeſt;
And (God be prais'd) he did it roundly,
Flogging a certain junto ſoundly.
But chief his anger was directed,
Where people leaſt of all ſuſpected;
And Selim, not ſo ſtrong as tall,
Beneath his graſp appear'd to fall.
But Innocence (as people ſay)
Stood by, and ſav'd him in the fray,
By her aſſiſted, and one Truth,
A buſy, prating, forward youth,
He rally'd all his ſtrength anew,
And at the foe a letter threw †:
His weakeſt part the weapon found,
And brought him ſenſeleſs to the ground.
Hence Oppoſition fled the field,
And ignorance with her ſeven-fold ſhield;
And well they might, for (things weigh'd fully)
The pris'ner with his whore and bully,
Muſt prove for every foe too hard,
Who never fought with ſuch a guard.
But Truth and Innocence, he ſaid,
Would ſtand him here in little ſtead;
For they had evidence on oath,
That would appear too hard for both.
Of witneſſes a fearful train
Came next, th' indictments to ſuſtain;
Detraction, Hatred, and Diſtruſt,
And party, of all foes the worſt,
Malice, Revenge, and Unbelief,
And Diſappointment worn with grief,
Diſhonour foul, unaw'd by ſhame,
And every fiend that vice can name.
All theſe in ample form depoſ'd,
Each fact the triple charge diſclos'd,
With taunts and gibes of bitter ſort,
And aſking vengeance from the court.

The pris'ner ſaid in his defence,
That he indeed had ſmall pretence
To ſoften facts ſo deeply ſworn,
But would for his offences mourn;
Yet more he hop'd than bare repentance
Might ſtill be urg'd to ward the ſentence.
That he had held a place ſome years,
He own'd with penitence and tears,
But took it not from motives baſe,
Th' indictment there miſtook the caſe;
And though he had betray'd his truſt
In being to his country juſt,
Neglecting Faction and her friends,
He did it not for wicked ends,
But that complaints and feuds might ceaſe,
And jarring parties mix in peace.
That what he wrote to Gilbert Weſt,
Bore hard againſt him, he confeſs'd;
Yet there they wrong'd him; for the fact is,
He reaſon'd for belief, not practice;
And people might believe, he thought,
Though practice might be deem'd a fault.
He either dreamt it, or was told,
Religion was rever'd of old,
That it gave breeding no offence,
And was no foe to wit and ſenſe;
But whether this was truth, or whim,
He would not ſay; the doubt with him
(And no great harm he hop'd) was, how
Th' enlighten'd world would take it now:
If they admitted it, 'twas well;
If not, he never talk'd of hell;
Nor even hop'd to change men's meaſures,
Or frighten ladies from their pleaſures.
One accuſation, he confeſs'd,
Had touch'd him more than all the reſt;
Three patriot-letters, high in fame,
By him o'erthrown, and brought to ſhame.
And though it was a rule in vogue,
If one man call'd another rogue,
The party injur'd might reply,
And on his foe retort the lie;
Yet what accru'd from all his labour,
But foul diſhonour to his neighbour?
And he's a moſt unchriſtian elf,
Who others damns to ſave himſelf.
Beſides, as all men knew, he ſaid,
Thoſe letters only rail'd for bread;
And hunger was a known excuſe
For proſtitution and abuſe:
A guinea, properly apply'd,
Had made the writer change his ſide;
He wiſh'd he had not cut and carv'd him,
And own'd, he ſhould have bought, not ſtarv'd him.
The court, he ſaid, knew all the reſt,
And muſt proceed as they thought beſt;
Only he hop'd ſuch reſignation
Would plead ſome little mitigation;
And if his character was clear
From other faults (and friends were near,
Who would, when call'd upon, atteſt it)
He did in humbleſt form requeſt it,
To be from puniſhment exempt,
And only ſuffer their contempt.

The pris'ner's friends their claim preferr'd,
In turn demanding to be heard.
Integrity and Honour ſwore,
Benevolence, and twenty more,
That he was always of their party,
And that they knew him firm and hearty.
Religion, ſober dame, attended,
And, as ſhe could, his cauſe befriended.
She ſaid, 'twas ſince he came from college,
She knew him introduc'd by knowledge:
The man was modeſt and ſincere,
Nor farther could ſhe interfere.
The Muſes begg'd to interpoſe;
But Envy with loud hiſſings roſe,
And call'd them women of ill fame,
Liars, and proſtitutes to ſhame;
And ſaid, to all the world 'twas known,
Selim had had them every one.
The pris'ner bluſh'd, the Muſes frown'd,
When ſilence was proclaim'd around,
And Faction, riſing with the reſt,
In form the pris'ner thus addreſs'd.
You, Selim, thrice have been indicted:
Firſt, that by wicked pride excited,
And bent your country to diſgrace,
You have receiv'd, and held a place:
Next, infidelity to wound,
You've dar'd, with arguments profound,
To drive freethinking to a ſtand,
And with religion vex the land:
And laſtly, in contempt of right,
With horrid and unnat'ral ſpite,
You have an author's fame o'erthrown,
Thereby to build and fence your own.
Theſe crimes ſucceſſive, on your trial,
Have met with proofs beyond denial;
To which yourſelf, with ſhame, conceded,
And but in mitigation pleaded.
Yet that the juſtice of the court
May ſuffer not in men's report,
Judgment a moment I ſuſpend,
To reaſon as from friend to friend.
And firſt, that you, of all mankind,
With kings and courts ſhould ſtain your mind!
You! who were Oppoſition's lord!
Her nerves, her ſinews, and her ſword!
That you at laſt, for ſervile ends,
Should wound the bowels of her friends!
Is aggravation of offence,
That leaves for mercy no pretence.
Yet more——For you to urge your hate,
And back the church, to aid the ſtate!
For you to publiſh ſuch a letter!
You! who have known religion better!
For you, I ſay, to introduce
The fraud again!—there's no excuſe.
And laſt of all, to crown your ſhame,
Was it for you to load with blame
The writings of a patriot-youth,
And ſummon Innocence and Truth
To prop your cauſe?——Was this for you?——
But juſtice does your crimes purſue;
And ſentence now alone remains,
Which thus, by me, the court ordains:

" That you return from whence you came,
" There to be ſtript of all your fame
" By vulgar hands; that once a week
" Old-England pinch you till you ſqueak;
" That ribbald pamphlets do purſue you,
" And lies and murmurs, to undo you.
" With every ſoe that worth procures,
" And only virtue's friends be yours."

ODE TO GARRICK,

UPON THE TALK OF THE TOWN.

" When I ſaid I would die a batchelor, I did not
" think I ſhould live till I were married."
Much Ado about Nothing.

No, no; the left-hand box, in blue;
There! don't you ſee her?—" See her! Who?"
Nay, hang me if I tell.
There's Garrick in the muſic box!
Watch but his eyes; ſee there——" O pox!"
" Your ſervant, Ma'moiſelle!"

But tell me, David, is it true?
Lord help us! what will ſome folks do?
How will they curſe this ſtranger!
What! fairly taken in for life!
A ſober, ſerious, wedded wife!
O fie upon you, Ranger!

The clergy too have join'd the chat;
" A papiſt!—Has he thought of that?
" Or means he to convert her?"
Troth, boy, unleſs your zeal be ſtout,
The nymph may turn your faith about,
By arguments experter.

The ladies, pale and out of breath,
Wild as the witches in Macbeth,
Aſk if the " deed be done!"
O, David! liſten to my lay!
I'll propheſy the things, they'll ſay,
For tongues you know, will run.

" And pray, what other news d'ye hear?
" Marry'd!—But don't you think my dear,
" He's growing out of faſhion?
" People may fancy what they will,
" But Quin's the only actor ſtill,
" To touch the tender paſſion.

" Nay, madam, did you mind, laſt night,
" His Archer? Not a line on't right!
" I thought I heard ſome hiſſes.
" Good God! if Billy Mills, thought I,
" Or Billy Havard would but try,
" They'd beat him all to pieces.

" 'Twas prudent though to drop his Bayes—
" And (entre nous) the Laureat ſays,
" He hopes he'll give up Richard.
" But then it tickles me to ſee,
" In Haſtings, ſuch a ſhrimp as he
" Attempt to raviſh Pritchard.

" The fellow pleas'd me well enough
" In —— what d'ye call it? Hoadley's ſtuff;
" There's ſomething there like nature:
" Juſt ſo, in life, he runs about,
" Plays at bo-peep, now in, now out,
" But hurts no mortal creature.

" And then there's Belmont, to be ſure——
" O ho! my gentle Neddy Moore!
" How does my good Lord Mayor?
" And have you left Cheapſide, my dear!
" And will you write again next year,
" To ſhow your fav'rite player?

" But Merope, we own, is fine,
" Eumenes charms in every line;
" How prettily he vapours!
" So gay his dreſs, ſo young his look,
" One would have ſworn 'twas Mr. Cook,
" Or Mathews, cutting capers."

Thus, David, will the ladies ſtout,
And councils hold at every rout,
To alter all your plays;
Yates ſhall be Benedick next year,
Macklin the Richard, Taſwell Lear,
And Kitty Clive be Bayes.

Two parts they readily allow
Are yours; but not one more, they vow;
And thus they cloſe their ſpite:
You will be Sir John Brute, they ſay,
A very Sir John Brute all day,
And Fribble all the night.

But tell me, fair ones, is it ſo?
" You all did love him once *," we know;
What then provokes your gall?
Forbear to rail—I'll tell you why;
Quarrels may come, or madam die,
And then there's hope for all.

And now a word or two remains,
Sweet Davy, and I cloſe my ſtrains:
Think well ere you engage;
Vapours and ague-fits may come,
And matrimonial claims at home,
Unnerve you for the ſtage.

But if you find your ſpirits right,
Your mind at eaſe, your body tight,
Take her; you can't do better.
A pox upon the tattling town!
The fops that join to cry her down
Would give their ears to get her.

Then if her heart be good and kind,
(And ſure that face beſpeaks a mind
As ſoft as woman's can be)
You'll grow as conſtant as a dove,
And taſte the purer ſweets of love,
Unviſited by Ranby.

ENVY AND FORTUNE:

A TALE.

TO MRS. GARRICK.

Says Envy to Fortune, " Soft, ſoft, Madam Flirt!
" Not ſo faſt with your wheel, you'll be down in " the dirt!
" Well, and how does your David? Indeed, my
" dear creature,
" You've ſhown him a wonderful deal of good-
" His bags are ſo full, and ſuch praiſes his due,
" That the like was ne'er known—and all owing
" to you:

* Julius Cæſar.

" But why won't you make him quite happy for
" life, [wife?"
" And to all you have done add the gift of a Says Fortune, and ſmil'd, " Madam Envy, God ſave ye!
" But why always ſneering at me and poor Davy?
" I own that ſometimes, in contempt of all rules,
" I laviſh my favours on blockheads and fools;
" But the caſe is quite different here, I aver it,
" For David ne'er knew me, till brought me by
" merit.
" And yet to convince you—nay, Madam, no
" hiſſes— [is—."
" Good manners at leaſt—ſuch behaviour as this (For mention but Merit, and Envy flies out
With a hiſs and a yell that would ſilence a rout.
But Fortune went on)—" To convince you, I ſay,
" That I honour your ſcheme, I'll about it to-day;
" The man ſhall be marry'd, ſo pray now be eaſy,
" And Garrick for once ſhall do ſomething to
" pleaſe ye."
So ſaying, ſhe rattled her wheel out of ſight,
While Envy walk'd after, and grinn'd with delight. [brewing,
It ſeems 'twas a trick that ſhe long had been
To marry poor David, and ſo be his ruin:
For Slander had told her the creature lov'd pelf,
And car'd not a fig for a ſoul but himſelf;
From thence ſhe was ſure, had the Devil a daughter, [her:
He'd ſnap at the girl, ſo 'twas Fortune that brought
And then ſhould her temper be ſullen or haughty,
Her fleſh too be frail, and incline to be naughty,
'Twould fret the poor fellow ſo out of his reaſon,
That Barry and Quin would ſet faſhions next ſeaſon.
But Fortune, who ſaw what the Fury deſign'd,
Reſolv'd to get David a wife to his mind:
Yet afraid of herſelf in a matter ſo nice,
She viſited Prudence, and begg'd her advice.
The nymph ſhook her head when the buſineſs ſhe knew,
And ſaid that her female acquaintance were few;
That excepting Miſs R * * *—O, yes, there was one,
A friend of that lady's, ſhe viſited none;
But the firſt was too great, and the laſt was too
good,
And as for the reſt, ſhe might get whom ſhe cou'd.
Away hurried Fortune, perplex'd and half mad,
But her promiſe was paſs'd, and a wife muſt be had:
She travers'd the town from one corner to t'other,
Now knocking at one door, and then at another.
The girls curtſy'd low as ſhe look'd in their faces,
And bridled and primm'd with abundance of graces;
But this was coquettiſh, and that was a prude,
One ſtupid and dull, t'other noiſy and rude;
A third was affected, quite careleſs a fourth,
With prate without meaning, and pride without worth;
A fifth, and a ſixth, and a ſeventh were ſuch
As either knew nothing, or ſomething too much—
In ſhort as they paſs'd, ſhe to all had objections;
The gay wanted thought, the good-humour'd affections,

The prudent were ugly, the ſenſible dirty,
And all of them flirts, from fifteen up to thirty.
When Fortune ſaw this ſhe began to look ſilly,
Yet ſtill ſhe went on till ſhe reach'd Piccadilly;
But vex'd and fatigu'd, and the night growing late,
She reſted her wheel within Burlington gate.
My lady roſe up, as ſhe ſaw her come in, [been?"
" O ho, madam Genius! pray where have you
(For her ladyſhip thought, from ſo ſerious an air,
'Twas Genius come home, for it ſeems ſhe liv'd there.)
But Fortune, not minding her ladyſhip's blunder,
And wiping her forehead, cry'd, " Well may you wonder [caſe,
" To ſee me thus flurry'd;"—then told her the
And ſigh'd till her ladyſhip laugh'd in her face.
" Mighty civil indeed!"—" Come, a truce, ſays
" my lady, [ye.
" A truce with complaints, and perhaps I may aid
" I'll ſhow you a girl that—Here, Martin! go
" tell!
" But ſhe's gone to undreſs; by and by is as " well—
" I'll ſhow you a ſight that you'll fancy uncommon,
" Wit, beauty, and goodneſs, all met in a woman;
" A heart to no folly or miſchief inclin'd,
" A body all grace, and all ſweetneſs a mind."
" O, pray let me ſee her," ſays Fortune, and
" ſmil'd, [child—
" Do but give her to me, and I'll make her my
" But who, my dear, who?—for you have not
" told yet"—
" Who, indeed, ſays my lady, if not Violette?"
The words were ſcarce ſpoke when ſhe enter'd
the room:
A bluſh at the ſtranger ſtill brighten'd her bloom;
So humble her looks were, ſo mild was her air,
That Fortune, aſtoniſh'd, ſat mute in her chair.
My lady roſe up, and with countenance bland,
" This is Fortune, my dear," and preſented her hand:
The goddeſs embrac'd her, and call'd her her own,
And, compliments over, her errand made known.
But how the ſweet girl colour'd, flutter'd, and trembled,
How oft ſhe ſaid no, and how ill ſhe diſſembled;
Or how little David rejoic'd at the news,
And ſwore, from all others, 'twas her he would chooſe;
What methods he try'd, and what arts to prevail;
All theſe, were they told, would but burden my tale—
In ſhort, all affairs were ſo happily carry'd,
That hardly ſix weeks paſs'd away till they mar-
ry'd.
But Envy grew ſick when the ſtory ſhe heard,
Violette was the girl that of all ſhe moſt fear'd;
She knew her good-humour, her beauty and
ſweetneſs, [neſs;
Her eaſe and compliance, her taſte and her neat-
From theſe ſhe was ſure that her man could not roam,
And muſt riſe on the ſtage, from contentment at home:
So on ſhe went hiſſing, and inwardly curs'd her,
And Garrick next ſeaſon will certainly burſt her.

To the Right Honourable

HENRY PELHAM,

The Humble Petition of the Worſhipful Company of Poets and News-Writers,

SHEWETH,

THAT your Honour's petitioners (dealers in rhymes,
And writers of ſcandal, for mending the times)
By loſſes in buſineſs, and England's well-doing,
Are ſunk in their credit, and verging on ruin.
That theſe their misfortunes, they humbly conceive,
Ariſe not from dulneſs, as ſome folks believe,
But from rubs in your way which your Honour has laid,
And want of materials to carry on trade.
That they always had form'd high conceits of their uſe,
And meant their laſt breath ſhould go out in abuſe;
But now (and they ſpeak it with ſorrow and tears)
Since your Honour has ſat at the helm of affairs,
No party will join them, no faction invite [write,
To heed what they ſay, or to read what they
Sedition, and Tumult, and Diſcord are fled,
And Slander ſcarce ventures to lift up her head—
In ſhort, public buſineſs is ſo carry'd on,
That their country is ſav'd, and the patriots undone.
To perplex them ſtill more, and lure famine to bring,
(Now ſatire has loſt both its truth and its ſting)
If, in ſpite of their natures, they bungle at praiſe,
Your Honour regards not, and nobody pays.
Your petitioners, therefore, moſt humbly entreat
(As the times will allow, and your Honour thinks meet) [complaint
That meaſures be chang'd, and ſome cauſe of
Be immediately furniſh'd, to end their reſtraint;
Their credit thereby, and their trade to retrieve,
That again they may rail, and the nation believe.
Or elſe (if your wiſdom ſhould deem it all one)
Now the Parliament's riſing, and buſineſs is done,
That your Honour would pleaſe, at this dangerous criſis,
To take to your boſom a few private vices,
By which your petitioners haply might thrive,
And keep both themſelves and Contention alive.
In compaſſion, good Sir, give them ſomething to ſay,
And your Homer's petitioners ever ſhall pray.

THE

TRIAL OF SARAH * * * *, ALIAS SLIM SAL,

FOR PRIVATELY STEALING.

THE pris'ner was at large indicted,
For that by thirſt of gain excited,
One day in July laſt, at tea,
And in the houſe of Mrs. P.
From the left breaſt of E. M. gent.
With baſe felonious intent,
Did then and there a heart with ſtrings,
Reſt, quiet, peace, and other things,
Steal, rob and plunder; and all them
The chattels of the ſaid E. M.

The proſecutor ſwore, laſt May
(The month he knew, but not the day)
He left his friends in town, and went
Upon a viſit down in Kent:
That ſtaying there a month or two,
He ſpent his time as others do,
In riding, walking, fiſhing, ſwimming;
But being much inclin'd to women,
And young and wild, and no great reaſoner,
He got acquainted with the priſoner
He own'd, 'twas rumour'd in thoſe parts
That ſhe 'ad a trick of ſtealing hearts,
And from fifteen to twenty-two,
Had made the devil and all to do:
But Mr. W. the vicar,
(And no man brews you better liquor)
Spoke of her thefts as tricks of youth,
The frolics of a girl forſooth:
Things now were on another ſcore,
He ſaid; for ſhe was twenty-four.
However, to make matters ſhort,
And not to treſpaſs on the court,
The lady was diſcover'd ſoon,
And thus it was. One afternoon,
The ninth of July laſt, or near it,
(As to the day, he could not ſwear it)
In company at Mrs P.'s,
Where folks ſay any thing they pleaſe;
Dean L.. and Lady Mary by,
And Fanny waiting on Miſs Y.
(He own'd he was inclin'd to think
Both were a little in their drink)
The pris'ner aſk'd, and call'd him couſin,
How many kiſſes made a dozen?
That being, as he own'd, in liquor,
The queſtion made his blood run quicker,
And, ſenſe and reaſon in eclipſe,
He vow'd he'd ſcore them on her lips.
That riſing up to keep his word,
He got as far as kiſs the third,
And would have counted t other nine,
And ſo all preſent did opine,
But that he felt a ſudden dizzineſs,
That quite undid him for the buſineſs:
His ſpeech, he ſaid, began to faulter,
His eyes to ſtare, his mouth to water,
His breaſt to thump without ceſſation,
And all within one conflagration.
Bleſs me! ſays Fanny, what's the matter?
And Lady Mary look'd hard at her,
And ſtamp'd, and wiſh'd the pris'ner further,
And cry'd out, Part them, or there's murther!
That ſtill he held the pris'ner faſt,
And would have ſtood it to the laſt;
But ſtruggling to go through the reſt,
He felt a pain acroſs his breaſt,
A ſort of ſudden twinge, he ſaid,
That ſeem'd almoſt to ſtrike him dead,
And after that ſuch cruel ſmarting,
He thought the ſoul and body parting.
That then he let the pris'ner go,
And ſtagger'd off a ſtep or ſo;
And thinking that his heart was ill,
He begg'd of Miſs Y. s maid to feel.
That Fanny ſtept before the reſt,
And laid her hand upon his breaſt;

But, mercy on on us! what a ſtare
The creature gave! No heart was there;
Souſe went her fingers in the hole,
Whence heart, and ſtrings, and all were ſtole.
That Fanny turn'd, and told the priſoner,
She was a thief, and ſo ſhe'd chriſten her;
And that it was a burning ſhame,
And brought the houſe an evil name;
And if ſhe did not put the heart in,
The man would pine and die for certain.
The pris'ner then was in her airs,
And bid her mind her own affairs;
And told his reverence, and the reſt of 'em,
She was as honeſt as the beſt of 'em.
That Lady Mary and Dean I..
Roſe up and ſaid, 'Twas mighty well,
But that, in general terms they ſaid it,
A heart was gone, and ſome one had it:
Words would not do, for ſearch they muſt,
And ſearch they would, and her the firſt.
That then the pris'ner dropp'd her anger,
And ſaid, ſhe hop'd they would not hang her;
That all ſhe did was meant in jeſt,
And there the heart was, and the reſt.
That then the Dean cry'd out, O fie!
And ſent in haſte for Juſtice I.
Who, though he knew her friends and pity'd her,
Call'd her hard names, and ſo committed her.
The parties preſent ſwore the ſame;
And Fanny ſaid, the pris'ner's name
Had frighten'd all the country round;
And glad ſhe was the bill was found.
She knew a man, who knew another,
Who knew the very party's brother,
Who loſt his heart by mere ſurpriſe,
One morning looking at her eyes;
And others had been known to ſqueak,
Who only chanc'd to hear her ſpeak:
For ſhe had words of ſuch a ſort,
That though ſhe knew no reaſon for't,
Would make a man of ſenſe run mad,
And rifle him of all he had;
And that ſhe'd rob the whole community,
If ever ſhe had opportunity.
The pris'ner now firſt filence broke,
And curtſy'd round her as ſhe ſpoke.
She own'd, ſhe ſaid, it much incens'd her,
To hear ſuch matters ſworn againſt her,
But that ſhe hop'd to keep her temper,
And prove herſelf "eadem ſemper."
That what the proſecutor ſwore
Was ſome part true, and ſome part more:
She own'd ſhe had been often ſeen with him,
And laugh'd and chatted on the green with him;
The fellow ſeem'd to have humanity,
And told her tales that ſooth'd her vanity,
Pretending that he lov'd her vaſtly,
And that all women elſe look'd ghaſtly.
But then ſhe hop'd the court would think
She never was inclin'd to drink,
Or ſuffer hands like his to daub her, or
Encourage men to kiſs and ſlobber her;
She'd have folks know ſhe did not love it,
Or if ſhe did, ſhe was above it.
But this, ſhe ſaid, was ſworn of courſe,
To prove her giddy, and then worſe;
As ſhe whoſe conduct was thought "lævis,"
Might very well be reckon'd thieviſh.
She hop'd, ſhe ſaid, the court's diſcerning
Would pay ſome honour to her learning,
For every day from four to paſt ſix,
She went up ſtairs, and read the claſſics.
Thus having clear'd herſelf of levity,
The reſt, ſhe ſaid, would come with brevity.
And firſt, it injur'd not her honour
To own the heart was found upon her;
For ſhe could prove, and did aver,
The paltry thing belong'd to her:
The fact was thus. This prince of knaves
Was once the humbleſt of her ſlaves,
And often had confeſs'd the dart
Her eyes had lodg'd within his heart:
That ſhe, as 'twas her conſtant faſhion,
Made great diverſion of his paſſion;
Which ſet his blood in ſuch a ferment,
As ſeem'd to threaten his interment:
That then ſhe was afraid of loſing him,
And ſo deſiſted from abuſing him;
And often came and felt his pulſe,
And bid him write to Doctor Hulſe.
The proſecutor thank'd her kindly,
And ſigh'd, and ſaid ſhe look'd divinely;
But told her that his heart was burſting,
And doctors he had little truſt in;
He therefore begg'd her to accept it,
And hop'd 'twould mend if once ſhe kept it.
That having no averſion to it,
She ſaid, with all her ſoul, ſhe'd do it;
But then ſhe begg'd him to remember,
If he ſhould need it in December,
(For winter months would make folks ſhiver,
Who wanted either heart or liver)
It never could return; and added,
'Twas her's for life, if once ſhe had it.
The proſecutor ſaid, Amen,
And that he wiſh'd it not again;
And took it from his breaſt and gave her,
And bow'd, and thank'd her for the favour;
But begg'd the thing might not be ſpoke of,
As heartleſs men were made a joke of.
That next day, whiſp'ring him about it,
And aſking how he felt without it,
He ſigh'd, and cry'd, Alack! alack!
And begg'd, and pray'd to have it back;
Or that ſhe'd give him her's inſtead on't:
But ſhe conceiv'd there was no need on't;
And ſaid, and bid him make no pother,
He ſhould have neither one nor t'other.
That then he rav'd and ſtorm'd like fury,
And ſaid, that one was his "de jure,"
And rather than he'd leave purſuing her,
He'd ſwear a robbery, and ruin her.
That this was truth ſhe did aver,
Whatever hap betided her;
Only that Mrs. P. ſhe ſaid,
Miſs Y. and her deluded maid,
And Lady Mary, and his reverence,
Were folks to whom ſhe paid ſome deference;
And that ſhe verily believ'd
They were not perjur'd, but deceiv'd.
Then Doctor D. begg'd leave to ſpeak,
And ſigh'd as if his heart would break.

He ſaid, that he was madam's ſurgeon,
Or rather, as in Greek chirurgeon,
From "cheir, manus, ergon, opus"
(As ſcope is from the Latin "ſcopus.")
That he, he ſaid, had known the priſoner
From the firſt ſun that ever riſe on her;
And griev'd he was to ſee her there;
But took upon himſelf to ſwear,
There was not to be found in nature
A ſweeter or a better creature;
And if the king (God bleſs him) knew her,
He'd leave St. James's to get to her:
But then as to the fact in queſtion,
He knew no more on't than Hephæſtion;
It might be falſe, and might be true;
And this, he ſaid, was all he knew.

The judge proceeded to the charge,
And gave the evidence at large,
But often caſt a ſheep's eye at her,
And ſtrove to mitigate the matter,
Pretending facts were not ſo clear,
And mercy ought to interfere.

The jury then withdrew a moment,
As if on weighty points to comment;
And right or wrong, reſolv'd to ſave her,
They gave a verdict in her favour.

But why or wherefore things were ſo,
It matters not for us to know
The culprit, by eſcape grown bold,
Pilfers alike from young and old,
The country all around her teazes,
And robs or murders whom ſhe pleaſes.

FABLES FOR THE LADIES.

PREFACE TO THE FIRST EDITION.

The following Fables were written at intervals, when I found myſelf in humour, and diſengaged from matters of greater moment. As they are the writings of an idle hour, ſo they are intended for the reading of thoſe, whoſe only buſineſs is amuſement. My hopes of profit, or applauſe, are not immoderate; nor have I printed through neceſſity, or requeſt of friends. I have leave from her Royal Highneſs to addreſs her, and I claim the fair for my readers. My fears are lighter than my expectations: I wrote to pleaſe myſelf, and I publiſh to pleaſe others; and this ſo univerſally, that I have not wiſhed for correctneſs to rob the critic of his cenſure, or my friend of the laugh.

My intimates are few, and I am not ſolicitous to increaſe them. I have learnt, that where the writer would pleaſe, the man ſhould be unknown. An author is the reverſe of all other objects, and magnifies by diſtance, but diminiſhes by approach. His private attachments muſt give place to public favour; for no man can forgive his friend the ill-natured attempt of being thought wiſer than himſelf.

To avoid, therefore, the misfortunes that may attend me from any accidental ſucceſs, I think it neceſſary to inform thoſe who know me, that I have been aſſiſted in the following papers by the author of Guſtavus Vaſa *. Let the crime of pleaſing be his, whoſe talents as a writer, and whoſe virtues as a man, have rendered him a living affront to the whole circle of his acquaintance.

* Henry Brooke, Eſq.

FABLE I.

THE EAGLE AND THE ASSEMBLY OF BIRDS.

To her Royal Highneſs the Princeſs of Wales.

The moral lay, to beauty due,
I write, fair excellence, to you;
Well pleas'd to hope my vacant hours
Have been employ'd to ſweeten yours.
Truth under fiction I impart,
To weed out folly from the heart;
And ſhow the paths, that lead aſtray
The wand'ring nymph from wiſdom's way.
I flatter none. The great and good
Are by their actions underſtood;
Your monument if actions raiſe,
Shall I deface by idle praiſe?
I echo not the voice of fame,
That dwells delighted on your name;
Her friendly tale, however true,
Were flatt'ry, if I told it you.

The proud, the envious, and the vain,
The jilt, the prude, demand my ſtrain;
To theſe, deteſting praiſe, I write,
And vent, in charity, my ſpite.
With friendly hand I hold the glaſs
To all, promiſcuous as they paſs;
Should folly there her likeneſs view,
I fret not that the mirror's true;
If the fantaſtic form offend,
I made it not, but would amend.

Virtue, in every clime and age,
Spurns at the ſolly-ſoothing page,
While ſatire, that offends the ear
Of vice and paſſion, pleaſes her.

Premiſing this, your anger ſpare,
And claim the fable you who dare.

The birds in place, by factions preſs'd,
To Jupiter their pray'rs addreſs'd;
By ſpecious lies the ſtate was vex'd,
Their counſels libellers perplex'd;
They begg'd (to ſtop ſeditious tongues)
A gracious hearing of their wrongs.
Jove grants their ſuit. The eagle ſate,
Decider of the grand debate.
The pie, to truſt and pow'r preferr'd,
Demands permiſſion to be heard.
Says he, prolixity of phraſe
You know I hate. This libel ſays,
" Some birds there are, who, prone to noiſe,
" Are hir'd to ſilence wiſdom's voice,
" And ſkill'd to chatter out the hour,
" Riſe by their emptineſs to pow'r."
That this is aim'd direct at me,
No doubt, you'll readily agree;
Yet well this ſage aſſembly knows,
By parts to government I roſe;
My prudent counſels prop the ſtate;
Magpies were never known to prate.
The kite roſe up. His honeſt heart
In virtue's fuff'rings bore a part.
That there were birds of prey he knew;
So far the libeller ſaid true;
" Voracious, bold, to rapine prone,
" Who knew no int'reſt but their own;
" Who hov'ring o'er the farmer's yard,
" Nor pigeon, chick, nor duckling ſpar'd."
This might be true, but if apply'd
To him, in troth, the ſtand'rer ly'd.
Since ign'rance then might be miſled,
Such things, he thought, were beſt unſaid.
The crow was vex'd. As yeſter-morn
He flew acroſs the new-ſown corn,
A ſcreaming boy was ſet for pay,
He knew, to drive the crows away;
Scandal had found out him in turn,
And buzz'd abroad, that crows love corn.
The owl aroſe, with ſolemn face,
And thus harangu'd upon the caſe.
That magpies prate, it may be true,
A kite may be voracious too,
Crows ſometimes deal in new-ſown peaſe;
He libels not, who ſtrikes at theſe,
The ſlander's here—" But there are birds,
" Whoſe wiſdom lies in looks, not words;
" Blund'rers, who level in the dark,
" And always ſhoot beſide the mark."
He names not me; but theſe are hints,
Which manifeſt at whom he ſquints;
I were indeed that blund'ring fowl,
To queſtion if he meant an owl.
Ye wretches, hence! the eagle cries,
'Tis conſcience, conſcience that applies;
The virtuous mind takes no alarm,
Secur'd by innocence from harm;
While guilt, and his aſſociate fear,
Are ſtartled at the paſſing air.

FABLE II.

THE PANTHER, THE HORSE, AND OTHER BEASTS.

The man, who ſeeks to win the fair,
So cuſtom ſays) muſt truth forbear;
Muſt fawn and flatter, cringe and lie,
And raiſe the goddeſs to the ſky.
For truth is hateful to her ear,
A rudeneſs, which ſhe cannot bear.
A rudeneſs? Yes. I ſpeak my thoughts;
For truth upbraids her with her faults.
How wretched, Cloe, then am I,
Who love you, and yet cannot lie!
And ſtill to make you leſs my friend,
I ſtrive your errors to amend!
But ſhall the ſenſeleſs ſop impart
The ſofteſt paſſion to your heart,
While he, who tells you honeſt truth,
And points to happineſs your youth,
Determines, by his care, his lot,
And lives neglected, and forgot?
Truſt me, my dear, with greater eaſe
Your taſte for flatt'ry I could pleaſe,
And ſimiles in each dull line,
Like glowworms in the dark, ſnould ſhine.
What if I ſay your lips diſcloſe
The freſhneſs of the op'ning roſe?
Or that your cheeks are beds of flow'rs,
Enripen'd by refreſhing ſhowers?
Yet certain as theſe flow'rs ſhall fade,
Time every beauty will invade.
The butterfly, of various hue,
More than the flow'r reſembles you;
Fair, flutt'ring, fickle, buſy thing,
To pleaſure ever on the wing,
Gaily coquetting for an hour,
To die, and ne'er be thought of more.
Would you the bloom of youth ſhould laſt?
'Tis virtue that muſt bind it faſt;
An eaſy carriage, wholly free
From ſour reſerve, or levity;
Good-natur'd mirth, an open heart,
And looks unſkill'd in any art;
Humility, enough to own
The frailties, which a friend makes known;
And decent pride, enough to know
The worth, that virtue can beſtow.
Theſe are the charms, which ne'er decay,
Though youth and beauty fade away;
And time, which all things elſe removes,
Still heightens virtue, and improves.
You'll frown, and aſk to what intent
This blunt addreſs to you is ſent?
I'll ſpare the queſtion, and confeſs
I'd praiſe you, if I lov'd you leſs;
But rail, be angry, or complain,
I will be rude, while you are vain.

Beneath a lion's peaceful reign,
When beaſts met friendly on the plain,
A panther, of majeſtic port,
(The vaineſt female of the court)
With ſpotted ſkin, and eyes of fire,
Fill'd every boſom with deſire.
Where'er ſhe mov'd, a ſervile crowd
Of fawning creatures cring'd and bow'd;
Aſſemblies every week ſhe held,
(Like modern belles) with coxcombs fill'd,
Where noiſe, and nonſenſe, and grimace,
And lies and ſcandal fill'd the place.

Behold the gay, fantaſtic thing,
Encircled by the ſpacious ring.
Low bowing, with important look,
As firſt in rank the monkey ſpoke.
" Gad take me, Madam, but I ſwear,
" No angel ever look'd ſo fair:
" Forgive my rudeneſs, but I vow,
" You were not quite divine till now;
" Thoſe limbs! that ſhape! and then thoſe eyes!
" O, cloſe them, or the gazer dies!"
Nay, gentle pug, for goodneſs huſh,
I vow, and ſwear, you make me bluſh;
I ſhall be angry at this rate:
'Tis ſo like flatt'ry, which I hate.
The fox, in deeper cunning vers'd,
The beauties of her mind rehears'd,
And talk'd of knowledge, taſte, and ſenſe,
To which the fair have vaſt pretence!
Yet well he knew them always vain
Of what they ſtrive not to attain,
And play'd ſo cunningly his part,
That pug was rival'd in his art.
The goat avow'd his am'rous flame;
And burnt—for what he durſt not name;
Yet hop'd a meeting in the wood
Might make his meaning underſtood.
Half angry at the bold addreſs,
She frown'd; but yet ſhe muſt confeſs,
Such beauties might inflame his blood,
But ſtill his phraſe was ſomewhat rude.
The hog her neatneſs much admir'd;
The formal aſs her ſwiftneſs fir'd;
While all to feed her folly ſtrove,
And by their praiſes ſhar'd her love.
The horſe, whoſe gen'rous heart diſdain'd
Applauſe, by ſervile flatt'ry gain'd,
With graceful courage, ſilence broke,
And thus with indignation ſpoke.
When flatt'ring monkeys fawn, and prate,
They juſtly raiſe contempt or hate;
For merit's turn'd to ridicule,
Applauded by the grinning fool.
The artful fox your wit commends,
To lure you to his ſelfiſh ends;
From the vile flatt'rer turn away,
For knaves make friendſhips to betray.
Diſmiſs the train of fops, and fools,
And learn to live by wiſdom's rules;
Such beauties might the lion warm,
Did not your folly break the charm;
For who would court that lovely ſhape,
To be the rival of an ape?
He ſaid; and ſnorting in diſdain,
Spurn'd at the crowd, and ſought the plain.

FABLE III.

THE NIGHTINGALE AND GLOWWORM.

The prudent nymph, whoſe cheeks diſcloſe
The lily, and the bluſhing roſe,
From public view her charms will ſcreen,
And rarely in the crowd be ſeen;
This ſimple truth ſhall keep her wiſe,
" The faireſt fruits attract the flies."

One night, a glowworm, proud and vain,
Contemplating her glitt'ring train,
Cry'd, Sure there never was in nature
So elegant, ſo fine a creature.
All other inſects that I ſee,
The frugal ant, induſtrious bee,
Or ſilk-worm, with contempt I view;
With all that low, mechanic crew,
Who ſervilely their lives employ
In buſineſs, enemy to joy.
Mean, vulgar herd! ye are my ſcorn,
For grandeur only I was born,
Or ſure am ſprung from race divine,
And plac'd on earth, to live and ſhine.
Thoſe lights that ſparkle ſo on high,
Are but the glowworms of the ſky,
And kings on earth their gems admire,
Becauſe they imitate my fire.
She ſpoke. Attentive on a ſpray,
A nightingale forbore his lay;
He ſaw the ſhining morſel near,
And flew, directed by the glare;
A while he gaz'd with ſober look,
And thus the trembling prey beſpoke.
Deluded fool, with pride elate,
Know 'tis thy beauty brings thy fate:
Leſs dazzling, long thou might'ſt have lain
Unheeded on the velvet plain:
Pride, ſoon or late, degraded mourns,
And beauty wrecks whom ſhe adorns.

FABLE IV.

HYMEN AND DEATH.

Sixteen, d'ye ſay? Nay, then 'tis time;
Another year deſtroys your prime.
But ſtay—The ſettlement! " That's made."
Why then's my ſimple girl afraid?
Yet hold a moment, if you can,
And heedfully the fable ſcan.

The ſhades were fled, the morning bluſh'd,
The winds were in the caverns huſh'd,
When Hymen, penſive and ſedate,
Held o'er the fields his muſing gait.
Behind him, through the green-wood ſhade,
Death's meagre form the god ſurvey'd,
Who quickly, with gigantic ſtride,
Out-went his pace, and join'd his ſide.
The chat on various ſubjects ran,
Till angry Hymen thus began.
Relentleſs Death, whoſe iron ſway
Mortals reluctant muſt obey,
Still of thy pow'r ſhall I complain,
And thy too partial hand arraign?
When Cupid brings a pair of hearts
All over ſtuck with equal darts,
Thy cruel ſhafts my hopes deride,
And cut the knot that Hymen ty'd.
Shall not the bloody and the bold,
The miſer, hoarding up his gold,
The harlot, reeking from the ſtew,
Alone thy fell revenge purſue?
But muſt the gentle, and the kind,
Thy fury, undiſtinguiſh'd, find?

The monarch calmly thus reply'd:
Weigh well the cauſe, and then decide.
That friend of yours, you lately nam'd,
Cupid, alone is to be blam'd;
Then let the charge be juſtly laid;
That idle boy neglects his trade,
And hardly once in twenty years,
A couple to your temple bears.
The wretches, whom your office blends,
Silenus now, or Plutus ſends;
Hence care, and bitterneſs, and ſtrife
Are common to the nuptial life.
Believe me; more than all mankind,
Your vot'ries my compaſſion find;
Yet cruel am I call'd, and baſe,
Who ſeek the wretched to releaſe;
The captive from his bonds to free,
Indiſſoluble but for me.
'Tis I entice him to the yoke;
By me, your crowded altars ſmoke:
For mortals boldly dare the nooſe,
Secure that death will ſet them looſe.

FABLE V.

THE POET AND HIS PATRON.

Why, Cælia, is your ſpreading waiſt
So looſe, ſo negligently lac'd?
Why muſt the wrapping bed-gown hide
Your ſnowy boſom's ſwelling pride?
How ill that dreſs adorns your head,
Diſtain'd, and rumpled from the bed!
Thoſe clouds, that ſhade your blooming face,
A little water might diſplace,
As nature every morn beſtows
The cryſtal dew, to cleanſe the roſe.
Thoſe treſſes, as the raven black,
That wav'd in ringlets down your back,
Uncomb'd, and injur'd by neglect,
Deſtroy the face, which once they deck'd.
Whence this forgetfulneſs of dreſs?
Pray, madam, are you marry'd? Yes.
Nay, then indeed the wonder ceaſes,
No matter now how looſe your dreſs is;
The end is won, your fortune's made,
Your ſiſter now may take the trade.
Alas! what pity 'tis to find
This fault in half the female kind!
From hence proceed averſion, ſtrife,
And all that ſours the wedded life.
Beauty can only point the dart,
'Tis neatneſs guides it to the heart;
Let neatneſs then, and beauty ſtrive
To keep a wav'ring flame alive.
'Tis harder far (you'll find it true)
To keep the conqueſt, than ſubdue;
Admit us once behind the ſcreen,
What is there farther to be ſeen?
A newer face may raiſe the flame,
But every woman is the ſame.
Then ſtudy chiefly to improve
The charm, that fix'd your huſband's love.
Weigh well his humour. Was it dreſs,
That gave your beauty power to bleſs?
Purſue it ſtill; be neater ſeen;
'Tis always frugal to be clean;
So ſhall you keep alive deſire,
And time's ſwift wing ſhall fan the fire.

In garret high (as ſtories ſay)
A poet ſung his tuneful lay;
So ſoft, ſo ſmooth his verſe, you'd ſwear
Apollo, and the muſes there.
Through all the town his praiſes rung,
His ſonnets at the play-houſe ſung;
High waving o'er his lab'ring head,
The goddeſs Want her pinions ſpread,
And with poetic fury fir'd,
What Phœbus faintly had inſpir'd.
A noble youth, of taſte and wit,
Approv'd the ſprightly things he writ,
And fought him in his cobweb dome,
Diſcharg'd his rent, and brought him home.
Behold him at the ſtately board,
Who, but the poet, and my lord!
Each day deliciouſly he dines,
And greedy quaffs the gen'rous wines;
His ſides were plump, his ſkin was ſleek,
And plenty wanton'd on his cheek,
Aſtoniſh'd at the change ſo new,
Away th' inſpiring goddeſs flew.
Now, dropt for politics, and news,
Neglected lay the drooping muſe;
Unmindful whence his fortune came,
He ſtifled the poetic flame;
Nor tale, nor ſonnet, for my lady,
Lampoon, nor epigram was ready.
With juſt contempt his pat'ron ſaw,
(Reſolv'd his bounty to withdraw)
And thus, with anger in his look,
The late repenting fool beſpoke.
Blind to the good that courts thee grown,
Whence has the ſun of favour ſhone?
Delighted with thy tuneful art,
Eſteem was growing in my heart;
But idly thou reject'ſt the charm,
That gave it birth, and kept it warm.
Unthinking fools alone deſpiſe
The arts, that taught them firſt to riſe.

FABLE VI

THE WOLF, THE SHEEP, AND THE LAMB.

Duty demands, the parent's voice
Should ſanctify the daughter's choice;
In that, is due obedience ſhown;
To chooſe, belongs to her alone.
May horror ſeize his midnight hour,
Who builds upon a parents pow'r,
And claims, by purchaſe vile and baſe,
The loathing maid for his embrace;
Hence virtue ſickens: and the breaſt,
Where peace had built her downy neſt,
Becomes the troubled ſeat of care,
And pines with anguiſh and deſpair.

A wolf, rapacious, rough and bold,
Whoſe nightly plunders thinn'd the fold,
Contemplating his ill-ſpent life,
And cloy'd with thefts, would take a wife.

His purpose known, the savage race,
In numerous crowds, attend the place;
For why, a mighty Wolf he was,
And held dominion in his jaws.
Her fav'rite whelp each mother brought,
And humbly his alliance fought;
But cold by age, or else too nice,
None found acceptance in his eyes.
It happen'd, as at early dawn,
He solitary cross'd the lawn,
Stray'd from the fold, a sportive lamb
Skip'd wanton by her fleecy dam:
When Cupid, foe to man and beast,
Discharg'd an arrow at his breast.
The tim'rous breed the robber knew,
And trembling o'er the meadow flew;
Their nimblest speed the wolf o'ertook,
And courteous, thus the dam bespoke.
Stay, fairest, and suspend your fear,
Trust me, no enemy is near;
These jaws, in slaughter oft imbru'd,
At length have known enough of blood;
And kinder business brings me now,
Vanquish'd, at beauty's feet to bow.
You have a daughter——Sweet, forgive
A wolf's address—In her I live;
Love from her eyes like lightning came,
And set my marrow all on flame;
Let your consent confirm my choice,
And ratify our nuptial joys.
Me ample wealth, and pow'r attend,
Wide o'er the plains my realms extend;
What midnight robber dare invade
The fold, if I the guard am made?
At home the shepherd's cur may sleep,
While I secure his master's sheep.
Discourse like this, attention claim'd;
Grandeur the mother's breast inflam'd;
Now fearless by his side she walk'd,
Of settlements, and jointure talk'd;
Propos'd, and doubled her commands
Of flow'ry fields, and turnip-lands.
The wolf agrees. Her bosom swells;
To Miss her happy fate she tells;
And of the grand alliance vain,
Contemns her kindred of the plain.
The loathing lamb with horror hears,
And wearies out her dam with pray'rs;
But all in vain; mama best knew
What inexperienc'd girls should do;
So, to the neighb'ring meadow carry'd,
A triumph as the couple marry'd.
Torn from the tyrant-mother's side,
The trembler goes, a victim-bride,
Reluctant, meets the rude embrace,
And bleats among the howl'ing race.
With horror oft her eyes behold
Her murder'd kindred of the fold;
Each day a sister lamb is serv'd,
And at the glutton's table carv'd;
The crashing bones he grinds for food,
And slakes his thirst with streaming blood.
Love, who the cruel mind detests,
And lodges but in gentle breasts,
Was now no more. Enjoyment past,
The savage hunger'd for the feast;
But (as we find human race,
A mask conceals the villain's face)
Justice must authorise the treat;
Till then he long'd, but durst not eat.
As forth he walk'd in quest of prey,
The hunters met him on the way;
Fear wings his flight; the marsh he sought;
The snuffing dogs are set at fault.
His stomach balk'd, now hunger gnaws,
Howling, he grinds his empty jaws;
Food must be had, and lamb is nigh;
His maw invokes the fraudful lie.
Is this (dissembling rage, he cry'd)
The gentle virtue of a bride?
Thar, leagu'd with man's destroying race,
She sets her husband for the chase?
By treach'ry prompts the noisy hound
To scent his footsteps on the ground?
Thou trait'ress vile! for this thy blood
Shall glut my rage, and dye the wood!
So saying, on the lamb he flies,
Beneath his jaws the victim dies.

FABLE VII.

THE GOOSE AND THE SWANS.

I HATE the face, however fair,
That carries an affected air;
The lisping tone, the shape constrain'd,
The study'd look, the passion feign'd,
Are fopperies, which only tend
To injure what they strive to mend.
With what superior grace enchants
The face, which nature's pencil paints!
Where eyes, unexercis'd in art,
Glow with the meaning of the heart!
Where freedom and good-humour sit,
And easy gaicty, and wit!
Though perfect beauty be not there,
The master lines, the finish'd air,
We catch from every look delight,
And grow enamour'd at the sight:
For beauty, though we all approve,
Excites our wonder, more than love,
While the agreeable strikes sure,
And gives the wounds we cannot cure.
Why then, my Amoret, this care,
That forms you, in effect, less fair?
If nature on your cheek bestows
A bloom that emulates the rose,
Or from some heav'nly image drew
A form Apelles never knew,
Your ill-judg'd aid will you impart,
And spoil by meretricious art?
Or had you, nature's error, come
Abortive from the mother's womb,
Your forming care she still rejects,
Which only heightens her defects.
When such, of glitt'ring jewels proud,
Still press the foremost in the crowd,
At every public show are seen,
With look awry, and awkward mien,
The gaudy dress attracts the eye,
And magnifies deformity
Nature may under-do her part,
But seldom wants the help of art;

Truſt her; ſhe is your ſureſt friend,
Nor made your form for you to mend.

A Goose, affected, empty, vain,
The ſhrilleſt of the cackling train,
With proud and elevated creſt,
Precedence claim'd above the reſt.
Says ſhe, I laugh at human race,
Who ſay, geeſe hobble in their pace;
Look here! the ſtand'rous lie detect;
Not haughty man is ſo erect
That peacock yonder! Lord, how vain
The creature's of his gaudy train!
If both were ſtript, I'd pawn my word.
A gooſe would be the finer bird.
Nature, to hide her own defects,
Her bungled work with finery decks;
Were geeſe ſet off with half that ſhow,
Would men admire the peacock? No.
Thus vaunting, croſs the mead ſhe ſtalks,
The cackling breed attend her walks;
The ſun ſhot down his noon-tide beams,
The ſwans were ſporting in the ſtreams;
Their ſnowy plumes, and ſtately pride
Provok'd her ſpleen. Why there, ſhe cry'd,
Again, what arrogance we ſee!
Thoſe creatures! how they mimic me!
Shall every fowl the waters ſkim,
Becauſe we geeſe are known to ſwim?
Humility they ſoon ſhall learn,
And their emptineſs diſcern.
So ſaying, with extended wings,
Lightly upon the wave ſhe ſprings;
Her boſom ſwells, ſhe ſpreads her plumes,
And the ſwan's ſtately creſt aſſumes.
Contempt and mockery enſu'd,
And burſts of laughter ſhook the flood.
A ſwan, ſuperior to the reſt,
Sprung forth, and thus the fool addreſs'd.
Conceited thing, elate with pride!
Thy affectation all deride;
Theſe airs thy awkwardneſs impart,
And ſhow thee plainly, as thou art.
Among thy equals of the flock,
Thou hadſt eſcap'd the public mock.
And as thy parts to good conduce,
Been deem'd an honeſt hobbling gooſe.
Learn hence to ſtudy wiſdom's rules;
Know, foppery's the pride of fools;
And ſtriving nature to conceal,
You only her defects reveal.

FABLE VIII.

THE LAWYER AND JUSTICE.

Love! thou divineſt good below,
Thy pure delights few mortals know!
Our rebel hearts thy ſway diſown,
While tyrant luſt uſurps thy throne.
The bounteous God of nature made
The ſexes for each other's aid,
Their mutual talents to employ,
To leſſen ills, and heighten joy.
To weaker woman he aſſign'd
That ſoft'ning goodneſs of mind,
That can, by ſympathy, impart
Its likeneſs to the roughеſt heart.
Her eyes with magic pow'r endu'd,
To fire the dull, and awe the rude.
His roſy fingers on her face
Shed laviſh every blooming grace,
And ſtamp'd (perfection to diſplay)
His mildeſt image on her clay,
Man, active, reſolute, and bold,
He faſhion'd in a different mould,
With uſeful arts his mind inform'd,
His breaſt with nobler paſſions warm'd;
He gave him knowledge, taſte and ſenſe,
And courage, for the fair's defence.
Her frame, reſiſtleſs to each wrong,
Demands protection from the ſtrong;
To man ſhe flies, when fear alarms,
And claims the temple of his arms.
By nature's author thus declar'd
The woman's ſov'reign, and her guard,
Shall man, by treach'rous wiles, invade
The weakneſs he was meant to aid?
While beauty, given to inſpire
Protecting love, and ſoft deſire,
Lights up a wild-fire in the heart,
And to its own breaſt points the dart,
Becomes the ſpoiler's baſe pretence
To triumph over innocence?
The wolf, that tears the tim'rous ſheep,
Was never ſet the fold to keep;
Nor was the tiger, or the pard
Meant the benighted trav'ller's guard;
But man, the wildeſt beaſt of prey,
Wears friendſhip's ſemblance, to betray;
His ſtrength againſt the weak employs,
And where he ſhould protect, deſtroys.

Past twelve o'clock, the watchman cry'd,
His brief the ſtudious lawyer ply'd;
The all-prevailing fee lay nigh,
The earneſt of to morrow's lie.
Sudden the furious winds ariſe,
The jarring caſement ſhatter'd flies;
The doors admit a hollow ſound,
And rattling from their hinges bound;
When Juſtice, in a blaze of light,
Reveal'd her radiant form to ſight.
The wretch with thrilling horror ſhook,
Looſe every joint, and pale his look;
Not having ſeen her in the courts,
Or found her mention'd in reports,
He aſk'd, with fault'ring tongue, her name,
Her errand there, and whence ſhe came?
Sternly the white-rob'd Shade reply'd,
(A crimſon glow her viſage dy'd)
Canſt thou be doubtful who I am?
Is Juſtice grown ſo ſtrange a name?
Were not your courts for Juſtice rais'd?
'Twas there, of old, my altars blaz'd.
My guardian thee did I elect,
My ſacred temple to protect,
That thou, and all thy venal tribe
Should ſpurn the goddeſs for the bribe?
Aloud the ruin'd client cries,
Juſtice has neither ears, nor eyes;

In foul alliance with the bar,
'Gainſt me the judge denounces war,
And rarely iſſues his decree,
But with intent to baffle me.
She paus'd Her breaſt with fury burn'd,
The trembling lawyer thus return'd.
I own the charge is juſtly laid,
And weak th' excuſe that can be made;
Yet ſearch the ſpacious globe, and ſee
If all mankind are not like me
The gown-man, ſkill'd in Romiſh lies,
By faith's falſe glaſs deludes our eyes;
O er conſcience rides without controul,
And robs the man to ſave his ſoul.
The doctor, with important face,
By fly deſign, miſtakes the caſe;
Preſcribes, and ſpins out the diſeaſe,
To trick the patient of his fees.
The ſoldier, rough with many a ſcar,
And red with ſlaughter, leads the war;
If he a nation's truſt betray,
The foe has offer'd d uble pay.
When vice o'er all mankind prevails,
And weighty int'reſt turns the ſcales,
Muſt I be better than the reſt,
And harbour juſtice in my breaſt?
On one ſide only take the fee,
Content with poverty and thee?
Thou blind to ſenſe, and vile of mind,
Th' exaſperated Shade rejoin'd,
If virtue from the world is flown,
Will others' frauds excuſe thy own?
For fickly ſouls the prieſt was made;
Phyſicians, for the body's aid;
The ſoldier guarded liberty;
Man woman, and the lawyer me.
If all are faithleſs to their truſt,
They leave not thee the leſs unjuſt.
Henceforth your pleadings I diſclaim,
And bar the ſanction of my name;
Within your courts it ſhall be read,
That juſtice from the law is fled.
She ſpoke; and hid in ſhades her face
Till Hardwicke ſooth'd her into grace.

FABLE IX.

THE FARMER, THE SPANIEL, AND THE CAT.

Why knits my dear her angry brow?
What rude offence alarms you now?
I ſaid, that Delia's fair, 'tis true,
But did I ſay ſhe equall'd you?
Can't I another's face commend,
Or to her virtues be a friend,
But inſtantly your forehead lours,
As if her merit leſſen'd yours?
From female envy never free,
All muſt be blind, becauſe you ſee.
Survey the gardens, fields, and bow'rs,
The buds, the bloſſoms, and the flow'rs.
Then tell me where the woodbine grows,
That vies in ſweetneſs with the roſe?
Or where the lily's ſnowy white,
That throws ſuch beauties on the ſight?
Yet folly is it to declare,
That theſe are neither ſweet, nor fair,
The cryſtal ſhines with fainter rays,
Before the di'mond's brighter blaze;
And fops will ſay, the di'mond dies,
Before the luſtre of your eyes:
But I, who deal in truth, deny
That neither ſhine when you are by.
When zephyrs o'er the bloſſoms ſtray,
And ſweets along the air convey,
Sha'n't I the fragrant breeze inhale,
Becauſe you breathe a ſweeter gale?
Sweet are the flow'rs, that deck the field;
Sweet is the ſmell the bloſſoms yield;
Sweet is the ſummer gale that blows;
And ſweet, though ſweeter you, the roſe.
Shall envy then torment your breaſt,
If you are lovelier than the reſt?
For while I give to each her due,
By praiſing them I flatter you;
And praiſing moſt, I ſtill declare
You faireſt, where the reſt are fair.

As at his board a farmer ſate,
Repleniſh'd by his homely treat,
His fav'rite ſpaniel near him ſtood,
And with his maſter ſhar'd the food;
The crackling bones his jaws devour'd,
His lapping tongue the trenchers ſcour'd;
'Till ſated now, ſupine he lay,
And ſnor'd the riſing fumes away.
The hungry cat, in turn, drew near,
And humbly crav'd a ſervant's ſhare;
Her modeſt worth the maſter knew,
And ſtraight the fatt'ning morſel threw:
Enrag'd the ſnarling cur awoke,
And thus, with ſpiteful envy, ſpoke.
They only claim a right to eat,
Who earn by ſervices their meat.
Me, zeal and induſtry inflame
To ſcour the fields, and ſpring the game;
Or, plunging in the wint'ry wave,
For man the wounded bird to ſave.
With watchful diligence I keep
From prowling wolves, his fleecy ſheep;
At home his midnight hours ſecure,
And drive the robber from the door.
For this, his breaſt with kindneſs glows;
For this, his hand the food beſtows;
And ſhall thy indolence impart
A warmer friendſhip to his heart,
That thus he robs me of my due,
To pamper ſuch vile things as you?
I own (with meekneſs puſs reply'd)
Superior merit on your ſide;
Nor does my breaſt with envy ſwell,
To find it recompens'd ſo well:
Yet I, in what my nature can,
Contribute to the good of man.
Whoſe claws deſtroy the pilf'ring mouſe?
Who drives the vermin from the houſe?
Or, watchful for the lab'ring ſwain,
From lurking rats ſecure the grain?
From hence, if he rewards beſtow,
Why ſhould your heart with gall o'erflow?
Why pine my happineſs to ſee,
Since there's enough for you and me?
Thy words are juſt, the farmer cry'd,
And ſpurn'd the ſnarler from his ſide;

FABLE X.

THE SPIDER AND THE BEE.

The nymph, who walks the public ſtreets,
And ſets her cap at all ſhe meets,
May catch the fool who turns to ſtare,
But men of ſenſe avoid the ſnare.
As on the margin of the flood,
With ſilken line, my Lydia ſtood,
I ſmil'd to ſee the pains you took,
To cover o'er the fraudful hook.
Along the foreſt as we ſtray'd,
You ſaw the boy his lime-twigs ſpread;
Gueſs'd you the reaſon of his fear,
Leſt, heedleſs, we approach'd too near?
For as behind the buſh we lay,
The linnet flutter'd on the ſpray.
Needs there ſuch caution to delude
The ſcaly fry, and feather'd brood?
And think you, with inferior art,
To captivate the human heart?
The maid, who modeſtly conceals
Her beauties, while ſhe hides, reveals,
Give but a glimpſe, and fancy draws
Whate'er the Grecian Venus was.
From Eve's firſt fig-leaf to brocade,
All dreſs was meant for fancy's aid,
Which evermore delighted dwells
On what the baſhful nymph conceals.
When Cælia ſtruts in man's attire,
She ſhows too much to raiſe deſire;
But from the hoop's bewitching round,
Her very ſhoe has power to wound.
The roving eye, the boſom bare,
The forward laugh, the wanton air,
May catch the fop; for gudgeons ſtrike
At the bare hook, and bait alike;
While ſalmon play regardleſs by,
Till art, like nature, forms the fly.

Beneath a peaſant's homely thatch,
A ſpider long had held her watch;
From morn to night, with reſtleſs care,
She ſpun her web, and wove her ſnare.
Within the limits of her reign,
Lay many a heedleſs captive ſlain,
Or flutt'ring, ſtruggled in the toils,
To burſt the chains, and ſhun her wiles.
A ſtraying bee, that perch'd hard by,
Beheld her with diſdainful eye,
And thus began. Mean thing, give o'er,
And lay thy ſlender threads no more;
A thoughtleſs fly or two, at moſt,
Is all the conqueſt thou canſt boaſt;
For bees of ſenſe thy arts evade,
We ſee ſo plain the nets are laid.
The gaudy tulip, thus diſplays
Her ſpreading foliage to the gaze;
That points her charms at all ſhe ſees,
And yields to every wanton breeze,
Attracts not me; where bluſhing grows,
Guarded with thorns, the modeſt roſe,
Enamour'd, round and round I fly,
Or on her fragrant boſom lie;
Reluctant, ſhe my ardour meets,
And baſhful, renders up her ſweets.
To wiſer heads attention lend,
And learn this leſſon from a friend.
She, who with modeſty retires,
Adds fuel to her lover's fires,
While ſuch incautious jilts as you,
By folly your own ſchemes undo.

FABLE XI.

THE YOUNG LION AND THE APE.

'Tis true, I blame your lover's choice,
Though flatter'd by the public voice,
And peeviſh grow, and ſick, to hear
His exclamations, O how fair!
I liſten not to wild delights,
And tranſports of expected nights:
What is to me your hoard of charms
The whiteneſs of your neck and arms
Needs there no acquiſition more,
To keep contention from the door?
Yes; paſs a fortnight, and you'll find,
All beauty cloys, but of the mind.
Senſe and good humour ever prove
The ſureſt cords to faſten love.
Yet, Phillis, ſimpleſt of your ſex,
You never think but to perplex,
Coquetting it with every ape
That ſtruts abroad in human ſhape;
Not that the coxcomb is your taſte,
But that it ſtings your lover's breaſt;
To morrow you reſign the ſway,
Prepar'd to honour, and obey,
The tyrant-miſtreſs change for life,
To the ſubmiſſion of a wife.
Your follies, if you can, ſuſpend,
And learn inſtruction from a friend.
Reluctant, hear the firſt addreſs,
Think often, ere you anſwer, yes;
But once reſolv'd, throw off diſguiſe,
And wear your wiſhes in your eyes.
With caution every look forbear,
That might create one jealous fear,
A lover's ripening hopes confound,
Or give the gen'rous breaſt a wound.
Contemn the girliſh arts to teaze,
Nor uſe your pow'r, unleſs to pleaſe;
For fools alone with rigour ſway,
When ſoon, or late, they muſt obey.

The king of brutes, in life's decline,
Reſolv'd dominion to reſign;
The beaſts were ſummon'd to appear,
And bend before the royal heir.
They came; a day was fix'd; the crowd
Before their future monarch bow'd.
A dapper monkey, pert and vain,
Stepp'd forth, and thus addreſs'd the train.
Why cringe my friends with ſlaviſh awe,
Before this pageant king of ſtraw?
Shall we anticipate the hour,
And ere we feel it, own his pow'r?
The counſels of experience prize,
I know the maxims of the wiſe;

Subjection let us cast away,
And live the monarchs of to-day;
'Tis ours the vacant hand to spurn,
And play the tyrant each in turn.
So shall he right from wrong discern,
And mercy from oppression learn;
At others' woes be taught to melt,
And lothe the ills himself has felt.
He spoke; his bosom swell'd with pride.
The youthful lion thus reply'd.
What madness prompts thee to provoke
My wrath, and dare th' impending stroke?
Thou wretched fool! can wrongs impart
Compassion to the feeling heart?
Or teach the grateful breast to glow,
The hand to give, or eye to flow?
Learn'd in the practice of their schools,
From women thou hast drawn thy rules:
To them return; in such a cause,
From only such expect applause;
The partial sex I not condemn,
For liking those, who copy them.
Would'st thou the gen'rous lion bind,
By kindness bribe him to be kind;
Good offices their likeness get,
And payment lessons not their debt;
With multiplying hand he gives
The good, from others he receives:
Or for the bad makes fair return,
And pays, with int'rest, scorn for scorn.

FABLE XII.

THE COLT AND THE FARMER.

Tell me, Corinna, if you can,
Why so averse, so coy to man?
Did nature, lavish of her care,
From her best pattern form you fair,
That you, ungrateful to her cause,
Should mock her gifts, and spurn her laws?
And miser-like, withhold that store,
Which by imparting, blesses more?
Beauty s a gift, by heav'n assign'd,
The portion of the female kind;
For this the yielding maid demands
Protection at her lover's hands;
And though by wasting years it fade,
Remembrance tells him, once 'was paid.
And will you then this wealth conceal,
For age to rust, or time to steal?
The summer of your youth to rove,
A stranger to the joys of love?
Then, when life's winter hastens on,
And youth's fair heritage is gone,
Dow'rless to court some peasant's arms,
To guard your wither'd age from harms;
No gratitude to warm his breast,
For blooming beauty, once possess'd:
How will you curse that stubborn pride,
Which drove your bark across the tide,
And sailing before folly's wind,
Left sense and happiness behind?
Corinna, left these whims prevail,
To such as you, I write my tale.

A colt, for blood, and mettled speed,
The choicest of the running breed,
Of youthful strength, and beauty vain,
Refus'd subjection to the rein.
In vain the groom's officious skill
Oppos'd his pride, and check'd his will;
In vain the master's forming care
Restrain'd with threats, or sooth'd with pray'r;
Of freedom proud, and scorning man,
Wild o'er the spacious plains he ran.
Where'er luxuriant nature spread
Her flow'ry carpet o'er the mead,
Or bubbling streams soft-gliding pass,
To cool and freshen up the grass,
Disdaining bounds, he cropp'd the blade,
And wanton'd in the spoil he made.
In plenty thus the summer pass'd,
Revolving winter came at last;
The trees no more a shelter yield,
The verdure withers from the field,
Perpetual snows invest the ground,
In icy chains the streams are bound;
Cold, nipping winds, and rattling hail,
His lank, unsheltered sides assail.
As round he cast his rueful eyes,
He saw the thatch'd-roof cottage rise;
The prospect touch'd his heart with cheer,
And promis'd kind deliv'rance near.
A stable, erst his scorn and hate,
Was now become his wish'd retreat;
His passion cool, his pride forgot,
A farmer's welcome yard he sought.
The master saw his woeful plight,
His limbs, that totter'd with his weight,
And friendly, to the stable led,
And saw him litter'd, dress'd, and fed.
In slothful ease, all night he lay;
The servants rose at break of day;
The market calls. Along the road,
His back must bear the pond'rous load;
In vain he struggles, or complains,
Incessant blows reward his pains.
To-morrow varies but his toil;
Chain'd to the plough, he breaks the soil;
While scanty meals, at night repay
The painful labours of the day.
Subdu'd by toil, with anguish rent,
His self-upbraidings found a vent.
Wretch that I am! he sighing said,
By arrogance and folly led,
Had but my restive youth been brought
To learn the lesson nature taught,
Then had I, like my sires of yore,
The prize from every courser bore;
While man bestow'd rewards and praise,
And females crown'd my latter days.
Now lasting servitude's my lot,
My birth contemn'd, my speed forgot,
Doom'd am I, for my pride, to bear
A living death, from year to year.

FABLE XIII.

THE OWL AND THE NIGHTINGALE.

To know the mistress' humour right,
See if her maids are clean and tight;

If Betty waits without her ſtays,
She copies but her lady's ways.
When miſs comes in with boiſt'rous ſhout,
And drops no curtſy going out,
Depend upon't, mamma is one,
Who reads, or drinks too much alone.
If bottled beer her thirſt aſſuage,
She feels enthuſiaſtic rage,
And burns with ardour to inherit
The gifts and workings of the ſpirit.
If learning crack her giddy brains,
No remedy, but death, remains.
Sum up the various ills of life,
And all are ſweet to ſuch a wife.
At home, ſuperior wit ſhe vaunts,
And twits her huſband with his wants;
Her ragged offspring all around,
Like pigs, are wallowing on the ground:
Impatient ever of controul,
She knows no order, but of ſoul;
With books her litter'd floor is ſpread,
Of nameleſs authors, never read;
Foul linen, petticoats, and lace
Fill up the intermediate ſpace.
Abroad, at viſitings, her tongue
Is never ſtill, and always wrong;
All meanings ſhe defines away,
And ſtands, with truth and ſenſe, at bay.
If e'er ſhe meets a gentle heart,
Skill'd in the houſewife's uſeful art,
Who makes her family her care,
And builds contentment's temple there,
She ſtarts at ſuch miſtakes in nature.
And cries, Lord help us! what a creature!
Meliſſa, if the moral ſtrike,
You'll find the fable not unlike.

An owl, puff'd up with ſelf-conceit,
Lov'd learning better than his meat;
Old manuſcripts he treaſur'd up,
And rummag'd every grocers ſhop;
At paſtry-cooks was known to ply,
And ſtrip, for ſcience, every pye.
For modern poetry, and wit,
He had read all that Blackmore writ;
So intimate with Curl was grown,
His learned treaſures were his own;
To all his authors had acceſs,
And ſometimes would correct the preſs.
In logic he acquir'd ſuch knowledge,
You'd ſwear him fellow of a college;
Alike to every art and ſcience,
His daring genius bid defiance,
And ſwallow'd wiſdom with that haſte,
That cits do cuſtards at a feaſt.
Within the ſhelter of a wood,
One ev'ning, as he muſing ſtood,
Hard by, upon a leafy ſpray,
A nightingale began his lay.
Sudden he ſtarts, with anger ſtung,
And, ſcreeching, interrupts the ſong.
Pert, buſy thing, thy airs give o'er,
And let my contemplations ſoar.
What is the muſic of thy voice,
But jarring diſſonance, and noiſe?
Be wiſe. True harmony, thou'lt find,
Not in the throat, but in the mind;
By empty chirping not attain'd,
But by laborious ſtudy gain'd.
Go read the authors Pope explodes,
Fathom the depth of Cibber's odes,
With modern plays improve thy wit,
Read all the learning Henley writ;
And, if thou needs muſt ſing, ſing then,
And emulate the ways of men;
So ſhalt thou grow, like me, refin'd,
And bring improvement to thy kind.
Thou wretch, the little warbler cry'd,
Made up of ignorance and pride,
Aſk all the birds, and they'll declare,
A greater blockhead wings not air.
Read o'er thyſelf, thy talents ſcan,
Science was only meant for man.
No uſeleſs authors we moleſt,
I mind the duties of my neſt;
With careful wing protect my young,
And cheer their ev'nings with a ſong.
Thus, following nature, and her laws,
From men and birds I claim applauſe;
While nurs'd in pedantry and ſloth,
An owl is ſcorn'd alike by both.

FABLE XIV.

THE TEMPLE OF HYMEN *.

As on my couch ſupine I lay,
Like others, dreaming life away;
Methought, expanded to my ſight,
A temple rear'd its ſtately height.
All ready built, without omitting
One ornament, for temples fitting.
Large look'd the pile, ſublime and fair;
But "Who the Godhead worſhip'd there?"
This to inquire, appearing meet,
Imagination lent me feet,
And thither, without further cavil,
I fairly undertook to travel.
At once, in bright proceſſion ſpied,
The female world was at my ſide,
Mingled, like many colour'd patterns,
Nymphs, mes dames, trollops, belles, and ſlatterns,
From point, and ſaucy ermine, down
To the plain coif, and ruffet gown;
All, by inquiry as I found,
On one important errand bound.
Their van, to either tropic ſpread,
Forerunning expectation led;
Pleaſure the female-ſtandard bore,
And youth danc'd lightly on before;
While prudence, judgment, ſenſe, and taſte,
The few directing virtues, placed

* This and the three following Fables were written by Henry Brooke, Eſq., author of "Guſtavus Vaſa," the Earl of Eſſex, "Fool of Quality," &c. The three laſt were originally printed in Moore's Fables. The firſt is inſerted in this preſent edition, from Brooke's "Plays and Poems," 8vo. 1778, as a ſuitable companion to the reſt.

To form and guide a woman's mind,
Discarded, sigh'd and slunk behind.
At length, in jubilee, arriving,
Where dwelt the jolly god of wiveing,
All pres promiscuously to enter,
Nor once reflected on the venture.
But here, the muse, affecting state,
Beckon'd her clamorous sex to wait,
Lest such a rendezvous should hinder
To say what past, the while, within door.
Against the portal, full in sight,
His sable vesture starr'd like night,
High thron'd upon an ebon seat,
Beneath a canopy of state,
That o'er his dusky temples nodded,
Was fix'd the matrimonial godhead.
Low at his feet, in pomp display'd,
The world's collected wealth was laid:
Where bags of mammon, pil'd around,
And chests on chests, o'erwhelm'd the ground,
With bills, bonds, parchments, the appointers
Of doweries, settlements, and jointures;
From whence, in just proportion weigh'd,
And down, by special tail, convey'd,
The future progenies inherit
Taste, beauty, virtue, sense, and merit.
Whatever titles here may suit us
For this same god, Hymen, or Plutus,
Who, from his trade of a gold-finder,
Might now become a marriage-binder,
And, haply, use that precious metal
To solder sexes, like a kettle;
No earthly god, in my opinion,
Claim'd such an absolute dominion.
To prove his right to adoration
Through every age, and every nation,
Around the spacious dome, display'd
By many a fabled light and shade,
Was emblematically told
The great omnipotence of gold.
And first, in yonder panel seen,
A lad, call'd Paris, strolled the green,
Poor, hungry, witless, and dejected,
By country, and by kin, neglected;
Till fortune, as she cross'd the plain,
Conceiv'd a crotchet in her brain,
And, laughing at the bashful blockhead,
Took a huge pippin from her pocket,
Of the true glittering tempting kind,
And gold throughout from core to rind;
This, in a whim, the dame bestow'd,
Then smiling, turn'd, and went her road.
The neighbours, now, when fame had shown
The youth had got the summum bonum, ['em
From many a hut and hamlet crowd,
And duly at his levy bow'd.
His reputation spreads apace—
O, such a shape, and such a face!
His mouth he opens, and they swear
The Delphic oracle is there.
Now, see the king of Troy aspire
To be the wealthy shepherd's sire.
For him, the brightest nymphs contended;
To him, three goddesses descended,
And show'd, in fair and open day,
Where honour, wit, and beauty lay,
O'er which, our poem, to conceal
From vulgar optics, drops a veil.
In the next panel, you discover
Olympic Jove, that thundering lover,
Who, charm'd with old Acrisius' daughter,
In many a shape had vainly sought her,
And run the round of all his tricks,
Yet still was doubtful where to fix;
Till, by some wiser head inclin'd,
To cast his blustering bolt behind,
His duller light'ning to withhold,
And wear the brighter form of gold,
He took the hint, he storm'd the tower,
And dropt in yon omnific shower.
In the next board, the tale so common is,
'Twixt Atalanta and Hippomenes,
I shall but slightly stop a minute,
To drop one observation in it;
Remarking, that howe'er prefer'd to
Their sex, for many a course in virtue,
The bright allurement, well applied,
May tempt good nymphs to turn aside.
Next, Lybia's golden orchard grew
Blooming temptation to the view,
In which a dragon, call'd the Law,
Kept conscientious fools in awe:
Yet, power superior to the crime,
And tall ambition skill'd to climb,
With traitors of a new invention,
Who sell their country for a pension,
Through many a thicket won their way,
And spoil'd the grove, and shar'd the prey
On the same golden system laid,
The world was in the fifth display'd:
The earth a golden axis turn'd;
The heavens, with golden planets, burn'd;
And thence, as astrologians know,
Derived their influence below:
A girdle, call'd the zodiac, grac'd
The glittering round of nature's waste,
Whose mystic charm from gold arises,
For this the Cæstus of the skies is;
And as in Homer's works, we read
(And Homer is the poet's creed)
Of a well twisted golden tether,
That tied the heavens and earth together,
Such was the cord, or such the cable,
That tied the spheres within this table;
By which, the artist, underhand,
Would give the wise to understand,
That interest, in every creature,
Throughout religion, law, and nature,
From east to west, and pole to pole,
Moves, binds, suspends, and turns the whole.
While thus, in passing slightly o'er, I
Surveyed the scenes of ancient story;
Or eyed, with more minute attention,
What prudence here forbids to mention;
The muse my shoulder tapp'd, to mind me
Of things that pass'd, the while, behind me.
I turn'd, and view'd, with deep surprise,
The phantom that assail'd my eyes:
His hinder-head disrob'd of hair,
His sapless back, and shoulders bare,
Confest the wrinkles of a sage
Who past ten Nestors in his age;

But clothed before, with decent grace,
And infant ſweetneſs in his face,
Not Smintheus with ſuch vigour ſtrung,
Nor blooming Hebe look'd ſo young.
On his left hand a palette lay,
With many a teint of colours gay;
While, guided with an eaſy ſlight,
The flying pencil graced his right.
Unnumber'd canvaſſes appear'd,
Before the moving artiſt rear'd,
On whoſe inſpirited expanſe he
Expreſt the creatures of his fancy;
So touch'd, with ſuch a ſwift command,
With ſuch a magic power of hand,
That Nature did herſelf appear
Leſs real than her ſemblance here,
And not a mortal, ſo betray'd,
Could know the ſubſtance from the ſhade!
Whate'er the world conceives in life,
Worth toil, anxiety, and ſtrife;
Whate'er by ignorance is bought,
By madneſs wiſh'd, or folly ſought,
The mitres, coronets, and garters,
To which ambition leads his martyrs;
With every joy, and toy, that can
Amuſe the various child of man,
Was painted here in many a ſcene,
A trifling, tranſient, charming train!
Awhile I ſtood, in thought ſuſpended,
To gueſs what theſe affairs intended;
When, lo! the muſe, in whiſpers, told,
"'Tis Father Time whom you behold;
"In part diſcovered to the wiſe,
"In part conceal'd from human eyes.
"A ſlave to you gold-giving power,
"For him he ſpends each reſtleſs hour;
"The product of his toil intends
"As gifts to thoſe his God befriends,
"And paints what other mortals view
"As ſubſtances, though ſhades to you."
She ceas'd, and turning to the ſentry,
Deſired he'd give the ladies entry;
And ſtraight the portal open'd wide,
And in they delug'd like a tide.
So, to ſome grove by ſtrefs of weather,
Faſt flock the fowl of every feather;
A mighty, pretty, prating rabble,
Like Iris rigg'd, and tongu'd like Babel;
Then crowding toward the nuptial throne,
By bags of ſtrong attraction known,
Low bending to their God they bow'd,
And vented thus their prayer aloud:
"Great Power! in whom our ſex confides,
"Who ruleſt the turns of female tides.
"Who kenſt while varying fancy ranges
"Through all its doubles, twirles and changes,
"To what a woman's heart is prone,
"A ſecret to ourſelves unknown—
"O give us, give us, Mighty Power!
"The wedded joy of every hour:
"Aſſign thy favourites in marriage,
"To coaches of diſtinguiſh'd carriage;
"To all the frippery of dreſſing,
"A nameleſs, boundleſs, endleſs bleſſing;
"To drums, ridottos, fights and ſounds;
"To viſits in eternal rounds;
"To card and counter, rake and rattle;
"To the whole luſt of tongue and tattle;
"And all the dear delightful trances
"Of countleſs frolics, fits, and fancies.
"You've heard, that men, unpoliſh'd boors!
"Lay naughty paſſions at our doors;
"'Tis your's to contradict the liar,
"Who are, yourſelf, our chief deſire.
"O then, as widow, or as wife,
"To you we yield each choice in life;
"Or would you every prayer fulfil,
"Wed us. O! wed us, to our will!"
They ceas'd, and, without more addition,
The God confirm'd their full petition:
To Time he beckon'd, and deſired
He'd give the good each nymph required;
And, from his viſionary treaſure,
Wed every woman to her pleaſure.
The firſt, who came, reſolv'd to fix
Upon a gilded coach and ſix;
The ſuit was granted her on ſight,
The nymph with ardour ſeiz'd her right.
A wonder! by poſſeſſion baniſh'd,
The coach and dappled courſers vaniſh'd;
And a foul waggon held the fair
Full laden with a weight of care:
She ſigh'd; her ſiſters caught the ſound,
And one inſulting laugh went round.
The ſecond was a dame of Britain,
Who by a coronet was ſmitten;
With boldneſs ſhe advanc'd her claim,
Exulting in ſo juſt a flame.
But ah! where bliſs alone was patent,
What unſuſpected miſchief latent!
The worſt in all Pandora's box,
Her coronet contain'd a ——.
With this example in her eye,
The third, a widow'd dame, drew nigh,
And fix'd her ſight and ſoul together
Upon a raking hat and feather;
Nor ſigh'd in vain, but ſeiz'd her due,
And claſp'd old age in twenty-two.
Thus, through the difference and degrees
Of ſword-knots, mitres, and toupees,
Prim bands pert bobs, and well hung blades,
Long robes, ſmart jackets, fierce cockades,
And all the fooleries in faſhion,
Whate'er became the darling paſſion,
The good for which they did importune,
Was ſtraight revers'd into misfortune;
And every woman, like the firſt,
Was, at her own entreaty, curſt.
At length, was introduced a fair,
With ſuch a face, and ſuch an air,
As never was on earth, I ween,
Save by poetic organs ſeen.
With decent grace, and gentle cheer,
The bright adventurer drew near;
Her mild approach the Godhead ſpied,
And, "Faireſt," with a ſmile, he cried,
"If aught you ſeek in Hymen's power,
"You find him in a happy hour."
At this, the virgin, half amazed,
As round the ſpacious dome ſhe gazed,
With caution every ſymbol eyed,
And, bluſhing, gracefully replied.

" If you are he, whose power controuls
" And knits the sympathy of souls.
" Then, whence this pomp of worthless geer,
" And why this heap of counters here?
" Is this vain show of glittering ore,
" The bliss, that Hymen has in store?
" Love sees the folly, with the gloss,
" And laughs to scorn thy useless dross.
" Where are the symbols of thy reign?
" And where thy robe of Tyrian grain,
" Whose teint, in virgin-colours dyed,
" Derives its blushing from the bride?
" Where is thy torch, serenely bright,
" To lovers yielding warmth and light,
" That from the heart derives its fire,
" And only can, with life, expire?
" Will this unactive mass impart
" The social feelings of the heart?
" Or can material fetters bind
" The free affections of the mind?
" Through every age, the great, the wise,
" Behold thee with superior eyes;
" Love spurns thy treasures with disdain,
" And virtue flies thy hostile reign.
" By love, congenial souls embrace,
" Celestial source of human race!
" From whence the cordial sense within,
" The bosom'd amities of kin,
" The call of nature to her kind,
" And all the tunings of the mind,
" That, winding Heaven's harmonious plan,
" Compose the brotherhood of man."
She said, and gracefully withdrew;
Her steps the muse and I pursue.
Along an unfrequented way
The virgin led, nor led astray;
Till, like the first, in form and size,
A second fabric struck our eyes:
We enter'd, guided by the fair,
And saw a second Hymen there.
A silken robe, of saffron hue,
About his decent shoulders flew;
While a fair taper's virgin light
Gave Ovid to his soul and sight.
An hundred Cupids wanton'd round,
Whose useless quivers strew'd the ground;
While, careless of their wonted trade,
They with the smiling Graces play'd.
Along the wall's extended side,
With taints of varying nature dyed,
In needled tapestry, was told
The tale of many a love of old.
In groves, that breath'd a citron air,
Together walk'd the wedded pair;
Or toy'd upon the vernal ground,
Their beauteous offspring sporting round,
Or, lock'd in sweet embracement, lay,
And slept, and lov'd, the night away.
There sat Penelope in tears,
Besieg'd, like Troy, for ten long years:
Her suitors, in a neighbouring room,
Wait the long promise of the loom,
Which she defers from day to day,
Till death determin'd to delay.
With thoughts of fond remembrance wrung,
Deep sorrowing, o'er her work she hung;
Where in the fields at Ilium fought,
The labours of her lord she wrought,
The toil, the dust, the flying foe,
The rallied host, the instant blow;
Then sighing, trembled at the view,
Scar'd at the dangers which she drew.
There too, suspended o'er the wave,
Alcione was seen to rave,
When, as the foundering wreck she spied,
She on her sinking Ceyx cried:
Her Ceyx, though by seas oppress,
Still bears her image in his breast;
And, with his fondest, latest breath,
Murmurs, " Alcione!" in death.
Panthea there, upon a bier,
Laid the sole lord of her desire:
His limbs were scatter'd through the plains;
She join'd and kiss'd the dear remains.
Too ponderous was her weight of woe
For sighs to rise, or tears to flow;
On the lov'd corse she fix'd her view,
No other use of seeing knew;
While high and stedfast as she gaz'd,
Her snowy arm a poniard rais'd,
Nor yet the desperate weapon staid,
But for a longer look delay'd;
Till, plung'd within her beauteous breast,
She on his bosom sunk to rest.
But, Oh! beyond whate'er was told
In modern tales, or truths of old,
One pair, in form and spirit twin'd,
Out-lov'd the loves of human kind;
She Hero, he Leander, nam'd,
For mutual faith as beauty fam'd!
Their story from its source begun,
And to the fatal period run.
While bow'd at Cytherea's shrine,
The youth adores her power divine,
He sees her blooming priestess there,
Beyond the sea-born goddess fair:
She, as some god, the stripling eyes,
Just lighted from his native skies—
The god whose chariot guides the hour,
Or haply love's immortal power.
At once their conscious glances spoke
Like fate the strong and mutual stroke;
Attracted by a secret force,
Like currents meeting in their course,
That thence one stream for ever rolls,
Together rush'd their mingling souls,
Too close for fortune to divide,
For each was lost in either tide.
In vain, by ruthless parents torn,
Their bodies are asunder borne,
And towering bulwarks intervene,
And envious ocean rolls between;
Love wings their letters o'er the sea,
And kisses melt the seals away.
And now the sable night impends,
Leander to the shore descends,
Exults at the appointed hour,
And marks the signal on the tower—
A torch, to guide the lover's way,
Endear'd beyond the brightest day:
At once he plunges in the tide;
His arms the Hellespont divide;

The danger and the toil he braves,
And daſhes the contending waves.
While near and nearer to his ſight
The taper darts a ruddier light,
Recruited at the view, he glows:
Aſide the whelming billow throws:
The winds and ſeas oppoſe in vain;
He ſpurns, he mounts, he ſkims the main.
Now from the tower, where Hero ſtood,
And threw a radiance o'er the flood,
Leander in the deep ſhe ſpied,
And would have ſprung to join his ſide;
Howe'er, her wiſhes make eſſay,
And claſp and warm him on his way.
The main is croſs'd, the ſhore is gain'd,
The long wiſh'd hour at laſt attain'd.
But, lovers, if there e'er aroſe
A pair ſo form'd and fond as thoſe,
So lov'd, ſo beauteous, and ſo bleſt,
Alone can ſpeak or think the reſt;
Nor will the weeping muſe unfold
The cloſe, too tragic to be told!
Long were the loving liſt to name
With Portia's faith, that ſwallow'd flame:
But much the longer liſt were thoſe
Whoſe joys were unallay'd by woes;
Whoſe bliſs no cruel parents croſt,
Whoſe love not ages could exhauſt,
Where not a cloud did intervene,
Or once o'ercaſt their bright ſerene,
But through the ſummer's day of life,
The huſband, tender as the wife,
Like Henry and his nut-brown maid,
Their faith nor ſhaken nor decay'd,
Together ran the bliſs-ful race,
Together liv'd, and ſlept in peace.
Long time the much inquiring maid
From ſtory on to ſtory ſtray'd;
Joy'd in the joys that lovers know,
Or wept her tribute to their woe;
Till Hymen, with a placid air,
Approaching, thus addreſs'd the fair:
"Hail to the nymph, whoſe ſacred train
"Of virtues ſhall reſtore my reign!
"Whate'er the wiſhes of thy ſoul,
"But ſpeak them, and poſſeſs the whole."
"Thanks, gentle power," the maid reply'd;
"Your bounty ſhall be amply try'd.
"I ſeek not titles, rank, or ſtate,
"Superfluous to the truly great;
"Nor yet to ſordid wealth inclin'd,
"The pooreſt paſſion of the mind;
"But, ſimply fix'd to nature's plan,
"I ſeek the aſſociate in the man.
"Yet, O beware! for much depends
"On what that ſyllable intends.
"Give him a form that may delight
"My inward ſenſe, my mental ſight;
"In every outward act deſign'd
"To ſpeak an elegance of mind:
"In him, by ſcience, travel, taſte,
"Be nature poliſh'd, not defac'd;
"And ſet, as is the brilliant ſtone,
"To be with double luſtre ſhown.
"Sweet be the muſic of his tongue,
"And as the lyre of David ſtrung,
"To ſteal from each delighted day
"Affliction, care, and time, away.
"Within his comprehenſive ſoul
"Let Heaven's harmonious ſyſtem roll;
"There let the great, the good, the wiſe,
"Of fam'd antiquity ariſe,
"From ev'ry age and ev'ry clime
"Eluding death, and circling time!
"There let the ſacred virtues meet,
"And range their known and native ſeat!
"There let the charities unite,
"And human feelings weep delight!"
"Kind power! if ſuch a youth you know,
"He's all the heaven I aſk below."
So wiſh'd the much aſpiring maid,
Pale turn'd the power, and, ſighing, ſaid:
"Alas! like him you fondly claim,
"Through every boaſted form and name,
"That graces nature's varying round,
"A ſecond is not to be found!
"Your ſuit, fair creature, muſt miſcarry,
"Till Charlemont reſolves to marry."

FABLE XV.

THE SPARROW, AND THE DOVE.

It was, as learn'd traditions ſay,
Upon an April's blithſome day,
When pleaſure, ever on the wing,
Return'd, companion of the ſpring,
And cheer'd the birds with am'rous heat,
Inſtructing little hearts to beat;
A ſparrow, frolic, gay, and young,
Of bold addreſs, and flippant tongue,
Juſt left his lady of a night,
Like him, to follow new delight.
The youth, of many a conqueſt vain,
Flew off to ſeek the chirping train;
The chirping train he quickly found,
And with a ſaucy eaſe, bow'd round.
For every ſhe his boſom burns,
And this, and that he wooes by turns;
And here a ſigh, and there a bill,
And here—thoſe eyes, ſo form'd to kill!
And now, with ready tongue, he ſtrings
Unmeaning, ſoft, reſiſtleſs things;
With vows, and demme's ſkill'd to woo,
As other pretty fellows do.
Not that he thought this ſhort eſſay
A prologue needful to his play;
No, truſt me, ſays our learned letter,
He knew the virtuous ſex much better;
But theſe he held as ſpecious arts,
To ſhow his own ſuperior parts,
The form of decency to ſhield,
And give a juſt pretence to yield.
Thus finiſhing his courtly play,
He mark'd the fav'rite of a day;
With careleſs impudence drew near,
And whiſper'd Hebrew in her ear;
A hint, which like the maſon's ſign,
The conſcious can alone divine.
The flutt'ring nymph, expert at feigning,
Cry'd, Sir!—pray Sir, explain your meaning——
Go prate to thoſe, that may endure ye——
To me this rudeneſs!—I'll aſſure ye!——

Then off she glided, like a swallow,
As saying—you guess where to follow.
To such as know the party set,
'Tis needless to declare they met;
The parson's barn, as authors mention,
Confess'd the fair had apprehension.
Her honour there secure from stain,
She held all further trifling vain,
No more affected to be coy,
But rush'd, licentious, on the joy.
Hist, love! the male companion cry'd,
Retire a while; I fear we're spy'd.
Nor was the caution vain; he saw
A turtle, rustling in the straw,
While o'er her callow brood she hung,
And fondly thus address'd her young.
Ye tender objects of my care!
Peace, peace, ye little helpless pair!
Anon he comes, your gentle sire,
And brings you all your hearts require.
For us, his infants, and his bride,
For us with only love to guide,
Our lord assumes an eagle's speed,
And like a lion, dares to bleed.
Nor yet by wint'ry skies confin'd,
He mounts upon the rudest wind,
From danger tears the vital spoil,
And with affection sweetens toil.
Ah cease, too vent'rous! cease to dare,
In thine our dearer safety spare!
From him, ye cruel falcons, stray,
And turn, ye fowlers, far away!
Should I survive to see the day,
That tears me from myself away,
That cancels all that heav'n could give,
The life, by which alone I live,
Alas, how more than lost were I,
Who, in the thought, already die!
Ye pow'rs, whom men, and birds obey,
Great rulers of your creatures, say,
Why mourning comes, by bliss convey'd,
And ev'n the sweets of love allay'd?
Where grows enjoyment, tall, and fair,
Around it twines entangling care;
While fear for what our souls possess,
Encrvates every pow'r to bless;
Yet friendship forms the bliss above,
And life! what art thou, without love?
Our hero, who had heard apart,
Felt something moving in his heart,
But quickly, with disdain, suppress'd
The virtue, rising in his breast;
And first he feign'd to laugh aloud,
And next, approaching, smil'd and bow'd.
Madam, you must not think me rude;
Good manners never can intrude;
I vow I come through pure good nature—
Upon my soul a charming creature!
Are these the comforts of a wife?
This careful, cloister'd, moping life?
No doubt, that odious thing call'd duty,
Is a sweet province for a beauty.
Thou pretty ignorance! thy will
Is measur'd to thy want of skill;
That good old-fashion'd dame, thy mother,
Has taught thy infant years no other.
The greatest ill in the creation,
Is sure the want of education.
But think ye?—tell me without feigning,
Have all these charms no farther meaning?
Dame nature, if you don't forget her,
Might teach your ladyship much better.
For shame, reject this mean employment,
Enter the world and taste enjoyment;
Where time by circling bliss we measure;
Beauty was form'd alone for pleasure:
Come, prove the blessing, follow me,
Be wise, be happy, and be free.
Kind Sir, reply'd our matron chaste,
Your zeal seems pretty much in haste;
I own, the fondness to be bless'd
Is a deep thirst in every breast;
Of blessings too I have my store,
Yet quarrel not, should heav'n give more;
Then prove the change to be expedient,
And think me, Sir, your most obedient.
Here turning, as to one inferior,
Our gallant spoke, and smil'd superior.
Methinks, to quit your boasted station
Requires a world of hesitation;
Where brats, and bonds are held a blessing,
The case, I doubt, is past redressing.
Why, child, suppose the joys I mention,
Were the mere fruits of my invention,
You've cause sufficient for your carriage,
In flying from the nurse of marriage;
That fly decoy, when vary'd snares,
That takes your widgeons in by pairs;
Alike to husband, and to wife,
The cure of love, and bane of life;
The only method of forecasting,
To make misfortune firm, and lasting;
The sin, by heav'n's peculiar sentence,
Unpardon'd through a life's repentance.
It is the double snake, that weds
A common tail to diff'rent heads,
That lead the carcass still astray,
By dragging each a diff'rent way.
Of all the ills that may attend me,
From marriage, mighty gods, defend me!
Give me frank nature's wild demesne,
And boundless tract of air serene,
Where fancy, ever wing'd for change,
Delights to sport, delights to range;
There, liberty! to thee is owing
Whate'er of bliss is worth bestowing;
Delights, still vary'd, and divine,
Sweet goddess of the hills! are thine.
What say you now, you pretty pink you?
Have I, for once, spoke reason, think you?
You take me now for no romancer—
Come, never study for an answer;
Away, cast every care behind ye,
And fly where joy alone shall find ye.
Soft yet, return'd our female fencer,
A question more, or so—and then, Sir.
You've rally'd me with sense exceeding,
With much fine wit, and better breeding;
But pray, Sir, how do you contrive it?
Do those of your world never wive it?
"No, no." How then? "Why, dare I tell,
"What does the business full as well."

Do you ne'er love? "An hour at leiſure."
Have you no friendſhips? "Yes, for pleaſure."
No care for little ones? "We get 'em,
"The reſt the mothers mind, and let 'em."
Thou wretch, rejoin'd the kindling dove,
Quite loſt to life, as loſt to love!
Whene'er misfortune comes, how juſt!
And come misfortune ſurely muſt;
In the dread ſeaſon of diſmay,
In that, your hour of trial, ſay,
Who then ſhall prop your ſinking heart?
Who bear affliction's weightier part?
Say, when the black-brow'd welkin bends,
And winter's gloomy form impends,
To mourning turns all tranſient cheer,
And blaſts the melancholy year;
For times, at no perſuaſion, ſtay,
Nor vice can find perpetual May;
Then where's that tongue, by folly fed,
That ſoul of pertneſs, whither fled?
All ſhrunk within thy lonely neſt,
Forlorn, abandon'd, and unbleſs'd;
No friends, by cordial bonds ally'd,
Shall ſeek thy cold, unſocial ſide;
No chirping prattlers, to delight
Shall turn the long-enduring night;
No bride her words of balm impart,
And warm thee at her conſtant heart.
Freedom, reſtrain'd by reaſon's force,
Is as the ſun's unvarying courſe,
Benignly active, ſweetly bright,
Affording warmth, affording light;
But torn from virtue's ſacred rules,
Becomes a comet, gaz'd by fools,
Foreboding cares, and ſtorms, and ſtrife,
And fraught with all the plagues of life.
Thou fool! by union every creature
Subſiſts, through univerſal nature;
And this, to beings void of mind,
Is wedlock, of a meaner kind.
While womb'd in ſpace, primæval clay
A yet unfaſhion'd embryo lay,
The ſource of endleſs good above
Shot down his ſpark of kindling love
Touch'd by the all-enliv'ning flame,
Then motion firſt exulting came;
Each atom ſought its ſep'rate claſs,
Through many a fair enamour'd maſs;
Love caſt the central charm around,
And with eternal nuptials bound.
Then form, and order o'er the ſky,
Firſt train'd their bridal pomp on high;
The ſun diſplay'd his orb to ſight,
And burnt with hymeneal light.
Hence nature's virgin womb conceiv'd,
And with the genial burden heav'd;
Forth came the oak, her firſt-born heir,
And ſcal'd the breathing ſteep of air;
Then infant ſtems, of various uſe,
Imbib'd her ſoft, maternal juice;
The flow'rs, in early bloom diſclos'd,
Upon her fragrant breaſt repos'd;
Within her warm embraces grew
A race of endleſs form, and hue;
Then pour'd her leſſer offspring round,
And fondly cloth'd their parent ground.

Nor here alone the virtue reign'd,
By matter's cumb'ring form detain'd;
But thence, ſubliming, and refin'd,
Aſpir'd, and reach'd its kindred mind.
Caught in the fond, celeſtial fire,
The mind perceiv'd unknown deſire,
And now with kind effuſion flow'd,
And now with cordial ardours glow'd,
Beheld the ſympathetic fair,
And lov'd its own reſemblance there;
On all with circling radiance ſhone,
But cent'ring, fix'd on one alone;
There claſp'd the heaven-appointed wife,
And doubled every joy of life.
Here ever bleſſing, ever bleſs'd,
Reſides this beauty of the breaſt;
As from his palace, here the god
Still beams effulgent bliſs abroad,
Here gems his own eternal round,
The ring, by which the world is bound,
Here bids his ſeat of empire grow,
And builds his little heav'n below.
The bridal partners thus ally'd,
And thus in ſweet accordance ty'd,
One body, heart and ſpirit live,
Enrich'd by every joy they give;
Like echo, from her vocal hold,
Return'd in muſic twenty fold.
Their union firm, and undecay'd,
Nor time can ſhake, nor pow'r invade;
But as the ſtem, and ſcion ſtand,
Ingrafted by a ſkilful hand,
They check the tempeſt's wint'ry rage,
And bloom and ſtrengthen into age.
A thouſand amities unknown,
And pow'rs, perceiv'd by love alone,
Endearing looks, and chaſte deſire,
Fan, and ſupport the mutual fire,
Whoſe flame, perpetual, as refin'd,
Is fed by an immortal mind.
Nor yet the nuptial faction ends,
Like Nile it opens, and deſcends,
Which, by apparent windings led,
We trace to its celeſtial head.
The ſire, firſt ſpringing from above,
Becomes the ſource of life, and love,
And gives his filial heir to flow,
In fondneſs down on ſons below:
Thus roll'd in one continu'd tide,
To time's extremeſt verge they glide,
While kindred ſtreams, on either hand,
Branch forth in bleſſings o'er the land.
Thee, wretch! no liſping babe ſhall name,
No late-returning brother claim,
No kinſman on thy road rejoice,
No ſiſter greet thy ent'ring voice,
With partial eyes no parents ſee,
And bleſs'd their years reſtor'd in thee.
In age rejected, or declin'd,
An alien, ev'n among thy kind,
The partner of thy ſcorn'd embrace
Shall play the wanton in thy face,
Each ſpark unplume thy little pride,
All friendſhip fly thy faithleſs ſide,
Thy name ſhall like thy carcaſs rot,
In ſickneſs ſpurn'd, in death forgot.

All-giving pow'r! great ſource of life!
O hear the parent! hear the wife!
That life, thou lendeſt from above,
Though little, make it large in love.
O bid my feeling heart expand
To every claim, on every hand;
To thoſe, from whom my days I drew,
To theſe, in whom thoſe days renew;
To all my kin, however wide,
In cordial warmth, as blood ally'd;
To friends, with ſteely fetters twin'd,
And to the cruel not unkind!
But chief, the lord of my deſire,
My life, myſelf, my ſoul, my fire,
Friends, children, all that wiſh can claim,
Chaſte paſſion claſp, and rapture name;
O ſpare him, ſpare him, gracious pow'r!
O give him to my lateſt hour!
Let me my length of life employ,
To give my ſole enjoyment joy.
His love, let mutual love excite,
Turn all my cares to his delight,
And every needleſs bleſſing ſpare,
Wherein my darling wants a ſhare.
When he with graceful action wooes,
And ſweetly bills, and fondly cooes,
Ah! deck me, to his eyes alone,
With charms attractive as his own,
And in my circling wings careſs'd,
Give all the lover to my breaſt.
Then in our chaſte, connubial bed,
My boſom pillow'd for his head,
His eyes with bliſsful ſlumbers cloſe,
And watch, with me, my lord's repoſe,
Your peace around his temples twine,
And love him with a love like mine.
And, for I know his gen'rous flame,
Beyond whate'er my ſex can claim,
Me too to your protection take,
And ſpare me for my huſband's ſake.
Let one unruffled, calm delight
The loving, and belov'd unite;
One pure deſire our boſoms warm,
One will direct, one wiſh inform;
Through life, one mutual aid ſuſtain,
In death, one peaceful grave contain.
While, ſwelling with the darling theme,
Her accents pour'd an endleſs ſtream,
The well-known wings a ſound impart,
That reach'd her ear, and touch'd her heart!
Quick dropp'd the muſic of her tongue,
And forth, with eager joy, ſhe ſprung.
As ſwift her ent'ring conſort flew,
And plum'd, and kindled at the view;
Their wings their ſouls embracing meet,
Their hearts with anſw'ring meaſure beat;
Half loſt in ſacred ſweets, and bleſs'd
With raptures felt, but ne'er expreſs'd.
Strait to her humble roof ſhe led
The partner of her ſpotleſs bed;
Her young, a flutt'ring pair, ariſe,
Their welcome ſparkling in their eyes;
Tranſported, to their ſire they bound,
And hang with ſpeechleſs action round.
In pleaſure wrapt, the parents ſtand,
And ſee their little wings expand;
The fire, his life-ſuſtaining prize
To each expecting bill applies,
There fondly pours the wheaten ſpoil,
With tranſport giv'n, though won with toil;
While, all collected at the ſight,
And ſilent through ſupreme delight,
The fair high heav'n of bliſs beguiles,
And on her lord, and infants ſmiles.
The ſparrow, whoſe attention hung
Upon the dove's enchanting tongue,
Of all his little ſlights diſarm'd,
And from himſelf, by virtue, charm'd,
When now he ſaw, what only ſeem'd,
A fact, ſo late a fable deem'd,
His ſoul to envy he reſign'd,
His hours of folly to the wind,
In ſecret wiſh'd a turtle too,
And ſighing to himſelf, withdrew.

FABLE XVI.

THE FEMALE SEDUCERS.

'Tis ſaid of widow, maid, and wife,
That honour is a woman's life;
Unhappy ſex! who only claim
A being, in the breath of fame,
Which, tainted, not the quick'ning gales
That ſweep Sabæa's ſpicy vales,
Nor all the healing ſweets reſtore,
That breathe along Arabia's ſhore.
The trav'ller, if he chance to ſtray,
May turn unenſur'd to his way;
Polluted ſtreams again are pure,
And deepeſt wounds admit a cure;
But woman! no redemption knows,
The wounds of honour never cloſe.
Though diſtant every hand to guide,
Nor ſkill'd on life's tempeſtuous tide,
If once her feeble bark recede,
Or deviate from the courſe decreed,
In vain ſhe ſeeks the friendleſs ſhore,
Her ſwifter folly flies before;
The circling ports againſt her cloſe,
And ſhut the wand'rer from repoſe;
Till, by conflicting waves oppreſs'd,
Her found'ring pinnace ſinks to reſt.
Are there no off'rings to atone
For but a ſingle error? None.
Though woman is avow'd, of old,
No daughter of celeſtial mould,
Her temp'ring not without allay,
And form'd but of the finer clay,
We challenge from the mortal dame
The ſtrength angelic natures claim;
Nay more; for ſacred ſtories tell,
That ev'n immortal angels fell.
Whatever fills the teeming ſphere
Of humid earth, and ambient air,
With varying elements endu'd,
Was form'd to fall, and riſe renew'd.
The ſtars no fix'd duration know,
Wide oceans ebb, again to flow,
The moon repletes her waning face,
All-beauteous, from her late diſgrace,
And ſuns, that mourn approaching night,
Reſulgent riſe with new-born light.

In vain may death, and time ſubdue,
While nature mints her race anew,
And holds ſome vital ſpark apart,
Like virtue, hid in every heart;
'Tis hence reviving warmth is ſeen,
To clothe a naked world in green.
No longer barr'd by winter's cold,
Again the gates of life unfold;
Again each inſect tries his wing,
And lifts freſh pinions on the ſpring;
Again from every latent root
The bladed ſtem, and tendril ſhoot,
Exhaling incenſe to the ſkies,
Again to periſh, and to riſe.
And muſt weak woman then diſown
The change, to which a world is prone?
In one meridian brightneſs ſhine,
And ne'er, like ev'ning ſuns, decline?
Reſolv'd and firm alone?—Is this
What we demand of woman?—Yes.
But ſhould the ſpark of veſtal fire
In ſome unguarded hour expire,
Or ſhould the nightly thief invade
Heſperia's chaſte, and ſacred ſhade,
Of all the blooming ſpoil poſſeſs'd,
The dragon honour charm'd to reſt,
Shall virtue's flame no more return?
No more with virgin ſplendour burn?
No more the ravag'd garden blow
With ſpring's ſucceeding bloſſom?—No.
Pity may mourn, but not reſtore,
And woman falls, to riſe no more.

Within this ſublunary ſphere,
A country lies—no matter where;
The clime may readily be found
By all, who tread poetic ground.
A ſtream call'd life, acroſs it glides,
And equally the land divides;
And here, of vice the province lies,
And there, the hills of virtue riſe.
Upon a mountain's airy ſtand,
Whoſe ſummit look'd to either land,
An ancient pair their dwelling choſe,
As well for proſpect, as repoſe:
For mutual faith they long were fam'd,
And temp'rance, and religion, nam'd.
A num'rous progeny divine
Confeſs'd the honours of their line;
But in a little daughter fair,
Was center'd more than half their care;
For heav'n to gratulate her birth,
Gave ſigns of future joy to earth;
White was the robe this infant wore,
And chaſtity the name ſhe bore.
As now the maid in ſtature grew,
(A flow'r juſt op'ning to the view)
Oft through her native lawns ſhe ſtray'd,
And wreſtling with the lambkins play'd;
Her looks diffuſive ſweets bequeath'd,
The breeze grew purer as ſhe breath'd,
The morn her radiant bluſh aſſum'd,
The ſpring with earlier fragrance bloom'd,
And nature, yearly, took delight,
Like her, to dreſs the world in white.
But when her riſing form was ſeen
To reach the criſis of fifteen,
Her parents up the mountain's head,
With anxious ſtep their darling led;
By turns they ſnatch'd her to their breaſt,
And thus the fears of age expreſs'd.
O joyful cauſe of many a care!
O daughter, too divinely fair!
Yon world, on this important day,
Demands thee to a dangerous way;
A painful journey, all muſt go,
Whoſe doubtful period none can know,
Whoſe due direction who can find,
Where reaſon's mute, and ſenſe is blind?
Ah, what unequal leaders theſe,
Through ſuch a wide, perplexing maze!
Then mark the warnings of the wiſe,
And learn what love, and years adviſe.
Far to the right thy proſpect bend,
Where yonder tow'ring hills aſcend;
Lo, there the arduous paths in view,
Which virtue, and her ſons purſue!
With toil o'er leſs'ning earth they riſe,
And gain, and gain upon the ſkies.
Narrow's the way her children tread,
No walk, for pleaſure ſmoothly ſpread,
But rough, and difficult, and ſteep,
Painful to climb, and hard to keep.
Fruits immature thoſe lands diſpenſe,
A food indelicate to ſenſe,
Of taſte unpleaſant; yet from thoſe
Pure health, with cheerful vigour flows,
And ſtrength, unfeeling of decay,
Throughout the long, laborious way.
Hence, as they ſcale that heav'nly road,
Each limb is lighten'd of its load;
From earth refining ſtill they go,
And leave the mortal weight below;
Then ſpreads the ſtrait, the doubtful clears,
And ſmooth the rugged path appears;
For cuſtom turns fatigue to eaſe,
And, taught by virtue, pain can pleaſe.
At length, the toilſome journey o'er,
And near the bright, celeſtial ſhore,
A gulf, black, fearful, and profound,
Appears, of either world the bound,
Through darkneſs, leading up to light:
Senſe backward ſhrinks, and ſhuns the ſight;
For there the tranſitory train,
Of time, and form, and care, and pain,
And matter's groſs encumb'ring maſs,
Man's late aſſociates, cannot paſs,
But ſinking, quit th' immortal charge,
And leave the wond'ring ſoul at large;
Lightly ſhe wings her obvious way,
And mingles with eternal day.
Thither, O! thither wing thy ſpeed,
Though pleaſure charm, or pain impede!
To ſuch th' all-bounteous pow'r has giv'n,
For preſent earth, a future heav'n;
For trivial loſs, unmeaſur'd gain,
And endleſs bliſs, for tranſient pain.
Then fear, ah! fear to turn thy ſight,
Where yonder flow'ry fields invite;
Wide on the left the path-way bends,
And with pernicious eaſe deſcends;

There ſweet to ſenſe, and fair to ſhow,
New-planted Edens ſeem to blow,
Trees, that delicious poiſon bear,
For death is vegetable there.
Hence is the frame of health unbrac'd,
Each ſinew ſlack'ning at the taſte;
The ſoul to paſſion yields her throne,
And ſees with organs not her own;
While, like the ſlumb'rer in the night,
Pleas'd with the ſhadowy dream of light,
Before her alienated eyes
The ſcenes of fairy-land ariſe;
The puppet world's amuſing ſhow,
Dipt in the gaily-colour'd bow;
Scepters, and wreaths, and glitt'ring things,
The toys of infants, and of kings,
That tempt, along the baneful plain,
The idly wiſe, and lightly vain,
Till verging on the gulfy ſhore,
Sudden they ſink, and riſe no more.
But liſt to what thy fates declare;
Though thou art woman, frail as fair,
If once thy ſliding foot ſhould ſtray,
Once quit yon heav'n-appointed way,
For thee, loſt maid, for thee alone,
Nor pray'rs ſhall plead, nor tears atone;
Reproach, ſcorn, infamy, and hate,
On thy returning ſteps ſhall wait,
Thy form be loath'd by every eye,
And every foot thy preſence fly.
Thus arm'd with words of potent ſound,
Like guardian angels plac'd around,
A charm, by truth divinely caſt,
Forward our young advent'rer paſs'd.
Forth from her ſacred eye-lids ſent,
Like morn, fore-running radiance went,
While honour, hand-maid, late aſſign'd,
Upheld her lucid train behind.
Awe-ſtruck, the much admiring crowd
Before the virgin viſion bow'd,
Gaz'd with an ever-new delight,
And caught freſh virtues at the ſight:
For not of earth's unequal frame
They deem'd the heav'n-compounded dame,
If matter, ſure the moſt refin'd,
High wrought, and temper'd into mind,
Some darling daughter of the day,
And body'd by her native ray.
Where'er ſhe paſſes, thouſands bend,
And thouſands, where ſhe moves, attend;
Her ways obſervant eyes confeſs,
Her ſteps purſuing praiſes bleſs;
While to the elevated maid
Oblations, as to heav'n, are paid.
'Twas on an ever-blithſome day,
The jovial birth of roſy May,
When genial warmth, no more ſuppreſs'd,
New-melts the froſt in every breaſt,
The cheek with ſecret flushing dies,
And looks kind things from chaſteſt eyes;
The ſun with healthier viſage glows,
Aſide his clouded kerchief throws,
And dances up th' ethereal plain,
Where late he us'd to climb with pain,
While nature, as from bonds ſet free,
Springs out, and gives a looſe to glee.

And now, for momentary reſt,
The nymph her travell'd ſtep repreſs'd,
Juſt turn'd to view the ſtage attain'd,
And glory'd in the height ſhe gain'd.
Out-ſtretch'd before her wide ſurvey,
The realms of ſweet perdition lay,
And pity touch'd her ſoul with woe,
To ſee a world ſo loſt below;
When ſtrait the breeze began to breathe
Airs, gently wafted from beneath,
That bore commiſſion'd witchcraft thence,
And reach'd her ſympathy of ſenſe;
No ſounds of diſcord, that diſcloſe
A people ſunk, and loſt in woes,
But as of preſent good poſſeſs'd,
The very triumph of the bleſs'd.
The maid in wrapt attention hung,
While thus approaching Sirens ſung.
Hither, faireſt, hither haſte,
Brighteſt beauty, come and taſte
What the pow'rs of bliſs unfold,
Joys, too mighty to be told;
Taſte what eccſtaſies they give,
Dying raptures taſte and live.
In thy lap, diſdaining meaſure,
Nature empties all her treaſure,
Soft deſires, that ſweetly languiſh,
Fierce delights, that riſe to anguiſh;
Faireſt, doſt thou yet delay?
Brighteſt beauty, come away.
Liſt not, when the froward chide,
Sons of pedantry, and pride,
Snarlers, to whoſe feeble ſenſe
April ſunſhine is offence;
Age and envy will adviſe
Ev'n againſt the joy they prize.
Come, in pleaſure's balmy bowl
Slake the thirſtings of thy ſoul,
Till thy raptur'd pow'rs are fainting
With enjoyment, paſt the painting;
Faireſt, doſt thou yet delay?
Brighteſt beauty, come away.
So ſung the Sirens, as of yore,
Upon the falſe Auſonian ſhore;
And, O! for that preventing chain,
That bound Ulyſſes on the main,
That ſo our fair-one might withſtand
The covert ruin, now at hand.
The ſong her charm'd attention drew,
When now the tempters ſtood in view;
Curioſity with prying eyes,
And hands of buſy, bold empriſe;
Like Hermes, feather'd were her feet,
And, like forerunning fancy, fleet.
By ſearch untaught, by toil untir'd,
To novelty ſhe ſtill aſpir'd,
Taſteleſs of every good poſſeſs'd,
And but in expectation bleſs'd.
With her, aſſociate, pleaſure came,
Gay pleaſure, frolic-loving dame,
Her mien, all ſwimming in delight,
Her beauties half reveal'd to ſight;
Looſe flow'd her garments from the ground,
And caught the kiſſing winds around.
As erſt Meduſa's looks were known
To turn beholders into ſtone,

A dire reverſion here they felt,
And in the eye of pleaſure melt.
Her glance with ſweet perſuaſion charm'd,
Unnerv'd the ſtrong, the ſteel'd diſarm'd;
No ſafety ev'n the flying find,
Who vent'rous, look but once behind.
Thus was the much-admiring maid,
While diſtant, more than half betray'd:
With ſmiles, and adulation bland,
They join'd her ſide, and ſeiz'd her hand:
Their touch envenom'd ſweets inſtill'd,
Her frame with new pulſations thrill'd,
While half conſenting, half denying,
Reluctant now, and now complying,
Amidſt a war of hopes, and fears,
Of trembling wiſhes, ſmiling tears,
Still down, and down, the winning pair
Compell'd the ſtruggling, yielding fair.
As when ſome ſtately veſſel, bound
To bleſt Arabia's diſtant ground,
Borne from her courſes, haply lights
Where Barca's flow'ry clime invites,
Conceal'd around whoſe treach'rous land,
Lurk'd the dire rock, and dangerous ſand;
The pilot warns with ſail and oar,
To ſhun the much-ſuſpected ſhore,
In vain; the tide, too ſubtly ſtrong,
Still bears the wreſtling bark along,
Till found'ring, ſhe reſigns to fate,
And ſinks o'erwhelm'd, with all her freight.
So, baffling every bar to ſin,
And heaven's own pilot, plac'd within,
Along the devious, ſmooth deſcent,
With pow'rs increaſing as they went,
The dames, accuſtom'd to ſubdue,
As with a rapid current drew,
And o'er the fatal bounds convey'd
The loſt, the long-reluctant maid.
Here ſtop, ye fair-ones, and beware,
Nor ſend your fond affections there;
Yet, yet your darling, now deplor'd,
May turn, to you, and heav'n, reſtor'd;
Till then, with weeping honour wait,
The ſervant of her better fate;
With honour, left upon the ſhore,
Her friend, and handmaid now no more;
Nor, with the guilty world, upbraid
The fortunes of a wretch, betray'd;
But o'er her failing caſt a veil,
Rememb'ring, you yourſelves are frail.
And now, from all-inquiring light
Faſt fled the conſcious ſhades of night;
The damſel, from a ſhort repoſe,
Conſounded at her plight, aroſe.
As when, with ſlumb'rous weight oppreſs'd,
Some wealthy miſer ſinks to reſt,
Where felons eye the glitt'ring prey,
And ſteal his hoard of joys away;
He, borne where golden Indus ſtreams,
Of pearl, and quarry'd di'mond dreams,
Like Midas, turns the glebe to ore,
And ſtands all wrapt amidſt his ſtore,
But wakens, naked, and deſpoil'd
Of that, for which his years had toil'd.
So far'd the nymph, her treaſure flown,
And turn'd, like Niobe, to ſtone;
Within, without, obſcure, and void,
She felt all ravag'd, all deſtroy'd
And, O thou curs'd, inſidious coaſt!
Are theſe the bleſſings thou canſt boaſt?
Theſe, virtue! theſe the joys they find,
Who leave thy heaven-topt hills behind?
Shade me, ye pines, ye caverns, hide,
Ye mountains, cover me, ſhe cry'd!
Her trumpet ſlander rais'd on high,
And told the tidings to the ſky;
Contempt diſcharg'd a living dart,
A ſide-long viper to her heart;
Reproach breath'd poiſons o'er her face,
And ſoil'd, and blaſted every grace;
Officious ſhame, her handmaid new,
Still turn'd the mirror to her view;
While thoſe, in crimes the deepeſt dy'd,
Approach'd, to whiten at her ſide,
And every lewd, inſulting dame
Upon her folly roſe to fame.
What ſhould ſhe do? attempt once more
To gain the late-deſerted ſhore?
So truſting, back the mourner flew,
As faſt the train of fiends purſue.
Again the farther ſhore's attain'd,
Again the land of virtue gain'd;
But echo gathers in the wind,
And ſhows her inſtant foes behind.
Amaz'd, with headlong ſpeed ſhe tends,
Where late ſhe left a hoſt of friends:
Alas! thoſe ſhrinking friends decline,
Nor longer own that form divine;
With fear they mark the following cry,
And from the lonely trembler fly,
Or backward drive her on the coaſt,
Where peace was wreck'd, and honour loſt.
From earth thus hoping aid in vain,
To heav'n not daring to complain,
No truce by hoſtile clamour giv'n,
And from the face of friendſhip driv'n,
The nymph ſunk proſtrate on the ground,
With all her weight of woes around.
Enthron'd within a circling ſky,
Upon a mount o'er mountains high,
All radiant fate, as in a ſhrine,
Virtue, firſt effluence divine;
Far, far above the ſcenes of woe,
That ſhut this cloud-wrapt world below;
Superior goddeſs, eſſence bright,
Beauty of uncreated light,
Whom ſhould mortality ſurvey,
As doom'd upon a certain day,
The breath of frailty muſt expire,
The world diſſolve in living fire,
The gems of heav'n, and ſolar flame
Be quench'd by her eternal beam,
And nature, quick'ning in her eye,
To riſe a new-born phœnix, die.
Hence, unreveal'd to mortal view,
A veil around her form ſhe threw,
Which three ſad ſiſters of the ſhade,
Pain, care, and melancholy, made.
Through this her all-inquiring eye,
Attentive from her ſtation high,
Beheld, abandon'd to deſpair,
The ruins of her fav'rite fair;

And with a voice, whose awful sound
Appal'd the guilty world around,
Bid the tumultuous winds be still;
To numbers bow'd each list'ning hill,
Uncurl'd the surging of the main,
And smooth'd the thorny bed of pain;
The golden harp of heav'n she strung,
And thus the tuneful goddess sung.

Lovely penitent, arise,
Come, and claim thy kindred skies;
Come, thy sister-angels say,
Thou hast wept thy stains away.
Let experience now decide,
'Twixt the good and evil try'd;
In the smooth, enchanted ground,
Say, unfold the treasures found.
Structures, rais'd by morning dreams,
Sands, that trip the flitting streams,
Down, that anchors on the air,
Clouds, that paint their changes there.
Seas, that smoothly dimpling lie,
While the storm impends on high,
Showing, in an obvious glass,
Joys, that in possession pass;
Transient, fickle, light, and gay,
Flatt'ring, only to betray;
What, alas, can life contain!
Life, like all its circles, vain!
Will the stork, intending rest,
On the billow build her nest?
Will the bee demand his store
From the bleak, and bladeless shore?
Man alone, intent to stray,
Ever turns from wisdom's way,
Lays up wealth in foreign land,
Sows the sea, and plows the sand.
Soon this elemental mass,
Soon th' encumb'ring world shall pass,
Form be wrapt in wasting fire,
Time be spent, and life expire.
Then, ye boasted works of men,
Where is your asylum then?
Sons of pleasure, sons of care,
Tell me, mortals, tell me where?
Gone, like traces on the deep,
Like a sceptre, grasp'd in sleep,
Dews, exhal'd from morning glades,
Melting snows, and gliding shades.
Pass the world, and what's behind?
Virtue's gold, by fire refin'd;
From an universe deprav'd,
From the wreck of nature sav'd.
Like the life-supporting grain,
Fruit of patience, and of pain,
On the swain's autumnal day,
Winnow'd from the chaff away.
Little trembler, fear no more,
Thou hast plenteous crops in store,
Seed, by genial sorrows sown,
More than all thy sorrows own.
What though hostile earth despise,
Heav'n beholds with gentler eyes;
Heav'n thy friendless steps shall guide,
Chear thy hours, and guard thy side.
When the fatal trump shall sound,
When th' immortals pour around,
Heav'n shall thy return attest,
Hail'd by myriads of the bless'd.
Little native of the skies,
Lovely penitent, arise,
Calm thy bosom, clear thy brow,
Virtue is thy sister now.
More delightful are my woes,
Than the rapture pleasure knows;
Richer far the weeds I bring,
Than the robes that grace a king.
On my wars, of shortest dare,
Crowns of endless triumph wait;
On my cares, a period bless'd;
On my toils, eternal rest.
Come, with virtue at thy side,
Come, be every bar defy'd,
Till we gain our native shore,
Sister, come, and turn no more.

FABLE XVII.

LOVE AND VANITY.

The breezy morning breath'd perfume,
The wak'ning flow'rs unveil'd their bloom,
Up with the sun, from short repose,
Gay health and lusty labour rose,
The milkmaid carol'd at her pail,
And shepherds whistled o'er the dale:
When Love, who led a rural life,
Remote from bustle, state, and strife,
Forth from his thatch'd-roof cottage stray'd,
And stroll'd along the dewy glade.
A nymph, who lightly tript it by,
To quick attention turn'd his eye;
He mark'd the gesture of the fair,
Her self-sufficient grace and air,
Her steps, that mincing meant to please,
Her study'd negligence and ease;
And, curious to inquire what meant
This thing of prettiness and paint,
Approaching spoke, and bow'd observant;
The Lady, slightly,—Sir, your servant.
Such beauty in so rude a place!
Fair-one, you do the country grace;
At court, no doubt, the public care,
But love has small acquaintance there.
Yes, Sir, reply'd the flutt'ring dame,
This form confesses whence it came;
But dear variety, you know,
Can make us pride and pomp forego.
My name is Vanity. I sway
The utmost islands of the sea;
Within my court all honour centers,
I raise the meanest soul that enters,
Endow with latent gifts and graces,
And model fools for posts and places.
As vanity appoints at pleasure,
The world receives its weight and measure;
Hence all the grand concerns of life,
Joys, cares, plagues, passions, peace and strife.
Reflect how far my pow'r prevails,
When I step in where nature fails,
And every breach of sense repairing,
Am bounteous still, where heav'n is sparing.
But chief in all their arts and airs,
Their playing, painting, pouts, and pray'rs,

Their various habits and complexions,
Fits, frolics, foibles, and perfections;
Their robing, curling, and adorning,
From noon to night, from night to morning,
From six to sixty, sick, or sound,
I rule the female world around.
Hold there a moment, Cupid cry'd,
Nor boast dominion quite so wide;
Was there no province to invade,
But that by love, and meekness sway'd?
All other empire I resign,
But be the sphere of beauty mine.
For in the downy lawn of rest,
That opens on a woman's breast,
Attended by my peaceful train,
I choose to live, and choose to reign.
Far-sighted faith I bring along,
And truth, above an army strong,
And chastity, of icy mould,
Within the burning tropics cold,
And lowliness, to whose mild brow
The pow'r and pride of nations bow,
And modesty, with downcast eye,
That lends the morn her virgin dye,
And innocence, array'd in light,
And honour, as a tow'r upright;
With sweetly winning graces, more
Than poets ever dreamt of yore,
In unaffected conduct free,
All smiling sisters, three times three,
And rosy peace, the cherub bless'd,
That nightly sings us all to rest.
Hence, from the bud of nature's prime,
From the first step of infant time,
Woman, the world's appointed light,
Has skirted every shade with white;
Has stood for imitation high,
To every heart, and every eye;
From ancient deeds of fair renown,
Has brought her bright memorials down;
To time affix'd perpetual youth,
And form'd each tale of love and truth.
Upon a new Promethean plan,
She moulds the essence of a man,
Tempers his mass, his genius fires,
And, as a better soul, inspires.
The rude she softens, warms the cold,
Exalts the meek, and checks the bold,
Calls sloth from his supine repose,
Within the coward's bosom glows,
Of pride unplumes the lofty crest,
Bids bashful merit stand confess'd,
And like coarse metal from the mines,
Collects, irradiates, and refines.
The gentle science she imparts,
All manners smooths, informs all hearts;
From her sweet influence are felt,
Passions that please, and thoughts that melt;
To stormy rage she bids controul,
And sinks serenely on the soul;
Softens Deucalion's flinty race,
And tunes the warring world to peace.
Thus arm'd to all that's light and vain,
And freed from thy fantastic chain,
She fills the sphere by heav'n assign'd,
And rul'd by me, o'er-rules mankind.

He spoke. The nymph impatient stood.
And laughing, thus her speech renew'd.
And pray Sir, may I be so bold,
To hope your pretty tale is told?
And next demand, without a cavil,
What new Utopia do you travel?
Upon my word, these highflown fancies
Show depth of learning—in romances.
Why, what unfashion'd stuff you tell us,
Of buckram dames, and tiptoe fellows!
Go, child; and when you're grown maturer,
You'll shoot your next opinion surer.
O such a pretty knack at painting!
And all for soft'ning, and for fainting!
Guess now, who can, a single feature,
Through the whole piece of female nature!
Then mark! my looser hand may fit
The lines, too coarse for love to hit.
'Tis said that woman, prone to changing,
Through all the rounds of folly ranging,
On life's uncertain ocean riding,
No reason, rule, nor rudder guiding,
Is like the comet's wand'ring light,
Eccentric, ominous, and bright,
Trackless, and shifting as the wind,
A sea, whose fathom none can find,
A moon, still changing, and revolving,
A riddle, past all human solving,
A bliss, a plague, a heav'n, a hell,
A——something, which no man can tell.
Now learn a secret from a friend,
But keep your counsel, and attend.
Though in their tempers thought so distant,
Nor with their sex nor selves consistent,
'Tis but the diff'rence of a name,
And every woman is the same.
For as the world, however vary'd,
And through unnumber'd changes carry'd,
Of elemental modes and forms,
Clouds, meteors, colours, calms, and storms,
Though in a thousand suits array'd,
Is of one subject matter made;
So, Sir, a woman's constitution,
The world's enigma, finds solution,
And let her form be what you will,
I am the subject essence still.
With the first spark of female sense,
The speck of being, I commence,
Within the womb make fresh advances,
And dictate future qualms and fancies;
Thence in the growing form expand,
With childhood travel hand in hand,
And give a taste to all their joys,
In gewgaws, rattles, pomp, and noise.
And now, familiar, and unaw'd,
I send the flutt'ring soul abroad;
Prais'd for her shape, her face, her mien,
The little goddess, and the queen
Takes at her infant shrine oblation,
And drinks sweet draughts of adulation.
Now blooming, tall, erect, and fair,
To dress becomes her darling care;
The realms of beauty then I bound,
I swell the hoop's enchanted round,
Shrink in the waist's descending size,
Heav'd in the snowy bosom, rise;

High on the floating lappet fail,
Or curl'd in treſſes, kiſs the gale.
Then to her glaſs I lead the fair,
And ſhow the lively idol there,
Where, ſtruck as by divine emotion,
She bows with moſt ſincere devotion,
And numb'ring ev'ry beauty o'er,
In ſecret bids the world adore.
Then all for parking and parading,
Coquetting, dancing, maſquerading,
For balls, plays, courts, and crowds what paſſion!
And churches, ſometimes—if the faſhion;
For woman's ſenſe of right and wrong,
Is rul'd by the almighty throng;
Still turns to each meander tame,
And ſwims the ſtraw of every ſtream.
Her ſoul intrinſic worth rejects,
Accompliſh'd only in defects,
Such excellence is her ambition,
Folly, her wiſeſt acquiſition,
And ev'n from pity and diſdain,
She'll cull ſome reaſon to be vain.
Thus, Sir, from every form and feature,
The wealth and wants of female nature,
And ev'n from vice which you'd admire,
I gather fewel to my fire,
And on the very baſe of ſhame
Erect my monument of fame.
Let me another truth attempt,
Of which your godſhip has not dreamt.
Thoſe ſhining virtues which you muſter,
Whence think you they derive their luſtre?
From native honour and devotion?
O yes, a mighty likely notion!
Truſt me, from titled dames to ſpinners,
'Tis I make ſaints, whoe'er make ſinners;
'Tis I inſtruct them to withdraw,
And hold preſumptuous man in awe;
For female worth as I inſpire,
In juſt degrees ſtill mounts the higher,
And virtue ſo extremely nice,
Demands long toil and mighty price;
Like Samſon's pillars, fix'd elate,
I bear the ſex's tottering ſtate:
Sap theſe, and in a moment's ſpace,
Down ſinks the fabric to its baſe.
Alike from titles and from toys,
I ſpring, the fount of female joys;
In every widow, wife, and miſs,
The ſole artificer of bliſs.
For them each tropic I explore;
I cleave the ſand of every ſhore;
To them uniting Indias ſail,
Sabæa breathes her fartheſt gale;
For them the bullion I refine,
Dig ſenſe and virtue from the mine,
And from the bowels of invention,
Spin out the various arts you mention.
Nor bliſs alone my pow'rs beſtow,
They hold the ſov'reign balm of woe;
Beyond the Stoic's boaſted art,
I ſooth the heavings of the heart;
To pain give ſplendour and relief,
And gild the pallid face of grief.
Alike the palace, and the plain
Admit the glories of my reign;
Through every age, in every nation,
Taſte, talents, tempers, ſtate, and ſtation,
Whate'er a woman ſays, I ſay;
Whate'er a woman ſpends, I pay;
Alike I fill, and empty bags,
Flutter in finery and rags,
With light coquets through folly range,
And with the prude diſdain to change.
And now you'd think, 'twixt you and I,
That things were ripe for a reply—
But ſoft, and while I'm in the mood,
Kindly permit me to conclude,
Their utmoſt mazes to unravel,
And touch the fartheſt ſtep they travel.
When every pleaſure's run a-ground,
And folly tir'd through many a round;
The nymph, conceiving diſcontent hence,
May ripen to an hour's repentance,
And vapours, ſhed in pious moiſture,
Diſmiſs her to a church or cloyſter;
Then on I lead her with devotion
Conſpicuous in her dreſs and motion,
Inſpire the heav'nly breathing air,
Roll up the lucid eye in pray'r,
Soften the voice, and in the face
Look melting harmony, and grace.
Thus far extends my friendly pow'r,
Nor quits her in her lateſt hour;
The couch of decent pain I ſpread,
In form recline her languid head,
Her thoughts I methodize in death,
And part not, with her parting breath;
Then do I ſet, in order bright,
A length of funeral pomp to ſight,
The glitt'ring tapers, and attire,
The plumes, that whiten o'er her bier;
And laſt, preſenting to her eye
Angelic fineries on high,
To ſcenes of painted bliſs I waft her,
And form the heav'n ſhe hopes hereafter.
In truth, rejoin'd love's gentle god,
You've gone a tedious length of road,
And ſtrange, in all the toilſome way,
No houſe of kind refreſhment lay,
No nymph, whoſe virtues might have tempted
To hold her from her ſex exempted.
For one, we'll never quarrel, man;
Take her, and keep her, if you can;
And pleas'd I yield to your petition,
Since every fair, by ſuch permiſſion,
Will hold herſelf the one ſelected,
And ſo my ſyſtem ſtands protected.
O, deaf to virtue, deaf to glory,
To truths divinely vouch'd in ſtory!
The godhead in his zeal return'd,
And kindling at her malice burn'd.
Then ſweatly rais'd his voice, and told
Of heav'nly nymphs, rever'd of old;
Hypſipile, who ſav'd her ſire;
And Portia's love, approv'd by fire,
Alike Penelope was quoted,
Nor laurell'd Daphne paſs unnoted,
Nor Laodamia's fatal garter,
Nor fam'd Lucretia, honour's martyr,
Alceſte's voluntary ſteel,
And Catherine, ſmiling on the wheel

But who can hope to plant conviction
Where cavil grows on contradiction?
Some ſhe evades or diſavows,
Demurs to all, and none allows;
A kind of ancient things call'd fables!
And thus the goddeſs turn'd the tables.
Now both in argument grew high,
And choler flaſh'd from either eye;
Nor wonder each refus'd to yield
The conqueſt of ſo fair a field.
When happily arriv'd in view
A goddeſs, whom our grandames knew,
Of aſpect grave, and ſober gait,
Majeſtic, awful, and ſedate,
As heav'n's autumnal eve ſerene,
When not a cloud o'ercaſts the ſcene,
Once prudence call'd, a matron fam'd,
And in old Rome, Cornelia nam'd.
Quick at a venture, both agree
To leave their ſtrife to her decree.
And now by each the facts were ſtated,
In form and manner as related;
The caſe was ſhort. They crav'd opinion,
Which held o'er females chief dominion?
When thus the goddeſs, anſwering mild,
Firſt ſhook her gracious head, and ſmil'd.
Alas, how willing to comply,
Yet how unfit a judge am I!
In times of golden date, 'tis true,
I ſhar'd the fickle ſex with you,
But from their preſence long precluded,
Or held as one, whoſe form intruded,
Full fifty annual ſuns can tell,
Prudence has bid the ſex farewell.
In this dilemma what to do,
Or who to think of, neither knew;
For both, ſtill biaſs'd in opinion,
And arrogant of ſole dominion,
Were forc'd to hold the caſe compounded,
Or leave the quarrel where they found it.
When in the nick, a rural fair,
Of inexperienc'd gait, and air,
Who ne'er had croſs'd the neighb'ring lake,
Nor ſeen the world beyond a wake,
With cambric coif, and kerchief clean,
Tript lightly by them o'er the green.
Now, now! cry'd love's triumphant child,
And at approaching conqueſt ſmil'd,
If vanity will once be guided,
Our diff'rence may be ſoon decided:
Behold yon wench; a fit occaſion
To try your force of gay perſuaſion.
Go you, while I retire aloof,
Go, put thoſe boaſted pow'rs to proof;
And if your prevalence of art
Tranſcends my yet unerring dart,
I give the fav'rite conteſt o'er,
And ne'er will boaſt my empire more.
At once, ſo ſaid, and ſo conſented;
And well our goddeſs ſeem'd contented;
Nor pauſing, made a moment's ſtand,
But tript, and took the girl in hand.
Meanwhile the godhead, unalarm'd,
As one to each occaſion arm'd,
Forth from his quiver cull'd a dart,
That erſt had wounded many a heart;
Then, bending, drew it to the head;
The bow-ſtring twang'd, the arrow fled,
And, to her ſecret ſoul addreſs'd,
Tranſfix'd the whiteneſs of her breaſt.
But here the dame, whoſe guardian care
Had to a moment watch'd the fair,
At once her pocket mirror drew,
And held the wonder full in view;
As quickly, rang'd in order bright,
A thouſand beauties ruſh to ſight;
A world of charms, till now unknown,
A world, reveal'd to her alone:
Enraptur'd ſtands the love-ſick maid,
Suſpended o'er the darling ſhade,
Here only fixes to admire,
And centres every fond deſire.

MISCELLANEOUS POEMS.

A HYMN TO POVERTY.

O POVERTY! thou ſource of human art,
Thou great inſpirer of the poet's ſong!
In vain Apollo dictates, and the nine
Attend in vain, unleſs thy mighty hand
Direct the tuneful lyre. Without thy aid
The canvas breathes no longer. Muſic's charms,
Uninfluenc'd by thee, forget to pleaſe:
Thou giv'ſt the organ ſound; by thee the flute
Breathes harmony; the tuneful viol owns
Thy pow'rful touch. The warbling voice is thine:
Thou gav'ſt to Nicolini every grace,
And every charm to Farinelli's ſong.
By thee the lawyer pleads. The ſoldier's arm
Is nerv'd by thee. Thy pow'r the gownman feels,
And, urg'd by thee, unfolds heav'n's myſtic truths,
The haughty fair, that ſwells with proud diſdain,
And ſmiles at miſchiefs, which her eyes have made.
Thou humbleſt to ſubmit and bleſs mankind.
Hail, pow'r omnipotent! me uninvok'd
Thou deign'ſt to viſit, far, alas! unfit
To bear thy awful preſence. O, retire!
At diſtance let me view thee; leſt too nigh,
I ſink beneath the terrors of thy face!

THE LOVER AND THE FRIEND.

O THOU, for whom my lyre I ſtring,
Of whom I ſpeak, and think, and ſing!
Thou conſtant object of my joys,
Whoſe ſweetneſs every wiſh employs!
Thou deareſt of thy ſex attend,
And hear the Lover and the Friend.

Fear not the poet's flatt'ring ſtrain;
No idle praiſe my verſe ſhall ſtain;
The lowly numbers ſhall impart
The faithful dictates of my heart,
Nor humble modeſty offend,
And part the Lover from the Friend.

Not diſtant is the cruel day,
That tears me from my hopes away;
Then frown not, faireſt, if I try
To ſteal the moiſture from your eye,
Or force your heart a ſigh to ſend,
To mourn the Lover and the Friend.

No perfect joy my life e'er knew,
But what aroſe from love and you;
Nor can I fear another pain
Than your unkindneſs, or diſdain;
Then let your looks their pity lend,
To cheer the Lover and the Friend.

Whole years I ſtrove againſt the flame,
And ſuffer'd ills, that want a name:
Yet ſtill the painful ſecret kept,
And to myſelf in ſilence wept;
Till grown unable to contend,
I own'd the Lover and the Friend.

I ſaw you ſtill. Your gen'rous heart
In all my ſorrows bore a part;
Yet while your eyes with pity glow'd,
No words of hope your tongue beſtow'd,
But mildly bid me ceaſe to blend
The name of Lover with the Friend.

Sick with deſire, and mad with pain,
I ſeek for happineſs in vain:
Thou lovely maid, to thee I cry,
Heal me with kindneſs, or I die!
From ſad deſpair my ſoul defend,
And fix the Lover and the Friend.

Curs'd be all wealth that can deſtroy
My utmoſt hope of earthly joy!
Thy gifts, O fortune I reſign,
Let her and poverty be mine!
And every year that life ſhall lend,
Shall bleſs the Lover and the Friend.

In vain, alas! in vain I ſtrive
To keep a dying hope alive;
The laſt ſad remedy remains,
'Tis abſence that muſt heal my pains,
Thy image from my boſom rend,
And force the Lover from the Friend.

Vain thought! though ſeas between us roll,
Thy love is rooted in my ſoul;
The vital blood that warms my heart
With thy idea muſt depart,
And death's deciſive ſtroke muſt end
At once the Lover and the Friend.

SONGS, &c.

SONG I.

THUS I ſaid to my heart, in a pet th' other day,
I had rather be hang'd than go moping this way;
No throbbings, no wiſhes your moments employ,
But you ſleep in my breaſt without motion or joy.

When Cloe perplex'd me 'twas ſweeter by half,
And at Thais's wiles I could oftentimes laugh;
Your burnings and achings I ſtrove not to cure,
Though one was a jilt, and the other a whore.

When I walk'd up the Mall, or ſtroll'd through the ſtreet, [beat,
Not a petticoat bruſh'd me, but then you could
Or if bang went the hoop againſt corner or poſt,
In the magical round you were ſure to be loſt.

But now if a nymph goes as naked as Eve,
Like Adam, unfallen, you never perceive;
Or the ſeat of delight if the tippet ſhould hide,
You tempt not my fingers to draw it aſide.

Is it caution, or dread, or the froſt of old age,
That inclines you with beauty no more to engage?
Tell me quickly the cauſe, for it makes me quite mad,
In the ſummer's gay ſeaſon to ſee you ſo ſad.

Have a care, quoth my heart, how you tempt me to ſtray; [way:
He that hunts down a woman muſt run a d——d
Like a hare ſhe can wind, or hold out with the fox,
And, ſecure in the chaſe, her purſuers ſhe mocks.

For Cloe I burn'd with an innocent flame,
And beat to the muſic that breath'd out her name;
Three ſummers flew over the caſtles I built,
And beheld me a fool, and my goddeſs a jilt.

Next Thais, the wanton, my wiſhes employ'd,
And the kind one repair'd what the cruel deſtroy'd:
Like Shadrach, I liv'd in a furnace of fire,
But, unlike him, was ſcorch'd, and compell'd to retire.

Recruited once more, I forgot all my pain,
And was jilted, and burnt, and bedevil'd again;

Not a petticoat fring'd, or the heel of a ſhoe,
Ever paſs'd you by day-light, but at it I flew.

Thus jilted, and wounded, and burnt to a coal,
For reſt I retreated again to be whole;
But your eyes, ever open to lead me aſtray,
Have beheld a new face, and command me away.

But remember, in whatever flames I may burn,
'Twill be folly to aſk for, or wiſh my return:
Neither Thais nor Cloe again ſhall enflame,
But a nymph more provoking than all you can name.

This ſaid, with a bound from my boſom he flew;
O, Phillis! theſe eyes ſaw him poſting to you;
Enſlav'd by your wit, he grows fond of his chain,
And vows I ſhall never poſſeſs him again.

SONG II.

Collin.

Be ſtill, O ye winds, and attentive, ye ſwains,
'Tis Phebe invites, and replies to my ſtrains;
The ſun never roſe on, ſearch all the world through,
A ſhepherd ſo bleſt, or a fair one ſo true.

Phebe.

Glide ſoftly ye ſtreams, O ye nymphs round me throng,
'Tis Collin commands, and attends to my ſong;
Search all the world over, you never can find
A maiden ſo bleſt, or a ſhepherd ſo kind.

Both.

'Tis love, like the ſun, that gives light to the year,
The ſweeteſt of bleſſings that life can endear;
Our pleaſures it brightens, drives ſorrow away,
Gives joy to the night, and enlivens the day.

Collin.

With Phebe beſide me, the ſeaſons how gay!
Then winter's bleak months ſeem as pleaſant as May;
The ſummer's gay verdure ſprings ſtill as ſhe treads,
And linnets and nightingales ſing through the meads.

Phebe.

When Collin is abſent 'tis winter all round,
How faint is the ſunſhine, how barren the ground!
Inſtead of the linnet and nightingale's ſong,
I hear the hoarſe raven croak all the day long.

Both.

'Tis love, like the ſun, &c.

Collin.

O'er hill, dale, and valley, my Phebe and I
Together will wander, and love ſhall be by:
Her Collin ſhall guard her ſafe all the long day,
And Phebe at night all his pains ſhall repay.

Phebe.

By moonlight, when ſhadows glide over the plain,
His kiſſes ſhall cheer me, his arm ſhall ſuſtain;
The dark haunted grove I can trace without fear,
Or ſleep in a church-yard, if Collin is near.

Both.

'Tis love, like the ſun, &c.

Collin.

Ye ſhepherds, that wanton it over the plain,
How fleeting your tranſports, how laſting your pain!
Inconſtancy ſhun, and reward the kind ſhe,
And learn to be happy of Phebe and me.

Phebe.

Ye nymphs, who the pleaſures of love never try'd,
Attend to my ſtrains, and take me for your guide;
Your hearts keep from pride and inconſtancy free,
And learn to be happy of Collin and me.

Both.

'Tis love, like the ſun, that gives light to the year,
The ſweeteſt of bleſſings that life can endear;
Our pleaſures it brightens, drives ſorrow away,
Gives joy to the night, and enlivens the day.

SONG III.

As Phillis the gay, at the break of the day,
Went forth to the meadows a maying,
A clown lay aſleep by a river ſo deep,
That round in meanders was ſtraying.

His boſom was bare, and for whiteneſs ſo rare,
Her heart it was gone without warning,
With cheeks of ſuch hue, that the roſe wet with dew,
Ne'er look'd half ſo freſh in a morning.

She cull'd the new hay, and down by him ſhe lay,
Her wiſhes too warm for diſguiſing;
She play'd with his eyes, till he wak'd in ſurpriſe,
And bluſh'd like the ſun at his riſing.

She ſung him a ſong, as he leant on his prong,
And reſted her arm on his ſhoulder;
She preſs'd his coy cheek to her boſom ſo ſleek,
And taught his two arms to enfold her.

The ruſtic grown kind, by a kiſs told his mind,
And call'd her his dear and his bleſſing:
Together they ſtray'd, and ſung, frolic'd, and play'd,
And what they did more there's no gueſſing.

SONG IV.

He.

Let rakes for pleaſure range the town,
Or miſers doat on golden guineas,
Let plenty ſmile, or fortune frown,
The ſweets of love are mine and Jenny's.

She.

Let wanton maids indulge deſire,
How ſoon the fleeting pleaſure gone is!
The joys of virtue never tire,
And ſuch ſhall ſtill be mine and Johnny's.

Both.

Together let us ſport and play,
And live in pleaſure where no ſin is;
The prieſt ſhall tie the knot to-day,
And wedlock's bands make Johnny Jenny's.

He.

Let roving ſwains young hearts invade,
The pleaſure ends in ſhame and folly;
So Willy woo'd, and then betray'd
The poor, believing, ſimple Molly.

She.

So Lucy lov'd, and lightly toy'd,
And laugh'd at harmleſs maids who marry;
But now ſhe finds her ſhepherd cloy'd,
And chides too late her faithleſs Harry.

Both.

But we'll together sport and play,
And live in pleasure where no sin is;
The priest shall tie the knot to-day,
And wedlock's bands make Johnny Jenny's.

He.

By cooling streams our flocks we'll feed,
And leave deceit to knaves and ninnies;
Or fondly stray where love shall lead,
And every joy be mine and Jenny's.

She

Let guilt the faithless bosom fright,
The constant heart is always bonny;
Content, and peace, and sweet delight,
And love, shall live with me and Johnny.

Both.

Together still we'll sport and play,
And live in pleasure where no sin is;
The priest shall tie the knot to-day,
And wedlock's bands make Johnny Jenny's.

SONG V.

Stand round, my brave boys, with heart and with voice,
And all in full chorus agree;
We'll fight for our king, and as loyally sing,
And let the world know we'll be free.

Chorus.

The rebels shall fly, as with shouts we draw nigh,
And echo shall victory ring;
Then safe from alarms, we'll rest on our arms,
And chorus it, long live the king!

Then commerce once more shall bring wealth to our shore,
And plenty and peace bless the isle;
The peasant shall quaff off his bowl with a laugh,
And reap the sweet fruits of his toil.

Chorus.

The rebels, &c.

Kind love shall repay the fatigues of the day,
And melt us to softer alarms;
Coy Phillis shall burn at her soldier's return,
And bless the brave youth in her arms.

Chorus.

The rebels shall fly, as with shouts we draw nigh,
And echo shall victory ring;
Then safe from alarms, we'll rest on our arms,
And chorus it, long live the king!

SONG VI.

To make the wife kind, and to keep the house still,
You must be of her mind, let her say what she will;
In all that she does you must give her her way,
For tell her she's wrong, and you lead her astray.

Chorus.

Then, husbands, take care, of suspicion beware,
Your wives may be true, if you fancy they are;
With confidence trust them, and be not such elves,
As to make by your jealousy horns for yourselves.

Abroad all the day if she chooses to roam,
Seem pleas'd with her absence, she'll sigh to come home;
The man she likes best, and longs most to get at,
Be sure to commend, and she'll hate him for that.

Chorus.

Then, husbands, &c.

What virtue she has, you may safely oppose,
Wherever her follies are, praise her for those;
Applaud all her schemes that she lays for a man,
For accuse her of vice, and she'll sin if she can.

Chorus.

Then, husbands, take care, of suspicion beware,
Your wives may be true, if you fancy they are;
With confidence trust them, and be not such elves,
As to make by your jealousy horns for yourselves.

SONG VII.

Damon.

Hark, hark, o'er the plains how the merry bells ring,
Asleep while my charmer is laid!
The village is up, and the day on the wing,
And Phillis may yet die a maid.

Phillis.

'Tis hardly yet day, and I cannot away,
O Damon! I'm young and afraid;
To-morrow, my dear, I'll to church without fear,
But let me to-night lie a maid.

Damon.

The bride-maids are met, and mamma's on the fret,
All, all my coy Phillis upbraid;
Come upon the door, and deny me no more,
Nor cry to live longer a maid.

Phillis.

Dear shepherd, forbear, and to-morrow, I swear,
To-morrow I'll not be afraid;
I'll open the door, and deny you no more,
Nor cry to live longer a maid.

Damon.

No, no, Phillis, no, on that bosom of snow
To-night shall your shepherd be laid;
By morning my dear shall be eas'd of her fear,
Nor grieve she's no longer a maid.

Phillis.

Then open the door, 'twas unbolted before,
His bliss silly Damon delay'd;
To church let us go, and if there I say no,
O then let me die an old maid!

SONG VIII.

That Jenny's my friend, my delight, and my pride,
I always have boasted, and seek not to hide;
I dwell on her praises wherever I go,
They say I'm in love, but I answer no, no.

At ev'ning oft times with what pleasure I see
A note from her hand, "I'll be with you at tea!"
My heart how it bounds, when I hear her below!
But say not 'tis love, for I answer no, no.

She sings me a song, and I echo each strain,
Again I cry, Jenny! sweet Jenny, again!
I kiss her soft lips, and if there I could grow,
And fear I'm in love, though I answer no, no,

She tells me her faults, as she sits on my knee,
I chide her, and swear she's an angel to me:
My shoulder she taps, and still bids me think so;
Who knows but she loves, though she tells me no, no?

Yet such is my temper, so dull am I grown,
I ask not her heart, but would conquer my own:
Her bosom's soft peace shall I seek to o'erthrow,
And wish to persuade, while I answer no, no?

From beauty, and wit, and good humour, ah! why
Should prudence advise, and compel me to fly?
Thy bounties, O fortune! make haste to bestow,
And let me deserve her, or still I say no.

SONG IX.

You tell me I'm handsome, I know not how true,
And easy, and chatty, and good humour'd too;
That my lips are as red as the rose-bud in June,
And my voice, like the nightingale's, sweetly in tune:
All this has been told me by twenty before,
But he that would win me, must flatter me more.

If beauty from virtue receive no supply,
Or prattle from prudence, how wanting am I!
My ease and good humour short raptures will bring,
And my voice, like the nightingale's, know but a spring.
For charms such as these, then, your praises give o'er,
To love me for life, you must love me for more.

Then talk to me not of a shape or an air,
For Cloe, the wanton, can rival me there:
'Tis virtue alone that makes beauty look gay,
And brightens good humour, as sunshine the day;
For that if you love me, your flame shall be true,
And I, in my turn, may be taught to love too.

SONG X.

How blest has my time been, what days have I known,
Since wedlock's soft bondage made Jesse my own!
So joyful my heart is, so easy my chain,
That freedom is tasteless, and roving a pain.

Through walks, grown with woodbines, as often we stray,
Around us our boys and girls frolic and play;
How pleasing their sport is the wanton ones see,
And borrow their looks from my Jesse and me.

To try her sweet temper sometimes am I seen
In revels all day with the nymphs of the green;
Though painful my absence, my doubts she beguiles,
And meets me at night with compliance and smiles.

What though on her cheek the rose loses its hue,
Her ease and good-humour bloom all the year through;
Time still as he flies brings increase to her truth,
And gives to her mind what he steals from her youth.

Ye shepherds so gay, who make love to ensnare,
And cheat with false vows the too credulous fair,
In search of true pleasure how vainly you roam!
To hold it for life, you must find it at home.

SONG XI.

Hark! hark! 'tis a voice from the tomb
Come, Lucy, it cries, come away;
The grave of thy Colin has room,
To rest thee beside his cold clay.
I come, my dear shepherd, I come;
Ye friends and companions, adieu;
I haste to my Colin's dark home,
To die on his bosom so true.

All mournful the midnight bell rung,
When Lucy, sad Lucy arose;
And forth to the green-turf she sprung,
Where Colin's pale ashes repose.
All wet with the night's chilling dew,
Her bosom embrac'd the cold ground,
While stormy winds over her blew,
And night ravens croak'd all around.

How long, my lov'd Colin, she cry'd,
How long must thy Lucy complain?
How long shall the grave my love hide?
How long ere it join us again?
For thee thy fond shepherdess liv'd,
With thee o'er the world would she fly,
For thee has she sorrow'd and griev'd,
For thee would she lie down and die.

Alas! what avails it how dear
Thy Lucy was once to her swain!
Her face like the lily so fair,
And eyes that gave light to the plain!
The shepherd that lov'd her is gone,
That face and those eyes charm no more,
And Lucy forgot and alone,
To death shall her Colin deplore.

While thus she lay sunk in despair,
And mourn'd to the echoes around,
Inflam'd all at once grew the air,
And thunder shook dreadful the ground:
I hear the kind call, and obey,
Oh, Colin, receive me, she cry'd!
Then breathing a groan o'er his clay,
She hung on his tomb-stone and dy'd.

SONG XII.

For a shape and a bloom, and an air and a mien,
Myrtilla was brightest of all the gay green;
But artfully wild, and affectedly coy,
Those her beauties invited, her pride would destroy.

By the flocks as she stray'd with the nymphs of the vale,
Not a shepherd but woo'd her to hear her soft tale;
Though fatal the passion, she laugh'd at the swain,
And return'd with neglect, what she heard with disdain.

But beauty has wings, and too hastily flies,
And love unrewarded, soon sickens and dies.
The nymph cur'd by time of her folly and pride,
Now sighs in her turn for the bliss she denied.

No longer ſhe frolics it wide o'er the plain,
To kill with her coyneſs the languiſhing ſwain;
So humbled her pride is, ſo ſoftened her mind,
That, though courted by none, ſhe to all would be kind.

SONG XIII.

When Damon languiſh'd at my feet,
And I believ'd him true,
The moments of delight how ſweet!
But ah! how ſwift they flew!
The ſunny hill, the flow'ry vale,
The garden and the grove,
Have echo'd to his ardent tale,
And vows of endleſs love.

The conqueſt gain'd, he left his prize
He left her to complain;
To talk of joy with weeping eyes,
And meaſure time by pain.
But heaven will take the mourner's part,
In pity to deſpair;
And the laſt ſigh that rends the heart,
Shall waft the ſpirit there.

THE NUN;

A CANTATA.

Recitative.

Or Conſtance holy legends tell,
The ſofteſt ſiſter of the cell;
None ſent to heav'n ſo ſweet a cry,
Or roll'd at maſs ſo bright an eye.
No wanton taint her boſom knew,
Her hours in heav'nly viſion flew,
Her knees were worn with midnight pray'rs,
And thus ſhe breath'd divineſt airs.

AIR.

In hallow'd walks and awful cells,
Secluded from the light and vain,
The chaſte ey'd maid with virtue dwells,
And ſolitude, and ſilence reign.

The wanton's voice is heard not here,
To heav'n the ſacred pile belongs;
Each wall returns the whiſper'd pray'r,
And echoes but to holy ſongs.

RECITATIVE.

Alas, that pamper'd monks ſhould dare
Intrude where fainted veſtals are!
Ah, Francis! Francis! well I weet
Thoſe holy looks are all deceit.
With ſhame the muſe prolongs her tale,
The Prieſt was young, the Nun was frail,
Devotion faulter'd on her tongue,
Love tun'd her voice, and thus ſhe ſung.

AIR.

Alas, how deluded was I,
To fancy delights as I did!
With maidens at midnight to ſigh,
And love the ſweet paſſion, forbid!
O, father! my follies forgive,
And ſtill to abſolve me be nigh;
Your leſſons have taught me to live,
Come teach me, O! teach me to die!

To her arms in a rapture he ſprung,
Her boſom, half-naked, met his;
Tranſported in ſilence ſhe hung,
And melted away at each kiſs.
Ah, father! expiring, ſhe cry'd,
With rapture I yield up my breath!
Ah, daughter! he fondly reply'd,
The righteous find comfort in death.

SOLOMON,

A SERENATA:

Set to Muſic by Dr. Boyce.

PART I.

CHORUS.

Behold, Jeruſalem, thy king,
Whoſe praiſes all the nations ſing!
To Solomon the Lord has giv'n
All arts and wiſdom under heav'n:
For him the tuneful virgin throng
Of Ziion's daughters ſwell the ſong:
While young and old their voices raiſe,
And wake the echoes with his praiſe.

RECITATIVE.

She. From the mountains, lo! he comes,
Breathing from his lips perfumes;
While zephyrs on his garments play,
And ſweets through all the air convey.

AIR.

Tell me, lovely ſhepherd, where
Thou feed'ſt at noon thy fleecy care?
Direct me to the ſweet retreat,
That guards thee from the mid-day heat:
Leſt by the flocks I lonely ſtray,
Without a guide, and loſe my way:
Where reſt at noon, thy bleating care,
Gentle ſhepherd, tell me where?

AIR.

He. Faireſt of the virgin throng,
Doſt thou ſeek thy ſwain's abode?
See yon fertile vale along
The new-worn path the flocks have trod:
Purſue the prints their feet have made,
And they ſhall guide thee to the ſhade.

RECITATIVE.

She. As the rich apple on whoſe boughs
Ripe fruit with ſtreaky beauty glows,
Excels the trees that ſhade the grove,
So ſhines, among his ſex, my love.

AIR.

Beneath his ample ſhade I lay,
Defended from the ſultry day:
His cooling fruit my thirſt aſſuag'd,
And quench'd the fires that in me rag'd;
Till ſated with the luſcious taſte,
I roſe and bleſt the ſweet repaſt.

RECITATIVE.

He. Who quits the lily's fleecy white,
To fix on meaner flow'rs the ſight?
Or leaves the roſe's ſtem untorn,
To crop the bloſſom from the thorn?
Unrival'd thus thy beauties are;
So ſhines my love among the fair.

AIR.

Balmy ſweetneſs, ever flowing,
From her dropping lips diſtils;
Flowers on her cheeks are blowing,
And her voice with muſic thrills.
Zephyrs o'er the ſpices flying,
Waſting ſweets from every tree,
Sick'ning ſenſe with odours cloying,
Breathe not half ſo ſweet as ſhe.

RECITATIVE.

SHE. Let not my prince his ſlave deſpiſe,
Or paſs me with unheeding eyes.
Becauſe the ſun's diſcolouring rays
Have chas'd the lily from my face,
My envious ſiſters ſaw my bloom,
And drove me from my mother's home;
Unſhelter'd all the ſcorching day
They made me in their vineyard ſtay.

AIR.

Ah ſimple me! my own, more dear,
My own, alas! was not my care:
Invading love the fences broke,
And tore the cluſters from the ſtock,
With eager graſp the fruit deſtroy'd,
Nor reſted till the ravage cloy'd.

AIR.

He. Fair and comely is my love,
And ſofter than the blue-ey'd dove;
Down her neck the wanton locks
Bound like the kids on Gilead's rocks;
Her teeth like flocks in beauty ſeem,
New ſhorn, and dropping from the ſtream;
Her glowing lips by far outvie
The plaited threads of ſcarlet dye;
Whene'er ſhe ſpeaks the accents wound,
And muſic floats upon the ſound.

RECITATIVE.

She. Forbear, O charming ſwain, forbear!
Thy voice enchants my liſt'ning ear;
And while I gaze my boſom glows,
My flutt'ring heart with love o'erflows,
The ſhades of night hang o'er my eyes,
And every ſenſe within me dies.

AIR

O fill with cooling juice the bowl!
Aſſuage the fever in my ſoul!
With copious draughts my thirſt remove,
And ſooth the heart that's ſick of love.

PART II.

RECITATIVE.

He. The cheerful ſpring begins to-day,
Ariſe, my fair one, come away!

RECITATIVE.

She. Sweet muſic ſteals along the air——
Hark!——my beloved's voice I hear!

AIR.

He. Ariſe, my fair, and come away,
The cheerful ſpring begins to-day:
Bleak winter's gone with all his train
Of chilling froſts, and dropping rain.
Amidſt the verdure of the mead
The primroſe lifts her velvet head:
The warbling birds, the woods among,
Salute the ſeaſon with a ſong:
The cooing turtle in the grove
Renews his tender tale of love:
The vines their infant tendrils ſhoot:
The fig-tree bends with early fruit:
All welcome in the genial ray:
Ariſe, my fair, and come away!

CHORUS.

All welcome in the genial ray,
Ariſe, O fair one, come away!

DUET.

Together let us range the fields,
Impearled with the morning dew;
Or view the fruits the vineyard yields,
Or the apple's cluſt'ring bough:
There in cloſe-embower'd ſhades,
Impervious to the noon-tide ray,
By tinkling rills, on roſy beds,
We'll love the ſultry hours away.

RECITATIVE.

He. How lovely art thou to the ſight,
For pleaſure form'd, and ſweet delight!
Tall as the palm-tree is thy ſhape,
Thy breaſts are like the cluſt'ring grape.

AIR.

Let me, love, thy bole aſcending,
On the ſwelling cluſters feed:
With my graſp the vine-tree bending,
In my cloſe embrace ſhall bleed.
Stay me with delicious kiſſes
From thy honey-dropping mouth;
Sweeter than the ſummer breezes
Blowing from the genial ſouth.

RECITATIVE.

She. O that a ſiſter's ſpecious name
Conceal'd from prying eyes my flame!
Uncenſur'd then I'd own my love,
And chaſteſt virgins ſhould approve:
Then fearleſs to my mother's bed
My ſeeming brother would I lead:
Soft tranſports ſhould the hours employ,
And the deceit ſhould crown the joy.

AIR.

Soft! I adjure you by the fawns
That bound acroſs the flow'ry lawns,
Ye virgins, that ye lightly move,
Nor with your whiſpers wake my love!

RECITATIVE.

He. My fair's a garden of delight,
Enclos'd and hid from vulgar ſight;
Where ſtreams from bubbling fountains ſtray,
And roſes deck the verdant way.

AIR.

Softly ariſe, O ſouthern breeze!
And kindly fan the blooming trees;
Upon my ſpicy garden blow,
That ſweets from every part may flow.

CHORUS.

Ye ſouthern breezes gently blow,
That ſweets from every part may flow.

PART III.

AIR.

He. Ariſe, my fair, the doors unfold,
Receive me, ſhivering with the cold.

RECITATIVE.

She. My heart amidſt my ſlumbers wakes,
And tells me my beloved ſpeaks.

AIR.

He. Ariſe, my fair, the doors unfold,
Receive me, ſhivering with the cold:
The chill drops hang upon my head,
And night's cold dews my cheeks o'erſpread:
Receive me dropping to thy breaſt,
And lull me in thy arms to reſt.

RECITATIVE.

She. Obedient to thy voice I hie;
The willing doors wide open fly.

AIR.

Ah! whither, whither art thou gone?
Where is my lovely wand'rer flown?
Ye blooming virgins, as you rove,
If chance you meet my ſtraying love,
I charge you tell him how I mourn,
And pant and die for his return.

CHORUS OF VIRGINS.

Who is thy love, O charming maid!
That from thy arms ſo late has ſtray'd?
Say what diſtinguiſh'd charms adorn,
And finiſh out his radiant form?

AIR.

She. On his face the vernal roſe,
Blended with the lily, glows;
His locks are as the raven black,
In ringlets waving down his back;
His eyes with milder beauties beam
Than billing doves beſide the ſtream;
His youthful cheeks are beds of flow'rs,
Enripen'd by refreſhing ſhow'rs;
His lips are of the roſe's hue,
Dropping with a fragrant dew;
Tall as the cedar he appears,
And as erect his form he bears.
This, O ye virgins, is the ſwain,
Whoſe abſence cauſes all my pain.

RECITATIVE.

He. Sweet nymph, whom ruddier charms adorn,
Than open with the roſy morn;
Fair as the moon's unclouded light,
And as the ſun in ſplendour bright;
Thy beauties dazzle from afar,
Like glitt'ring arms that gild the war.

RECITATIVE.

She. O take me! ſtamp me on thy breaſt!
Deep let the image be impreſt!
For love, like armed death, is ſtrong,
Rudely he drags his ſlaves along:
If once to jealouſy he turns,
With never-dying rage he burns.

DUET.

Thou ſoft invader of the ſoul!
O love, who ſhall thy pow'r controul!
To quench thy fires whole rivers drain,
Thy burning heat ſhall ſtill remain.
In vain we trace the globe to try
If pow'rful gold thy joys can buy:
The treaſures of the world will prove
Too poor a bribe to purchaſe love.

CHORUS.

In vain we trace the globe to try
If pow'rful gold thy joys can buy:
The treaſures of the world will prove
Too poor a bribe to purchaſe love.

PROLOGUE TO GIL BLAS,

Spoken by Mr. Woodward, in the Character of a Critic, with a Catcall in his Hand.

Are you all ready? Here's your muſic! here *!
Author, ſneak off, we'll tickle you, my dear.
The fellow ſtopp'd me in a helliſh fright——
Pray, Sir, ſays he, muſt I be damn'd to-night?
Damn'd! ſurely, friend—Don't hope for our compliance,
Zounds, Sir!—a ſecond play's downright defiance.
Though once, poor rogue, we pitied your condition,
Here's the true recipe—for repetition.
Well, Sir, ſays he, e'en as you pleaſe, ſo then
I'll never trouble you with plays again.
But harkee poet!—won't you though? ſays I.
'Pon honour.—Then we'll damn you, let me die.
Sha'n't we, my Bucks? Let's take him at his word—
Damn him—or by my ſoul he'll write a third.
The man wants money, I ſuppoſe—but mind ye—
Tell him you've left your charity behind ye.
A pretty plea, his wants to our regard!
As if we Bloods had bowels for a bard!
Beſides, what men of ſpirit now a-days
Come to give ſober judgments of new plays?
It argues ſome good nature to be quiet—
Good nature! Ay—but then we loſe a riot.
The ſcribbling fool may beg and make a fuſs,
'Tis death to him—What then?—'Tis ſport to us.
Don't mind me though—for all my fun and jokes,
The bard may find us Bloods good-natur'd folks;
Not crabbed critics—foes to riſing merit——
Write but with fire—and we'll applaud with ſpirit—
Our author aims at no diſhoneſt ends,
He knows no enemies, and boaſts ſome friends;
He takes no methods down your throat to cram it;
So if you like it, ſave it; if not—damn it.

AN ELEGY †.

Written among the Ruins of a Nobleman's Seat in Cornwall.

Amidst theſe venerable drear remains
Of ancient grandeur, muſing ſad I ſtray;
Around a melancholy ſilence reigns,
That prompts me to indulge the plaintive lay.

Here liv'd Eugenio, born of noble race,
Aloft his manſion roſe; around were ſeen
Extenſive gardens, deck'd with every grace,
Ponds, walks, and groves, through all the ſeaſons green.

Ah, where is now its boaſted beauty fled!
Proud turrets that once glitter'd in the ſky,
And broken columns in confuſion ſpread,
A rude miſhapen heap of ruins lie.

Of ſplendid rooms no traces here are found:
How are theſe tottering walls by time defac'd!

---

* Blowing his catcall

† From the "Poetical Calendar" for Auguſt 1763.

Shagg'd with vile thorn, with twining ivy bound,
Once hung with tapeſtry, with paintings grac'd!

In ancient times, perhaps, where now I tread,
Licentious riot crown'd the midnight bowl,
Her dainties luxury pour'd, and beauty ſpread
Her artful ſnares to captivate the ſoul.

Or here, attended by a choſen train
Of innocent delight, true grandeur dwelt,
Diffuſing bleſſings o'er the diſtant plain,
Health, joy, and happineſs, by thouſands felt.

Around now ſolitude unjoyous reigns,
No gay-gilt chariot hither marks the way,
No more with cheerful hopes the needy ſwains
At the once bounteous gate their viſits pay.

Where too is now the garden's beauty fled,
Which every clime was ranſack'd to ſupply?
O'er the drear ſpot ſee deſolation ſpread,
And the diſmantled walls in ruins lie!

Dead are the trees that once with niceſt care
Arrang'd, from opening bloſſoms ſhed perfume,
And thick with fruitage ſtood, the pendent pear,
The ruddy-colour'd peach, and gloſſy plumb.

Extinct is all the family of flowers:
In vain I ſeek the arbour's cool retreat,
Where ancient friends in converſe paſs'd the hours,
Defended from the raging dog-ſtar's heat.

Along the terraſs-walks are ſtraggling ſeen
The prickly bramble, and the noiſome weed,
Beneath whoſe covert crawls the toad obſcene,
And ſnakes and adders unmoleſted breed.

The groves, where pleaſure walk'd her rounds, decay,
The mead untill'd a barren aſpect wears;
And where the ſprightly fawn was wont to play,
O'ergrown with heath, a dreary waſte appears.

In yonder wide-extended vale below,
Where oſiers ſpread, a pond capacious ſtood;
From far by art the ſtream was taught to flow,
Whoſe liquid ſtores ſupplied th' unfailing flood.

Oft here the ſilent angler took his place,
Intent to captivate the ſcaly fry——
But periſh'd now are all the numerous race,
Dumb is the fountain, and the channel dry.

Here then, ye great! behold th' uncertain ſtate
Of earthly grandeur——beauty, ſtrength, and power,
Alike are ſubject to the ſtroke of fate,
And flouriſh but the glory of an hour.

Virtue alone no diſſolution fears,
Still permanent, though ages roll away;
Who builds on her immortal baſis, rears
A ſuperſtructure time can ne'er decay.

Far hence, ye viſionary charming maids,
Ye fancy'd nymphs, that haunt the Grecian ſhades;
Your birth who from conceiving fiction drew,
Yourſelves producing fictions as untrue:
But come, ſuperior Muſe! divinely bright,
Daughter of Heaven, whoſe offspring ſtill are light;
Oh condeſcend! celeſtial ſacred gueſt,
To purge my ſight, and conſecrate my breaſt;
While I preſume OMNIPOTENCE to trace,
And ſing that POWER who peopled boundleſs ſpace.

THE LIFE OF BOYSE.

Samuel Boyse was born in Dublin, in 1708. His father, the Rev. Joſeph Boyſe, was paſtor of a congregation of Proteſtant diſſenters in Woodſtreet, and had for his coadjutor the Rev. Thomas Emlyn, ſo well known for his writings and ſufferings. He was one of the ſixteen children of Matthew Boyſe of Leeds in Yorkſhire. He was conſidered as a learned, pious, and uſeful divine; he was an aſſiduous preacher; and his credit was ſuch as procured him general eſteem. He had a principal ſhare in promoting the act of toleration in Ireland. He concurred in the orthodox perſecution of the excellent Emlyn, yet he was the only one of the Dublin diſſenting miniſters who viſited him in priſon, and it was in conſequence of his ſolicitations that the fine was mitigated. He died in 1728. The ſame year his works were publiſhed in 2 vols. folio. He is chiefly diſtinguiſhed, as a writer, by his controverſy with Archbiſhop King, concerning the office of a ſcriptural biſhop.

Young Boyſe received the rudiments of his education at a private ſchool in Dublin. At eighteen years of age, he was ſent to the Univerſity of Glaſgow, probably with a deſign of being educated for the miniſtry. His indolence and diſſipation, however, ſoon rendered this deſign abortive. He had not been a year at Glaſgow, before he unfortunately fell in love with Miſs Atchiſon, the daughter of a tradeſman in that city; and imprudently interrupted his ſtudies, by marrying her before he had entered into his twentieth year.

The natural extravagance of his temper ſoon expoſed him to the inconveniencies of indigence: and as he had now the additional charge of a family, the ſcantineſs of his finances obliged him to remove with his wife, who alſo carried her ſiſter with her, to Dublin; where he expected aſſiſtance and ſupport from his father; who, notwithſtanding the imprudence of his conduct, received him with paternal kindneſs.

His conduct in this dependent ſtate, was the very reverſe of what it ſhould have been. He directed his ſtudies to no uſeful purſuit, by which he might have ſupported himſelf and family, but gave himſelf up to abject trifling and diſſipation; which drew many heavy expences upon his father, who was ſupported by the ſubſcriptions of his congregation, and an eſtate which he poſſeſſed of fourſcore pounds a-year, in Yorkſhire. The behaviour of his wife alſo, was not commendable; her levity and extravagance contributed to accelerate his ruin. The good man was obliged to ſell his eſtate, to pay his ſon's debts; and when he lay in his laſt ſickneſs, he was entirely ſupported by preſents from his congregation, and buried at their expence.

Being deprived, by his father's death, of any farther proſpect of ſupport from him, he repaired to Edinburgh, where his poetical genius raiſed him many friends, and ſome patrons of conſiderable eminence.

In 1731, he publiſhed, by ſubſcription, a volume of Poems on ſeveral occaſions, in 8vo; to which was ſubjoined a tranſlation of the Tablature of Cebes, and a Letter upon Liberty, inſerted in the "Dublin "Journal," 1727. In the liſt of ſubſcribers, which is numerous and reſpectable, are the names of Tickell, Philips, and Brooke.

He acquired a great reputation by this publication, which he dedicated to the Counteſs of Eglinton, a lady of great accompliſhments, both of body and mind; who was a patroneſs of men of wit, and very much diſtinguiſhed Boyſe while he reſided in Scotland.

He alſo wrote an elegy on the death of the Viſcounteſs Stormont; which he intituled, The Tears of the Muſes; becauſe the deceaſed lady was a woman of taſte in the ſciences, and a great admirer of poetry.

Lord Stormont was ſo much pleaſed with this mark of reſpect paid to the memory of his lady, that he ordered a very handſome preſent to be given to Boyſe, by his agent at Edinburgh.

But though his writings had procured him ſome celebrity in that city, yet his perſon was very little known there, and eſpecially among perſons of faſhion and figure; for he was rather of an unſocial turn, and had but few acquaintances. It was, therefore, ſome time before he could be found out: and he would have reaped no benefit from Lord Stormont's generoſity, if an advertiſement had not been inſerted in one of the Edinburgh newſpapers, deſiring the author of the Tears of the Muſes to call at the houſe of the agent.

One of his moſt intimate and reſpectable acquaintances in Edinburgh, was a Mr. Stewart, a merchant or bookſeller, who had two beautiful and accompliſhed daughters, to whom he addreſſed ſome poems, under the names of Hilaria and Clariſſa, inſerted in the the ſecond volume of his poems, publiſhed in 1738.

The notice which Lady Eglinton and Lord Stormont took of Boyſe, was the means of recommending him to the patronage of the Ducheſs of Gordon, who was a lady of literary taſte, and cultivated a correſpondence with ſome of the moſt eminent poets then living.

She was ſo deſirous to raiſe Boyſe above neceſſity, that ſhe employed her intereſt in procuring the promiſe of a place for him; and accordingly gave him a letter, which he was next day to deliver to one of the Commiſſioners of the Cuſtoms at Edinburgh. But it unluckily happened that he was then ſome miles diſtant from the city; and the morning on which he was to have ridden to town with her Grace's letter of recommendation, proved to be rainy. This trivial circumſtance was ſufficient to diſcourage Boyſe, who was never accuſtomed to look beyond the preſent moment; he declined going to town, on account of the rainy weather; and while he let ſlip the opportunity, the place was beſtowed upon another; which the Commiſſioner declared he kept for ſome time vacant, in expectation of ſeeing a perſon recommended by the Ducheſs of Gordon.

Such imprudence and ſuch indolence, were naturally productive of indigence and diſtreſs; and at length, having defeated all the kind intentions of his patrons towards him, he fell into contempt and poverty, which obliged him to quit Edinburgh, as his creditors began to ſolicit the payment of their debts in a manner too importunate to be eaſily reſiſted.

Having reſolved to go to London, he communicated his deſign to the Ducheſs of Gordon; who ſtill retaining a high opinion of his poetical abilities, gave him a recommendatory letter to Pope, and obtained another for him to Lord Chancellor King. Lord Stormont alſo recommended him to his brother the Solicitor-General, afterwards Earl of Mansfield, and other perſons of rank and faſhion.

Upon his arrival in London, he repaired to Twickenham, in order to deliver the Ducheſs of Gordon's letter to Pope; but not finding him at home, he never gave himſelf the trouble to repeat his viſit. He did, however, as he ſaid himſelf, wait upon the Lord Chancellor; by whom he was well received, and with whom he occaſionally dined: but the truth of this was queſtioned by his friends; for he was always averſe to the company of perſons of rank and figure, among whom he had not ſpirit enough to ſupport a ſhare in the converſation.

It indeed appears, that his imprudent conduct prevented his deriving any advantage from the recommendations which he brought with him from Scotland; ſo that he was ſoon reduced to a ſtate of great indigence; from which he attempted no means of extricating himſelf, but by writing mendicant letters.

He frequently applied for aſſiſtance to ſome of the more eminent Diſſenters; from whom he received many benefactions, in conſequence of the reſpect which they paid to the memory of his father. But the pecuniary ſupplies which he received were ſoon diſſipated; for he was not only indolent and imprudent, but luxurious and extravagant.

He had no taſte for any thing elegant, and yet was to the laſt degree expenſive. Often when he had received half-a-guinea, in conſequence of a ſupplicatory letter, he would go into a tavern, order a ſupper to be prepared, drink of the richeſt wines, and ſpend all the money that had juſt been given him in charity, without having any one to participate the luxury with him, and while his wife and child were ſtarving at home.

This is an inſtance of baſe ſelfiſhneſs, which was perhaps never practiſed by the moſt ſenſual epicure, except, with ſome variation of circumſtances, by Savage, whom Boyſe reſembled as well in his genius as in his vices and poverty.

All his friends were at length wearied out with his perpetual applications. About the year 1740, he had brought himſelf to ſuch a ſtate of wretchedneſs, that he had not any clothes in which he could appear abroad, and therefore was wholly confined at home for ſome weeks, procuring, in the mean time, ſome ſcanty ſubſiſtence, by writing verſes for Mr. Cave, the proprietor of the "Gentleman's Magazine;" who paid him by the hundred lines; which, after a while, he wanted to make what is called the long hundred.

"He had not," ſays Shiels, from whom this account is chiefly taken, "a ſhirt, a coat, or any kind of apparel to put on, the ſheets in which he lay were carried to the pawn-broker's, and he was obliged to be confined to bed with no other covering than a blanket. Whoever had ſeen him in his ſtudy, muſt have thought the object ſingular enough. He ſat up in bed with the blanket wrapped about him, through which he had cut a hole large enough to admit his arm, and placing the paper upon his knee, ſcribbled in the beſt manner he could, the verſes he was obliged to make. For the future, wherever his diſtreſſes ſo preſſed as to induce him to diſpoſe of his ſhirt, he ſelt upon an artifical method of ſupplying one. He cut ſome white paper in ſlips, which he tied round his wriſts, and in the ſame manner ſupplied his neck. In this plight he frequently appeared abroad, with the additional inconvenience of want of breeches."

His connection with Mr. Cave, naturally made him acquainted with Dr. Johnſon; who informed Mr. Nichols, that he once collected a ſum of money to redeem his clothes, which he had pawned; and which, in two days after, were pawned again. Mr. Nichols relates, from the ſame reſpectable authority, that Boyſe tranſlated well from the French; but if any one employed him, by the time one ſheet of the work was done, he pawned the original. If the employer redeemed it, a ſecond ſheet would be completed, and the book again be pawned; and this perpetually

From this period, he wrote many poems; but theſe, though excellent in their kind, were loſt to the world, by being introduced with no advantage.

From an original letter, which, in July 1741, he ſent to a friend, with ſome paſſages from his poem, called Deity, it appears to have been publiſhed about this time.

"I have no great reaſon to brag of the ſucceſs of the poem, though the "Champion" early recommended it. Divine poetry is not the taſte of the age; but I hope ſhall be the ſupport of mine. It is the only ſubject I now take pleaſure in. I have all laſt ſummer been employed by Mr. Cave, in French tranſlations; a province highly agreeable to me, and the moſt profitable buſineſs ſtirring I have been, ſince laſt September, almoſt conſtantly with Dr Douglas, in the ſlaviſh work of index-making, alias word-catching, and am only now interrupted by his "Oſteology" which takes up his whole attention. I have the proſpect of having a new tranſlation from the French, in a few days; but bookſellers are ſo undiſtinguiſhing, and authors, or rather ſcribblers, ſo plenty, that learning unleſs ſupported, bids fair to ſtarve between them. I hope the beſt, as I begin to be a little known; and would endeavour, as far as I could, to ſupport a good character in the literary way."

In 1742, his diſtreſſes brought him into a ſpunging-houſe, in Grocer's-alley in the Poultry; from whence he wrote the following letter to Mr. Cave (Sylvanus Urban), ſoliciting for aſſiſtance.

"Inſcription for St. Lazarus' Cave.

Hodie, teſte cælo ſummo;
Sine pane, ſine nummo,
Sorte poſitus inſeſte,
Scribo tibi dolens meſte
Fame, bile tumet jecur
Urbane, mitte opem precor
Tibi enim cor humanum
Non a malis alienum;
Mihi mens nec male grata,
Pro a te favore data.
Ex gehenna debitoria,
Vulgo, Domo Spongiatoria. Alcæus.

"I am every moment," he adds, "threatened to be turned out here, becauſe I have not money to pay for my bed two nights paſt, which is uſually paid before hand; and I am loth to go into the Compter, till I can ſee if my affairs can poſſibly be made up. I hope, therefore, you will have the humanity to ſend me half-a-guinea for ſupport, till I finiſh your papers in my hands. I humbly entreat your anſwer, having not taſted any thing ſince Tueſday evening I came here; and my coat will be taken off my back for the charge of the bed; ſo that I muſt go into priſon naked, which is too ſhocking for me to think of."

How long he was in confinement, does not appear; however, he at length obtained his liberty: but his wants and his imprudence ſtill continued; and he often had recourſe to the meaneſt arts, in order to procure occaſional benefactions.

In 1741, he wrote the Viſion of Patience, an allegorical poem, to the memory of Mr. Alexander Cuming, unfortunately loſt in the Northern Ocean, on his return from China, 1740.

Mr. Cuming was elder brother of his friend the late Dr. William Cuming of Dorcheſter, to whom he addreſſed an Ode on his going to France, in 1735.

In 1743, he publiſhed, without his name, an ode on the battle of Dettingen, intituled, Albion's Triumph.

In 1745, he was invited to Reading, by Mr. David Henry, the late worthy proprietor of the "Gentleman's Magazine," to compile an hiſtorical work, which was printed in that town, in 1747, in two vols. 8vo, under the following title: An Hiſtorical Review of the Tranſactions of Europe, from the commencement of the War with Spain in 1739, to the Inſurrection in Scotland in 1745, with the proceedings in Parliament, and the moſt remarkable domeſtic occurrences during that period. To which is added, an Impartial Hiſtory of the late Rebellion, interſperſed with characters and memoirs, and illuſtrated with notes. This work is not deſtitute of merit, and contains much uſeful information reſpecting the hiſtory of that period.

It appears that Boyſe was paid for this work at a very low rate.

"My ſalary," he writes a friend, in June 1746, "is wretchedly ſmall (half-a-guinea a week), both for writing the hiſtory, and correcting the preſs." In the ſame letter, he affectingly laments the loſs of his wife Emilia, who died while he was at Reading; and was buried at the expence of the pariſh. She is ſaid by Shiels to have been alſo vicious and diſſolute; but other accounts are more favourable, and probably more juſt. He afterwards deſcribes his ſituation as "not wholly uncomfortable."

"I bleſs God I enjoy a greater degree of health than I have known for many years, and a ſerene melancholy, which I prefer to the moſt poignant ſenſations of pleaſure I ever knew. All I ſigh for is a ſettlement, with ſome degree of independence, for my laſt ſtage of life, that I may have the comfort of my poor dear girl to be near me, and cloſe my eyes. I am now beginning the Hiſtory of the Rebellion, a very difficult and invidious taſk. All the accounts I have yet ſeen, are either defective, confuſed, or heavy. I think myſelf, from my long reſidence in Scotland, not unqualified for the attempt; but I apprehend it is premature; by waiting a year or two, better materials would offer. I am about a tranſlation (at my leiſure hours) of an invaluable French work, intituled, "L'Hiſtoire Univerſelle," by the late M. Boſſuet, Biſhop of Meaux. I propoſe only to give his diſſertations on the ancient empires, viz. the Egyptian, Aſſyrian, Grecian, and Roman; which he has deſcribed with ſurpriſing conciſeneſs, and with equal judgment and beauty. I deſign to inſcribe it to Mr. Lyttleton, one of the Lords of the Treaſury; one of the moſt amiable men I have ever known, and to whoſe uncommon goodneſs, if you knew my obligations, you would eſteem him as much as he deſerves."

After his return from Reading, his behaviour was more decent than it had been before, and ſome hopes were entertained of his reformation. He was employed by Mr. Sandby the bookſeller, to tranſlate Fenelon's Demonſtration of the being of a God. He began now to ſupport a better appearance than that to which he had lately been accuſtomed, and ſeemed to have ſome regard to his character. But while his circumſtances were mending, and his irregular appetites loſing ground, his health viſibly declined. During his illneſs, he had the ſatisfaction to obſerve his Deity commended by two eminent writers, Fielding and Hervey. The latter, touched with the ſtory of his misfortunes, and pleaſed with the deſign of his poem, depoſited two guineas with a friend, to give him as his neceſſities required. Of this favour, Boyſe expreſſed his grateful ſenſe, in a letter to Hervey; which ſhows that he was neither in his laſt moments void of real religion, nor an elegant taſte.

" For your tender admonition, and excellent advice, I am truly indebted to you, as they diſcover a generous and compaſſionate concern for my better part. I bleſs God I have reaſon to hope that great work is not to do; for of all the marks of infatuation I know amongſt men, there can be none equal to that of truſting to a death-bed repentance.

" I do not pretend to vindicate my own conduct; nor can I ever forget the very Chriſtian ſenſe of my condition and misfortunes, which (notwithſtanding all my miſbehaviour) you have ſo pathetically expreſſed. The follies of my youth have furniſhed a plentiful harveſt of reflection for my latter years. As I have been now for a long time in a manner buried from the world, ſo it has been my endeavour to ſpend that time in lamenting my paſt errors, and in purſuing a courſe of life void of offence towards God and man.

" I have learned to truſt in God as my portion; to bleſs him for his fatherly corrections, which have been much gentler than my demerits; and by which I have been taught to know him and myſelf, his infinite mercy and goodneſs, my own ingratitude and unworthineſs; ſo that I may truly ſay with the returning prodigal, 'Father, I have ſinned againſt heaven and againſt thee, and am not worthy to be called thy ſon.'

" My health is in a very precarious ſtate; and the greateſt hopes of recovery I have (which are very ſmall), ariſe from warm weather and the country air. I thank God I am abſolutely reſigned to his holy and bleſſed will. I have ſeen enough of the vanity and folly of earthly things, and how inſufficient they are to ſatisfy the deſires of an immortal ſoul. I am ſenſible of my own wretchedneſs and nothingneſs; and that my only hope of ſalvation is through that bleſſed Redeemer, who died to ſave loſt ſinners. This is my rock of hope againſt an approaching eternity."

From this letter, may be eaſily deduced his real character. Happy it would have been, had he ſooner expreſſed theſe ſentiments and principles! His mind, indeed, was often religiouſly diſpoſed; he frequently talked upon that ſubject, and probably ſuffered a great deal from the remorſe of his conſcience. The early impreſſions of his good education, were never entirely obliterated; and his whole life was a continued ſtruggle between his will and reaſon, as he was always violating his duty to the one, while he fell under the ſubjection of the other. In conſequence of this war in his mind, he wrote a poem, called the Recantation.

After a lingering illneſs he died, in the month of May 1749, in obſcure lodgings near Shoe-lane, in the 51ſt year of his age. He was buried at the expence of the pariſh.

Mr. Giles, a late collector of poems, ſays, he was informed by Mr. Sandby, that he was found dead in his bed, in a garret in White-Friars, with the pen in his hand, and in the act of writing.

Dr. Johnſon aſſured Mr. Nichols, that the account of his death, by Mr. Sandby, is not true; it being ſuppoſed that, in a fit of intoxication, he was run over by a coach; at leaſt, he was brought home in ſuch a condition, as to make this probable, but too far gone to give the leaſt account of the accident.

Mr. Francis Stewart, the ſon of a bookſeller in Edinburgh, (probably the brother of Hilaria), and one of Dr. Johnſon's amanuenſes, who had been long intimately acquainted with Boyſe, gives the following account of his death.

" Poor Mr. Boyſe was one evening laſt winter attacked in Weſtminſter by two or three ſoldiers; who not only robbed him, but uſed him ſo barbarouſly, that he never recovered the bruiſes he received; which might very probably induce the conſumption of which he died.

" About nine months before his death, he married a cutler's widow, a native of Dublin, with whom he had no money; but ſhe proved a very careful nurſe to him during his lingering indiſpoſition.

" She told me, that Mr. Boyſe never imagined he was dying, as he always was talking of his recovery; but perhaps his deſign in this might be to comfort her; for one incident makes me think otherwiſe. About four or five weeks before he breathed his laſt, his wife went out in the morning, and was ſurpriſed to ſee a great deal of burnt papers upon the hearth, which he told her were old bills and accounts; but I ſuppoſe were his manuſcripts, which he had reſolved to deſtroy; for nothing of that kind could be found after his death. Though, from this circumſtance, it may be inferred that he was apprehenſive of death, yet I muſt own that he never intimated it to me; nor did he ſeem in the leaſt deſirous of any ſpiritual advice.

" For ſome months before his end, he had left off drinking all fermented liquors, except now and then a glaſs of wine, to ſupport his ſpirits; and that he took very moderately.

" After his death, I endeavoured all I could to get him decently buried, by ſoliciting thoſe Diſſenters who were the friends of him and his father, to no purpoſe; for only Dr. Groſvenor, in Hoxton-ſquare, a diſſenting teacher, offered to join towards it. He had quite tried out thoſe friends in his lifetime; and the general anſwer that I received was, " That ſuch a contribution was of no ſervice to him; for it was a matter of no importance how or where he was buried." As I found nothing could be done, our laſt reſource was an application to the pariſh; nor was it without ſome difficulty, occaſioned by the malice of his landlady, that we at laſt got him interred on the Saturday after he died. Three more of Dr. Johnſon's amanuenſes, and myſelf, attended the corpſe to the grave. Such was the miſerable end of poor Sam, who was obliged to be buried in the ſame charitable manner with his firſt wife; a burial of which he had often mentioned his abhorrence."

Another friend, in a letter to Mr. Nichols, gives the following ſupplementary narrative.

" I knew Mr. Boyſe well, from the year 1732 to the time of his death; have often relieved his neceſſities, and frequently correſponded with him. I have preſerved at leaſt thirty pieces of his, and have in manuſcript ſome of his poems that were never publiſhed. I never ſaw any thing in his wife's conduct that deſerved cenſure. He publiſhed a ſecond volume of poems, in 1738. He was a man of learning; when in company with thoſe by whom he was not awed, an entertaining companion; but ſo irregular and inconſiſtent in his conduct, that it appeared as if he had been actuated by two different ſouls on different occaſions."

" Boyſe," ſays another friend, " was a man of no party whatever; even his private ſentiments, and his public political creed, was influenced by his neceſſities. In regard to his perſon, he was of a middle ſize, of a thin habit, ſlovenly in his dreſs, which was increaſed by his neceſſities, very near-ſighted, and his hearing imperfect. Theſe circumſtances added to his natural diffidence, and his not having been accuſtomed to appear in good company but as neceſſitous, and a mendicant, gave him an awkward, ſheepiſh air, which by no means prejudiced ſtrangers in his favour."

As Boyſe depended for ſubſiſtence on his pen, it muſt be expected that his productions would be more numerous than excellent. His poetical pieces, if collected, would make ſix moderate volumes. Many of them are ſcattered in the " Gentleman's Magazine," marked with the letter Y, and others are ſubſcribed Alcæus. Two volumes of his poems were collected together, and publiſhed in London; which, as they never had any great ſale, are now difficult to be found. He was employed by Mr. Ogle to tranſlate ſome of Chaucer's Tales into modern Engliſh, which he performed with great ſpirit. He received, it is ſaid, at the rate of three pence a-line for his trouble. His liberal tranſlation of Voltaire's three Epiſtles on Happineſs, Freedom of Will, and Envy, is well executed. They were publiſhed in 1738, without his name; and as his clothes were then at the pawn-broker's, the manuſcript was ſold to Dodſley for two guineas.

An ode of his, in the manner of Spenſer, intituled The Olive, was addreſſed to Sir Robert Walpole, which procured him a preſent of ten guineas. He alſo tranſlated a poem from the High Dutch of Van Haren, in praiſe of peace, upon the concluſion of that made at Aix-la-Chapelle. His genius was not confined to poetry only; he had a taſte for painting, muſic, and heraldry; with the latter of which he is ſaid to have been well acquainted. Some of his friends adviſed him to turn his thoughts towards the drama, as that ſpecies of poetical compoſition is more lucrative than any other: and they thought him qualified for it: but he appears never to have attempted any thing of that kind.

The moſt celebrated of his performances was his poem called Deity; the third edition of which was printed in 1752. It has been frequently reprinted in the poetical miſcellanies; and is now, with the Viſion of Patience, and a few other pieces ſelected from the maſs of his miſcellaneous poetry, received, for the firſt time, into a collection of claſſical Engliſh poetry.

The ſubject of his Deity is the attributes of the Supreme Being; a theme the moſt noble and ex-

tenſive, and capable of the higheſt poetical ornament. Though nothing ſhort of the ſimple grandeur of David's lyre, or the exalted majeſty of Milton's epic muſe, can ſatisfy the mind on this hallowed theme, yet he may be reckoned among the moſt ſucceſsful of thoſe writers who have ventured to tread the hallowed ground of ſacred poeſy. The poem is without a plan, or any connection of parts but it is executed. upon the whole, with great ſpirit and elegance, and bears marks of real genius. It abounds with beautiful and magnificent images, elevated ſentiments, animated deſcriptions, and flowing lines; but the poetical diction is not throughout conſiſtently ſupported. nor the harmony of the verſe uniformly preſerved. Several of the lines are flat and proſaic. The Viſion of Patience exhibits, with ſimilar inequalities of language, a tenderneſs of ſentiment, a fertility of imagination, and a facility of expreſſion, equal to the moſt ſucceſsful imitations of Spenſer.

The Ode to Dr. Cuming, is a pleaſing and poetical prrformance, though it breathes not the ardour of ſpirit which lyric poetry requires. His Horace and Lydia, is a happy imitation of that celebrated dialogue. It was written on a ſlight temporary jarring between Boyſe and his wife, whom he thought too much attached to Miſs Atchiſon, her ſiſter, a woman of an equivocal character.

His Epiſtle to Brooke. is truly penitentiary and poetical. Boyſe and Brooke had been long acquainted, and viſited each other frequently. While Brooke was compoſing his "Guſtavus Vaſa," Boyſe by his irregularities, ſome how, gave offence to Brooke, who for ſome time declined his viſits. Boyſe, ſenſible of his fault (for no man's repentance was more poignant for the time, but it was brief and fleeting), addreſſed to Brooke this epiſtle; which, with a ſolemn promiſe of amendment, reſtored him to favour.

His Elegies are equally valuable, as effuſions of poetry, and as monuments of gratitude and piety. The Anniverſary Ode, to the memory of a Daughter. contains an affectionate tribute to the memory of his father. If his daughter's death is correctly dated in 1726, he muſt have been born before 1708, or married before he was eighteen; the age at which, it is ſaid, he was ſent to Glaſgow.

The teſtimonies to his merits are few, but reſpectable. Fielding, in his "Tom Jones" (book vii. ch 1.), gives a quotation from his Deity, which he ſtyles "a very noble one;" and then adds: "It is taken from a poem called the Deity, publiſhed about nine years ago, and long ſince buried in oblivion; a proof that good books, no more than good men, do always ſurvive the bad."

Hervey, in his "Meditations" (vol. ii. p. 239), calls it "a very beautiful, ſublime, and inſtructive poem." And in his "Letters" (vol. i. p. 191), ſays, "It is a noble piece, quite poetical, truly evangelical. admirably fitted to delight and comfort the heart, to alarm and improve the reader."

Boyſe himſelf ſaid, that. upon the firſt publication of the Deity, a gentleman acquainted with Pope took occaſion to aſk him if he was not the author of it; to which Pope replied: "That he was not the author; but that there were many lines in it of which he ſhould not be aſhamed." This Boyſe conſidered as a very great compliment.

Such are the teſtimonies in favour of this unfortunate poet; who was a melancholy inſtance of the wretchedneſs and diſgrace which the moſt ingenious perſons may bring upon themſelves, by imprudence, indolence, and an indiſcriminate indulgence of their appetites and paſſions. Had he employed the powers with which nature endowed him, in a manner ſuitable to the duties of reaſon and virtue, he might have been a happy and reſpectable man; inſtead of which. he was expoſed to all the miſeries of the moſt extreme indigence; nor could the eminent talents which he poſſeſſed reſcue him from contempt.

The unhappy fate of Boyſe will bring to the recollection of thoſe who are but ſlightly acquainted with the lives of our Engliſh writers. many inſtances of men. of the brighteſt parts, whoſe lives, after an uninterrupted courſe of miſery have terminated under the preſſure of want. Otway Savage, Pattiſon, and Chatterton, were admired, and at the ſame time neglected; praiſed, and at the ſame time ſtarved.

"This relation," to uſe the forcible language of Dr. Johnſon on a ſimilar occaſion, "will not be wholly without its uſe, if it remind thoſe. who in confidence of ſuperior capacities or attainments, diſregard the common maxims of life. that nothing can ſupply the want of prudence; and that negligence and irregularity, long continued, will make knowledge uſeleſs, wit ridiculous, and genius contemptible."

THE WORKS OF BOYSE.

DEITY.

" Unde nil majus generatur ipso,
" Nec viget quidquam simile aut secundum."
HOR.

FROM earth's low prospects and deceitful aims,
From wealth's allurements, and ambition's dreams,
The lover's raptures, and the hero's views,
All the false joys mistaken man pursues,
The schemes of science, the delights of wine,
Or the more pleasing follies of the nine!
Recal, fond bard, thy long-enchanted sight,
Deluded with the visionary light!
A nobler theme demands thy sacred song,
A theme beyond or man's or angel's tongue!
But oh, alas! unhallow'd and profane,
How shalt thou dare to raise the heav'nly strain?
Do thou, who from the altar's living fire
Isaiah's tuneful lips did once inspire,
Come to my aid, celestial wisdom, come;
From my dark mind dispel the doubtful gloom:
My passions still, my purer breast inflame,
To sing that God from whom existence came;
Till heav'n and nature in the concert join,
And own the author of their birth divine.

I. Eternity.

WHENCE sprung this glorious frame? or whence arose
The various forms the universe compose?
From what Almighty cause, what mystic springs
Shall we derive the origin of things?
Sing, heav'nly Guide! whose all-efficient light
Drew dawning planets from the womb of night!
Since reason, by thy sacred dictates taught,
Adores a Pow'r beyond the reach of thought.
First Cause of causes! Sire supreme of birth!
Sole light of heav'n! acknowledg'd life of earth!
Whose word from nothing call'd this beauteous whole,
This wide expanded All from pole to pole!
Who shall prescribe the boundary to Thee?
Or fix the era of eternity!
Should we, deceiv'd by error's sceptic glass,
Admit the thought absurd—that nothing was!
Thence would this wild, this false conclusion flow,
That nothing rais'd this beauteous all below!
When from disclosing darkness splendor breaks,
Associate atoms move, and matter speaks!
When non-existence bursts its close disguise,
How blind are mortals?—not to own the skies!
If one vast void eternal held its place,
Whence started time? or whence expanded space?
What gave the slumb'ring mass to feel a change?
Or bid consenting worlds harmonious range?
Could nothing link the universal chain?
No, 'tis impossible, absurd, and vain!
Here reason its eternal author finds,
The whole who regulates, unites, and binds,
Enlivens matter, and produces minds!
Inactive Chaos sleeps in dull repose,
Nor knowledge thence, nor free volition flows!
A nobler source those pow'rs ethereal show,
By which we think, design, reflect, and know;
These from a cause superior date their rise,
" Abstract in essence from material ties."
An origin immortal, as supreme,
From whose pure day, celestial rays! they came:
In whom all possible perfections shine,
Eternal, self-existent, and divine!
From this great spring of uncreated might!
This all-resplendent orb of vital light!
Whence all created beings take their rise,
Which beautify the earth, or paint the skies!
Profusely-wide the boundless blessings flow,
Which heav'n enrich, and gladden worlds below!
Which are no less, when properly defin'd,
Than emanations of th' Eternal Mind!
Hence triumphs truth beyond objection clear
(Let unbelief attend, and shrink with fear!)
That what for ever was—must surely be
Beyond commencement, and from period free;
Drawn from himself his native excellence,
His date eternal, and his space immense!
And all of whom that man can comprehend,
Is, that he ne'er begun, nor e'er shall end.
In him from whom existence boundless flows,
Let humble faith its sacred trust repose;
Assur'd, on his eternity depend,
" Eternal Father! and eternal Friend!"
Within that mystic circle safety seek,
No time can lessen, and no force can break;
And, lost in adoration, breathe his praise,
High Rock of ages, ancient Sire of days!

II. Unity.

THUS recognis'd, the spring of life and thought!
Eternal, self-deriv'd, and unbegot!

Approach, celeſtial muſe, th' empyreal throne,
And awfully adore th' exalted One!
In nature pure, in place ſupremely free,
And happy in eſſential unity!
Bleſs'd in himſelf, had from his forming hand
No creatures ſprung to hail his wide command;
Bleſs'd, had the ſacred fountain ne'er run o'er,
A boundleſs ſea of bliſs that knows no ſhore!
Nor ſenſe can two prime origins conceive,
Nor reaſon two eternal gods believe!
Could the wild Manichæan own that guide,
The good would triumph, and the ill ſubſide!
Again would vanquiſh'd Arimanius bleed,
And darkneſs from prevailing light recede!
In diff'rent individuals we find
An evident diſparity of mind;
Hence ductile thought a thouſand changes gains,
And actions vary as the will ordains;
But ſhould two beings, equally ſupreme,
Divided pow'r, and parted empire claim;
How ſoon would univerſal order ceaſe!
How ſoon would diſcord harmony diſplace!
Eternal ſchemes maintain eternal fight,
Nor yield, ſupported by eternal might;
Where each would uncontroul'd his aim purſue,
The links diſſever, or the chain renew;
Matter from motion croſs impreſſions take,
As ſerv'd each pow'r his rival's pow'r to break,
While neutral Chaos, from his deep receſs,
Would view the never ending ſtriſe increaſe,
And bleſs the conteſt that ſecur'd his peace!
While new creations would oppoſing riſe,
And elemental war deform the ſkies!
Around wild uproar and confuſion hurl'd,
Eclipſe the heav'ns, and waſte the ruin'd world.
Two independent cauſes to admit,
Deſtroys religion, and debaſes wit;
The firſt by ſuch an anarchy undone,
The laſt acknowledges its ſource but one.
As from the main the mountain rills are drawn,
That wind irriguous through the flow'ry lawn;
So mindful of their ſpring, one courſe they keep,
Exploring, till they find their native deep!
Exalted Pow'r! inviſible, ſupreme,
Thou ſov'reign, ſole unutterable name!
As round thy throne thy flaming ſeraphs ſtand,
And touch the golden lyre with trembling hand;
Too weak thy pure effulgence to behold,
With their rich plumes their dazzled eyes infold;
Tranſported with the ardors of thy praiſe,
The holy, holy, holy, anthem raiſe!
To them, reſponſive, let creation ſing,
Thee, indiviſible eternal King!

III. Spirituality.

O SAY, celeſtial muſe! whoſe purer birth
Diſdains the low material ties of earth!
By what bright images ſhall be deſin'd
The myſtic nature of th' eternal Mind?
Or how ſhall thought the dazzling height explore,
Where all that reaſon can—is to adore!
That God's an immaterial eſſence pure,
Whom figure can't deſcribe, nor parts immure;
Incapable of paſſions, impulſe, fear,
In good pre-eminent, in truth ſevere:
Unmix'd his nature, and ſublim'd his pow'rs,
From all the groſs allay that tempers ours;
In whoſe clear eye the bright angelic train
Appear ſuffus'd with imperfection's ſtain!
Impervious to the man's, or ſeraph's eye,
Beyond the ken of each exalted high;
Him would in vain material ſemblance feign,
Or figur'd ſhrines the boundleſs God contain;
Object of faith!—he ſhuns the view of ſenſe,
Leſt in the blaze of ſightleſs excellence!
Moſt perfect, moſt intelligent, moſt wiſe,
In whom the ſanctity of pureneſs lies;
In whoſe adjuſting mind the whole is wrought,
Whoſe form is ſpirit! and whoſe eſſence thought!
Are truths inſcrib'd by wiſdom's brighteſt ray,
In characters that gild the face of day!
Reaſon confeſs'd, (howe'er we may diſpute)
Fix'd boundary! diſcovers man from brute;
But dim to us, exerts its fainter ray,
Depreſs'd in matter, and ally'd to clay!
In forms ſuperior kindles leſs conſin'd,
Whoſe dreſs is ether, and whoſe ſubſtance mind;
Yet all from him, ſupreme of Cauſes, flow,
To him their pow'rs and their exiſtence owe;
From the bright cherub of the nobleſt birth,
To the poor reaſoning glow-worm plac'd on earth;
From matter then to ſpirit ſtill aſcend,
Through ſpirit ſtill refining, higher tend;
Purſue, on knowledge bent, the pathleſs road,
Pierce through infinitude in queſt of God!
Still from thy ſearch, the centre ſtill ſhall fly,
Approaching ſtill—thou never ſhalt come nigh!
So its bright orb, th' aſpiring flame would join,
But the vaſt diſtance mocks the fond deſign.
If he, Almighty! whoſe decree is fate,
Could, to diſplay his pow'r, ſubvert his ſtate;
Bid from his plaſtic hand a greater riſe,
Produce a matter, and reſign his ſkies!
Impart his incommunicable flame,
The myſtic number of th' eternal name!
Then might revolting reaſon's feeble ray,
Aſpire to queſtion God's all-perfect day!
Vain taſk! the clay in the directing hand,
The reaſon of its form might ſo demand,
As man preſume to queſtion his diſpoſe,
From whom the pow'r, he thus abuſes, flows.
Here point, fair muſe! the worſhip God requires,
The ſoul inflam'd with chaſte and holy fires!
Where love celeſtial warms the happy breaſt,
And from ſincerity the thought's expreſs'd;
Where genuine piety and truth refin'd,
Re-conſecrate the temple of the mind;
With grateful flames the living altars glow,
And God deſcends to viſit man below!

IV. Omnipreſence.

THROUGH the unmeaſurable tracts of ſpace,
Go, muſe divine! and preſent Godhead trace!
See where by place, uncircumſcrib'd as time,
He reigns extended, and he ſhines ſublime!

Should'ſt thou above the heav'n of heav'ns aſcend,
Couldſt thou below the depth of depths deſcend;
Could thy ſond flight beyond the ſtarry ſphere,
The radiant morning's lucid pinions bear,
There ſhould his brighter preſence ſhine confeſs'd
Here his almighty arm thy courſe arreſt!
Could'ſt thou the thickeſt veil of night aſſume,
Or think to hide thee in the central gloom!
Yet there, all patent to his piercing ſight,
Darkneſs itſelf would kindle into light:
Not the black manſions of the ſilent grave,
Nor darker hell from her perception ſave;
What pow'r, alas! thy ſootſteps can convey
Beyond the reach of omnipreſent day!

In his wide graſp, and comprehenſive eye,
Immediate worlds on worlds unnumber'd lie:
Syſtems enclos'd in his perception roll,
Whoſe all-informing mind directs the whole:
Lodg'd in his graſp, their certain ways they know;
Plac'd in that ſight from whence can nothing go.
On earth his footſtool fix'd, in heav'n his ſeat;
Enthron'd he dictates, and his word is fate.

Nor want his ſhining images below,
In ſtreams that murmur, or in winds that blow;
His ſpirit broods along the boundleſs flood,
Smiles in the plain, and whiſpers in the wood;
Warms in the genial ſun's enliv'ning ray,
Breathes in the air, and beautifies the day!

Should man his great immenſity deny,
Man might as well uſurp the vacant ſky:
For were he limited in date, or view,
Thence were his attributes imperfect too;
His knowledge, pow'r, his goodneſs all confin'd,
And loſt th' idea of a ruling Mind:
Feeble the truſt, and comfortleſs the ſenſe,
Of a defective partial Providence!
Boldly might then his arm injuſtice brave,
Or innocence in vain his mercy crave;
Dejected virtue liſt its hopeleſs eye:
And heavy ſorrow vent the heartleſs ſigh!
An abſent God no abler to defend,
Protect, or puniſh, than an abſent friend;
Diſtant alike, our wants or griefs to know,
To eaſe the anguiſh, or prevent the blow!
If he, ſupreme Director, were not near,
Vain were our hope, and empty were our fear;
Unpuniſh'd vice would o'er the world prevail,
And unrewarded virtue toil—to fail!
The moral world a ſecond chaos lie,
And nature ſicken to the thoughtful eye!

Even the weak embryo, ere to life it breaks,
From his high pow'r its ſlender texture takes;
While in his book the various parts inroll'd,
Increaſing, own eternal Wiſdom's mould.

Nor views he only the material whole,
But pierces thought, and penetrates the ſoul!
Ere from the lips the vocal accents part,
Or the faint purpoſe dawns within the heart!
His ſteady eye the mental birth perceives,
Ere yet to us the new idea lives!
Knows what we ſay, ere yet the words proceed,
And ere we form th' intention, marks the deed!

But conſcience, fair vicegerent-light within,
Aſſerts its author, and reſtores the ſcene.

Points out the beauty of the govern'd plan,
"And vindicates the ways of God to man"

Then ſacred muſe, by the vaſt proſpect fir'd,
From heav'n deſcended, as by heav'n inſpir'd;
His all-enlight'ning Omnipreſence own,
Whence firſt thou feels thy dwindling preſence known;
His wide omniſcience, juſtly grateful ſing,
Whence thy weak ſcience prunes its callow wing!
And bleſs th' eternal—all-informing ſoul,
Whoſe ſight pervades, whoſe knowledge fills the whole!

V. Immutability.

As the Eternal and Omniſcient Mind,
By laws not limited, nor bounds confin'd;
Is always independent, always free,
Hence ſhines confeſs'd immutability!
Change, whether the ſpontaneous child of will,
Or birth of force,—is imperfection ſtill.
But he, all-perfect, in himſelf contains
Pow'r ſelf-deriv'd, and from himſelf he reigns!
If, alter'd by conſtraint, we could ſuppoſe,
That God his fix'd ſtability ſhould loſe;
How ſtartles reaſon at a thought ſo ſtrange!
What pow'r can force Omipotence to change?
If from his own divine productive thought,
Were the yet ſtranger alteration wrought;
Could excellence ſupreme new rays acquire?
Or ſtrong perfection raiſe its glories higher?
Abſurd!—his high meridian brightneſs glows,
Never decreaſes, never overflows;
Knows no addition, yields to no decay,
The blaze of incommunicable day!

Below, through different forms does matter range,
And life ſubſiſts from elemental change,
Liquids condenſing ſhapes terreſtrial wear,
Earth mounts in fire, and fire diſſolves in air;
While we, inquiring phantoms of a day,
Inconſtant as the ſhadows we ſurvey!
With them, along time's rapid current paſs,
And haſte to mingle with the parent maſs;
But thou, Eternal Lord of life divine!
In youth immortal ſhalt for ever ſhine!
No change ſhall darken thy exalted name,
From everlaſting ages ſtill the ſame!

If God, like man, his purpoſe could renew,
His laws could vary, or his plans undo;
Deſponding faith would droop its cheerleſs wing,
Religion deaden to a lifeleſs thing!
Where could we, rational, repoſe our truſt,
But in a pow'r immutable as juſt?
How judge of revelation's force divine,
If truth unerring gave not the deſign;
Where, as in nature's fair according plan,
All ſmiles benevolent and good to man.

Plac'd in this narrow clouded ſpot below,
We darkly ſee around, and darkly know!
Religion lends the ſalutary beam,
That guides our reaſon through the dubious gleam,
Till ſounds the hour, when he who rules the ſkies
Shall bid the curtain of Omniſcience riſe!
Shall diſſipate the miſts that veil our ſight,
And ſhow his creatures—all his ways are right!

Then when aſtoniſh'd nature feels its fate,
And fetter'd time ſhall know his lateſt date!
When earth ſhall in the mighty blaze expire,
Heav'n melt with heat, and worlds diſſolve in fire!
The univerſal ſyſtem ſhrink away,
And ceaſing orbs confeſs th' Almighty ſway!
Immortal he, amidſt the wreck ſecure,
Shall ſit exalted permanently pure!
As in the ſacred buſh, ſhall ſhine the ſame,
And from the ruin raiſe a fairer frame!

VI. Omnipotence.

Far hence, ye viſionary charming maids,
Ye fancy'd nymphs that haunt the Grecian ſhades!
Your birth, who from conceiving fiction drew,
Yourſelves producing phantoms as untrue;
But come, ſuperior muſe! divinely bright,
Daughter of heav'n, whoſe off'ſpring ſtill are light;
Oh condeſcend, celeſtial ſacred gueſt!
To purge my ſight, and animate my breaſt,
While I preſume Omnipotence to trace,
And ſing that pow'r who peopled boundleſs ſpace!
Thou preſent wert, when forth th' Almighty rode,
While Chaos trembled at the voice of God!
Thou ſaw, when o'er th' immenſe his line he drew,
When nothing from his word exiſtence knew!
His word, that wak'd to life the vaſt profound,
While conſcious light was kindled at the ſound!
Creation fair! ſurpris'd the angelic eyes,
And ſov'reign wiſdom ſaw that all was wiſe!
Him, ſole Almighty, nature's book diſplays,
Diſtinct the page, and legible the rays!
Let the wild ſceptic his attention throw
To the broad horizon, or earth below;
He finds thy ſoft impreſſion touch his breaſt,
He feels the God, and owns him unconfeſs'd!
Should the ſtray pilgrim, tir'd of ſands and ſkies,
In Libya's waſte behold a palace riſe,
Would he believe the charm from atoms wrought?
Go, atheiſt, hence, and mend thy juſter thought!
What hand, Almighty Architect! but thine
Could give the model of this vaſt deſign?
What hand but thine adjuſt th' amazing whole?
And bid conſenting ſyſtems beauteous roll
What hand but thine ſupply the ſolar light?
Ever beſtowing, yet for ever bright!
What hand but thine the ſtarry train array,
Or give the moon to ſhed her borrow'd ray?
What hand but thine the azure convex ſpread?
What hand but thine compoſe the ocean's bed?
To the vaſt main the ſandy barrier throw,
And with the feeble curb reſtrain the foe!
What hand but thine the wint'ry flood aſſwage,
Or ſtop the tempeſt in its wildeſt rage!
Thee infinite! what finite can explore?
Imagination ſinks beneath thy pow'r;
Thee could the ableſt of thy creatures know,
Leſt were thy unity, for he were thou!
Yet preſent to all ſenſe thy pow'r remains,
Reveal'd in nature, nature's Author reigns!
In vain would error from conviction fly,
Thou ev'ry where art preſent to the eye!
The ſenſe how ſtupid, and the ſight how blind,
That fails this univerſal truth to find!

Go! all the ſightleſs realms of ſpace ſurvey,
Returning trace the planetary way!
The ſun, that in his central glory ſhines,
While ev'ry planet round his orb inclines;
Then at our intermediate globe repoſe,
And view yon lunar ſatellite that glows!
Or caſt along the azure vault thy eye,
When golden day enlightens all the ſky;
Around, behold earth's variegated ſcene,
The mingling proſpects, and the flow'ry green;
The mountain brow, the long-extended wood,
Or the rude rock that threatens o'er the flood!
And ſay, are theſe the wild effects of chance?
Oh, ſtrange effect of reaſ'ning ignorance!
Nor pow'r alone confeſs'd in grandeur lies,
The glittering planet, or the painted ſkies!
Equal, the elephant's or emmet's dreſs,
The wiſdom of Omnipotence confeſs;
Equal, the cumbrous whale's enormous maſs,
With the ſmall inſect in the crowded graſs;
The mite that gambols in its acid ſea,
In ſhape a porpus, though a ſpeck to thee!
Ev'n the blue down the purple plumb ſurrounds,
A living world, thy failing ſight confounds,
To him a peopled habitation ſhows,
Where millions taſte the bounty God beſtows!
Great Lord of life, whoſe all-controuling might,
Through wide creation beams divinely bright,
Nor only does thy pow'r in forming ſhine,
But to annihilate, dread King! is thine.
Shouldſt thou withdraw thy ſtill-ſupporting hand,
How languid nature would aſtoniſh'd ſtand!
Thy frown the ancient realm of night reſtore,
And raiſe a blank—where ſyſtems ſmil'd before!
See in corruption, all-ſurpriſing ſtate,
How ſtruggling life eludes the ſtroke of fate;
Shock'd at the ſcene, though ſenſe averts its eye,
Nor ſtops the wond'rous proceſs to deſcry;
Yet juſter thought the myſtic change purſues,
And with delight Almighty wiſdom views!
The brute, the vegetable worlds ſurveys,
Sees life ſubſiſting ev'n from life's decays!
Mark there, ſelf-taught, the penſive reptile come,
Spins his thin ſhroud, and living builds his tomb!
With conſcious care his former pleaſures leave,
And dreſs him for the buſineſs of the grave!
Hence, paſs'd the ſhort-liv'd change, renew'd he ſprings,
Admires the ſkies, and tries his ſilken wings!
With airy flight the inſect roves abroad,
And ſcorns the meaner earth he lately trod!
Thee, potent, let deliver'd Iſrael praiſe,
And to thy name their grateful homage raiſe!
Thee, potent God! let Egypt's land declare,
That felt thy juſtice, awfully ſevere!
How did thy frown benight the ſhadow'd land?
Nature revers'd, how own thy high command?
When jarring elements their uſe forgot,
And the ſun felt thy overcaſting blot!
When earth produc'd the peſtilential brood,
And the foul ſtream was crimſon'd into blood!
How deep the horrors of that awful night,
How ſtrong the terror, and how wild the fright!
When o'er the land thy ſword vindictive paſt,
And men and infants breath'd at once their laſt,

How did thy arm thy favour'd tribes convey!
Thy light conducting point the patent way?
Obedient ocean to their march divide
The wat'ry wall distinct on either side;
While through the deep the long proceſſion led,
And ſaw the wonders of the oozy bed!
Nor long they march'd, till black'ning in the rear,
The vengeful tyrant and his hoſt appear!
Plunge down the ſteep, the waves thy nod obey,
And whelm the threat'ning ſtorm beneath the ſea!
Nor yet thy pow'r thy choſen train forſook,
When through Arabia's ſands their way they took;
By day thy cloud was preſent to the ſight,
Thy fiery pillar led the march by night;
Thy hand amidſt the waſte their table ſpread,
With feather'd viands, and with heav'nly bread:
When the dry wilderneſs no ſtreams ſupply'd,
Guſh'd from the yielding rock the vital tide!
What limits can Omnipotence confine?
What obſtacles oppoſe thy arm divine?
Since ſtones and waves their ſettled laws forego,
Since ſeas can harden, and ſince rocks can flow!
On Sinai's top, the muſe with ardent wing
The triumphs of Omnipotence would ſing,
When o'er its airy brow thy cloud diſplay'd,
Involv'd the nations in its awful ſhade!
When ſhrunk the ear h from thy approaching face,
And the rock trembled to its rooted baſe;
Yet where thy maj ſty divine appear'd,
Where ſhone thy glory, and thy voice was heard;
Ev'n in the blaze of that tremendous day,
Idolatry its impious rites could pay!
Oh ſhame to thought — Thy ſacred throne invade,
And brave the bolt that linger'd round its head!

VII. Wiſdom.

O THOU, who when th' Almighty form'd this all,
Upheld the ſcale, and weigh'd each balanc'd ball;
And as his hand completed each deſign,
Number'd the work, and fix'd the ſeal divine;
O wiſdom infinite! creation's ſoul,
Whoſe rays diffuſe new luſtre o'er the whole,
What tongue ſhall make thy charms celeſtial known?
What hand, fair goddeſs! paint thee but thy own?
What though in nature's univerſal ſtore,
Appear the wonders of Almighty pow'r?
Pow'r unattended, terror would inſpire,
Aw'd muſt we gaze, and comfortleſs admire.
But when fair wiſdom joins in the deſign,
The beauty of the whole reſult's divine!
Hence life acknowledges its glorious cauſe,
And matter owns its great Diſpoſer's laws.
Hence in a thouſand different models wrought,
Now fix'd to quiet, now ally'd to thought;
Hence flow the forms and properties of things,
Hence riſes harmony, and order ſprings,
Elſe had the maſs a ſhapeleſs chaos lay,
Nor ever felt the dawn of wiſdom's day!
See, how aſſociate round their central ſun,
Their faithful rings the circling planets run;
Still equi-diſtant, never yet too near,
Exactly tracing their appointed ſphere.
Mark how the moon our flying orb purſues,
While from the ſun her monthly light renews;
Breathes her wide influence on the world below,
And bids the tides alternate ebb and flow.
View how in courſe the conſtant ſeaſons riſe,
Deform the earth, or beautify the ſkies:
Firſt ſpring advancing, with her flow'ry train,
Next ſummer's hand that ſpreads the ſylvan ſcene,
Then autumn with her yellow harveſts crown'd,
And trembling winter cloſe the annual round.
The vegetable tribes obſervant trace,
From the tall cedar to the creeping graſs:
The chain of animated beings ſcale,
From the ſmall reptile to th' enormous whale,
From the ſtrong eagle ſtooping through the ſkies,
To the low inſect that eſcapes thy eyes!
And ſee, if ſee thou canſt, in ev'ry frame,
Eternal Wiſdom ſhine confeſs'd the ſame:
As proper organs to the leaſt aſſign'd,
As proper means to propagate the kind,
As juſt the ſtructure, and as wiſe the plan,
As in this lord of all—debating man!
Hence, reas'ning creature, thy diſtinction find,
Nor longer to the ways of heav'n be blind.
Wiſdom in outward beauty ſtrikes the mind,
But outward beauty points a charm behind.
What gives the earth, the ambient air, or ſeas,
The plain, the river, or the wood to pleaſe?
Oh ſay, in whom does beauty's ſelf reſide,
The beautifier, or the beautify'd?
There dwells the Godhead in the bright diſguiſe,
Beyond the ken of all created eyes!
His works our love, and our attention ſteal,
His works (ſurpriſing thought!) the Maker veil;
Too weak our ſight to pierce the radiant cloud,
Where wiſdom ſhines, in all her charms avow'd.
O gracious God, omnipotent and wiſe,
Unerring Lord and ruler of the ſkies;
All-condeſcending to my feeble heart,
One beam of thy celeſtial light impart;
I ſeek not ſordid wealth, or glitt'ring pow'r,
O grant me wiſdom—and I aſk no more!

VIII. Providence.

As from ſome level country's ſhelter'd ground,
With towns replete, with green incloſures bound,
Where the eye kept within the verdant maze,
But gets a tranſient viſta as it ſtrays;
The pilgrim to ſome riſing ſummit tends,
Whence opens all the ſcene as he aſcends:
So Providence the friendly height ſupplies,
Where all the charms of Deity ſurpriſe;
Here goodneſs power and wiſdom all unite,
And dazzling glories whelm the raviſh'd ſight!
Almighty Cauſe 'tis thy preſerving care,
That keeps thy works for ever freſh and fair!
The ſun from thy ſuperior radiance bright,
Eternal ſheds his delegated light,
Lends to his ſiſter orb inferior day,
And paints the ſilver moon's alternate ray:
Thy hand the waſte of eating time renews,
Th u ſhedd'ſt the tepid morning's balmy dews;
When raging winds the blacken'd deep deform,
Thy ſpirit rides commiſſion'd in the ſtorm;
Bids at thy will the ſlack'ning tempeſt ceaſe,
While the calm ocean ſmooths its ruffled face;

When light'nings through the air tremendous fly,
Or the blue plague is looſen'd to deſtroy,
Thy hand directs, or turns aſide the ſtroke,
Thy word the fiend's commiſſion can revoke;
When ſubterraneous fires the ſurface heave,
And towns are bury'd in the yawning grave;
Thou ſuffer'ſt not the miſchief to prevail,
Thy ſov'reign touch the recent wound can heal.
To Zembla's rocks thou ſend'ſt the cheerful gleam;
O'er Libya's ſands thou pour'ſt the cooling ſtream;
Thy watchful Providence o'er all intends,
Thy works obey their great Creator's ends.
When man too long the paths of vice purſu'd,
Thy hand prepar'd the univerſal flood;
Gracious to Noah gave the timely ſign,
To ſave a remnant from the wrath divine!
One ſhining waſte the globe terreſtrial lay,
And the ark heav'd along the troubled ſea;
Thou bad'ſt the deep his ancient bed explore,
The clouds their wat'ry deluge pour'd no more!
The ſkies were clear'd—the mountain tops were ſeen,
The dove pacific brought the olive-green.
On Ararat the happy patriarch toſt,
Found the recover'd world his hopes had loſt;
There his fond eyes review'd the pleaſing ſcene,
The earth all verdant, and the air ſerene!
Its precious freight the guardian ark diſplay'd,
While Noah grateful adoration paid!
Beholding in the many-tinctur'd bow,
The promiſe of a faſer world below.
When wild ambition rear'd its impious head,
And riſing Babel heav'n with pride ſurvey'd;
Thy word the mighty labour could confound,
And leave the maſs to moulder with the ground.
From thee all human actions take their ſprings,
The riſe of empires, and the fall of kings!
See the vaſt theatre of time diſplay'd,
While o'er the ſcene ſucceeding heroes tread!
With pomp the ſhining images ſucceed,
What leaders triumph! and what monarchs bleed!
Perform the parts thy Providence aſſign'd,
Their pride, their paſſions to thy ends inclin'd:
A while they glitter in the face of day,
Then at thy nod the phantoms paſs away;
No traces left of all the buſy ſcene,
But that remembrance ſays—The things have been!
" But (queſtions doubt) whence ſickly nature [feels
" The ague-fits her face ſo oft reveals?
" Whence earthquakes heave the earth's aſtoniſh'd breaſt? [feſt?
" Whence tempeſts rage? or yellow plagues in-
" Whence draws rank Afric her empoiſon'd ſtore?
" Or liquid fires exploſive Ætna pour?"
Go, ſceptic mole! demand th' Eternal Cauſe,
The ſecret of his all-preſerving laws?
The depths of wiſdom infinite explore,
And aſk thy Maker—why he knows no more?
Thy error ſtill in moral things as great,
As vain to cavil at the ways of fate.
To aſk why proſp'rous vice ſo oft ſucceeds,
Why ſuffers innocence, or virtue bleeds!
hy monſters, nature muſt with bluſhes own,
W crimes grow pow'rful, and diſgrace a throne!
By

Why ſaints and ſages, mark'd in ev'ry age,
Periſh the victims of tyrannic rage;
Why Socrates for truth and freedom fell,
Or Nero reign'd the delegate of hell:
In vain hy reaſon is the maze purſu'd,
Of ill triumphant, and afflicted good.
Fix'd to the hold, ſo might the ſailor aim
To judge the pilot, and the ſteerage blame;
As we direct to God what ſhould belong,
Or ſay that ſov'reign wiſdom governs wrong.
Nor always vice does uncorrected go,
Nor virtue unrewarded paſs below!
Oft ſacred juſtice lifts her awful head,
And dooms the tyrant and th' uſurper dead;
Oft Providence, more friendly than ſevere,
Arreſts the hero in his wild career;
Directs the fever, poniard, or the ball,
By which an Ammon, Charles, or Cæſar fall:
Or when the curſed Borgias brew the cup
For merit, bids the monſters drink it up;
On violence oft retorts the cruel ſpear,
Or ſetters cunning in its crafty ſnare:
Relieves the innocent, exalts the juſt,
And lays the proud oppreſſor in the duſt!
But faſt as time's ſwift pinions can convey,
Haſtens the pomp of that tremendous day,
When to the view of all created eyes,
God's high tribunal ſhall majeſtic riſe,
When the loud trumpet ſhall aſſemble round
The dead, reviving at the piercing ſound!
Where men and angels ſhall to audit come,
And millions yet unborn receive their doom!
Then ſhall fair Providence, to all diſplay'd,
Appear divinely bright without a ſhade;
In light triumphant, all her acts be ſhown,
And bluſhing doubt eternal wiſdom own!
Meanwhile, thou great Intelligence ſupreme,
Sov'reign Director of this mighty frame,
Whoſe watchful hand, and all-obſerving ken,
Faſhions the hearts, and views the ways of men,
Whether thy hand the plenteous table ſpread,
Or meaſure ſparingly the daily bread;
Whether or wealth or honours gild the ſcene,
Or wants deform, and waſting anguiſh ſtain;
On thee let truth and virtue firm rely,
Bleſs'd in the care of thy approving eye!
Know that thy Providence, their conſtant friend,
Through life ſhall guard them, and in death attend;
With everlaſting arms their cauſe embrace,
And crown the paths of piety with peace.

IX. Goodneſs.

Ye ſeraphs, who God's throne encircling ſtill,
With holy zeal your golden cenſers fill;
Ye flaming miniſters to diſtant lands,
Who bear, obſequious, his divine commands;
Ye cherubs who compoſe the ſacred choir,
Attuning to the voice th' angelic lyre!
Or ye fair natives of the heav'nly plain,
Who once were mortal—now a happier train!
Who ſpend in peaceful love your joyful hours,
In bliſsful meads and amaranthine bow'rs,
Oh lend one ſpark of your celeſtial fire,
Oh deign my glowing boſom to inſpire,

And aid the muſe's unexperienc'd wing,
While goodneſs, theme divine, ſhe ſoars to ſing!
Though all thy attributes divinely fair,
Thy full perfection, glorious God! declare;
Yet if one beams ſuperior to the reſt,
Oh let thy goodneſs faireſt be confeſs'd:
As ſhines the moon amidſt her ſtarry train,
As breathes the roſe amongſt the flow'ry ſcene,
As the mild dove her ſilver plumes diſplays,
So ſheds thy mercy its diſtinguiſh'd rays.
This led, Creator mild, thy gracious hand,
When formleſs Chaos heard thy high command;
When pleas'd, thy eye thy matchleſs works review'd,
And goodneſs, placid, ſpoke that all was good!
Nor only does in heav'n thy goodneſs ſhine;
Delighted nature feels its warmth divine;
The vital ſun's illuminating beam,
The ſilver creſcent, and the ſtarry gleam;
As day and night, alternate they command,
Proclaim that truth to ev'ry diſtant land.
See ſmiling nature, with thy treaſures fair,
Confeſs thy bounty and parental care;
Renew'd by thee, the faithful ſeaſons riſe,
And earth with plenty all her ſons ſupplies.
The generous lion and the brinded boar,
As nightly through the foreſt walks they roar,
From thee, Almighty Maker, ſeek their prey,
Nor from thy hand unfated go away:
To thee for meat the callow ravens cry,
Supported by thy all-preſerving eye:
From thee, the feather'd natives of the plain,
Or thoſe who range the field, or plough the main,
Receive with conſtant courſe th' appointed food,
And taſte the cup of univerſal good;
Thy hand thou open'ſt, million'd myriads live;
Thou frown'ſt, they faint;—thou ſmil'ſt, and they revive!
On virtue's acre, as on rapine's ſtores,
See heav'n impartial, deal the fruitful ſhow'rs!
"Life's common bleſſings all her children ſhare,"
Tread the ſame earth, and breathe a gen'ral air!
Without diſtinction, boundleſs bleſſings fall,
And goodneſs, like the ſun, enlightens all!
Oh man, degenerate man! offend no more;
Go, learn of brutes thy Maker to adore!
Shall theſe, through ev'ry tribe, his bounty own,
Of all his works ungrateful thou alone!
Deaf when the tuneful voice of mercy cries,
And blind, when ſov'reign goodneſs charms the eyes!
Mark how the wretch his awful name blaſphemes,
His pity ſpares,—his clemency reclaims!
Obſerve his patience with the guilty ſtrive,
And bid the criminal repent and live:
Recal the fugitive with gentle eye,
Beſeech the obſtinate, he would not die!
Amazing tenderneſs—amazing moſt,
The ſoul on whom ſuch mercy ſhould be loſt!
But would'ſt thou view the rays of goodneſs join,
In one ſtrong point of radiance all divine!
Behold, celeſtial muſe! yon eaſtern light;
To Bethle'em's plain, adoring, bend thy ſight!
Hear the glad meſſage to the ſhepherds giv'n,
"Good-will on earth to man, and peace in heav'n."
Attend the ſwains, purſue the ſtarry road,
And hail to earth the Saviour and the God!
Redemption! oh thou beauteous myſtic plan!
Thou ſalutary ſource of life to man!
What tongue can ſpeak thy comprehenſive grace?
What thought thy depths unfathomable trace?
When loſt in ſin our ruin'd nature lay,
When awful juſtice claim'd her righteous pay:
See the mild Saviour bend his pitying eye,
And ſtop the light'ning juſt prepar'd to fly!
(O ſtrange effect of unexampled love!)
View him deſcend the heav'nly throne above;
Patient, the ills of mortal life endure,
Calm, though revil'd, and innocent, though poor!
Uncertain his abode, and coarſe his food,
His life one fair continued ſcene of good:
For us ſuſtain the wrath to man decreed,
The victim of eternal juſtice bleed!
Look! to the croſs the Lord of life is ty'd,
They pierce his hands, and wound his ſacred ſide!
See God expires! our forfeit to atone,
While nature trembles at his parting groan!
Advance, thou hopeleſs mortal, ſteel'd in guilt,
Behold, and if thou can'ſt, forbear to melt!
Shall Jeſus die thy freedom to regain,
And wilt thou drag the voluntary chain?
Wilt thou refuſe thy kind aſſent to give,
When dying he looks down to bid thee live!
Perverſe, wilt thou reject the proffer'd good,
Bought with his life, and ſtreaming in his blood!
Whoſe virtue can thy deepeſt crimes efface,
Re-heal thy nature, and confirm thy peace!
Can all the errors of thy life atone,
And raiſe thee from a rebel, to a ſon!
O bleſt Redeemer, from thy ſacred throne,
Where ſaints and angels ſing thy triumphs won!
(Where, from the grave thou rais'd thy glorious head, Chain'd to thy car the pow'rs infernal led)
From that exalted height of bliſs ſupreme,
Look down on thoſe who bear thy ſacred name;
Reſtore their ways, inſpire them by thy grace,
Thy laws to follow, and thy ſteps to trace;
Thy bright example to thy doctrine join,
And by their morals prove their faith divine!
Nor only to thy church confine thy ray,
O'er the glad world thy healing light diſplay;
Fair Sun of Righteouſneſs! in beauty riſe,
And clear the miſts that cloud the mental ſkies!
To Judah's remnant, now a ſcatter'd train,
Oh great Meſſiah! ſhow thy promis'd reign;
O'er earth as wide, thy ſaving warmth diffuſe,
As ſpreads the ambient air, or falling dews,
And haſte the time when, vanquiſh'd by thy pow'r,
Death ſhall expire, and ſin deſile no more!

X. Rectitude.

Hence diſtant far, ye ſons of earth profane,
The looſe, ambitious, covetous, or vain;
Ye worms of pow'r! ye minion'd ſlaves of ſtate,
The wanton vulgar, and the fool did great!

But come, ye purer ſouls, from droſs refin'd,
The blameleſs heart and uncorrupted mind!
Let your chaſte hands the holy altars raiſe.
Freſh incenſe bring, and light the glowing blaze;
Your grateful voices aid the muſe t ſing
The ſp tleſs juſtice of th' Almighty King!
As only rectitude divine he knows,
As truth and ſanctity his thoughts compoſe;
So theſe the dictates which th' Eternal Mind
To reaſonable beings has aſſign'd;
Theſe has his care on ev'ry mind impreſ'd,
The conſcious ſeals the hand of heav'n atteſt!
When man, perverſe, for wrong fortakes the right,
He ſtill attentive keeps the fault in ſight;
Demands the ſtrict atonement ſhould be made,
And claims the forfeit on th' offender's head!
But doubt demands,—"Why man diſpos'd this "way?
"Why left the dang'rous choice to go aſtray?
"If heav'n that made him did the fault foreſee,
"Thence follows, heav'n is more to blame than
"he."
No—had to good the heart alone inclin'd,
What toil, what prize had virtue been aſſign'd?
From obſtacles her nobleſt triumphs flow,
Her ſpirits languiſh, when ſhe finds no foe!
Man might perhaps have ſo been happy ſtill,
Happy, without the privilege of will,
And juſt, becauſe his hands were ty'd from ill!
O wond'rous ſcheme to mend th' Almighty plan,
By ſinking all the dignity of man!
Yet turn thy eyes, vain ſceptic, own thy pride,
And view thy happineſs and choice ally'd;
See virtue from herſelf her bliſs derive,
A bliſs beyond the pow'r of thrones to give;
See vice of empire and of wealth poſſeſs'd,
Pine at the heart, and feel herſelf unbleſs'd.
And ſay, were yet no farther marks aſſign'd,
Is man ungrateful? or is heav'n unkind?
"Yes, all the woes from heav'n permiſſive fall,
"The wretch adopts—the wretch improves them
"all."
From his wild luſt, or his oppreſſive deed,
Rapes, battles, murders, ſacrilege proceed;
His wild ambition thins the peopled earth,
Or from his av'rice, famine takes her birth;
Had nature giv'n the hero wings to fly,
His pride would lead him to attempt the ſky!
To angels make the pigmy's folly known,
And draw ev'n pity from th' eternal throne.
Yet while on earth triumphant vice prevails,
Celeſtial Juſtice balances her ſcales,
With eye unbiaſs'd all the ſcene ſurveys,
With hand impartial, ev'ry crime ſhe weighs;
Oft cloſe purſuing at his trembling heels,
The man of blood her awful preſence feels;
Oft from her arm, amidſt the blaze of ſtate,
The regal tyrant, with ſucceſs elate,
Is forc'd to leap the precipice of fate!
Or if the villain paſs unpuniſh'd here,
'Tis but to make the future ſtroke ſevere;
For ſoon or late, eternal Juſtice pays
Mankind the juſt deſert of all their ways.
'Tis in that awful all-diſcloſing day!
When high Omniſcience ſhall her books diſplay;
When juſtice ſhall preſent her ſtrict account,
While conſcience ſhall atteſt the due amount;
That all who feel, condemn'd, the dreadful rod,
Shall own that righteous are the ways of God!
Oh then while penitence can fate diſarm,
While ling'ring juſtice yet withholds its arm;
While heav'nly patience grants the precious time,
Let the loſt ſinner think him of his crime;
Immediate, to the ſeat of mercy fly,
Nor wait to-morrow—left to-night he die!
But tremble, all ye ſins of blackeſt birth,
Ye giants, that deform the face of earth;
Tremble, ye ſons of aggravated guilt,
And, ere too late, let ſorrow learn to melt;
Remorſeleſs murder! drop thy hand ſevere,
And bathe thy bloody weapon with a tear;
Go, luſt impure! converſe with friendly light,
Forſake the manſions of defiling night;
Quit, dark hypocriſy, thy thin diſguiſe,
Nor think to cheat the notice of the ſkies!
Unſocial avarice, thy graſp forego,
And bid the uſeful treaſure learn to flow!
Reſtore, injuſtice, the defrauded gain!
Oppreſſion, bend to eaſe the captive's chain,
Ere awful Juſtice ſtrike the fatal blow,
And drive you to the realms of night below!
But doubt reſumes,—"If juſtice has decreed
"The puniſhment proportion'd to the deed;
"Eternal miſery ſeems too ſevere,
"Too dread a weight for wretched man to bear!
"Too harſh!—that endleſs torments ſhould re-
"pay
"The crimes of life,—the errors of a day!"
In vain our reaſon would preſumptuous pry;
Heav'n's counſels are beyond conception high;
In vain would thought his meaſur'd juſtice ſcan!
His ways, how different from the ways of man!
Too deep for thee, his ſecrets are to know,
Inquire not, but more wiſely ſhun the woe;
Warn'd by his threat'nings, to his laws attend,
And learn to make Omnipotence thy friend!
Our weaker laws, to gain the purpos'd ends,
Oft paſs the bounds the lawgiver intends;
Oft partial pow'r, to ſerve its own deſign,
Warps from the text, exceeding reaſon's line;
Strikes, biaſs'd, at the perſon, not the deed,
And ſees the guiltleſs unprotected bleed!
But God alone, with unimpaſſion'd ſight,
Surveys the nice barrier of wrong and right;
And while, ſubſervient, as his will ordains,
Obedient nature yields the preſent means;
While neither force nor paſſions guide his views,
Ev'n evil works the purpoſe he purſues!
That bitter ſpring, the ſource of human pain!
Heal'd by his touch does mineral health contain;
And dark affliction, at his potent rod,
Withdraws its cloud, and brightens into good.
Thus human juſtice—(far as man can go)
For private ſafety ſtrikes the dubious blow;
But rectitude divine, with nobler ſoul,
Conſults each individual in the whole!
Directs the iſſues of each moral ſtrife,
And ſees creation ſtruggle into life!
And you, ye happier ſouls! who in his ways
Obſervant walk, and ſing his daily praiſe!

Ye righteous few! whose calm unruffled breasts,
No fears can darken, and no guilt infests,
To whom his gracious promises extend,
In whom they centre, and in whom shall end,
Which (bless'd on that foundation sure who build)
Shall with eternal justice be fulfill'd:
Ye sons of life t. whose glad hope is giv'n
The bright reversion of approaching heav'n,
With grateful hearts his glorious praise recite,
Whose love from darkness call'd you out to light;
So let your piety reflective shine,
As men may thence confess his truth divine!
And when this mortal veil, as soon it must,
Shall drop, returning to its native dust;
The work of life with approbation done,
Receive from God your bright immortal crown!

XI. Glory.

But oh! advent'rous muse, restrain thy flight,
Dare not the blaze of uncreated light!
Before whose glorious throne, with dread surprise,
Th' adoring seraph veils his dazzled eyes;
Whose pure effulgence, radiant to excess,
No colours can describe, or words express!
All the fair beauties, all the lucid stores,
Which o'er thy works thy hand resplendent pours;
Feeble, thy brighter glories to display,
Pale as the moon before the solar ray!
See on his throne the gaudy Persian plac'd,
In all the pomp of the luxuriant east!
While mingling gems a borrow'd day unfold,
And the rich purple waves emboss'd with gold;
Yet mark this scene of painted grandeur yield
To the fair lily that adorns the field!
Obscur'd, behold that fainter lily lies,
By the rich bird's inimitable dyes;
Yet these survey, confounded and outdone,
By the superior lustre of the sun;
That sun himself withdraws his lessen'd beam
From thee, the glorious author of his frame!
Transcendent Pow'r! sole arbiter of fate!
How great thy glory! and thy bliss how great!
To view from thy exalted throne above,
(Eternal source of light, and life, and love!)
Unnumber'd creatures draw their smiling birth,
To bless the heav'ns, or beautify the earth;
While systems roll, obedient to thy view,
And worlds rejoice—which Newton never knew.
Then raise the song, the gen'ral anthem raise,
And swell the concert of eternal praise!
Assist ye orbs that form this boundless whole,
Which in the womb of space unnumber'd roll;
Ye planets who compose our lesser scheme,
And bend, concertive, round the solar frame;
Thou eye of nature! whose extensive ray
With endless charms adorns the face of day;
Consenting raise th' harmonious joyful sound,
And bear his praises through the vast profound:
His praise, ye winds that fan the cheerful air,
Swift as they pass along your pinions bear!
His praise let ocean through her realms display,
Far as her circling billows can convey!
His praise ye misty vapours wide diffuse,
In rains descending, or in milder dews;
His praises whisper, ye majestic trees,
As your tops rustle to the gentle breeze!
His praise around, ye flow'ry tribes, exhale,
Far as your sweets embalm the spicy gale:
His praise, ye dimpled streams, to earth reveal,
As pleas'd ye murmur through the flow'ry vale.
His praise, ye feather'd choirs distinguish'd sing
As to your notes the vocal forests ring!
His praise proclaim, ye monsters of the deep,
Who in the vast abyss your revels keep!
Or ye fair natives of our earthly scene,
Who range the wilds, or haunt the pasture green!
Nor thou, vain lord of earth, with careless ear,
The universal hymn of worship hear!
But ardent in the sacred chorus join,
Thy soul transported with the task divine!
While by his works th' Almighty is confess'd,
Supremely glorious and supremely bless'd!
Great Lord of life! from whom this humble frame
Derives the pow'r to sing thy holy name,
Forgives the lowly muse, whose artless lay
Has dar'd thy sacred attributes survey!
Delighted oft through nature's beauteous field,
Has she ador'd thy wisdom bright reveal'd;
Oft have her wishes aim'd the secret song,
But awful rev'rence still with-held her tongue.
Yet as thy bounty lent the reas'ning beam,
As feels my conscious breast thy vital flame,
So, blest Creator, let thy servant pay
His mite of gratitude this feeble way,
Thy goodness own, thy Providence adore,
And yield thee only——what was thine before.

THE VISION OF PATIENCE,

AN ALLEGORICAL POEM,

Sacred to the Memory of Mr Alexander Cuming, a Young Gentleman unfortunately lost in the Northern Ocean, on his Return from China,* 1740.

"Ne jaceat nullo, vel ne meliore sepulchro."
LUCAN, lib. viii.

'Twas on a summer's night I lay repos'd,
In the kind arms of hospitable rest,
When fancy to my waking thought disclos'd
And deep the visionary scene impress:
Close by my side, in robes of morning grey,
A form celestial stood, or seem'd to stand;
Intranc'd in admiration as I lay,
She rais'd with aspect calm my feeble hand;
And while through all my veins the tumult ran,
With mild benignity she placid thus began 10

* Mr. A. Cuming was first supercargo of the Suecia, a Swedish East India ship, which was wrecked on a rock about two miles east of the island of North Ronalsha, the northernmost of the Orkney Islands, Nov. 18. 1740. Immediately on the ship's striking Mr Cuming went off in the barge, accompanied by the surgeon and six of the boldest seamen, in order to discover what the island was, but were never more heard of. Thirty-one of the sailors were saved out of a hundred, the ship's complement.

" Patience my name—of Lachesis the child,
Nor art thou unacquainted with my voice;
By me afflicted virtue suffers mild,
And to th' eternal will submits its choice.
Behold, commission'd from the heavenly sphere,
I come to strengthen thy corrected sight;
To teach thee yet continued woes to bear,
And eye misfortune in a friendly light:
Nor thou my present summons disobey,
But cheerfully prepare to wait me on my way."

" Daughter of heaven (methought I straight replyd),
Gladly by me thy summons is obey'd;
Content I follow thee, celestial guide,
Beneath thy sure protection undismay'd:
Oft in sharp perils and surrounding woes
Thy salutary presence have I found;
Then lead wherever thy direction shows,
To distant seas, or earth's remotest bound:
Ready am I to wait thy purpos'd flight,
Thine be the care to act the sovereign will aright."

Sudden, enfolded in a fleecy cloud,
Through yielding air we cut our rapid way,
While the pale moon a dubious light bestow'd,
Lands as we pass'd and intermingled sea:
Nor ceas'd our voyage, till the blushing dawn
Dispell'd the glimmering of the starry host;
And night's dark curtain by degrees withdrawn,
We found ourselves on Thulé's sky-girt coast:
Where Silence sits on her untroubled throne,
As if she left the world to live and reign alone.

Here no invading noise the goddess finds,
High as she sits o'er the surrounding deep;
But pleas'd she listens to the hollow winds,
Or the shrill mew, that lulls her evening-sleep;
Deep in a cleft-worn rock we found her laid,
Spangled the roof with many an artless gem:
Slowly she rose, and met us in the shade,
As half disturb'd that such intrusion came:
But at her sister's sight, with look discreet,
She better welcome gave, and pointed each a seat.

Wide from her grotto to the dazzled eye
A boundless prospect! lay the azure waste,
Lost in the sightless limit sea and sky;
By measurable distance faintly trac'd;
Whence now arising from his war'ry bed,
The sun emerging spread his golden ray;
When sweetly Patience rais'd her pensive head,
And thus the goddess said, or seem'd to say:
" Mark, mortal, with attention's deepest care,
The swift approaching scene the hands of Heaven prepare."

With look intent, across the shining void,
(An object to the weak beholder lost!)
Just in the horizon dim a sail I spied,
As if she made some long-expected coast;
Kind to her wishes blew the western breeze,
As, swift advancing o'er the placid main
She shap'd her course, increasing by degrees,
Till nearer sense made all her beauties plain;
And show'd her on the yielding billows ride,
In all the gallant trim of ornamental pride!

Thus flew she onward with expanded sail,
A sight delightful to the pleas'd eye!
Borne on the wings of the propitious gale,
Heedless, alas! of hidden danger nigh:
The joyful sailor, hanging on ocean toss'd,
Already thought his tedious sufferings o'er;
Already hail'd the hospitable coast,
And trod in thought along the friendly shore:
When, dreadful to behold!—disastrous shock!
Shipwreck'd, at once she struck on a wave-cover'd rock!

O Heaven!—it was a piteous sight to view
The wild confusion suddenly took place!
The different gestures of the frighted crew!
The fear that mark'd each death-distracted face.
All one impassion'd scene of woe appear'd,
Some wildly rav'd, while others scarce could speak.
No order was observ'd, no reason heard,
For mortal paleness sat on every cheek!
I look'd at Patience, as she sat me nigh,
And wonder'd, as I look'd, to see her tearless eye!

Again I turn'd—when, o'er the vessel's side,
Distinct I saw a manly youth appear,
Launch the oar'd pinnace to the swelling tide,
Nor show'd his steady brow a guilty fear!
The sad remainder with a mournful hail
His just design and bold departure blest;
With lifted eye he spread the slender sail,
As if he trusted Heaven to guide the rest;
Swift o'er the main the bark retreating flew,
And the tall ship at once was taken from my view.

Immediate Patience from her seat arose,
And all abrupt the transient visit broke;
While Silence, pleas'd, return'd to her repose,
With air compos'd, for never word she spoke:
Again cloud-wafted we pursu'd our way
Westward, as gave the alter'd wind to ride.
When thus, methought, I heard the goddess say,
" 'Tis mine to wait yon boat that braves the tide,
For well, alas! too well I now foresee, [me."
Much need yon voyagers will quickly have for

Driven on the pinions of the eastern wind
O'er many a sea-girt isle and rocky coast,
We left bleak Shetland's shadowy hills behind,
To watch the little bark in ocean toss'd:
For now from sight of land diverted clear,
They drove uncertain o'er the pathless deep,

Ver. 11. Patience, the first allegorical figure introduced, is here represented as the daughter of Necessity, or Lachesis, one of the three Destinies.

Ver. 38 Thulé is here taken for the Orkney Isles.

Ver. 39. Silence, the second allegorical person, and sister of Patience.

Ver. 113. The pinnace was probably driven into the great ocean that lies to the westward of the isles of Orkney and Shetland, where it perished.

Nor gave the adverſe gale due courſe to ſteer,
Nor durſt they the deſign'd direction keep:
The gathering tempeſt quickly rag'd ſo high,
The wave-encompaſs'd boat but faintly reach'd my eye.

Yet could I mark, amidſt the noiſy waſte,
The peaceful exit blameleſs virtue gave;
Calm ſat the youth in the loud threatening blaſt,
And firm prepar'd him for his wat'ry grave:
One fond regard, his lateſt debt, he paid,
Eaſtward, to Caledonia's native ſhore;
And thus (methought) in dying accents ſaid,
"Farewel my country!" he could ſay no more,
For the wild ſurge with rage devouring ſpread,
And whelm'd the hapleſs youth in ocean's liquid bed.

Then Patience meek, as from my rending heart,
She heard deep utter'd the expreſſive ſighs,
"Seeſt thou (ſhe ſaid) that youth's undaunted part,
Who yonder ev'n in death unvanquiſh'd lies?
There view the bleſt effects from virtue flow,
The cow'rd from fate to ſhameful ſafety flies;
The truly valiant dares to meet the foe,
Nor ſhrinks from danger, but with honour dies:
For guilt of all defence diſarms the ſlave,
But innocence in death ſupports the good and brave.

"Yet, ere yon ſetting ſun his light renew,
Shalt thou behold the decent honours paid
To the pale corſe now floating in thy view,
And ſee it in the earth lamented laid;
For though he dies from each expecting friend,
Whoſe vows were offer'd for his ſafe return,
The mournful ſtranger o'er his grave ſhall bend,
The bluſhing virgins weep around his urn!
Such privilege his ſpotleſs truth ſhall boaſt,
Though to your diſtant world in dark oblivion loſt!"

The tempeſt ceas'd—and all the ſober night
Intent our courſe aërial we purſu'd;
Till as Aurora dawn'd with ruddy light,
An iſland we perceiv'd that ſtemm'd the flood;
No hills nor trees adorn'd the level ſoil,
Where bleating flocks a plenteous herbage found;
Low lay the proſpect of the bleating iſle.
With here and there a ſpot of tillage-ground:
By which the humble village ſtood deſcried,
Where never enter'd arts, or luxury, or pride!

O'er many a ſea-green holm we wafted went,
Where undiſturb'd the feather'd nations lay!
Till lighting on the plain with ſoft deſcent,
We ſaw a reverend form advance our way;
And now approaching with an eaſy pace,
The venerable ſage before us ſtands;
White were his hairs, and cheerful was his face,
At once delights his aſpect and commands:
I felt all care ſuſpended at his view,
Whom better far than I his kindred goddeſs knew.

Of homeſpun ruſſet was the garb he bore,
Girt with a velvet ſeal's divided ſkin;
Of woollen yarn the mittens which he wore,
To keep him from the breath of Boreas thin:
An eaſy path along the verdant ground
Soon to his hoſpitable cottage led,
Ere yet inſtructed I my error found,
Nor knew the cauſe my firſt emotion bred,
Till, as into his clean abode we went,
Kind Patience whiſper'd me our hoſt was call'd Content.

Sweet was his earthen floor with ruſhes ſpread,
Sweet was each ſhell-wrought bowl and wooden diſh,
Sweet was the quilt compos'd his healthy bed,
Nor wanted he for fowl or ſun-dried fiſh,
And milk of ſheep, and turf, a plenteous ſtore,
Which lay beneath his comfortable roof;
No ſtorms, no accidents, could make him poor,
He and his houſe I ween were weather-proof.
A batchelor he wonde, devoid of care,
Which made him now appear ſo healthy and ſo fair.

Long time with Patience fair diſcourſe he held,
(Oft had the goddeſs been his welcome gueſt)
Nor ſhe the friendly intercourſe repell'd,
But the good ſire familiarly addreſs'd:
Thus were we happily converſant ſet,
When from the neighbouring village roſe a cry,
And drew our haſty ſteps where numbers met,
Like us, appear'd to know the reaſon—why?
Nor needed anſwer: on the ſea-weed ſpray,
Too viſible reply!—the wave-toſs'd body lay.

How ſtood I ſhock'd, when in the ſemblant face
(By death unalter'd, or the cruel flood),
I could of Lycidas each feature trace,
Young Lycidas, the learned and the good!
"O Heaven (cried I) what ſorrows will he feel,
Debarr'd the promis'd hope of thy return?
Not all his ſkill the mental wound can heal,
Or cure a loſs he muſt ſo juſtly mourn!
How will he weep, when in the ocean grave
He hears a brother loſt he could have died to ſave!"

Here with obſervant eye, and look ſerene,
Thus check'd the good old man my plaintive ſpeech;
"Beſt in ſubmiſſion piety is ſeen,
That leſſon let thy kind conductreſs teach:
But leſt the youth thy friend bewails ſhould want
The rites departed merit ought to find,
Let theſe aſſembled natives kindly grant
The unpolluted grave, by Heaven aſſign'd:
A corpſe that claim'd a due interment more,
Yet never wafted wave to Faroe's guiltleſs ſhore!"

He ſaid—obedient to his juſt commands
The zealous youth the breathleſs body bear,
Some form the ſepulchre with careful hands,
While round the virgins drop the artleſs tear.

Ver. 157. The Faroe Iſles, ſubject to Denmark. See Bede's Deſcription of them.

Ver. 180. Content, the third allegorical figure introduced.

Such flowers as Nature grants the ruder clime,
Such flowers around with pious care they shed,
And sing the funeral dirge in Runic rhyme,
Allotted to the sage or warrior dead:
While as these fruitless honours are bestow'd,
Content with sober speech his purpose thus avow'd:

"What boots thee now, lost youth! that cross the main,
Thou spread the daring sail from pole to pole,
Wealth to acquire, and knowledge to attain:
Knowledge, the nobler treasure of thy soul!
Beneath the scorching of the medial line,
On Afric's sand, and India's golden coast;
Virtue gave thee with native truth to shine,
Dress in each excellence that youth could boast,
And now she gives thee from the wave to rise,
And reach the safer port prepar'd thee in the skies.

"Yet take these honours, thy deserv'd reward!
Call this untroubled spot of earth thy own;
Here shall thy ashes find a due regard,
And annual sweets around thy grave be thrown.
Directing Heaven ordain'd thy early end,
From fraud and guilt to save thy blameless youth,
To show that death no terrors can attend,
Where piety resides and holy truth:
Here take thy rest within this hallow'd ground,
Till the last trump emit the dead awakening sound!"

He ceas'd—attentive to the words he said,
In earth the natives place the honour'd clay;
With holy rites they cover up his head,
A spotless grave, where never mortal lay!
Charm'd with the simple manners of the isle,
I wish'd some further knowledge to receive;
Here could have dwelt with old Content awhile,
And learn'd of him the happiness to live!
When Patience from my side abruptly broke,
And, starting at the loss, I suddenly awoke!

JOB. CHAP. III.

TRANSLATED.

THUS Job began,——Curst be the fatal morn
In which distinguish'd wretchedness was born!
From the fair round of the revolving year
Perish that day! nor let the night appear,
In which this speck of entity began
To swell to misery, and promise man!
Let darkness stain it o'er, no friendly ray
Pierce through the gloom of that affrighted day!
But shades of terror o'er its circuit spread,
And fold it in the mantle of the dead!
O'er that curst night may double horrors dwell,
Such as enwrap the punishments of hell!
No cheerful sounds its solitude awake,
But such as fiends and tortur'd wretches make;
Such as may wound the soul, and shock the ear,
The groans of death, and howlings of despair!
May all its stars with rays diminish'd show,
And through the dusky air obscurely glow!
No glimpse of hope the dreadful scene adorn,
Nor let it see the promise of a morn ——
Because it shut not up my mother's womb,
And join'd at once my cradle and my tomb:
Why dy'd I not? Why did preventive care
My destin'd life for future sorrows spare?
Then had I found that ease I seek in vain,
Nor known this load of unexampled pain!

O grave! thou refuge of the sad distrest!
When shall I sink into thy downy rest?
There kings and mighty ones neglected rot,
In their own mould'ring monuments forgot:
(Though once of grandeur and of pow'r possest,
And all the treasures of the shining east)
There men no longer vain distinctions boast,
In common dust the prince and slave are lost:
Low lies th' oppressor bound in lasting chains,
There of his rod the wretch no more complains!
There cease the wailings of the heart distrest,
And there the weary find eternal rest!

Why spares thou, O Lord! a life like mine?
While with incessant prayers for death I pine:
Why is that blessing given to wealth and pride?
But to the wretch, distress'd like me, denied.
While o'er my head thy awful terrors brood,
Beset my path, and mingle with my food.
In vain my cries and groans continual rise,
In vain my tears I pour, and waste my sighs:
While all my fears upon my soul are come,
By thee forsaken, hopeless and undone!

Ver. 227. The inhabitants of all these northern isles observe the custom of singing over the dead.

VERSES

Sacred to the memory of the Reverend

*MR. JOHN ANDERSON,

MINISTER AT GLASGOW, OB. ANNO 1721.

SHALL streaming tears a nation's eyes o'erflow,
And not a muse partake the general woe?
Shall we be dumb because he speaks no more,
Who charm'd attentive multitudes before.
Clos'd are those eyes, and silent is that tongue
Where sparkled zeal and mild instruction hung.
By nature form'd to shine in ev'ry scene,
To charm th' ambitious, or allure the vain:
Early he learn'd the prospect to despise
And make his nobler choice his kindred skies:
For this himself and rising hopes resign'd,
To live to heav'n, and live for human kind;
Hard trial to the mind, could ought controul
A Roman virtue in a Christian soul?
Oh could the muse his generous labours say!
To justify the debt of tears we pay;
No streams of grief should be immod'rate thought,
Excess of sorrow is an honest fault
His widow'd flock best know his pious care,
Taught by his words and guarded by his prayer;
No more shall in his eyes his ardour shine,
No longer from his lips flow truths divine.

* Author of "A Dialogue on the Common prayer Book" 4to 1711, "Letters upon Presbyteries," &c. 8vo. 1720, and grandfather of the learned and ingenious John Anderson, F. R. S. Professor of Natural Philosophy in the University of Glasgow.

How wont the willing crowd to gather round,
Hang on ' is lips, and catch th' enchanting ſound;
While in ſuch terms his thoughts he ſtill expreſt
The love of virtue roſe in every breaſt
And ev'ry heart its ſecret faults confeſt.
Then with what eaſe the tumult would he calm,
And to the wounds he ſcarch'd apply the balm!
So firſt their danger to mankind he taught,
Then, like ſome guardian angel, comfort brought.
Nor had his ſpeech alone ſuch wond'rous pow'r,
Though wond'rous that—but ſtill his life was more;
Where all the charms of virtue were diſplay'd;
And taught the world even more than all he ſaid;
Where all was open, unreſerv'd and fair,
A generous boſom, and a heart ſincere,
So firm to truth, to reaſon ſo reſign'd,
At once impartial, and at once ſo kind,
That ſcarce we knew which moſt we ſhould commend,
The free reprover, or the tender friend:
Such were the paſtors that in ancient days,
Reclaim'd mankind, and led in virtue's ways,
Such Aſia boaſted, and ſuch Rome of old,
E'er ſouls were barter'd for unrighteous gold;
Such great Eraſmus, gentle Cranmer ſhone,
And ſuch a man, O Glaſgow! late thy own:
Whoſe life like theirs, in generous labours paſt,
Was ſtill the ſame and lovely to the laſt.
So in calm ev'nings and unclouded ſkies
Not leſs reſplendent in his fall than riſe;
The weſtering ſun into the main declines,
Bright and more bright, and as he ſets he ſhines!

WRITTEN

IN MR. WATTS'S HORÆ LYRICÆ.

Here let th' attentive reader learn
On heavenly wings to riſe;
And all-contemplative diſcern
The wonders of the ſkies!

Compaſſion kind, and boundleſs love,
Here ſeem divinely bright:
And mercy like the ſilver dove
Allures the raviſh'd ſight.

Thy ſoul, great Watts! forſakes the earth,
And ſcorns the glitt'ring toy:
While conſcious of her higher birth
She ſeeks immortal joy.

Thy melting numbers touch the ſoul,
And kind devotion warm;
Each jarring thought with eaſe controul,
And bleſs us while they charm.

O happy whoſe ſeraphic mind,
Such heights ſublime can riſe!
Can leave the leſſening world behind,
And mingle with the ſkies

But happier far ſhall be thy fate,
When death ſhall break the chain;
And ſet thee looſe to bliſs complete,
To joys that know no pain.

There ſhalt thou thy immortal lyre,
In ſongs of praiſe employ!
And feel the ſacred taſk inſpire
Thy breaſt with endleſs joy.

VERSES

OCCASIONED BY THE DEATH OF MR. M— S—,

At Glaſgow, May 28. 1730.

INSCRIBED TO MR. A — S —.

While thy torn heart with varied woe is preſt,
And all the friend lies bleeding in thy breaſt:
Forgive the muſe who would our loſs deplore,
And mourn with thee—that Marcus is no more!
The cruel tyrant, whoſe reſiſtleſs rage
Alike employs itſelf on youth and age;
Smiles at our tears—and as our grief runs high,
Points Marcus out; and bids us learn to die!
Shows all the op'ning virtues of the youth,
His native goodneſs, modeſty, and truth:
What early worth juſt blaſted in its bloom!
How many graces ſhrowded in the tomb!
See Caledonia weeping o'er the urn!
As if ſhe ſeem'd her fav'rite ſon to mourn;
Oft for her ſake he read th' hiſtoric page,
And trac'd the mazes of remoteſt age;
Earlier aſſerter of her glorious cauſe,
Fond of her freedom, zealous for her laws:
Great liberty inſpir'd his honeſt breaſt,
And his dear country all his ſoul poſſeſt:
In youth a patriot—ſteady to the right,
In manners humane, and in arts polite.
His heart all-generous, candid, and ſerene,
Sweet as his look, engaging as his mien:
To friendſhip faithful, to misfortune kind,
His life a lovely copy of his mind.
So near perfection in his early day,
Why ſhould we weep to ſee him ſnatch'd away?
To ſee him reach at once th' immortal prize,
And riſe triumphant to his native ſkies.
Behold th' exalted youth with ſmiles ſurvey,
The fond miſtaken debt of grief we pay!
Behold him ſeated on the bliſsful ſhore,
Hear from afar the noiſy tempeſt roar!
Safe from the taint of a corrupted age,
From vicious manners, and from party-rage.
No paſſions there his purer boſom move;
But harmony divine, and peace, and love;
Such as on earth were wont to ſooth his breaſt,
The pleaſing foretaſte of his heav'nly reſt.
See him point out the path he left in view,
And bid his friends the noble race purſue!
Diſplay the fair example to their eyes,
And bid them live like him—like him to riſe!
So the bright all-enlivening orb of light,
When he withdraws himſelf from mortal ſight;
With fairer glories ſhines in milder ſkies,
And ſets to us, for better worlds to riſe!
Thou dear departed friend! if greatly bleſt,
One meaner thought can touch thy peaceful breaſt,
Look on a heart, by paſſions rent like mine,
That weeping waits to mingle joys with thine!
Fir'd by the flight—that ſtruggles to be free,
And join ſociety with heav'n and thee.

TO MR. THOMSON,

UPON HIS TRAGEDY OF SOPHONISBA.

Forgive the muſe, that with unpractis'd ſtring,
And fond ambition dares thy praiſe to ſing;

Pleas'd who beholds thy tow'ring genius riſe,
And ſees thy merit ſhine in ſouthern ſkies.
When nature firſt inſpir'd thy early ſtrain,
To paint the beauties of the flow'ry plain;
The charming page I read with ſoft delight,
And every lively landſkip charm'd my ſight:
Now led by thee, while I again explore,
New patriots riſing on a barbarous ſhore;
A beauteous breaſt that glows with love of fame,
A female Cato, with a ſofter name!
My raviſh'd heart exults in being free,
And burns with love of ſacred liberty!
Let Rome the bleſſing arrogate no more,
The goddeſs reigns upon a diſtant ſhore;
And there in all her native charms confeſt,
She fires immortal Saphoniſba's breaſt:
Great Carthage riſes from oblivion's womb,
By thee reviv'd, ſhe quits her awful tomb;
And emulates again her haughty rival Rome.
So when great Titian roſe, immortal man!
With rural ſcenes his pencil firſt began;
Employ'd all genial nature's laws to trace,
And copy from her ever-blooming face;
Here paint the precipice and falling flood,
There ſtrike the vale—or mark the diſtant wood;
Till riſing in his ſkill by juſt degrees,
He form'd th' idea of th' hiſtoric piece;
Where ſome great hero boldly he deſign'd,
And touch'd th' exalted paſſions of the mind:
Of art with nature ſuch the generous ſtriſe,
That all the ſpeaking canvas ſwell'd with life!
So ſtrong the figures ſtrike the raviſh'd eye,
We quite forget the hand that gives the joy!
Till by reflection warm'd, we feel thoſe joys,
Still from one great original ariſe;
Who follows nature charms without deſign,
Who follows her like you—like you muſt ſhine.

TO MRS. OLDFIELD,

ON HER ACTING CLEOPATRA.

Oft has my ſoul with ſtrong compaſſion ſtrove,
To think of Antony's ill-fated love;
To ſee him ſhrink before th' ambitious boy,
Fame, life, and honour, given for tranſient joy!
Thus once I thought—but now my error ſee,
And the loſt hero ſtands abſolv'd by thee.
Had Cleopatra's charms like Oldfield's ſhone!
Had ſhe the tuneful magic of thy tongue!
Well might the Roman of his ſoftneſs boaſt,
And think that love aton'd for empire loſt:
Well might he from the glorious war remove,
And barter crowns and provinces for love!
For oh! who would not make the fate his own?
And wiſh to be ſo glorioufly undone!

ANNIVERSARY ODE,

SACRED TO THE MEMORY OF A DAUGHTER.

Ob. An. 1726.

Begin my muſe, and ſtrike the lyre,
Let grief the melting notes inſpire!
And ſadly conſecrate the day,
That ſnatch'd my ſoul's delight away!
When firſt the beauteous infant maid,
The early ſeeds of ſenſe diſplay'd,
With her dear prattle ſooth'd my cares,
And charm'd my fond tranſported ears.
How did her op'ning bloom ariſe!
And as it ſtruck my raviſh'd eyes,
Oft promis'd to my years increaſe,
A ſtore of innocence and peace.
But ſoon, too ſoon, theſe flattering joys,
Fate's interpoſing hand deſtroys;
And loſt in death's all-gloomy ſhade,
The dear deluſive viſion fled.
So does the early-budding roſe,
Its bluſhing fragrancy diſcloſe,
Allure the touch, and ſmell, and ſight,
And yield each ſenſe a ſoft delight.
Till ſome raſh foe its pride invade,
And raviſh'd from its native bed,
Its odour and its hue decay,
And all its beauties fade away.
Thus were my dreams of comfort croſt,
And with the fav'rite virgin loſt;
And all my ſchemes of bliſs to come,
Enclos'd within her early tomb!
Thence clouds of new afflictions riſe,
And brooding o'er the darken'd ſkies;
With their ſad melancholy ſhade,
The horizon of life o'erſpread.
While o'er the young Sabina's urn,
Thus with paternal grief I mourn:
Around my ſoul new ſorrows break,
And leave my wōes no room to ſpeak.—
On Atticus' delightful age,
Fate next employed his cruel rage;
With eaſe diſſolv'd life's feeble chain,
And freed the ſuff'ring ſaint from pain.
O ever honour'd ſacred name!
If in the bright immortal train
One thought of earth can touch thy reſt,
Look down on this afflicted breaſt.
Teach me, like thee, through life to ſteer,
Patient and calm my lot to bear;
Teach me thy heav'nly ſteps to trace,
And reach like thee the realms of peace!

ODE TO MR. WILLIAM CUMING,

ON HIS GOING TO FRANCE, AUGUST 31. 1735.

" ——— Finibus [Gallicis]
" Reddes incolumem precor,
" Et ſerves animæ dimidium meæ!"

O blow ſerene! ye ſoft Eteſian gales,
Curl the gay main, and fill the ſwelling ſails!
The guardian veſſel through the deep attend:
Shine every favourable planet bright,
To guide the proſp'rous navigation right,
And bear to Gallia's ſhore my happy friend!

Thence to Lutetia's walls, a pleasing way,
Through scenes by nature dress'd profusely gay!
Auspicious fortune still his passage guide;
Till safe arriv'd he views the wond'rous town,
Which all agree unprejudic'd to own
At once fair Europe's envy and its pride!

There while his thoughts explore th' amazing plan
Of pow'r divine—the microcosm of man;
From every danger shield his spotless youth,
With manly strength his growing virtue arm,
To break the force of every siren charm,
And keep untainted all his native truth.
When views of pomp or bright processions rise,
When Louvre or Versailles enchants the eyes,
The grand assembly or the royal train!
Oh liberty! thy faithful prospect lend,
To Britain's isle his calm reflection bend,
And say, that slav'ry makes the splendour mean.

When artful beauty lays the secret snare,
Instruct him, friendly goddess, to beware,
Defend him from each captivating art!
For there fair Venus holds her sov'reign court,
There all her wanton sportive loves resort,
And in a thousand forms surprise the heart.

Yet, goddess! let him, as intent he sees
That airy nation's native skill to please,
Shun the reflection of the mimic glass!
Of all the Britons I have ever seen,
Who ap'd the graces of the Gallic mien,
Scarce one but chronicled himself an ass.

Yet that politeness of the truest kind,
Which both adorns and cultivates the mind,
This let his careful study borrow thence!
Manners from hence new ornament receive,
To knowledge this does double lustre give,
And travel finishes the man of sense.

Sometimes from crowds retir'd if chance he strays,
Where Seine along th' Elysian meadows plays,
Let some kind genius whisper in his ear,
How many vows for his success are paid,
How many for his safe return are made,
How many think his absence tedious here.

But oh, too harsh, my friend! these precepts flow,
The specious coverings of my secret woe,
While fortune's partial favour I accuse:
Who, when my sorrows needed most a friend,
Was pleas'd in thee the precious gift to send,
Malicious bounty! but bestow'd to lose.

Oh no, forgive, the sacred tie I wrong!
Where virtue binds, the mutual union strong.
Distance, misfortune, time, and fate defies;
From pole to pole, from Ganges to the Thame,
Immortal friendship spreads th' etherial flame
For ages still the same, and never dies!

Edinæ, Aug. 21. 1735.

Amico opt. W. C. mœstus hoc doloris et gratitudinis monumentum P.

HORACE AND LYDIA,

BOOK III. ODE IX. IMITATED.

Alexis.

While, Phyllis, transported I lay in your arms,
And, possess'd of your fondness, was bless'd in your charms,
On wealth and ambition with scorn I look'd down,
Nor envy'd great Lewis that bauble, his crown.

Phyllis.

While faithful with me you delighted at home,
As happy was I, as the Pope is at Rome;
But now new acquaintance your fancy mislead,
And Peter's folk * never are out of your head.

Alexis.

The charge I submit to—I own they're my friends,
Their agreeable converse fair virtue commends.
With their sense and good humour my woes I relieve,
And with them for an age I unweary'd could live.

Phyllis.

Miranda's fine voice and good humour for me,
My comrade she is, and my comrade shall be!
In spite of all scandal, I'll live with her still,
And let the world censure, or say what it will.

Alexis.

But what if, dear Phyllis, this diff'rence should end,
Suppose, for your sake, I abandon'd my friend,
And, in spite of my judgment, too bias's'd my view,
Relinquish'd the world to be bury'd with you.

Phyllis.

Though Miranda's still constantly pleasing and gay,
Though her notes far exceed all the music of May,
And though you, like old ocean, look muddy and sour,
Our ancient alliance I'll gladly restore, [more.
And resolve that till death we will differ no

Alexis.

No, Phyllis, though kind, that concession won't take,
I ne'er can consent our joint friends to forsake,
Who in making of treaties forget their allies,
Will never be reckon'd or honest or wise.

Phyllis.

Then be judg'd by the rule you've so gravely laid down,
Nor hope that Miranda my heart shall disown.
With her, gentle heav'n, grant me freedom to rove,
While friendship shall pay me the interest of love.

Alexis.

Beware, charming Phyllis, a fatal mistake,
Where interest's the motive, there friendship is weak
'Tis virtue alone can establish the tie, [we die.
Through life still unbroken, which holds when
The taste may be modish, yet ne'er can last long,
To lose an old lover, to hear a new song.

---

* By "Peter's folk," is meant the hospitable and agreeable family of a Mr. Stewart, a merchant in Edinburgh; who had two amiable daughters, to whom Boyse addressed some poems.

If novelty charms you, delighted in change,
From pleasure to pleasure, oh long may you range!
For me, from henceforth on some quieter shore,
Where fortune and love shall disturb me no more,
I'll seek in retirement the noblest of joys,
'Tis time must discover the truth of each choice.

EPISTLE TO HENRY BROOKE, ESQ.

Though 'midst the cruel storm of passion tost,
I view the shore, and sigh for safety lost,
While every distant hope of good is gone,
And left by thee! 'tis joy to be undone,
Oh, read the thought where no design has part,
The last faint purpose of my wretched heart;
Long had between us (in a moment torn)
The holy band of friendship's faith been worn:
I claim'd the bliss, so happy once was I,
Dear to your breast, and cherish'd in your eye:
Now lost the privilege shall one short day
Snatch all the labour of our lives away?
But oh, I err!—I am not what I seem,
Friendship can ne'er subsist without esteem;
Death were my choice, if heaven my choice approv'd,
More easy than to lose the friend I lov'd:
Happy in this, that to your better care
I gave a friend, will never lose his share,
Whose truth will still increase, the longer known,
Whose faith, whose goodness, are so like your own:
Forget I bless you,—if this wish succeeds,
Then live Gustavus, though Arvida bleeds.

ON THE EXTRAORDINARY EXECUTION OF CAPT. JOHN PORTEOUS, SEPT. 7. 1736.

"——— Nec lex est justior ulla,
"Quam necis artifices arte perire sua."

"By their own arts, 'tis righteously decreed,
"The dire artificers of death shall bleed."

Porteous! thou strong example, timely given,
How sovereigns should employ the power of heaven;
Thy wanton hands a sanguine deluge spread,
Thy country's equal voice pronounc'd thee dead:
But tools like thee were thought such useful things,
That sordid greatness mov'd all secret springs;
In vain the great applied, the court repriev'd,
Eternal Justice thought too long you liv'd:
Mercy grew vain; when such a crime grew slight,
'Twas time the people should assert their right.
Yet let the muse the just encomium draw,
Self-injur'd, how they kept the sight of law,
The gentleness, denied their fellows, gave,
And left thee time to arm thee for the grave:
Let none behold thy exit with regret,
You died, the noblest way, a public debt:
May the auspicious omen rise in you,
And villains (screen'd however) meet their due!

OF

WILLIAM THOMPSON

THE LIFE OF THOMPSON.

Of the perſonal hiſtory of Thompson, the preſent writer is ſorry that the intelligence which his inquiries have obtained, is ſo ſcanty, that he muſt give his life to the world much more briefly than his qualifications deſerve. A few detached dates and notices, leſs ample and ſatisfactory than the inſcription on a common grave-ſtone, collected chiefly from his writings, compoſe the ſlender memorials of his life.

William Thompſon, was ſecond ſon of the Rev. Francis Thompſon, B. D. Senior Fellow of Queen's College, Oxford, and thirty-two years vicar of Brough in Weſtmoreland.

Of the time and place of his birth there are no memorials. But it is probable, he was born at Brough, about 1712. His mother was firſt married to Joſeph Fiſher, M. A. Fellow of Queen's College, Oxford, Vicar of Brough, and Arch-deacon of Carliſle, by whom ſhe had no children. His father died Auguſt 31. 1735, aged 70. His mother died October 25. 1737, aged 65.

After paſſing through the uſual courſe of elementary learning in the country, he was ſent to the Univerſity of Oxford, and entered at Queen's College, where he afterwards became a Fellow.

Early in life, he diſcovered a propenſity to poetry, and wrote, as he himſelf informs us, Six Paſtorals, in 1734.

His early conceptions of love, of friendſhip, and of virtue, were very warm and elevated, and prompted a variety of poetical effuſions, amatory, ſentimental, and ſerious.

In his retirement in Weſtmoreland, on the banks of his native Eden, which "firſt heard the Doric reeds" of the unfortunate Pattiſon, and the amiable Langhorne, he wrote his Stella, five Amores, Elegiarum tres Libri, in 1736.

Theſe Paſtorals and Love Elegies, written when the young poet's ſoul was high-tuned to the tender emotions of nature, without any deſign of printing them, have not been collected into his works.

In 1736, he wrote an Epithalamium on the Royal Nuptials, as a college exerciſe, which procured him conſiderable reputation.

He took the degree of Maſter of Arts, February 26. 1738; and entering into orders, was preſented to the rectory of South Weſton and Hampton-Pyle, in Oxfordſhire.

About this time, on his recovery from the ſmall-pox, he wrote his poem called Sickneſs; which was publiſhed in 1746, and very favourably received by the polite and religious world.

Not long after, he publiſhed his Hymn to May, in the manner of Spenſer, which completely eſtabliſhed his poetical reputation.

In 1751, he was a candidate for the poetry profeſſorſhip at Oxford; but did not ſucceed in his application.

Soon after, he publiſhed Gratitude, a Poem, on the Counteſs of Pomfret's benefactions to the Univerſity of Oxford, which has eluded the inquiries of the preſent writer.

In 1757, he publiſhed, by ſubſcription, a collection of his Poems on Several Occaſions, and Gondibert and Birtha, a tragedy, with a dedication to the Counteſs of Northumberland. In a ſhort advertiſement, he informs the reader, "that the greater part of the poems were written when the author was very young, and without any deſign of printing them, which," he ſays, "is only mentioned with hopes to procure the reader's pardon for the imperfection of ſome, and the lightneſs of others. Yet

> Non ego mordaci diſtrinxi carmine quemquam
> Nulla venenato litera miſta joco eſt." OVID.

" The tragedy," he adds, " was likewiſe chiefly compoſed when the author was an under-graduate in the Univerſity. as an innocent relaxation from thoſe ſeverer and more uſeful ſtudies; for which the College, where he had the benefit of his education, is ſo deſervedly diſtinguiſhed. I have cauſed it (with all its juvenile imperfections on its head) to be printed as it was firſt written, and have even added the original motto, that it might be all of a piece"

This ſeems to be the language of unaffected modeſty; ſome of the earlier little pieces might probably have admitted of ſome improvements, if he had judged it proper to retouch them afterterwards: but as a ſpirit of ingenuouſneſs is manifeſt throughout his ſentiments, he has probably given his moſt private productions, as they were firſt conceived and written; upon which ſuppoſition, there appears very little reprehenſible in them, and not a little, for their quantity, that may be juſtly commended.

" The poem called Sickneſs," he ſays, " was republiſhed at the requeſt of ſeveral of my ſubſcribers; to which, without regarding the additional expence, I very readily agreed. I have made ſome alterations, which, in the diviſions of the books, I hope will be thought improvements."

He ſurvived this publication ſeveral years, and intended to republiſh " Browne's Britannia's Paſtorals," upon which he left ſome ſhort notes, inſerted in T. Davies's edition, 1772; but the preſent writer has not been able to diſcover when he died.

This is all that is known of Thompſon, an amiable and ingenious poet, whoſe writings ſeem not hitherto to have received ſo much attention as they deſerve.

His Poems on Several Occaſions, with the omiſſion of a few trifling ſongs, and his Garden Inſcriptions, publiſhed in the " Poetical Calendar" for Auguſt 1763, are now, for the firſt time, received into a collection of claſſical Engliſh poetry. The reader may perhaps wiſh, for the ſake of his reputation, that ſome more of his lighter pieces had been omitted. The majority of them are, however, worthy of him.

As a poet, his compoſitions are characterized by fertility of invention, ſplendour of imagination, tenderneſs of ſentiment, facility of expreſſion, and harmony of numbers. He is of the ſchool of Spenſer and Milton; but he imitates the former more than the latter. He ſeems to have been an enthuſiaſtic admirer, and an attentive obſerver of the charms of nature, as his compoſitions abound in minute rural imagery, and picturеſque deſcription. His faults are thoſe of his maſter. Rich in native ſtores, he ſometimes employs traditionary imagery, and hereditary ſimiles. His deſcriptions are ſometimes puerile and extravagant, and ſometimes overwrought, and loſt in a profuſion of colours.

His capital performance is Sickneſs, a poem, in five books, in blank verſe. In this work, boldneſs of perſonification, energy of language, ſublimity of ſentiment, pathetic repreſentation, and the moſt exquiſite beauties of poetry, are ennobled with Chriſtian and moral truths. Almoſt every line glows with devotion, riſes into the moſt exalted apprehenſions of the Creator, and is animated with the moſt lively faith in the all-ſufficient mediation of the Redeemer of mankind. In the firſt book, which bears only the general title of Sickneſs, after propoſing his ſubject, he thus reflects on the levity of ſome of his earlier poetical amuſements.

> ———Too long the muſe,
> Ah! much too long, a libertine diffus'd,
> On Pleaſure's roſy lap, has idly breath'd
> Love-ſighing elegies, and paſtoral ſtrains,
> The ſoft ſeducers of our youthful hours,
> Soothing away the vigour of the mind,
> And energy of virtue But farewell,
> Ye myrtle walks, ye lily mantled meads
> Of Paphos, and the fount of Acidale.

The second book is called the Palace of Diseaſe. This palace is very poetically imagined and executed, and the malignant power inhabiting it is very correſpondently pourtrayed. He thus deſcribes one of her ſix attendant furies, the ſmall-pox, whoſe ſevere infection occaſioned the poem.

> The laſt, ſo turpid to the view, affrights
> Her neighbour hags Happy herſelf is blind,
> Or madneſs would enſue, ſo bloated black,
> So loathſome to each ſenſe, the ſight or ſmell,
> Such foul corruption on this ſide the grave,
> Variola yclep'd; ragged and rough,
> Her couch perplex'd with thorns. What heavy ſcenes
> Hang o'er my head, to feel the theme is mine!

In the third book, called the Progreſs of Sickneſs, after a ſucceſſion of dreams of different complexions, which are very poetically enumerated and contraſted, on waking affrighted from the imaginary blaſt of Aſtolpho's horn, in "Orlando Furioſo;" he thus energetically exclaims:

> Pain empties all her vials on my head,
> And ſteeps me o'er and o'er. Th' envenom'd ſhirt
> Of Hercules enwraps my burning limbs
> With dragon's blood: I rave and roar like him,
> Writhing in agony. Devouring fires
> Eat up the marrow frying in my bones.
> O whether, whether ſhall I turn for aid!

The metaphorical diſplay of friendſhip at the cloſe of this book is warm and delicate.

> Friendſhip's
> ——————a holy fire,
> Where honour beams on honour truths on truths,
> Bright as the eyes of angels, and as pure.
> An altar whence two gentle loving hearts
> Mount to the ſkies in one conſpiring blaze,
> And ſpotleſs union——

The fourth book is called the Recovery. In this, Mercy ſends Hygeia or Health, to the well of life, in which he ingeniouſly feigns the angel who deſcended into the pool of Betheſda, to have previouſly moiſtened his wings. His ſurpriſe at the firſt return of ſight, and his ſucceeding exultation on it, are finely expreſſed.

> I thank thee Sleep!—Heav'ns! is the day reſtor'd
> To my deſiring eyes? Their lids, unglew'd,
> Admit the long-loſt light, now ſtreaming in
> Painfully clear!—O check the rapid gleam
> With ſhading ſilk, till the weak viſual orb,
> Stronger and ſtronger, dares imbibe the ſun,
> Nor, wat'ring, twinkle at unfolded day.
> Sight, all-expreſſive! Though the feeling ſenſe
> Thrills from Ianthe's hand; at Handel's lyre
> Tingles the ear; though ſmell from bloſſom'd beams
> Arabian ſpirit gathers; and the draught,
> Sparkling from Burgundy's exalted vines,
> Streams nectar on the palate; yet, O ſight!
> Weak their ſenſations, when compar'd with thee.

The laſt book, ſtyled the Thankſgiving, is replete with much devout and animated gratitude. The following parody of a very poetical paſſage in the "Pſalms," is well executed.

> ——For me (who late
> A neighbour of the worms) when I forget
> The wonders of thy goodneſs ray'd on me,
> And ceaſe to celebrate with matin harp
> Or veſper ſong, thy plenitude of love,
> And healing mercy, may the nightly Pow'r,
> Which whiſpers on my ſlumbers, ceaſe to breathe
> Her modulating impulſe through my ſoul;

Untun'd, unhallow'd! Diſcord, ſtring my lyre,
Idly, my finger, preſs the fretted gold,
Rebellious to the dictates of my hand,
When indolent, to ſwell the notes for thee,
FATHER of heav'n and earth!———

The Hymn to May, is a profeſſed imitation of Spenſer; and without oſtentatious praiſe, it is but juſt to obſerve, that in opulence of imagery, brilliancy of colouring, diſtinctneſs and propriety of attribute, and harmony of numbers, it challenges every modern production, and rivals, if not ſurpaſſes every thing of the kind, even in Spenſer, from whom he caught his inſpiration. The diction is florid and luxuriant, and the ſentiments rapturous and tender in the higheſt degree. He gives a looſe to the luxuriance of his imagination, and indulges himſelf in every extravagance that poetry allows. The exuberance of his diction inveſts his thoughts with ſplendour, through which, perhaps, they are not always eaſily diſcerned. Spenſer being not leſs celebrated for his deſcription of the beauties of nature, than for his dreſs and portraiture of allegorical perſonages, Thompſon has thus charmingly delineated and arrayed his poetical May.

She comes!—A ſilken camus, emerald-green,
Gracefully looſe, adown her ſhoulders flows,
(Fit to enfold the limbs of Paphos' queen)
And with the labours of the needle glows,
Purfled by nature's hand! The amorous air
And muſky weſtern breezes faſt repair,
Her mantle proud to ſwell, and wanton with her hair.

Her hair (but rather threads of light it ſeems)
With the gay honours of the ſpring entwin'd,
Copious, unbound, in nectar'd ringlets ſtreams,
Floats glitt'ring on the ſun, and ſcents the wind,
Love-ſick with odours!---Now to order roll'd,
It melts upon her boſom's dainty mould,
Or, curling round her waiſt, diſparts its wavy gold.

Young circling roſes, bluſhing round them throw
The ſweet abundance of their purple rays,
And lilies dipt in fragrance, freſhly blow,
With blended beauties, in her angel face.
The humid radiance beaming from her eyes,
The air and ſeas illumes, the earth and ſkies,
And open, where ſhe ſmiles, the ſweets of Paradiſe.

On zephyr's wing the laughing goddeſs view
Diſtilling balm. She cleaves the buxom air,
Attended by the ſilver-footed dew,
The ravages of winter to repair.
She gives her naked boſom to the gales,
Her naked boſom down the ether fails;
Her boſom breathes delight; her breath the ſpring exhales.

In ſtanzas 47, 48, 49, 50, and 51, the ſuppoſition of Venus being born in this month, and celebrating her birth-day near Acidalus, a fountain in Bœotia, is happily imagined, and expreſſed with that ſoftneſs of ſentiment which he profeſſes to have indulged in this poem, though with an avowal of the pureſt intention. The ſtanzas 19, 20, 21, &c. ſhow him a great maſter in the deſcriptive. The Nativity, a college exerciſe, and the Epithalamium on the royal nuptials, are alſo fine imitations of Spenſer. In the Nativity, the lines beginning, Hark, the jolly pipe and rural lay, and ending, Hell groan'd through all her dens, and grim death dropp'd down dead, are remarkably fine. The verſes on Pope's Works are agreeably various and ſpirited Thoſe eſpecially on his tranſlation of "Homer," are exquiſitely animated. The Epiſtle to the Author of Leonidas, The fall of Coreſus and Callirhoe, from Pauſanias; and the Magi, a Sacred Eclogue are all maſterly. The lines in the Eclogue in which the ſages are introduced paying their adoration to the infant Saviour, are eminently beautiful. His Epitaphs on both his parents, compriſe two moſt worthy characters pourtrayed by filial poetry. The verſes Written on the Holy Bible, in his grave religious character, have an original air. The Garden Inſcriptions, prove him no languid admirer, but a fervent worſhipper of the excellencies of his favourites, particularly Spenſer, Milton, Thomſon, and Young. The eulogy is ſometimes overcharged; yet the the overflowing fulneſs with which he meaſures out to others, ſprings from a moſt amiable ſource. It is the very contraſt of narrow ſelf-love, of envy and detraction, and entitles him to the moſt liberal regard from every lover of candour and benevolence.

His Love verſes are, for the moſt part, tender and unaffected; dictated by his own feelings, when the paſſion is quite new, romantically ſweet, and, perhaps, at the utmoſt purity which is compatible with deſire.

His two Latin odes on Winter and Summer, rank with the beſt compoſitions of our Engliſh writers, who have cultivated Latin poetry with ſucceſs. Poetical verſions, by Mr. Tatterſal, fellow of Trinity-College, Cambridge, were publiſhed along with the originals; which I believe," ſays he, " will be thought the beſt verſes in the collection: they are finiſhed in ſo eaſy and maſterly a manner, that I muſt own, that I had rather have been the author of them than of the originals themſelves."

His tragedy of Gondibert and Birtha, taken from Davenant's poem of " Gondibert," ſeems very little adapted to the ſtage, being much more poetical than dramatic. The ſentiments are warm and elevated; but ſeem rather ſuch as he had collected from an acquaintance with the illuſtrious dead, than from being " hackneyed in the ways of men," as he appears more delighted with what Syphax malignantly calls the " extravagance of virtue," than experienced in a knowledge of the world, and the ordinary conduct of mankind.

SICKNESS, A POEM: IN FIVE BOOKS.

The Lord comfort him, when he lieth ſick upon his bed; make thou all his bed in his ſickneſs.

BOOK I.

THE ARGUMENT.

SUBJECT propoſed. The folly of employing poetry on wanton or trifling ſubjects. Invocation of Urania. Reflections on the inſtability of life itſelf: Frailneſs of youth, beauty, and health. The ſuddenneſs and firſt attacks of a diſtemper, in particular of the ſmall-pox. Moral and religious obſervations reſulting from ſickneſs.

Of days with pain acquainted, and of nights
Unconſcious of the healing balms of ſleep,
That burn in reſtleſs agonies away;
Of ſickneſs, and its family of woes,
The felleſt enemies of life, I ſing,
Horizon'd cloſe in darkneſs. While I touch
The ebon inſtrument, of ſolemn tone,
Pluck'd from the cypreſs' melancholy boughs,
Which, deep'ning, ſhade the houſe of mourning, groans
And hollow wailings, through the damps of night,
Reſponſive wound the ear. The ſprightly pow'rs
Of muſical enchantment wave their wings,
And ſeek the fragrant groves and purple fields,
Where pleaſure rolls her honey-trickling ſtreams,
Of blooming health and laughter-dimpled joy.
Me other ſcenes than laughing joy, and health
High-blooming, purple-living fields and groves,
Fragrant with ſpring, invite. Too long the muſe,
Ah! much too long, a libertine, diffus'd
On pleaſure's roſy lap, has idly breath'd
Love-ſighing elegies, and paſtoral ſtrains,
The ſoft ſeducers of our youthful hours,
Soothing away the vigour of the mind,
And energy of virtue. But farewel
Ye myrtle walks, ye lily-mantled meads
Of Paphos, and the fount of Acidale,
Where oft in ſummer, Grecian fables tell,
The daughters of Eurynome and Jove,
Thalia and her ſiſter-graces, cool
Their glowing features, at the noontide hour,
Farewel!—But come, Urania, from thy bow'rs
Of everlaſting day; O condeſcend
To lead thy votary (with rapt'rous zeal Adoring nature's God, the great Three-One!)
To Salem, where the ſhepherd-monarch wak'd
The ſacred breath of melody, and ſwell'd
His harp, to angels kindred notes attun'd,
With muſic worthy heaven! O bathe my breaſt,
With praiſes burning, in the morning dews,
Which ſparkle, Sion, on thy holy hill.
The prophets, eagle-ey'd, celeſtial maid,
Thoſe poets of the ſky! were taught to chaunt
The glories of Meſſiah's reign by thee!
Kindled by thee, the eaſtern pages flame
With light'ning, and with thunder ſhake the ſoul;
While from the whirlwind God's all-glorious voice
Burſts on the tingling ears of Job: the writ
Of Moſes, meek in ſpirit, but his thoughts
Lofty as heav'n's blue arch. My humble hopes
Aſpire but to the alpha of his ſong;
Where, roll'd in aſhes, digging for a grave,
More earneſt than the covetous for gold
Or hidden treaſures, cruſted o'er with boils,
And roaring in the bitterneſs of ſoul,
And heart-ſick pain, the man of Uz complains.
Themes correſpondent to thy ſervant's theme.
I ſing to you, ye ſons of men! of duſt
Say rather: What is man, who proudly lifts
His brow audacious, as confronting Heav'n,
And tramples with diſdain his mother earth,
But moulded clay? an animated heap
Of duſt, that ſhortly ſhall to duſt return?
We dream of ſhadows, when we talk of life,
Of Pelops' ſhoulder, of Pythagoras' thigh,
Of Surius's ſaints, and Ovid's gods;
Mere tales to cheat our children with to reſt;
And, when the tale is told, they ſink to ſleep,
Death's image! ſo inane is mortal man!
Man's but a vapour, toſs'd by every wind,

The child of ſmoke, which in a moment flies,
And, ſinking into nothing, diſappears.
Man's a briſk bubble, floating on the waves
Of wide eternity: He dances now
Gay-gilded by the ſun (though empty, proud;)
Phantaſtically fine! and now he drops
In a broad ſheet of waters deep involv'd,
And gives his place to others. O, ye ſons
Of vanity, remember, and be wiſe!
Man is a flow'r, which, in the morning, fair
As day-ſpring, ſwelling from its ſlender ſtem,
In virgin-modeſty, and ſweet reſerve,
Lays out its bluſhing beauties to the day,
As Gideon's fleece, full with the dews of heav'n.
But if ſome ruder gale, or nipping wind,
Diſaſtrous blow too hard, it weeping mourns
In robes of darkneſs; it reclines its head
In languid ſoftneſs; withers every grace;
And, ere the ev'ning-ſtar the weſt inflames,
It falls into the portion of thoſe weeds
Which with a careleſs hand we caſt away—
Ye thoughtleſs fair ones, moralize my ſong!

Thy pulſe beats muſic; thou art high in health;
The rather tremble. When the leaſt we fear,
When folly lulls us on her couch of down,
And wine, and lutes, and odours, fill the ſenſe
With their ſoft affluence of bewitching joys;
When years of rapture in thy fancy glow
To entertain thy youth; a ſudden burſt
Of thunder from the ſmalleſt cloud of fate,
Small as the prophet's hand, deſtroys, confounds,
And lays thy viſionary hopes in duſt.
By my example taught, examples teach
Much more than precepts, learn to know thy end.

The day was Valentine's: when lovers wounds
Afreſh begin to bleed, and ſighs to warm
The chilly rigour of relenting ſkies:
Sacred the day to innocence and mirth,
The feſtival of youth! in ſeeming health
(As cuſtom bids) I hail'd the year's fair morn,
And with its earlieſt purple braid my brows,
The violet or primroſe breathing ſweets
New to the ſenſe. Ianthe by my ſide,
More lovely than the ſeaſon! rais'd her voice,
Obſervant of his rites, in feſtal lays,
And thus addreſs'd the patron of the ſpring:

"Hail, Valentine! at thy approach benign,
Profuſe of gems, the boſom of the earth
Her fragrant ſtores unfolds: the fields rejoice,
And, in the infancy of plenty, ſmile:
The vallies laugh and ſing: the woods, alive,
Sprout into floating verdure, to embow'r
Thoſe happy lovers who record thy praiſe.

Hail, Valentine! at thy approach benign,
Inhaling genial raptures from the ſun,
The plumy nations ſwell the ſong of joy,
Thy ſoaring choriſters! The lark, the thruſh,
And all th' aërial people, from the wren
And linnet to the eagle, feel the ſtings
Of amorous delight, and ſing thy praiſe.

Hail, Valentine! at thy approach benign,
Quick o'er the ſoft'ning ſoul the gentle gales
Of ſpring, awaking bliſs, inſtinctive move
The ardent youth to breathe the ſighs of faith
Into the virgin's heart; who, ſick of love,
With equal fires, and purity of truth,
Conſenting, bluſhes while ſhe chaunts thy praiſe."

So ſung Ianthe: to my heart I preſt
Her ſpotleſs ſweetneſs: when (with wonder hear!)
Though ſhe ſhone ſmiling by, the torpid pow'rs
Of heavineſs weigh'd down my beamleſs eyes,
And preſs'd them into night. The dews of death
Hung clammy on my forehead, like the damps
Of midnight ſepulchres; which ſilent op'd
By weeping widows, or by friendſhip's hand,
Yawn hideous on the moon, and blaſt the ſtars
With peſtilential reek. My head is torn
With pangs inſufferable, pulſive ſtarts,
And pungent aches, griding through the brain,
To madneſs hurrying the tormented ſenſe,
And hate of being.—Poor Ianthe wept
In bitterneſs, and took me by the hand
Compaſſionately kind: "Alas! ſhe cry'd,
What ſudden change is this? (Again ſhe wept.)
Say, can Ianthe prove the ſource of pain
To Thamalin? forbid it, gracious Heav'n!"
No, beauteous innocence! As ſoon the roſe
Shall poiſon with its balm; as ſoon the dove
Become a white diſſembler, and the ſtream
With lulling murmurs, creeping through the grove,
Offend the ſhepherd's ſlumber.—Scarce my tongue
Theſe fault'ring accents ſtammer'd, down I ſink,
And a lethargic ſtupor ſteeps my ſenſe
In dull oblivion: till returning pain,
Too faithful monitor! and dire diſeaſe,
Bid me remember pleaſure is a dream,
That health has eagle's wings, nor tarries long.

New horrors riſe. For in my pricking veins
I feel the forky flame: the rapid flood
Of throbbing life, excurſive from the laws
Of ſober nature and harmonious health,
Boils in tumultuary eddies round
Its burſting channels. Parching thirſt, anon,
Drinks up the vital maze, as Simois dry,
Or Xanthus, by the arm-ignipotent,
With a red torrent of involving flames
Exhauſted; when Achilles with their floods
Wag'd more than mortal war: the god of fire
Wide o'er the waters pour'd th' inundant blaze,
The ſhrinking waters to the bottom boil,
And hiſs in ruin, O! ye rivers, roll
Your cooling cryſtal o'er my burning breaſt,
For Ætna rages here! Ye ſnows, deſcend;
Bind me in icy chains, ye northern winds,
And mitigate the furies of the fire!

Good Heav'n! what hoards of unrepented guilt
Have drawn this vengeance down, have rais'd this fiend
To laſh me with his flames? But, O! forgive
My raſhneſs, that dares blame thy juſt decrees.
It is thy rod: I kiſs it with my heart
As well as lips: like Aaron's may it bloom
With fruits of goodneſs; not, like Moſes' turn
A ſerpent; or to tempt me to accuſe
The kind oppreſſion of thy righteous hand,
Or ſting me to deſpair.—Affliction, hail!
Thou ſchool of virtue! open wide thy gates,
Thy gates of ebony! Yet, O! correct
Thy ſervant but with judgment, not in wrath,
But with thy mercy, Lord! thy ſtripes will heal.

Thus, without herefy, afflictions prove
A purgatory; fave us as by fire:
And purifying off the drofs of fin,
Like old Elijah's chariot, rap the foul,
On wings of meditation, to the fkies.
In health we have no time to vifit truth:
Health's the difeafe of morals: few in health
Turn o'er the volumes which will make us wife.
What are ye now, ye tuneful triflers! once
The eager folace of my eafy hours,
Ye dear deluders or of Greece or Rome,
Anacreon, Horace, Virgil, Homer, what?
The gay, the bright, the fober, the fublime?
And ye of fofter ftrain, ye amorous fools,
Correctly indolent, and fweetly vain,
Tibullus, Ovid, and the female verfe
Of her, who, plunging from Leucadia's heights,
Extinguifh'd with her life her hopelefs fires,
Or rofe a fwan, as love-ftruck fancy deem'd.
Who would not, in thefe hours of wifdom, give
A vatican of wits for one Saint Paul?
Dare Tully, with the golden mouth of Greece,
With Chryfoftom in rhet'ric-thunder join
Advent'rous now? as foon the feeble found,
Salmoneus, of thy brazen bridge contends
With Jove's etherial peal, and burfting roar
Fulminous, rending earth, o'erturning air,
And fhaking heav'n. Or fhall the pointed pen
Of * Corduba, with hoftile labour bend
Its fentences obfcure againft the force
Of Hierom's noble fire? as foon the moon,
With blunted horn, dares pour her pallid beam
Againft the boundlefs majefty of day,
The fun's refulgent throne, when high in noon
He kindles up the earth to light and joy.
My beft inftructor, ficknefs, fhuts the eye
From vanity; fhe draws the curtains round
The couch, nor gives admittance to the world:
But to Harpocrates configns the door,
And, filent, whifpers me, that "life is vain."
If life be vain on what fhall man depend?
Depend on virtue. Virtue is a rock
Which ftands for ever; braves the frowning flood,
And rears its awful brow, direct, to heaven.
Though virtue fave not from the grave, fhe gives
Her votaries to the ftars; fhe plucks the fting
From the grim king of terrors; fmooths the bed
Of anguifh, and bids death, though dreadful, fmile.
Death fmiles on virtue: And his vifage, black,
Yet comely feems. A Chriftian fcorns the bounds
Where limited creation faid to time,
"Here I have end." Rapt'rous, he looks beyond
Or time or fpace; he triumphs o'er decay;
And fills eternity: the next to God!

NOTES AND ALLUSIONS TO BOOK I.

Ver. 8. Thus Horace:

Barbiton hic Paries habebit. Lib. iii. Ode 26.

And, a greater than Horace in lyric poetry, the royal Pfalmift, repreſents the ſame image:

As for our harps we hanged them up, upon the trees that are therein. Pſal. cxxxvii. 2.

Ver. 26. Paphos, a city of Cyprus; formerly dedicated to Venus.

Acidale, a fountain in Orchomenus, a city of Bœotia, where the graces were ſuppoſed to bathe themſelves. The geneology of the graces is very diverſly related. But Heſiod ſays, they were the offſpring of Jupiter and Eurynome. Theog.

Ver. 47. The book of Job is aſcribed to various authors, and amongſt the reſt to Moſes. I am proud to obſerve, that Dr. Young has ſtrengthened this opinion in his notes to his admirable poem on Job. Moſt of the arguments on each ſide of the queſtion may be found in Pole's Synopſis Critic. in the beginning of his notes on the book of Job; and in Mr. S. Weſley's curious diſſertation on the ſame ſubject.

Ver. 63.

Σκιαι οναρ ανθρωποι. Pind. Pith. Ode 8.

Sophocles has much the ſame thought in his Ajax; and, to dignify the ſentiment, he puts it into the mouth of Ulyſſes:

Ορω γαρ ημας ωδεν οντας αλλο πλην
Ειδωλ' οσοι περ ζωμεν, η κουφην σκιαν.

The Scholiaſt obſerves, that he borrowed the ſentiment from Pindar.

Ver. 63. The poets feign that Tantalus ſerved up his ſon Pelops to the table of the gods: They reunited the fragments, and formed his ſhoulder, which was loſt, of ivory. Ovid. Met. Lib. vi.

—— Humeroque Pelops inſignis eburno.
Virg. Georg. iii.

I ſhall add this beautiful paſſage from Tibullus:

——— Carmina ni ſint,
Ex humero Pelopis non nituiſſet ebur.
Lib. i. Eleg. 4.

Ver. 64. This is told with ſo much humour by Mr. Addiſon, in one of his fineſt works, that I rather chooſe to give an authority from him, than any of the ancients. "The next man aſtoniſhed the whole table with his appearance: He was ſlow, ſolemn, and ſilent, in his behaviour, and wore a raiment curiouſly wrought with hieroglyphics. As he came into the middle of the room, he threw back the ſkirt of it, and diſcovered a golden thigh. Socrates, at the ſight of it, declared againſt keeping company with any who were not made of fleſh and blood; and therefore deſired Diogenes the Laertian to lead him to the apartment allotted the fabulous heroes, and worthies of dubious exiſtence," &c.

The Table of Fame, Tatler, Vol. II. No. 81.

Ver. 65. Surius writ the voluminous legend of the Romiſh ſaints, in ſix volumes in folio. Dr.

Donne, in his ſatires, has given him this character:

——————— outlie either
Jovius, or Surius, or both together. Sat. 4.

Ver. 112. Sickneſs being a ſubject ſo diſagreeable, in itſelf, to human nature, it was thought neceſſary, as fable is the ſoul of poetry, to relieve the imagination with the following, and ſome other epiſodes. For to deſcribe the anguiſh of a diſtemper without a mixture of ſome more pleaſing incidents, would, no doubt, diſguſt every good-natured and tender reader.

Ver. 223. Salmoneus king of Elis, a province in the Peloponneſus. He was ſo arrogant as to affect being thought a god: for which end he built a bridge of braſs, by driving over which in his chariot, he endeavoured to make himſelf be believed the thunderer. But Jupiter, enraged at his impiety, ſtruck him dead with a real thunderbolt.

Vidi crudeles dantem Salmonea pœnas,
Dum flammas Jovis et ſonitus imitatur Olympi—
Demens qui nimbos, et non imitabile fulmen
Ære et cornipedum curſu imitarat equorum.
Virg. Æn. Lib. 4.

Ver. 237. Harpocrates, the god of ſilence amongſt the Egyptians.

Si quicquam tacite commiſſum eſt fido ab amico,
Me unum eſſe invenies illorum jure ſacratum,
Corneli, et factum eſſe puta Harpocratem.
Catull.

Hence Eraſmus, Lib. Adag. tells us, that reddere Harpocratem, is the ſame as, mutum reddere. So Catullus in another place:

Patruum reddidit Harpocratem.

Ovid deſcribes him in the ſame manner, without taking notice of his name, amongſt the attendants of Iſis:

Quique premit vocem, digitoque ſilentia ſuadet.
Metam. Lib. ix.

This deſcription entirely agrees with the ſeveral medals and ſtatues of Harpocrates, which the learned antiquary Giſb. Cuperus exhibits in his laborious diſſertation on that ſubject, printed with Monumenta Antiqua.

But upon another account likewiſe, Harpocrates may juſtly be appointed to attend upon the ſick; for he is numbered amongſt the ſalutary gods, who aſſiſted in extreme dangers, as appears from Artemidorus, Oneir. l. ii. c. 44. where, after having mentioned Serapis, Iſis, Anubis, and Harpocrates, he goes on thus: "Semper enim ſervatores crediti ſunt hi dii, eorum qui per omnia exercitati ſunt, et ad extremum periculum pervenerunt," &c. Kircher alſo, in his Oedip. Egyp. p. 2. vol. ii. p. 315. amongſt others to the ſame purpoſe, has theſe remarkable words:

"Reverebantur Egypti, præter cætera numina maximè Iſin et Oſirin, ac horum ſive Harpocratem, tanquam Iatricos genios."

THE PALACE OF DISEASE.

Diſeaſes dire, of which a monſtrous crew
Before thee ſhall appear. Milton.

BOOK II.

THE ARGUMENT.

REFLECTIONS. Invocation of the genius of Spenſer. Apoſtrophe to the Ducheſs of Somerſet. The palace of diſeaſe. War. Intemperance. Melancholy. Fever. Conſumption. Small pox. Complaint on the death of Lord Beauchamp.

DEATH was not man's inheritance, but life
Immortal, but a paradiſe of bliſs,
Unfading beauty, and eternal ſpring,
(The cloudleſs blaze of innocence's reign):
The gifts of God's right hand! till monſtrous ſin,
The motly child of Satan and of hell,
Invited dire diſeaſe into the world,
And her diſtorted brood of ugly ſhapes,
Echidna's brood! and fix'd their curs'd abode
On earth, inviſible to human ſight,
The portion and the ſcourge of mortal man.

Yet though to human ſight inviſible,
If ſhe, whom I implore, Urania deign,
With Euphraſy to purge away the miſts
Which, humid, dim the mirror of the mind;
(As Venus gave Æneas to behold
The angry gods with flame o'erwhelming Troy,
Neptune and Pallas), not in vain, I'll ſing
The myſtic terrors of this gloomy reign:
And, led by her, with dangerous courage preſs
Through dreary paths, and haunts, by mortal foot
Rare viſited; unleſs by thee, I ween,

Father of fancy, of deſcriptive verſe,
And ſhadowy beings, gentle Edmund, hight,
Spenſer! the ſweeteſt of the tuneful throng,
Or recent, or of *eld. Creative bard,
Thy ſprings unlock, expand thy fairy ſcenes,
Thy unexhauſted ſtores of fancy ſpread,
And with thy images enrich my ſong.
Come †Hertford! with the muſe, awhile, vouchſafe
(The ſofter virtues melting in thy breaſt,
The tender graces glowing in thy form)
Vouchſafe in all the beauty of diſtreſs,
To take a ſilent walk among the tombs:
There lend a charm to ſorrow, ſmooth her brow,
And ſparkle through her tears, in ſhining woe.
As when the ‡dove (thy emblem, matchleſs dame!
For beauty, innocence, and truth are thine),
Spread all its colours o'er the boundleſs deep
(Empereal radiance quivering round the gloom),
Chaos reform'd, and bade diſtraction ſmile!
Deep in a deſert vale, a palace frowns
Sublimely mournful: to the eye it ſeems
The manſion of deſpair, or ancient night.
The graces of the ſeaſon's never knew
To ſhed their bounty here, or ſmiling, bleſs,
With hoſpitable foot, its bleak domain,
Uncultivated. Nor the various robe
Of fluſhing ſpring, with purple gay, inveſts
Its blighted plains; nor ſummer's radiant hand
Profuſive, ſcatters o'er its baleful fields
The rich abundance of her glorious days;
And golden autumn here forgets to reign.
Here only hemlock, and whatever weeds
Medea gather'd, or Canidia brew'd,
Wet with Avernus' waves, or Pontus yields,
Or Colchos, or Theſſalia, taint the winds,
And choke the ground unhallow'd. But the ſoil
Refuſes to embrace the kindly ſeeds
Of healing vegetation, ſage, and rue,
Dittany, and amello, blooming ſtill
In Virgil's rural page. The bitter yew,
The church-yard's ſhade! and cypreſs' wither'd arms
In formidable ranks ſurround its courts
With umbrage dun; adminiſt'ring a roof
To birds of ominous portent; the bat,
The raven boding death, the ſcreaming owl
Of heavy wing, while ſerpents, ruſtling, hiſs,
And croaking toads the odious concert aid.
The peeviſh eaſt, the rheumy ſouth, the north
Pregnant with ſtorms, are all the winds that blow:
While, diſtant far, the pure Eteſian gales,
And weſtern breezes fan the ſpicy beds
Of Araby the bleſt, or ſhake their balm
O'er fair Britannia's plains, and wake her flow'rs.
Eternal damps, and deadly humours, drawn
In pois'nous exhalations from the deep,
Conglomerated into ſolid night,
And darkneſs, almoſt to be felt, forbid
The ſun, with cheerful beams, to purge the air,
But roll their ſuffocating horrors round
Inceſſant, baniſhing the blooming train
Of health, and joy, for ever, from the dome.
In ſad magnificence the palace rears
Its mouldering columns; from thy quarries, Nile,
Of fable marble, and Egyptian mines
Embowell'd. Nor Corinthian pillars, gay
With foliag'd capitals and figur'd frize,
Nor feminine Ionique, nor, though grave,
The fluted Doric, and the Tuſcan plain,
In juſt proportions rife: but Gothic, rude,
Irreconcil'd in ruinous deſign:
Save in the centre, in relievo high,
And ſwelling emblematically bold,
In gold the apple roſe *, "whoſe mortal taſte
"Brought death into the world, and all our "woe."
Malignantly delighted, dire diſeaſe
Surveys the glittering peſt, and grimly ſmiles
With helliſh glee. Beneath, totters her throne,
Of jarring elements; earth, water, fire;
Where hot and cold, and moiſt and dry, maintain
Unnatural war. Shapeleſs her frightful form,
(A chaos of diſtemper'd limbs in one)
Huge as Megæra, cruel as the grave,
Her eyes, two comets; and her breath, a ſtorm.
High in her wither'd arms, ſhe wields her rod,
With adders curl'd, and dropping gore; and points
To the dead walls, beſmear'd with curſed tales
Of plagues red-ſpotted, of blue peſtilence,
Walking in darkneſs; havoc at their heels;
Lean famine, gnawing in deſpight her arm:
Whatever Egypt, Athens, or Meſſine,
Conſtantinople, Troynovant, Marſeilles,
Or Cairo felt, or Spagnolet could paint.
A fickly taper, glimmering feeble rays
Acroſs the gloom, makes horror viſible,
And puniſhes, while it informs, the eye.
A thouſand and ten thouſand monſtrous ſhapes
Compoſe the group; the execrable crew
Which Michael, in viſion ſtrange, diſclos'd
To Adam, in the Lazar-houſe of woe;
A colony from hell. The knotted gout,
The bloated dropſy, and the racking ſtone,
Rolling her eyes in anguiſh; lepra foul,
Strangling angina; ephialtic ſtarts;
Unnerv'd paralyſis; with moiſt catarrhs;
Pleuritis bending o'er its ſide in pain;
Vertigo; murderous apoplexy, proud
With the late ſpoils of Clayton's honour'd life:
Clayton the good, the courteous, the humane;
Tenacious of his purpoſe, and his word
Firm as the fabled throne of Grecian Jove.
Be juſt, O memory! again recal
Thoſe looks illumin'd by his honeſt heart,
That open freedom, and that cheerful eaſe,
The bounteous emanations of his ſoul:
His Britiſh honour, Chriſtian charity,
And mild benevolence for human kind.

†The preſent Ducheſs of Somerſet.

‡The Platoniſts ſuppoſe that Love, or the celeſtial Venus (of whom the dove is likewiſe an emblem) created the world out of Chaos.

Milton's Paradiſe Loſt, Book I.*

From every quarter, lamentations loud,
And ſighs reſound, and rueful peals of groans
Roll echoing round the vaulted dens, and ſcreams
Dolorous, wreſted from the heart of pain,
And brain-ſick agony. Around her throne
Six favourite furies, next herſelf accurſt,
Their diſmal manſions keep; in order each
As moſt deſtructive. In the foremoſt rank,
Of poliſh'd ſteel, with armour blood-diſtain'd,
Helmets, and ſpears, and ſhields, and coats of mail,
With iron ſtiff, or tin, or braſs, or gold,
Swells a triumphal arch; beneath grim war
Shakes her red arm: for war is a diſeaſe,
The felleſt of the fell! Why will mankind,
Why will they, when ſo many plagues involve
This habitable globe (the curſe of ſin),
Invent new deſolations to cut off
The Chriſtian race? At leaſt in Chriſtian climes
Let olives ſhade your mountains, and let peace
Stream her white banner o'er us, bleſt from war,
And laurels only deck your poets brows.
Or, if the fiery metal in your blood.
And thirſt of human life your boſom ſting,
Too ſavage! let the fury looſe of war,
And bid the battle rage againſt the breaſts
Of Aſian infidels: redeem the tow'rs
Where David ſung, the Son of David bled;
And warm new Taſſos with the epic flame.

Right oppoſite to war a gorgeous throne
With jewels flaming, and embоſs'd with gold,
And various ſculpture, ſtrikes the wond'ring eye
With jovial ſcenes (amid deſtruction gay),
Of inſtruments of mirth, the harp, the lute,
Of coſtly viands, of delicious wines,
And flow'ry wreaths to bind the careleſs brow
Of youth or age; as youth or age demand
The pleaſing ruin from th' enchantreſs, vile
Intemperance: than Circe ſubtler far;
Only ſubdu'd by wiſdom; fairer far
Than young Armida, whoſe bewitching charms
Rinaldo fetter'd in her roſy chains;
Till by Ubaldo held, his diamond ſhield
Blaz'd on his mind the virtues of his race,
And quick diſſolv'd her wanton miſts away.
See, from her throne flow-moving, ſhe extends
A poiſon'd goblet! fly the beauteous bane:
The adder's tooth, the tiger's hungry fang,
Are harmleſs to her ſmiles; her ſmiles are death.
Beneath the foamy luſtre of the bowl,
Which ſparkles men to madneſs, lurks a ſnake
Of mortal ſting: fly: if you taſte the wine,
Machaon ſwears that moly cannot cure.
Though innocent and fair her looks, ſhe holds
A lawleſs commerce with her ſiſter peſts,
And doubly whets their darts: away—and live.

Next, in a low-brow'd cave, a little hell,
A penſive hag, moping in darkneſs, ſits
Dolefully ſad: her eyes (ſo deadly dull!)
Stare from their ſtonied ſockets, widely wild;
For ever bent on ruſty knives and ropes;
On poignards, bowls of poiſon, daggers red
With clotted gore. A raven by her ſide
Eternal croaks; her only mate deſpair;
Who, ſcowling in a night of clouds, preſents
A thouſand burning hells, and damned ſouls,
And lakes of ſtormy fire, to mad the brain
Moon-ſtrucken. Melancholy is her name;
Britannia's bitter bane. Thou gracious pow'r,
(Whoſe judgments and whoſe mercies who can tell!)
With bars of ſteel, with hills of adamant,
Cruſh down the ſooty fiend; nor let her blaſt
The ſacred light of Heav'n's all-cheering face,
Nor fright from Albion's iſle the angel hope.

Fever the fourth: aduſt as Afric wilds,
Chain'd to a bed of burning braſs: her eyes
Like roving meteors blaze, nor ever cloſe
Their wakeful lids: ſhe turns, but turns in vain
Through nights of miſery. Attendant thirſt
Graſps hard an empty bowl, and ſhrivell'd ſtrives
To drench her parched throat. Not louder groans
From Phalaris's bull, as fame reports,
Tormented with diſtreſsful din the air,
And drew the tender tear from pity's eye.

Conſumption near; a joyleſs meagre wight,
Panting for breath, and ſhrinking into ſhade
Eludes the graſp: thin as th' embodied air,
Which, erſt, deceiv'd Ixion's void embrace,
Ambitious of a goddeſs! ſcarce her legs
Feeble ſhe drags, with wheezing labour on,
And motion ſlow: a willow wand directs
Her tottering ſteps, and marks her for the grave.

The laſt ſo turpid to the view, affrights
Her neighbour hags. Happy herſelf is blind,
Or madneſs would enſue; ſo bloated black,
So lothſome to each ſenſe, the ſight or ſmell,
Such foul corruption on this ſide the grave;
Variola yclep'd, ragged and rough,
Her couch perplex'd with thorns.—What heavy [ſcenes
Hang o'er my heart to feel the theme is mine!
But Providence commands; His will be done!
She ruſhes through my blood; ſhe burns along,
And riots on my life!—Have mercy, Heav'n!—
Variola, what art thou? whence proceeds
This virulence, which all but we eſcape?
Thou nauſeous enemy to human kind:
In man, and man alone, thy myſtic ſeeds,
Quiet, and in their ſecret windings hid,
Lie unprolific! till infection rouſe
Her pois'nous particles, of proper ſize,
Of impregnation; atoms ſubtle, barb'd,
Infrangible, and active to deſtroy;
By geometric or mechanic rules
Yet undiſcover'd: quick the leaven runs,
Deſtructive of the ſolids, ſpirits, blood
Of mortal man, and agitates the whole
In general conflagration and miſrule.
As when the flinty ſeeds of fire embrace
Some fit materials, ſtubble, furze or ſtraw,
The crackling blaze aſcends: the rapid flood
Of ruddy flames, impetuous o'er its prey,
Rolls its broad courſe, and half the field devours.

As adders deaf to beauty, wit, and youth,
How many living lyres, by thee unſtrung,
E'er half their tunes are ended, ceaſe to charm
Th' admiring world? So ceas'd the matchleſs name,
By Cowley honour'd, by Roſcommon lov'd,
Orinda: blooming Killigrew's ſoft lay:
And manly Oldham's pointed vigour, curs'd

By the gor'd ſons of Loyola and Rome.
And he who Phædra ſung, in buſkin'd pomp,
Mad with inceſtous fires, ingenious Smith:
Oxonia's ſons! And, O, our recent grief!
Shall * Beauchamp die, forgotten by the muſe,
Or are the muſes with their Hertford dumb!
Where are ye? weeping o'er thy learned Rhine,
Bononia, fatal to our hopes! or elſe
By Kennet's chalky wave, with treſſes torn,
Or rude, and wildly floating to the winds,
Mute, on the hoary willows hang the lyre,
Neglected? or in rural Percy-lodge,
Where innocence and he walk'd hand in hand,
The Cypreſs crop, or weave the laurel-bough
To grace his honour'd grave! Ye lilies, riſe
Immaculate; ye roſes, ſweet as morn;
Leſs ſweet and leſs immaculate than he.
His op'ning flow'r of beauty ſoftly ſmil'd,
And ſparkling in the liquid dews of youth,
Adorn'd the bleſſed light! with bloſſoms fair,
Untainted; in the rank Italian ſoil
From blemiſh pure. The virgins ſtole a ſigh,
The matrons lifted up their wond'ring eyes,
And bleſs'd the Engliſh angel as he paſs'd,
Rejoicing in his rays! Why did we truſt
A plant ſo lovely to their envious ſkies,
Unmercifully bright with ſavage beams?
His were the arts of Italy before,
Courting, and courted by the claſſic muſe.
He travell'd not to learn, but to reform,
And with his fair example mend mankind.
Why need I name (for diſtant nations know,
Heſperia knows; O would Heſperia ſing!
As Maro erſt, and late Marino rais'd
The blooming Beauchamps of the former times,
Marcellus and Adonis to the ſtars,
On wings of ſoaring fire! ſo would ſhe ſing!)
His uncorrupted heart; his honour clear
As ſummer ſuns, effulging forth his ſoul
In every word and look: his reaſon's ray
By folly vanity, or vice unſtain'd,
Shining at once with purity and ſtrength,
With Engliſh honeſty, and Attic fire:

His tenderneſs of ſpirit, high-inform'd
With wide benevolence, and candid zeal
For learning, liberty, religion, truth;
The patriot-glories burning in his breaſt,
His king and country's undivided friend!
Each public virtue, and each private grace;
The Seymour dignity, the Percy flame;
All, all—Ere twenty autumns roll'd away
Their golden plenty. Further ſtill! behold
His animated bloom; his fluſh of health;
The blood exulting with the balmy tide
Of vernal life! ſo freſh for pleaſure form'd
By nature and the graces: yet his youth
So temperately warm, ſo chaſtely cool,
Ev'n Seraphims might look into his mind,
Might look, nor turn away their holy eyes!
Th' unutterable eſſence of good heav'n,
That breath of God, that energy divine
Which gives us to be wiſe, and juſt, and pure,
Full on his boſom pour'd the living ſtream,
Illum'd, inſpir'd, and ſanctify'd his ſoul!
And are theſe wonders vaniſh'd? are thoſe eyes,
Where ardent truth, and melting mildneſs, ſhone,
Clos'd in a foreign land? no more to bleſs
A father, mother, friend! no more to charm
A longing people? O, lamented youth!
Since fate and gloomy night thy beauties veil'd
With ſhade myſterious, and eclips'd thy beams,
How many Somerſets are loſt in thee?
Yet only loſt to earth!—For truſt the muſe,
(His virtues rather truſt) ſhe ſaw him riſe,
She ſaw him ſmile along the tiſſu'd clouds,
In colours rich embroider'd by the ſun,
Engirt with cherub wings, and kindred forms,
Children of light, the ſpotleſs youth of heav'n?
They hail their bleſt companion, gain'd ſo ſoon
A partner of their joys! and crown with ſtars,
Almoſt as fair the radiance of his brows,
Ev'n where the angel hoſt, with tongues of fire,
Chaunt to their glittering harps th' Almighty's praiſe,
And, in a burning circle, ſhout around
The jaſper-throne, he mingles flames with them;
He ſprings into the centre of the choir,
And drinking in the ſpirit moſt divine,
He ſings as ſweet, and glows as bright as they.

NOTES AND ALLUSIONS ON BOOK II.

Ver. 14. Eyebright. This herb was unknown to the ancients; at leaſt, it is not mentioned by them. It is of extraordinary ſervice to the eye, curing moſt of its diſtempers.

—— Cum debilitat morbi vis improba viſum,

Ver. 24. The date of our Engliſh poetry may with great juſtice begin with Spenſer. It is true, Chaucer, Gower, and Ludgate, were maſters of uncommon beauties, conſidering the age they lived in; and have deſcribed the humours, paſſions, &c. with great diſcernment. Yet none of them ſeem to have been half ſo well acquainted with the very life and being of poetry, invention, painting, and deſign, as Spenſer. Chaucer was the beſt before him; but then he borrowed moſt of his poems, either from the ancients, or from Boccace, Petrarch, or the Provençal writers, &c. Thus his Troilus and Creſſida, the largeſt of his works, was taken from Lollius; and the Romaunt of the Roſe was tranſlated from the French of John de Meun, an Engliſhman, who flouriſhed in the reign of Richard II.; and ſo of the reſt. As for thoſe who followed him, ſuch as Heywood, Scogan, Skelton, &c. they ſeem to be wholly ignorant of either numbers, language, propriety, or even decency itſelf. I muſt be underſtood to except the Earl of Surrey, Sir Thomas Wyat, Sir Philip Sidney, ſeveral pieces in the Mirror of Magiſtrates, and a few parts of Mr. G. Gaſcoign's and Turbervill's works.

Ver. 55. Medea, notorious for her incantations in Ovid, &c. as Canidia in Horace.

Ver. 56. Pontus, Colchos, and Theſſalia, well known for producing noxious and pois'nous herbs and plants.

Has herbas, atque hæc Ponto mihi lecta venena,

Beſides there grows a flow'r in marſhy ground,
Its name amellus, eaſy to be found:

The ſprouting ſtalk, and ſhows itſelf in leaves.
The flow'r itſelf is of a golden hue,
The leaves inclining to a darker blue, &c.

Ver. 114. A famous painter, eminent for drawing the diſtreſſes and agonies of human nature.

Ver. 120. See Milton's Paradiſe Loſt, B. xi.

Ver. 129. Sir Willſam Clayton, Bart. died at Marden in Surrey, December 28. 1744.

Ver. 165. Though a cruſade may ſeem very romantic (and perhaps it is ſo), yet it has been applauded by the greateſt writers of different ages; by Æneas Sylvius, by Beſſarion, by Naugerius, &c. who have each writ orations upon that ſubject. And here I cannot help obſerving, that Caſimire and Jac. Baldè, the two moſt celebrated of the modern lyric poets, have writ ſeveral of their fineſt odes to animate the Chriſtian princes to ſuch a deſign; and that Taſſo has adorned the expedition of Godfrey of Bullogin with the moſt beautiful and perfect poem ſince the Æneis (for I prefer Milton to Virgil himſelf.)

Ver. 176. See Homer's Odyſſey, Lib. 10.

Ver. 178. See Taſſo's Il Godfredo, cant. iv. ſtan. 29, &c. cant. xiv. ſtan. 68. cant. xvi. ſtan. 29.

Ver. 190. Machaon celebrated in Homer; but here uſed, in general, for any phyſician. So Ovid:

Firma valent per ſe, nullumque Machanoa quærunt.

And Martial:

Quid tibi cum medicis? dimitte Machaonas omnes.

Ibid. Mercury is ſaid to have preſented moly to Ulyſſes, to preſerve him from the charms of Circe.
Homer's Odyſſ. Lib. x.

Thus while he ſpoke, the ſovereign plant he drew.
Where on th' all-bearing earth unmark'd it grew,
And ſhow'd its nature and its wond'rous pow'r;
Black was the root, but milky white the flow'r:
Moly the name. POPE.

Ver 219. Amongſt ſeveral inſtruments of torment that Phalaris cauſed to be contrived, there was a bull of braſs, in which people being caſt, and a fire placed under it, they bellowed like oxen. Perillus the artiſt, demanding a great reward for his invention, was put in it himſelf to try the firſt experiment Upon which Pliny makes this good-natured reflection: "Perillum nemo laudat, fæviorem Phalaride tyranno, qui taurum fecit, mugitus hominis pollicitus, igne ſubdito, et primus eum expertus crucitatum juſtiore fævitia," &c.
Plinius, Lib. 34. Chap. 8.

Ver. 225. Ixion being invited to dine with Jupiter, fell in love with Juno, and endeavoured to debauch her, who acquainted her huſband. He, to try Ixion, formed a cloud into Juno's likeneſs, upon which he ſatisfied his luſt. Hygini Fab. Diodor. vi. &c.

seems to have been paid by that people to our great Milton in his travels, as we learn by this epigram of a learned Italian nobleman, in the 2d volume of Milton's poetical works:

THE PROGRESS OF SICKNESS.

When I waited for light there came darkness.
My skin is black upon me; and my bones are burnt with heat.
My harp also is turned to mourning. JOB.

BOOK III.

THE ARGUMENT.

REFLECTIONS. The progress of the disease. Blindness. Delirious Dreams. Remedies for the mind. 1. Patience. 2. Hope. 3. Prayer. Human aid and relief in sickness. 1. Physic; Eulogium on that Science. 2. Friends; Digression on Friendship.

THE fair, the bright, the great, alas! are fall'n,
Nipt in the bloom of beauty, wit, and youth,
Death's undistinguish'd prey. Shall I complain
(When such th' establish'd ordinance of Heav'n)
If sickness at my bosom lay the siege?
A worm to them! and to their light a shade,
Ungilded with one beam, which melted down
The tear fast trickling o'er their honour'd tombs:
We all must die! Our every pulse that beats,
Beats toward eternity, and tolls our doom.
Fate reigns in all the portions of the year.
The fruits of autumn feed us for disease;
The winter's raw inclemencies bestow
Disease on death; while spring, to strew our herse,
Kindly unbosoms, weeping in their dews,
Her flow'ry race! and summer (kinder still)
With the green turf and brambles binds our graves.
But am I wake? or in Ovidian realms,
And Circè holds the glass? What odious change,
What metamorphose strikes the dubious eye?
Ah! whither is retir'd the scarlet wave,
Mantling with health, which floated through the cheek, [where
From the strong summer-beam imbib'd? And
The vernal lily's softly-blended bloom?
The forehead roughens to the wond'ring hand.
Wide o'er the human-field, the body, spreads
Contagious war, and lays its beauties waste.
As once thy breathing harvest, Cadmus, sprung,
Sudden, a serpent-brood! an armed crop
Of growing chiefs, and fought themselves to death.
One black-incrusted bark of gory boils,
One undistinguish'd blister, from the soal
Of the foot sore, to the head's sorer crown.
Job's punishment! With patience like his own,
O may I exercise my wounded soul,
And cast myself upon his healing hand,
Who bruiseth at his will, and maketh whole!

Ah, too, the lustre of the eyes is fled!
Heavy and dull, their orbs neglect to roll,
In motionless distortion stiff and fix'd;
Till by the trembling hand of watchful age
(A weeping matron, timorous to affright,
And piously fallacious in her care,
Pretending light offensive, and the sun)
Clos'd; and, perhaps, for ever! ne'er again
To open on the sphere, to drink the day,
Or (worse!) behold Ianthe's face divine,
And wonder o'er her charms.—But yet forbear,
O dare not murmur! 'tis heav'n's high behest
Though darkness through the chambers of the grave
This dust pursue, and death's sad shade involve,
E'er long, the Filial-light himself shall shine;
(The stars are dust to him, the sun a shade)
These very eyes, these tunicles of flesh,
Even though by worms destroy'd, shall see my God,
And, seeing, ne'er remember darkness more,
Environ'd with eternity of day.
Though, at their visual entrance, quite shut out
External forms, forbidden, mount the winds,
Retire to chaos, or with night commix;
Yet, fancy's mimic work, ten thousand shapes,
Antic and wild, rush sweeping o'er my dreams,
Irregular and new; as pain or ease
The spirits teach to flow, and in the brain
Direction diverse hold: Gentle and bright
As hermits, sleeping in their mossy cells,
Lull'd by the fall of waters! by the rills
From Heliconian cliffs devolv'd; or where
Thy ancient river Kishon, sacred stream!
Soft murmurs on their slumbers: peace within,
And conscience, ev'n to ecstasy sublim'd
And beatific vision. Sudden, black,
And horrible as murderers; or hags,
Their lease of years spun out, and bloody bond

Full-flashing on their eyes: the gulf, beneath,
Mad'ning with gloomy fires; and heav'n, behind,
With all her golden valves for ever clos'd.
Now in Elysium lapp'd, and lovely scenes,
Where honeysuckles rove, and eglantines,
Narcissus, jes'min, pinks, profusely wild,
In every scented gale Arabia breathe:
As blissful Eden fair; the morning-work
Of Heav'n, and Milton's theme! where innocence
Smil'd, and improv'd the prospect.—Now, anon,
By Isis' favourite flood supinely laid,
In tuneful indolence, behold the bards
(Harps in each hand, and laurel on each brow)
A band of demigods, august to sight,
In venerable order sweetly rise,
(The muses sparkling round them) who have trod
In measur'd pace its banks, forever green,
Enamell'd from their feet! harmonious notes,
Warbled to Doric reeds, to Lesbian lyres,
Or Phrygian minstrelsy, steal on the ear
Enamour'd with variety: and loud
The trumpets shrilling clangours fill the sky
With silver melody—Now, happier still!
Round thy Italic cloisters, musing slow,
Or in sweet converse with thy letter'd sons,
Philosophers, and poets, and divines,
Enjoy the sacred walk, delighted, * Queen's!
Where Addison and Tickell lay inspir'd,
Inebriated from the classic springs,
And tun'd to various-sounding harps the song,
Sublime, or tender, humourous, or grave,
Quaffing the muses' nectar to their fill.
Where Smith in hoary reverence presides,
(Crown'd with the snow of virtue for the skies)
With graceful gravity, and gentle sway;
With perfect peace encircled and esteem.
Whose mild and bright benevolence of soul,
By reason cool, and by religion warm,
And generous passion for the college-weal,
More than a muse inspire.—Momental bliss!
For sudden rapt, the midnight howl of wolves,
The dragon's yell, the lion's roar, astound
My trembling ear. Ha! down a burning mount
I plunge deep, deep: sure Vulcan's shop is here—
Hark, how the anvils thunder round the dens
Flammivomous! What? are those chains to bind
This skeleton! the cyclops must be mad:
Those bolts of steel, those adamantine links
Demand Typhœus' strength to burst.—Away—
Venus and Mars—beware.—In giddy whirls
I ride the blast, and tow'ring through the storm
Enjoy the palace of the morn. The sun
Resigns the reins of Phlegon to my hands:
His mane waves fire: he scorches me to dust:
Avaunt, thou fiend! I'll hurl thee down the deep
Of heav'n, with bolted thunder, and enwrapt
With forky light'ning.—Now staggering I reel,
By murderers pursu'd: my faithless feet
Scarce shift their pace: or down rushing amain,
I cease to recollect my steps, and roll
Passive on earth.—Sure, 'twas Astolpho's horn
Pour'd on my ear th' annoying blast: at which,
Rogero trembled, Bradamant grew pale,
And into air dissolv'd th' enchanted dome.
Now starting from this wilderness of dreams,
I wake from fancy'd into real woe,
Pain empties all her vials on my head,
And steeps me o'er and o'er. Th' envenom'd shirt
Of Hercules enwraps my burning limbs
With dragon's blood: I rave and roar like him,
Writhing in agony. Devouring fires
Eat up the marrow, frying in my bones.
O whither, whither shall I turn for aid?—
Methinks a seraph whispers in my ears,
Pouring ambrosia on them, "Turn to God;
So peace shall be thy pillow, ease thy bed,
And night of sorrow brighten into noon.
Let the young cherub patience, bright-ey'd hope,
And rosy-finger'd pray'r, combining hold
A sure dominion in thy purpos'd mind,
Unconquer'd by affliction."—I receive
The mandate as from Heav'n itself.—Expand
Thyself, my soul, and let them enter in.
Come, smiling angel, patience, from thy seat;
Whether the widow's cot, or hermit's cell,
By fasting strong, and potent from distress;
Or midnight-student's taper-glimmering roof,
Unwearied with revolving tedious tomes,
O come, thou Panacæa of the mind!
The manna of the soul! to every taste
Grateful alike: the universal balm
To sickness, pain, and misery below.
She comes! she comes! she dissipates the gloom;
My eyes she opens, and new scenes unfolds
(Like Moses' bush, though burning, not consum'd)
Scenes full of splendour, miracle, and God.
Behold, my soul, the martyr-army, who
With holy blood the violence of fire
Quench'd, and with ling'ring constancy fatigu'd
The persecuting flame: or nobly stop'd
The lion's mouth, and triumph'd in his jaws.
Hark, how the virgin white-rob'd tender train
Chaunt hallelujah to the rack; as dear
And pleasing to the ear of God, as hymns
Of angels on the resurrection-morn,
When all the host of heaven hosanna sing!
Yet further; lift thy eyes upon the cross,
A bleeding Saviour view, a dying God!
Earth trembles, rend the rocks, creation groans:
The sun, asham'd, extinguishes the day:
All nature suffers with her suffering Lord.
Amidst this war of elements, serene,
And as the sun-shine brow of patience, calm,
He dies without a groan, and smiles in death.
Shall martyrs, virgins, nay, thy Saviour bleed
To teach thee patience? and yet bleed in vain?
Forbid it, reason; and forbid it, Heav'n.
No; suffer: and, in suffering, rejoice.
Patience endureth all, and hopeth all.
Hope is her daughter then. Let hope distil
Her cordial-spirit, as Hybla-honey sweet,
And healing as the drops of Gilead-balm.
Cease to repine, as those who have no hope;
Nor let despair approach thy darkest hour.
Despair! that triple death! th' imperial plague!
Th' exterminating angel of th' accurst,
And sole disease of which the damn'd are sick,

* Queen's College in Oxford.

Kindling a fever hotter than their hell—
O pluck me from despair, white-handed hope!
O interpose thy spear and silver shield
Betwixt my bosom and the fiend! detrude
This impious monster to primeval hell;
To its own dark domain but light my soul,
Imp'd with thy glittering wings, to scenes of joy,
To health and life; for health and life are thine:
And fire imagination with the skies.
But whence this confidence of hope? in thee,
And in thy blood, my Jesus! (bow, O earth!
Heav'n bends beneath the name, and all its sons,
The hierarchy! drop low the prostrate knee,
And sink, in humble wise, upon the stars.)
Yes, on thy blood and name my hope depends.—
My hope? nay, worlds on worlds depend on thee;
Live in thy death, from thy sepulchre rise.
Thy influential vigour reinspires
This feeble frame; dispels the shade of death;
And bids me throw myself on God in prayer.
A Christian soul is God's beloved house;
And pray'r the incense which perfumes the soul:
Let armies then of supplications rise,
Besiege the golden gates of heav'n, and force,
With holy violence, a blessing down
In living streams. If Hezekiah's pray'r
The sun arrested in his prone career,
And bade the shadow ten degrees return
On Ahaz' dial, whirling back the day:
Pour out thyself my soul! with fervent zeal,
With overflowing ardour, and with faith
Unwav'ring. To assist me, and to swell
My fainting spirits to sublime desires,
Wou'd † Taylor from his starry throne descend,
How fear wou'd brighten! by his sacred aid,
To live were happiness, and gain to die.—
No: let him still adorn his starry throne,
Well-merited by labours so divine:
For, lo! the Man of God, and friend of man,
Theron, the purest breast, and warmest heart,
Flies on the wings of charity and love
To join me in the saving task, and raise
My weaker pow'rs with his abundant zeal;
Pure, sweet, and glowing as the incens'd fires,
Of Solomon, thy golden-altar, fann'd
By wings of cherubims into a flame;
Till on the skies the aromatic gale
In pyramids of fragrance softly stole,
A grateful offering to the throne of grace.
Still, though I feel these succours from the skies,
In operation mighty: still remain
Inferior aids behind: terrestrial stores
Medicinal: the instruments of God.
For God created the physician! God
Himself on earth, our great Physician! spread
O'er sick and weak, shadowing, his healing wings:
Each miracle a cure!—before disease,
Offspring of sin, infested human-kind,
In Paradise, the vegetable seeds
Sprung from their Maker's hand, invigorate strong
With med'cine. He foresaw our future ills;
Foreseeing, he provided ample cure;
Fossils, and simples: Solomon, thy theme,
Nature's historian; wisest of the wise!
Though Paradise be lost, the tree of life
In med'cine blooms; then pluck its healing fruits;
And with thanksgiving eat; and, eating, live.
Ev'n pagan wisdom bade her sons adore,
As one, the God of physic and the day,
Fountain of vegetation and of life,
Apollo, ever blooming, ever young,
And from his art immortal! thus, of yore,
The prime of human race from heav'n deduc'd
The bright original of physic's pow'r:
And, nor unjustly, deem'd that he who sav'd
Millions from death, himself shou'd never die.
An instrument of various pipes and tubes,
Veins, arteries, and sinews, organiz'd,
Man, when in healthy tune, harmonious wakes
The breath of melody, in vocal praise,
Delighting earth and heav'n! discordant, oft,
As accident, or time, or fate prevail,
This human-organ scarce the bellows heaves
Of vital-respiration; or in pain,
With pauses sad: what art divine shall tune
To order and refit this shatter'd frame?
What fingers touch into a voice again?
Or music reinspire? who, but the race
Of Pæan? who but physic's saving sons?
A Ratcliff, Frewin, Metcalf, or a friend?—
But something yet, beyond the kindly skill
Of Pæan's sons, disease, like mine, demands
Nepenthe to the soul, as well as life.
O for a mother's watchful tenderness,
And father's venerable care!—but * they,
In life immortal, gather endless joys,
Reward of charity, of innocence,
Of pleasing manners, and a life unblam'd!
The tears of poverty and friendship oft
Their modest tombs bedew, where Eden's flood,
(Ituna 'clep'd by bards of old renown,
Purpled with Saxon and with British blood)
Laves the sweet vale, that first my prattling muse
Provok'd to numbers, broken as the ruins
Of Roman towers which deck its lofty banks,
And shine more beauteous by decay.—But hark!
What music glads my ear? 'tis Theron's voice,
Theron a father, mother; both, a friend!—
Pain flies before his animating touch:
The gentle pressure of his cordial hand,
A burning mountain from my bosom heaves!
What wonders, sacred friendship, flow from thee!
One period from a friend enlivens more,
Than all Hippocrates and Galen's tombs,
Than all the med'cines they unfold. I feel
Myself renew'd! not only health, but youth,
Roll the brisk tide, and sparkles at my heart.
As the live-atoms of Campanian wines
Dance in the virgin crystal, and o'erlook
With glorifying foam, the nectar'd brim;
Smiling, and lending smiles to social wit,
The jocund hearth, and hospitable board.
Friendship is a religion, from the first,
The second-best: it points, like that, to heav'n,
And almost antedates on earth its bliss.

But vice and folly never friendſhip knew;
Whilſt wiſdom grows by friendſhip ſtill more wiſe.
Her feſters are a ſtrong defence; her chains
A robe of glory; Ophir gold her bands;
And he who wears them, wears a crown of joy.
Friendſhip's the ſteel, which ſtruck, emits the ſparks
Of candour, peace, benevolence, and zeal;
Spreading their glowing ſeeds.—A holy fire
Where honour beams on honour, truth on truth;
Bright as the eyes of angels and as pure.
An altar whence two gentle-loving hearts
Mount to the ſkies in one conſpiring blaze
And ſpotleſs union. 'Tis the nectar-ſtream
Which feeds and elevates ſeraphic love—
Health is diſeaſe, life death, without a friend.

NOTES AND ALLUSIONS TO BOOK III.

Ver. 28. Cadmus is reported by the poets to have ſlain a monſtrous ſerpent in Bœotia, at the command of Minerva; and ſowed its teeth in a field, which produced an hoſt of armed ſoldiers; who, fighting, ſlew one other. See Ovid. Met. l. iii. Suidas, Pauſanias, &c. It is ſaid, that he ſowed ſerpents teeth, and that ſoldiers in armour ſprung up from them; becauſe, as Bochart obſerves, in the Phœnician language, to expreſs men armed with brazen darts and ſpears of braſs, they made uſe of words, which might be tranſlated, "armed with the teeth of a ſerpent."

Ver 61. The following lines upon delirious dreams may appear very extravagant to a reader, who never experienced the diſorders which ſickneſs cauſes in the brain; but the author thinks that he has rather ſoftened than exaggerated the real deſcription, as he found them operate on his own imagination at that time.

Ver 68 Sir G. Wheeler, in his voyages, has given a very beautiful deſcription of an hermitage on the borders of Mount Helicon, belonging to the convent of Saint Luke the hermit, not the Evangeliſt, called Stiriotes, from his dwelling in thoſe deſerts. See Wheeler's Journey into Greece, Fol. B. iv. P. 325.

Ver. 93. Thoſe different inſtruments are deſigned to expreſs the ſeveral parts of poetry, to which they were adapted, viz. paſtoral, ode, heroic, &c.

Ver. 119. See Hom. Ilias, B. xviii. Virg. Æn. B. viii.

Ver. 135.

A horn, in which if he do once but blow,
The noiſe thereof ſhall trouble men ſo ſore,
That all both ſtout and faint ſhall fly therefro,
So ſtrange a noiſe was never heard before.

THE RECOVERY.

Thou haſt delivered my ſoul from death, and my feet from falling, that I may walk before God in the light of the living. Pſalms.

BOOK IV.

THE ARGUMENT.

Reflections. Sickneſs at the worſt. Hopes of recovery caſt on Heaven alone. Proſpect of futurity at this juncture. Guardian Angel's hymn to Mercy. Deſcription of her. She ſends Hygeia to the well of life; both deſcribed. Her deſcent. The effects. Abatement of the diſtemper. Apoſtrophe to ſleep. Recovery of ſight; and pleaſure flowing from thence. Health by degrees reſtored. Compariſon between ſickneſs and health in regard to the body and mind.

Swift foo, thy tale is told: a ſound, a name,
No more than Lucian, Butler, or Scarron.
Fantaſtic humour drop'd the feeling ſenſe,
Her empire leſs'ning by his fall. The ſhades

Of frolic Rabelais, and HIM of Spain,
Madrid's facetious glory, join his ghoſt;
Triumvirate of laughter!—Mirth is mad;
The loudeſt languiſhing into a ſigh:
And laughter ſhakes itſelf into decay.
"Lord! what is man?" the prophet well might aſk;
We all may aſk, "Lord! what is mortal man?"
So changeable his being, with himſelf
Diſſimilar; the rainbow of an hour!
A change of colours, tranſient through his life,
Brightens or languiſhes;—then fades to air.
Ev'n e'er an artful ſpider ſpins a line
Of metaphyſic texture, man's thin thread
Of life is broken: how analogous
Their parallel of lines! ſlight, ſubtle, vain.
Man, in a little hour's contracted round
Perplexes reaſon: now to triumph ſwell'd,
To joyous exultations, to a blaze
Of ecſtaſy; and now depreſs'd again,
And drooping into ſcenes of death and woe.
That ſudden flow of ſpirits, bright and ſtrong,
Which play'd in ſprightly ſallies round my heart;
Was it a gleam, forewarning me from heav'n,
Of quick-approaching fate? As tapers mount
Expiring into wide-diffuſive flame,
Give one broad glare, into the ſocket ſink,
And ſinking diſappear.—It muſt be ſo!—
The ſoul, prophetic of its voy'ge, deſcry'd
The bliſsful ſhore, exulting on the wing,
In a glad flutter: then, o'erwhelm'd with joy,
She warn'd her old companion of her flight,
(The feeble tenement of mould'ring clay)
Who ſadden'd at their parting—Yes,—I feel
Thy leaden hand, O death! it preſſes hard,
It weighs the faculties of motion down,
Inactive as the foot of a dull rock,
And drags me to thy duſty chains: the wheels
Of life are faſt'ned to the grave, nor whirl,
Longer, the fiery chariot on. The war,
The ſtruggle for eternity begins.
Eternity! illimitable, vaſt,
Incomprehenſible! For heav'n and hell,
Within her univerſal womb, profound,
Are center'd.—Sleep or death are on my heart:
Swims heavily my brain:—My ſenſes reel.
What ſcenes diſcloſe themſelves! What fields of joy!
What rivers of delight! What golden bow'rs!
Sweetly oppreſs'd with beatific views,
I hear angelic inſtruments, I ſee
Primeval ardours, and eſſential forms;
The ſons of light, but of created light,
All energy, the diligence of God!
Might I but join them! Lend your glitt'ring wings,
Waft me, O quickly waft me to yon crown,
Bright with the flaming roſes of the zone
Sidereal: Gracious, they beck'ning, ſmile,
They ſmile me to the ſkies! Hope leads the way:
Mounting I ſpring to ſeize!—What fury ſhakes
Her fiery ſword, and intercepts the ſtars?
Ha! Amartia? Conſcience, conſcience ſends
Her grieſly form, to blaſt me at my end.
Behold! ſhe points to burning rocks, to waves
Sulphureous, molten lead, and boiling gulfs,
Tempeſtuous with everlaſting fire.—
'Tis horrible!—O ſave me from myſelf!—
O ſave me, Jeſu!—Ha! a burſt of light
Blends with the empyréum's azure tide,
While faith, triumphant, ſwells the trump of God,
And ſhouting, "Where's thy victory, O grave?
And where, O death, thy ſting?" I ſee her ſpread
Her ſaving banner o'er my ſoul (the croſs!)
And call it to its peers. Thick crowds of day,
Immaculate, involve me in their ſtreams,
And bathe my ſpirit, whiten'd for the ſky.
While on this iſthmus of my fate I lie,
Jutting into eternity's wide ſea,
And leaning on this habitable globe,
The verge of either world! dubious of life,
Dubious, alike, of death; to mercy thus,
Inſpirited with ſupplicating zeal,
My guardian angel rais'd his potent pray'r.
(For angels miniſter to man, intent
On offices of gentleneſs and love.)
"Hear, Mercy! ſweeteſt daughter of the ſkies;
Thou lovelieſt image of thy Father's face,
Thou bleſſed ſount, whence grace and goodneſs flow,
Auſpicious, hear! extend thy helping arm,
With pitying readineſs, with willing aid,
O lift thy ſervant from the vale of death,
Now grovelling in the duſt, into the fields
Of comfort, and the paſtures green of health.
Hear, Mercy, ſweeteſt daughter of the ſkies!
If e'er thy ſervant to the poor his ſoul
Drew out, and taught the fatherleſs to ſing;
If e'er by pity warm'd, and not by pride,
He cloth'd the naked, and the hungry fed;
If e'er diſtreſs, and miſery, forelorn,
Deceiv'd his cheek, and ſtole his untaught tear,
An humble drop of thy celeſtial dew!
Hear, Mercy, ſweeteſt daughter of the ſkies.
Sprung from the boſom of eternal bliſs,
Thy goodneſs reaches farther than the grave;
And near the gates of hell extends thy ſway,
Omnipotent! All, ſave the curſed crew
Infernal, and the black rebellious hoſt
Of Lucifer, within thy ſweet domain
Feed on ambroſia, and may hope the ſtars.
Hear, Mercy, ſweeteſt daughter of the ſkies.
By thee, the great Phyſician from the bed
Of darkneſs call'd the ſick, the blind, the lame;
He burſt the grave's relentleſs bars by thee,
And ſpoke the dead to life and bloom again.
His miracles, thy work; their glory, thine:
Then, O thou deareſt attribute of God!
Thy ſaving health to this thy ſervant lend!
Hear, Mercy, ſweeteſt daughter of the ſkies!"
Inclin'd upon a dewy-ſkirted cloud
Purpled with light, and dropping fatneſs down,
Plenty and bliſs on man, with looks as mild
As ev'ning ſuns (when flowry-footed May
Leads on the jocund hours, when love himſelf
Flutters in green) effuſing heart-felt joy
Abundant, Mercy ſhone with ſober grace,
And majeſty at once with ſweetneſs mix'd
Ineffable. A rainbow o'er her head,
The covenant of God, betok'ning peace

'Twixt Heaven and earth, its florid arch display'd,
High bended by th' Almighty's glorious hand;
The languish of the dove upon her eyes
In placid radiance melted, from the throne
Of grace infus'd, and fed with light: her smiles
Expansive cheer'd the undetermin'd tracks
Of all creation, from th' ethereal cope,
August with moving fires, down to the shades
Infernal, and the reign of darkness drear.
Ev'n men refine to angels from her gaze,
Gracious, invigorating, full of heav'n!

This daughter of the Lamb, to fervent pray'rs
And intercession, opes her ready ear,
Compassionate; and to Hygeia thus:
"Hygeia, hie thee to the well of life;
There dip thy fingers; touch his head and breast;
Three drops into his mouth infuse, unseen,
Save by the eye of faith: he yonder lies—
Descend, and take the ev'ning's western wing."

She said, Hygeia bow'd; and bowing, fill'd
The circumambient air with od'rous streams,
Pure essence of ambrosia! Not the breath
Of Lebanon, from cedar alleys blown,
Of Lebanon, with aromatic gales
Luxuriant, spikenard, aloes, myrrh and balm;
Nor the wise eastern monarch's garden vy'd
In fragrance, when his fair Circassian spouse,
Enamour'd, call'd upon the south to fan
Its beds of spices, and her bosom cool.
Panting with languishment and love-sick fires.

Forth from th' eternal throne the well of life,
Pouring its crystal, laves the streets of God,
(Where sickness never comes, nor age, nor pain)
Fast-trickling o'er the pebble-gems. Beneath
Unfading Amarant and Asphodel,
A mirror spreads its many-colour'd round,
Mosaic work, inlaid by hands divine
In glist'ring rows, illuminating each,
Each shading: beryl, topaz chalcedon,
Emerald and amethyst. Whatever hues
The light reflects, celestial quarries yield,
Or melt into the vernant-showry bow,
Profusive vary here in mingling beams.
Collected thus the waters, dimpling, end
Their soft-progressive lapse. The cherubs hence
Immortal vigour quaff and bliss unblam'd.
Nor only flow for you, ye sons of light,
The streams of comfort and of life, but flow
To heal the nations. Wonderful to tell,
The aged they renew, the dead revive,
And more, the festers of the wounded soul,
Corrupted, black, to pristine white relume
And saint-like innocence. The mystic dove
Broods, purifying o'er them, with his wings.
The angel, who Bethesda's troubled pool
Stirr'd, first his pinions with these vital drops
Sprinkled; then pour'd himself into the flood,
Instilling health and nutriment divine,
Its waves to quicken, and exalt its pow'rs.

Here lights Hygeia, ardent to fulfil
Mercy's behest. The bloom of Paradise
Liv'd on her youthful cheek, and glow'd the spring.
The deep carnations in the eastern skies,
When ruddy morning walks along the hills,
Illustriously red, in purple dews,
Are languid to her blushes; for she blush'd
As through the op'ning file of winged flames,
Bounding, she light'ned, and her sapphire eyes
With modest lustre bright, improving heav'n,
Cast sweetly round, and bow'd to her compeers,
An angel amid angels. Light she sprung
Along th' empyreal road: Her locks distill'd
Salubrious spirit on the stars. Full soon
She pass'd the gate of pearl, and down the sky,
Precipitant, upon the ev'ning wing
Cleaves the live ether, and with healthy balm
Impregnates, and fecundity of sweets.

Conscious of her approach, the wanton birds,
Instinctive, carol forth, in livelier lays,
And merrier melody, their grateful hymn,
Brisk-flutt'ring to the breeze. Eftsoons the hills,
Beneath the gambols of the lamb and kid,
Of petulant delight, the circling maze
(Brush'd off its dews) betray. All nature smiles,
With double day delighted. Chief on man
The goddess ray'd herself: He, wond'ring, feels
His heart in driving tumults, vig'rous, leap,
And gushing ecstasy: bursts out his tongue
In laud, and unpremeditated song,
Obedient to the music in his veins.
Thus, when at first, the instantaneous light
Sprung from the voice of God, and, vivid, threw
Its golden mantle round the rising ball,
The cumb'rous mass, shot through with vital warmth
And plastic energy, to motion roll'd
The drowsy elements, and active rule:
Sudden the morning stars, together, sang,
And shouted all the sons of God for joy.

Enters Hygeia, and her task performs,
With healing fingers touch'd my breast and head;
Three drops into my mouth infus'd, unseen,
Save by the eye of faith: Then reascends.

As snow in Salmon, at the tepid touch
Of southern gales, by soft degrees, dissolves
Trickling, yet flow, away; and loosen'd frosts
The genial impress feel of vernal suns,
Relenting to the ray; my torpid limbs
The healing virtue of Hygeia's hand
And salutary influence perceive,
Instant to wander through the whole. My heart
Begins to melt, o'er-running into joy,
Late froze with agony. Kind tumults seize
My spirits, conscious of returning health,
And dire disease abating from the cells
And mazy haunts of life. The judging leech
Approves the symptoms, and my hope allows.

The hostile humours cease to bubble o'er
Their big-distended channels; quiet now
And sinking into peace. The organs heave
Kindlier with life: And nature's fabric near
To dissolution shatter'd, and its mould
To dust dissolv'd, though not its pristine strength
(The lusty vigour of its healthy prime)
Yet gentle force recovers; to maintain
Against the tyrant-death's batt'ring assaults,
The fort of life.—But darkness, present still,
And absent sweet repose, best med'cine, sleep,
Forbid my heart the full carouse of joy.

"Soft pow'r of slumbers, dewy-feather'd sleep,

Kind nurſe of nature! whither art thou fled,
A ſtranger to my ſenſes, weary'd out
With pain, and aching for thy preſence? Come,
O come! embrace me in thy liquid arms;
Exert thy drowſy virtue, wrap my limbs
In downy indolence, and bathe in balm,
Faſt-flowing from th' abundance of thy horn,
With nouriſhment replete, and richer ſtor'd
Than Amalthea's; who (ſo poets feign)
With honey and with milk ſupply'd a god,
And fed the thunderer. Indulgent quit
Thy couch of poppies! ſteal thyſelf on me,
(In rory miſts ſuffus'd and clouds of gold)
On me, thou mildeſt cordial of the world?
The ſhield his pillow, in the tented field,
By thee, the ſoldier, bred in iron war,
Forgets the mimic thunders of the day,
Nor envies luxury her bed of down.
Rock'd by the blaſt, and cabbin'd in the ſtorm,
The ſailor hugs thee to the doddering maſt,
Of ſhipwreck negligent, while thou art kind.
The captive's freedom, thou! the labourer's hire;
The beggar's ſtore; the miſer's better gold;
The health of ſickneſs; and the youth of age!
At thy approach the wrinkled front of care
Subſides into the ſmooth expanſe of ſmiles.
And, ſtranger far! the monarch, crown'd by thee,
Beneath his weight of glory gains repoſe.
What guilt is mine, that I alone am wake,
Ev'n though my eyes are ſeal'd, am wake alone?
Ah ſeal'd, but not by thee! The world is dumb;
Exhal'd by air, an awful ſilence rules,
Still as thy brother's reign, or ſdot of time;
Ev'n nightingales are mute, and lovers reſt,
Steep'd in thy influence, and ceaſe to ſigh,
Or only ſigh in ſlumbers. Fifteen nights
The moon has walk'd in glory o'er the ſky;
As oft the ſun has ſhone her from the ſphere,
Since, gentle ſleep, I felt thy cordial dews.
Then liſten to my moaning; nor delay
To ſooth me with thy ſoftneſs: to o'erſhade
Thy ſuppliant with thy pinions: or at leaſt,
Lightly to touch my temples with thy wand.
So, full and frequent, may the crimſon fields
With poppies bluſh, nor feel a Tarquin's hand.
So may the weſt wind's ſigh, th' murm'ring brook,
The melody of birds, Ianthe's lute,
And muſic of the ſpheres, be all the ſounds
That dare intrude on thy devoted hour.
Nor Boreas bluſter, nor the thunder roar,
Nor ſcreech-owl flap his wing, nor ſpirit yell,
As 'neath the trembling of the moon he walks,
Within the circle of thy ſtill domain.
He comes! he comes! the reconciling pow'r
Of pain, vexation, care, and anguiſh comes!
He hovers in the lazy air:—He melts,
With honey heavineſs, my ſenſes down.
—I thank thee ſleep!—Heav'ns! is the day reſtor'd
To my deſiring eyes? their lids, unglew'd,
Admit the long-loſt light, now ſtreaming in
Painfully clear!—O check the rapid gleam
With ſhading ſilk, 'till the weak viſual orb,
Stronger and ſtronger, dares imbibe the ſun,
Nor, wat'ring, twinkles at unfolded day.

As, where, in Lapland, night collects her reign,
Oppreſſive, over half the rounded year
Uninterrupted with one ſtruggling beam;
Young Orra-Moor, in furry ſpoils enroll'd,
Shagged and warm, firſt ſpies th' imperfect bluſh
Of op'ning light, exulting; ſcarce her eyes
The luſtre bear, though faint; but, wid'ning faſt
Th' unbounded tide of ſplendour covers, fair,
Th' expanded hemiſphere; and fills her ſight
With gladneſs, while her heart, warm-leaping, burns.
Sight, all expreſſive! though the feeling ſenſe
Thrills from Ianthe's hand; at Handel's lyre
Tingles the ear; though ſmell from bloſſom'd beans
Arabian ſpirit gathers; and the draught,
Sparkling from Burgundy's exalted vines,
Streams nectar on the palate: Yet, O ſight!
Weak their ſenſations, when compar'd with thee.
Without thee, nature lies unmeaning gloom.
Whatever ſmiles on earth, or ſhines in heav'n,
From ſtar of Venus to Adonis flow'r;
Whatever ſpring can promiſe; ſummer warm
To rich maturity; gay autumn roll
Into the lap of plenty, or her horn;
Winter's majeſtic horrors;—all are thine.
All varying in order's pleaſing round,
In regular confuſion grateful all!
And now progreſſive health, with kind repair,
My fever-weaken'd joints and languid limbs
New brace. Live vigour and auxiliar'd nerves
Sinew the freſhen'd frame in bands of ſteel.
As in the trial of the furnace ore,
From baſer dregs refin'd, and droſſy ſcum,
Flames more refulgent, and admits the ſtamp
Of majeſty to dignify the gold,
Cæſar or George! the human body, thus,
Enamel'd, not deform'd, from ſickneſs' rage
More manly features borrows, and a grace
Severe, yet worthier of its ſovereign form.
The patriarch of Uz, ſon of the morn,
Envy'd of Lucifer, by ſores and blanes
Sharply improv'd, to fairer honours roſe;
Leſs his beginning bleſt than latter end.
How late a tortur'd lump of baleful pain,
The ſoul immerg'd in one inactive maſs
Of breathing blanes, each elegance of ſenſe,
Each intellectual ſpark and fiery ſeed
Of reaſon, mem'ry, judgment, taſte, and wit,
Extinct and ſmother'd in unwieldy clay
Scarce animated: and (O bleſſing!) now
I ſeem to tread the winds; to overtake
The empty eagle in her early chaſe,
Or nimble-trembling dove, from preyful beak,
In many a rapid, many a cautious round,
Wheeling precipitant: I leave behind,
Exulting o'er its aromatic hills,
The bounding Beher-roe. The poet's mind,
(Effluence eſſential of heat and light!)
Not mounts a loftier wing, when fancy leads
The glitt'ring track, and points him to the ſkies,
Excurſive: He empyreal air inhales,
Earth fading from his flight! triumphant ſoars
Amid the pomp of planetary worlds,
Ranging infinitude, beyond the ſtretch

Of Newton's ken, reformer of the ſpheres,
And, gaining on the heav'ns, enjoys his home!
The winter of diſeaſe all paſs'd away,
The ſpring of health, in bloomy pride, calls forth
Embroſom'd bliſs, of roſy-winged praiſe
The riſing incenſe, the impaſſion'd glance
Of gratitude, the pant of honour, quick
With emulating zeal; the florid wiſh
For ſacred happineſs, and cordial glow
From conſcious virtue felt: all the ſweet train
Of vernal ſolitude's refining walks,
Beſt gift of Heav'n, and ſource of nameleſs joys!

NOTES AND ALLUSIONS ON BOOK IV.

Ver. 55. Light is the firſt-born of all creatures, and it is commonly obſerved, that the angels were created at the ſame period of time. St. Auſtin thinks them meant under fiat lux, "let there be light:" De civitate Dei, l. xi. c. 9. This indeed is only conjectural, and we have no article of the Apoſtles' creed which directs upon any conſiderations of angels; becauſe perhaps it exceeds the faculties of men to underſtand their nature, and it may not conduce much to our practical edification to know them. Yet, however, this obſervation may ſerve to illuſtrate that beautiful paſſage in the book of Job: When "the morning-ſtars ſang together, and all the ſons of God ſhouted for joy."

Ver. 182. White has been accounted in all ages the peculiar tincture of innocence, and white veſtments worn by perſons delegated for ſacred offices, &c. When our Saviour was transfigured before his diſciples, his raiment became ſhining, "exceeding white as ſnow," Mark, ix. 3. When he aſcended into heaven, the angels deſcended in "white apparel," Acts i. 10. "And to the ſpouſe of the Lamb was granted that ſhe ſhould be arrayed in fine linen, clean and white, which is the righteouſneſs of the ſaints," Rev. xix. 8. 14. Hence the cuſtom of the primitive church of clothing the perſons baptized in white garments.

Inde parens ſacro ducens de fonte ſacerdos
Infantes, niveo corpore, mente, habitu.
Paulinus, Epiſt. xii.

The heathens paid likewiſe a great regard to white:

Color albus præcipuè Deo charus eſt.
Cicero de Leg. Lib. ii.

—— Ante aras ſtat veſte ſacerdos
Effulgens nivea. Silius Ital. Lib. iii.

Delius hic longè candenti veſte ſacerdos
Occurrit. Valerius Flacc. Lib. ii.

And not only the prieſts, but likewiſe thoſe who attended at the ſacrifices and paid their devotions to their gods:

Cernite fulgentes ut eat ſacer agnus ad aras,
Tinctaque poſt oleâ candida turba comas.
Tibull. Lib. ii. Eleg. i.

And Ovid:

Linguis candida turba favet. Faſt. Lib. ii.

I ſhall only add one paſſage from Plautus:

—— Ergo æquius vos erat
Candidatas venire, hoſtiataſque ad hoc
Fanum. Rudenſ. Act. i. Sc. 5.

Ver. 230. Hygeia here performs her office in the very manner ſhe was ordered by Mercy. I have, after the manner of Homer, uſed the ſame expreſſions over again, as when ſhe received the mandate. The father of poetry conſtantly makes his envoys obſerve this practice, as a mark of decency and reſpect.

Ver. 268. Amalthea the daughter of Meliſſus King of Crete, and nurſe of Jupiter, who fed him with goat's milk and honey. But this ſtory is differently related. See Strabo, l. x. Diodor. Sicul. l. iv. c. 5. and Ovid. Faſt. l. v. It is very remarkable, that the tranſlation of the Septuagint uſes the expreſſion Amalthea's horn, for the name of Job's third daughter, Keren-happuc (ſo called from her beauty), alluding to a Grecian fable invented long after, Job ch. the laſt, ver. 14. The ſame tranſlation likewiſe mentions Arachne in the ninetieth Pſalm, and 9th verſe, which image is left out in all our late verſions. A Chriſtian poet, therefore, may ſurely be excuſed for uſing the word Ambroſia, &c. or drawing metaphors or compariſons from the Pagan mythology in a ſerious compoſition; which is the practice of Milton and ſome of the beſt poets. The fault only is, when the poet weaves the heathen fables with the Jewiſh and Chriſtian truths. As when Sannazarius introduces the furies, Cerberus, &c. into his poem (which is otherwiſe a very fine one) De partu Virginis. And likewiſe when Camoens blends the adventures of Bacchus with the miracles of Chriſt, &c. in his Luſiad. But this is by the by.

THE THANKSGIVING.

The grave cannot praiſe Thee; death cannot celebrate Thee.—The living, the living, he ſhall praiſe Thee, as I do this day. Iſaiah.

BOOK V.

THE ARGUMENT.

THE effects which the reſtoration of health ought to have in the ſolitudes of ſpring. Rural proſpect. Excurſion to the battle at Tournay. Reflections on the abuſes of modern poetry. Hymn to the ever-bleſſed and glorious Trinity: 1ſt, To God the Father, as Creator and Preſerver: 2dly, To God the Son, as Mediator and Redeemer: 3dly, To God the Holy Ghoſt, as Sanctifier and Comforter. Concluſion.

COME, contemplation! therefore, from thy haunts,
From Spenſer's tomb, (with reverent ſteps and flow
Oft viſited by me; certès, by all,
Touch'd by the muſe:) from Richmond's-green retreats,
Where * Nature's bard the ſeaſons on his page
Stole from the year's rich hand: or Welwyn groves,
Where Young, the friend of virtue and of man,
Sows with poetic ſtars the nightly ſong,
To Phœbus dear as his own day! and drowns
The nightingale's complaint in ſadder ſtrains
And ſweeter elegance of woe, O come!
Now ev'ning mildly ſtill and ſofter ſuns
(While every breeze is flowing balm) invite
To taſte the fragrant ſpirit of the ſpring
Salubrious; from mead or hawthorn-hedge
Aromatiz'd, and pregnant with delight
No leſs than health. And what a proſpect round
Swells greenly grateful on the cheriſh'd eye!
A univerſal bluſh! a waſte of ſweets!
How live the flow'rs, and, as the zephyrs blow,
Wave a ſoft luſtre on their parent-ſun,
And thank him with their odours for his beams;
Mild image of himſelf! reflected fair,
By ſaintneſs fair, and amiably mild.
Hark! how the airy echoes talk along
With undulating anſwer, ſoft or loud,
The mocking ſemblance of the imag'd voice,
Babbling itinerant from wood to hill,
From hill to dale, and wake their ſiſters round,
To multiply delight upon the ear.
As float the clouds, romantic fancy pours
The magazines of Proteus forth, and builds
Huge caſtles in the air; while veſſels ſail
Spacious, along the fluid element;
And dragons burn in gold, with azure ſtains
Speckled: ten thouſand inconſiſtent ſhapes
Shift on the eye, and through the welkin roll.

Here tuſted hills! there ſhining villas riſe,
Circling; and temples, ſolemn, fill the mind
With beauty, ſplendour, and religious awe!
Peace o'er the plains expands her ſnowy wing,
Dove-ey'd; and buxom plenty laughs around!
Far different objects mortify the eye
Along thy borders, Sheldt: (with William's tears
Ennobled, tears from brave humanity
And royal pity drawn! nor of his blood
Leſs prodigal!) inſtead of herbag'd plains,
Of fields with golden plenty waving wide,
Of lowing vallies, and of fleécy hills:
What magazines of death! what flaming ſwords
Deſtruction brandiſh; what a burniſh'd glare
Of horror wanders round; what carnage vile
Of dubitable limbs; what groaning piles
Of dying warriors on th' enſanguin'd earth
(Ev'n ſons of Britain, chiefs of high renown)
Grov'ling in duſt, and with unmartial fires
Sheer blaſted! O 'tis pitiful to ſight!
It ſmites the honeſt brain and heart! The cloud,
Belch'd from the brazen throat of war, would hide,
Induſtrious, the ruin which it ſpreads,
As if aſham'd of maſſacre—But hark!—
What dire exploſion tears th' embowel'd ſky,
And rumbles from th' infernal caves? The roar
Of Ætna's troubled caverns, when ſhe heaves
Trinacria from her marble pillars, fix'd
On the foundations of the ſolid earth,
And Theris' bellows from her diſtant dens,
O'erwhelm the ear!—A mine with deadly ſtores
Infuriate, burſt; and a whole ſquadron'd hoſt
Whirl'd through the riven air. A human ſhow'r
With ſmouldry ſmoke enroll'd and wrapt in fire,
To cover earth with deſolation drear!—
Curſt be the man, the monk, the ſon of hell,
The triple Moloch! whoſe mechanic brain,
Maliciouſly inventive, from its forge,
Of cruel ſteel, the ſulphur ſeeds of wrath
Flaſh'd on the world, and taught us how to kill;
To hurl the blazing ruin, to diſgorge

* Mr. James Thomſon.

From ſmoking braſs the ragged inſtruments
Of fate, in thunder, on the mangled files
Of gallant foes:---the cowardice of hell!
And, what the barb'rous nations never knew,
(Though nouriſh'd by the tigers. and their tongues
Red with the gore of lions) to involve
The holy temples, the religious fanes,
To hallelujahs ſacred and to peace,
With dreadleſs fires. Shudd'ring the angels weep
At man's impiety, and ſeek the ſkies:
They weep! while man, courageous in his guilt,
Smiles at the infant writhing on his ſpear;
The hoary head pollutes the flinty ſtreets
With ſcanty blood; and virgins pray in vain.
Bluſh, bluſh! or own Deucalion for thy ſire.
Yet ſhould rebellion, burſting from the caves
Of Erebus, uprear her Hydra form,
To poiſon, liberty, thy light divine;
If ſhe, audacious, ſtalk in open day,
And hiſs againſt the throne by heav'n's own hand
Eſtabliſh'd, and religion heav'n-reform'd,
Britannia! reſcue earth from ſuch a bane:
Exert thy ancient ſpirit; urge thyſelf
Into the bowels of the glowing war,
Sweep her from day to multiply the fiends,
And ſcare the damn'd!---and thou! the God of hoſts,
Supreme! the Lord of lords, and King of kings!
Thy people, thy anointed with thy ſhield
Cover and ſhade: unbare thy righteous arm,
And ſave us in the hollow of thy hand!
Michaël ſend, as erſt againſt the hoſt
Of Lucifer, and let his ſword be drunk
With rebel-blood. The battle is thy own;
When virtue, liberty, religion call:
Thine is the victory: the glory thine!
Turn, contemplation, from this ſavage ſcene
Of violence and waſte: my ſwimming eyes
Have loſt the beauties of the vernal view!
Sweet are the beauties of the vernal view!
And yet devotion wafts to nobler themes,
And lifts the ſoul to heav'n! for who, untouch'd,
With mental adoration feeling laud,
Beholds this living-vegetable whole,
This univerſal witneſs of a God!
Though ſilent, yet convincing, uncontrol'd,
Which meets the ſenſe, and triumphs in the ſoul?
Let me, by Iſaac's wife example fir'd,
When meditation led him through the fields,
Sweetly in pious muſings loſt, adore
My God! for meditation is too poor,
Below the ſacrifice of Chriſtian hearts:
Plato cou'd meditate; a Chriſtian, more:
Chriſtians, from meditation, ſoar to pray'r.
Methinks I hear, reprov'd by modern wit,
Or rather pagan, "though ideal ſounds
Soft-wafted on the zephyr's fancy'd wing,
Steal tuneful ſoothings on the eaſy ear,
New from Iliſſus' gilded miſts exhal'd;
Though gently o'er the academic groves,
The magic echoes of unbodied thoughts
Roll their light billows through th' unwounded air,

In mildeſt undulations' yet a * prieſt,
Taſteleſs and peeviſh, with his jargon ſhrill,
Scorns Academus; though its flow'rs beſtow
On Hybla nectar, purer than her own,
From Plato's honey-dropping tongue diſtill'd
In copious ſtreams, devolving o'er the ſenſe
Its ſweet regalement!" Philodemus, yes:
(Though learn'd Lycæum's cloiſters lead the mind
Attentive on, as far as nature leads:
And Plato, for a heathen, nobler dreams
Than dream ſome modern poets). yes, a prieſt,
A prieſt dares tell you, Salem's hallow'd walks,
And that illumin'd mountain, where a God,
The God of my ſalvation, and I hope
Of thine, unutterable beauty beam'd,
(Though ſhaded from exceſs of deity,
Too fierce for mortal-aching eyes to prove
The ruſh of glory) me, deſirous, draw
From Athen's owls, to Jordan's myſtic dove.
Thou ſing of nature, and the moral charms
Gild with thy painted muſe: my fingers lift
The lyre to God Jehovah! Eloim!
Truth is my leader; only fancy, thine:
Sweet Farinelli of enervate ſong)!
I quit the myrtle, for a ſtarry crown.
And know, if ſickneſs ſhed her bluiſh plagues
From fog, or fen, or town-infected damps,
(And, ſure I'd pity thee) among thy veins:
Then, then no Platoniſt! thy inmoſt ſoul
Will thank me for this preaching; nor diſdain
To breath itſelf in pray'r, as low as mine;
From God begin, with God conclude the ſong;
Thus glorifying with a Chriſtian zeal.
Father of heav'n and earth! coeval Son!
And co-exiſting Spirit! Trinal-One!
Myſterious Deity, inviſible;
Indefinite, and Omnipreſent God,
Inhabiting eternity! ſhall duſt,
Shall aſhes, dare preſume to ſing of thee?
O for a David's heart, and tongue of fire
To rival angels in my praiſe and zeal!
Yet love immenſe, and gratitude, with awe
Religious mix'd, ſhall elevate the hymn,
My heart enkindle, and inſpire my tongue.
Father-Creator! who beholds thy works,
But catches inſpiration! thou the earth
On nothing hung, and balanc'd in the void
With a magnetic force, and central poiſe.
Ocean of brightneſs thou! thy grand beheſt
Flung on thy orb, the ſun, a ſparkling drop,
To light the ſtars, and feed their ſilver urns
With unexhauſted flame; to bid them ſhine
Eternal in their courſes, o'er the blue
Which mantles night, and woo us to repoſe
With roſcid radiance. They harmonious roll,
In majeſty of motion, ſolemn, loud,
The univerſal hallelujah: ſphere,
In lucid order, quiring ſweet to ſphere,
Deep-felt and loftier than a ſeraph's ſong;
The ſymphony of well-according worlds!

* The very expreſſions of one of our diſciples of Socrates.

But man, thy beam, thy breath, thy image, ſhines
The crown, the glory, and the lord of all;
Of all below the ſtars! a plant, from heav'n
Traduc'd, to ſpread the riches of its bloom
O'er earth, and water'd with ethereal dews;
Incorruptible aliment! the birds
Warble among his boughs; the cattle, ſafe,
Paſture within his ſhade; and earth beneath
Th' imperial umbrage of his branches ſmiles.
The ſmiling earth, the ſpangled ſpheres, and man
Their great Creator praiſe! but praiſe how long,
Unleſs by thy Almighty arm upheld,
Preſerver infinite? by thee unleſs
Upheld, the earth wou'd from her baſis reel;
The ſpheres forego their courſes (off their orbs
The ſilver ſoftneſs melted into ſhade),
Obſcurely diſſonant; and mortal man
(Void of thy foſtering fires) his ſtately form
To duſt be moulder'd chaos wou'd reſume
Her ancient anarchy; confuſion, rule;
And darkneſs ſwallow all. In thee we live,
In thee we move: our beings in thy chain,
Linkt to eternity, faſten on thee,
The pillar of our ſouls! for me, (how late
A neighbour of the worm)! when I forget
The wonders of thy goodneſs ray'd on me,
And ceaſe to celebrate, with mattin-harp
Or veſper-ſong, thy plenitude of love,
And healing mercy; may the nightly pow'r,
Which whiſpers on my ſlumbers, ceaſe to breathe
Her modulating impulſe through my ſoul;
Untun'd, unhallow'd! diſcord, ſtring my lyre,
Idly, my finger, preſs the fretted gold,
Rebellious to the dictates of my hand,
When indolent, to ſwell the notes for thee,
Father of heav'n and earth!---Coeval Son!
(His word, his eſſence, his effulgence pure!)
Not leſs thy filial likeneſs I adore,
Nor from thy Father's glory aught disjoin,
Redeemer! Mediator! from the birth
Of uncreated time, thy Father's wrath
(Sprung from Omniſcience)! to appeaſe, for man,
Upright as yet, to mediate, mercy wak'd
Unbounded love in thee; unbounded love
Contracted to the meaſure of a ſpan
Immenſity of Godhead, and thy crown
Reſt from thy faded brow. Liſten, O earth!
And wonder, O ye heav'ns! ſhall he, whoſe feet
Are cloth'd with ſtars, (the glory of his head
For who can tell)? whoſe looks divine illume
The dazzel'd eyes of cherubs, and the youth
Of ſaints with everlaſting bloom renew:
Shall he, whoſe vital ſmiles with ſplendor fill
The circuits of creation, and ſuſtain
Th' abodes of all exiſtence, from the depths
Of hell beneath, above heav'n's higheſt orb,
With life, and health, and joy! ſhall he, to God
Dear as his eye and heart, engraven there
Deep from eternity; alone belov'd,
Alone begotten! ſay, ſhall he become
A man of grief---for man? nay more his foe,
Rebellious next the fiends?---aſtoniſhment
Had chain'd my tongue to ſilence, if the pow'rs
Of tendereſt pity and of warmeſt love
Provok'd not penſive meaſures, ſadder ſtrains
Of elegiac ſorrow, with the theme
Mournfully varying. Take, my ſoul redeem'd!
O take the moaning dove's dew-dropping wing,
Fly, fly to Solyma! and melt thy woe
To Cedron's murmurs. Thence, extend thy flight
To Golgotha's accurſed tree. Behold!
Clouds roll'd on clouds of wrath (the blackeſt wrath
Of an offended God)! his beauties ſhade;
But ſhade not long: it ſoon in drops diſſolves,
Sweet to the ſoul as manna to the taſte,
As pride of ſummer-flow'r to ſight or ſmell!
Behind this ſhadowing cloud, this myſtic gloom,
The Sharon roſe, dy'd in the blood of heav'n,
The lilly of the valley, white from ſtain,
Bows the fair head, in lovelineſs declines,
And, ſweetly languiſhing, it droops and dies.
But darkneſs veils the ſun: a curtain draw
Before the paſſion; beyond wonder great,
Great beyond ſilence!---(Awe-ſtruck pauſe a-while---)
And heavy as the burden of our ſins!---
'Tis finiſh'd!---Change the lyre, the numbers change;
Let holy anthem-airs inſpire the hymn.
Glory in heav'n! redemption to mankind,
And peace on earth! dominion! bleſſing! praiſe!
Thankſgiving! pow'r! ſalvation to our God!
Salvation to our God, and to the Lamb!
And, co-exiſting Spirit! thou, whoſe breath
My voice informs, ſhall it be mute to thee,
Eternal Paraclete? in order, laſt,
Equal in glory to Omnipotence
The firſt, as to the ſecond; and from both Proceeding; (O inexplicable name!)
Myſtical link of the unnumber'd Three!
To learning, night; to faith, the noon-tide day.
Soul of the univerſe! thy wiſdom, firſt,
The rage compos'd of warring * elements,
(The ſubject of a nobler future ſong)
Yon all ſurrounding heav'ns with cryſtal orbs
Garniſh'd, and living gems, in goodly ranks
And diſciplin'd array; dividing night
From day, their ordinances 'ſtabliſh'd ſure.
Moving the waters ſaw thee o'er their face;
O God, the waters ſaw thee, and, afraid,
Into their channels ſhrunk, (capricious bed
Of liquid element)! and own'd their bounds
Impaſſable, as that eternal gulf
'Twixt bliſs and woe.---The Prince of peace thy beams
Largely imbib'd, when, dovelike, o'er his head,
Faſt by the banks of Jordan's ſacred ſtream,
Thy mantling wings diffus'd their heav'nly hues;
And Abba glorify'd his only Son,
Well pleaſed. From thy tongues of cloven fire
Kindled, the nations burn'd in flaming zeal,
And unextinguiſh'd charity, diſpers'd
And glowing as the ſummer blaze at noon.
The ruſhing winds on all their wings convey'd
Thy doctrine, ſtrong to ſhake the guilty ſoul;
As erſt the dome, low-ſtooping to its baſe,

* The Elements. A poem: in four books.

Before thy mighty preſence learn'd to bend.
Thou, from the morning womb, upon our ſouls,
Barren and dry, thy ſanctifying dews
Abroad in ſilent ſoftneſs ſheds: the dews
Of love unſpotted, uncorrupted joy,
Obedient goodneſs, temperance ſubdu'd,
Unſhaken faith, and meekneſs without guile.
Hence flow the odours out, our pray'rs perfume,
Like incenſe, riſing fragrant on the throne,
From golden vials pour'd by elder hands!
Extinct thy influential radiance ſin,
Incumbent on the ſoul, as black as hell,
Holds godleſs anarchy: by thee refin'd,
Incens'd, ſublim'd, and ſanctify'd, the ſoul
Invites the Holieſt (O abyſs of love!)
To chooſe a temple, purer than the ſun,
Incorruptible, formed not by hands,
Where beſt he loves to dwell.—Thou all my bed,
Moſt holy Comforter! in ſickneſs ſmooth'd,
And violet buds and roſes without thorn
Shower'd round the couch. From darkneſs and the vale
Of ſhadowy death, to paſtures fair, and ſtreams
Of comfort, thy refreſhing right hand led
My wearied ſoul, and bath'd in health and joy!
To light reſtor'd, and the ſweet breath of heav'n,
Beneath thy olive boughs, in plenteous flow,
The golden oil effuſing on my head,
Of gladneſs, let me ever ſit and ſing,
Thy numerous Godhead ſparkling in my ſoul,
Thyſelf inſtilling praiſes, by thy ear
Not unapprov'd! For wiſdom's ſteady ray
Th' enlight'ning gift of tongues, the ſacred fires
Of poeſy are thine, united Three!
Father of heav'n and earth! coeval Son!
And coexiſting Spirit! Trinal One!

NOTES AND ALLUSIONS ON BOOK V.

Ver. 44. This was written at the time of the ſiege of Tournay.

Ver. 130. Far be it from me to ſpeak with diſreſpect of this Pagan philoſopher. For my part, I could almoſt declare my admiration of Plato's beautiful deſcriptions, &c. in the words of B. Johnſon on Shakſpeare: "To juſtify (ſays he) my own candour, I honour his memory (on this ſide idolatry) as much as any." See his Diſcoveries, vol. ii. fol. of his works, p. 98.

I only here would obſerve how falſely, not to ſay impiouſly, ſome modern writers ſeem to take pains to recommend Plato's ideal morality, in oppoſition to the glorious doctrines ſo fully revealed in the holy ſcriptures.

Ver. 146. Alluding to Q. Sectanus's admirable ſatires; who introduces much ſuch another character under this name. The true author, as we are informed by Monſ. Blainville in his curious travels, is Monſ. Sergardi, one of the fineſt and politeſt gentlemen of Rome; by Philodemus, he means one Gravina, an atheiſtical pretender to philoſophy, the Greek language, &c. He thus makes him boaſt of himſelf, as if he drew the principles of his ſyſtem from Socrates.

Nos etenim (puto jàm noſti) docti ſumus, et quos
Socraticâ cœpi tractandos mollitèr arte
Sordibus emergunt vulgi, totâque probantur
Urbe.

See Q. Sectani Satyr, 4to. vol. i. ſat. 1. lib. 1. v. 108, &c.

Ver. 299. The Heathens frequently give the appellation of Soul or Spirit to God.

Thus Virgil:

Cœlum et terram campoſque liquentes,
Lucentemque globum lunæ, Titaniaque aſtra
Spiritus intùs agit.

That he means God by Spirit, appears from another place.

——————— Deum ire per omnes
Terraſque tractuſque maris cœlumque profundum.

And Zeno's opinion is very remarkable;

Θεος εστι πνευμα διηκον δι ολε τε κοσμε.

See Lactantius, B. vii. c. 3. and Diogenes Laertius in the life of Zeno.

Ver. 306. Cicero tells us that it was Thales's opinion that God was the Spirit which created all things from the water. Thales aquam dixit eſſe initium rerum, Deum autem eſſe mentem quæ ex aqua cuncta fingeret. De Nat. Deor. l. 1.

Ver. 323. The very Heathens imagined a commotion in nature at the preſence of the Deity.

——— Vibratus ab æthere fulgor
Cum ſonitu venit, ruere omnia viſa repentè.
Æneis, lib 8.

And in another place, Virgil:

Vix ea fatus eram, tremere omnia viſa repentè
Liminaque laurusque Dei, totuſque moveri
Mons circum. Æneis, lib. 3.

So likewiſe Statius:

Mirabur cur templa mihi tremuere Dianæ.
Theb. lib. 4.

And Seneca:

—— Imo mugit è fundo ſolum,
Tonat dies ſerenus, ac totis domus
Ut fracta tectis crepuit. Thyeſtes, Act. 2.

Ver. 324. Pſalm cx. 3. This is a noble metaphor to expreſs the beauties and graces of the Holy Spirit. So that "from the womb of the morning" in the Pſalmiſt, ſignifies this: From the heavenly light of the goſpel, which is the wing or beam whereby the Sun of Righteouſneſs revealeth himſelf, and breaketh out upon the world, the people ſhall adorn themſelves from the firſt forming of Chriſt in them, with the dews of grace, and the gifts and emanations of the Holy Ghoſt; which are love, joy, peace, long-ſuffering, gentleneſs, goodneſs, faith, meekneſs, temperance. Gal. v. 22, &c. When the Spirit of Chriſt bloweth thus upon us, and the dews of grace are poured into our hearts, then the ſpices flow out, which ariſe from the holy duties and ſpiritual infuſions mentioned above.

Ver. 332. Rev. v. 8. The four and twenty elders fell down before the Lamb, having every one of them harps and golden vials full of odours, which are the prayers of the ſaints; that is, the prayers of good men are as grateful to God as incenſe from the tabernacle. So David, Pſ. xiv. 2. "Let my prayer be directed to thee as incenſe."

Ver. 348. Alluding to the two olive branches in Zechariah, ch. iv. ver. 11. and 12. which empty the golden oil out of themſelves. Amongſt other expoſitions of which words, Junius and Tarnovius interpret them to mean the various gifts and effuſions of the Holy Spirit, which are by Chriſt derived upon the church. For Chriſt is called the Meſſiah, on account of his being anointed with the "oil of gladneſs," Pſ. xiv. 8. And St. John, ſpeaking thus of the Holy Ghoſt: "Ye have an unction from the Holy One," 1 John ii. 20. "The anointing which ye received from him abideth in you," John ii. 27.

To conclude; a recovery from the ſmall-pox, a few years ago, gave occaſion to the preceding poem. I only at firſt (in gratitude to the great Phyſician of ſouls and bodies) deſigned to have publiſhed this hymn to the Trinity upon a recovery from ſickneſs. But the ſubject being very extenſive, and capable of admitting ſerious reflections on the frail ſtate of humanity, I expatiated farther upon it. It cannot be ſuppoſed that I ſhould treat upon ſickneſs in a medicinal, but only in a deſcriptive, a moral, and religious manner: the verſification is varied accordingly; the deſcriptive parts being more poetical, the moral more plain, and the religious, for the moſt part, drawn from the holy ſcriptures. I have juſt taken ſuch notice of the progreſs of the ſmall-pox, as may give the reader ſome ſmall idea of it, without offending his imagination. Theſe few notes are not intended for the learned reader, but added to aſſiſt thoſe who may not be ſo well acquainted with the claſſical and other alluſions. I do not remember to have ſeen any other poem on the ſame ſubject to lead me on the way, and therefore, it is to be hoped, the good-natured reader will more readily excuſe its blemiſhes.

I have here added, by way of concluſion to the notes, a ſhort hymn, written (when very young) in the great epidemical cold in 1732.

A HYMN IN SICKNESS.

O Lord! to thee I lift my ſoul,
To thee direct my eyes,
While fate in every vapour rolls,
And ſick'ning nature ſighs.

Ev'n air, the vehicle of life,
The ſoft receſs of breath,
Is made the harbinger of fate,
And poiſon'd dart of death.

No gentle ſtrains relieve my ears;
But hark! the paſſing toll,
In a long ſadly-ſolemn knell,
Alarms anew my ſoul.

No lovely proſpect meets my eye,
But melancholy fear,
Attended with the hollow pomp
Of ſickneſs and deſpair.

My ſins wide-ſtaring in my face,
In ghaſtly guiſe alarm;
The pleaſing ſins of wanton youth,
In many a fatal charm.

I ſink beneath their black approach:
My God! thy mercy lend;
Let hope her healing wings diffuſe;
O ſnatch me from the fiend!

I feel, I feel thy ſaving health:
New raptures fill my heart:
A ſhining train of bliſs ſucceeds;
The gloomy ſcenes depart.

Though ſtraining coughs this mortal frame
To diſſolution bring,
Yet dreary death in vain affrights
And points in vain his ſting:

If gracious Heaven at that ſad hour
Its guardian arm extend;
If angels watch my parting ſoul,
And ſave me at my end.

O Lord, or let me live or die,
Thy holy will be done!
But let me live alone to thee,
And die in thee alone.

AN HYMN TO MAY.

Nunc formoſiſſimus annus. VIRGIL.

PREFACE.

As Spenſer is the moſt deſcriptive and florid of all our Engliſh writers, I attempted to imitate his manner, in the following vernal poem. I have been very ſparing of the antiquated words, which are too frequent in moſt of the imitations of this author; however, I have introduced a few here and there, which are explained at the bottom of each page where they occur. Shakſpeare is the poet of nature, in adapting the affections and paſſions to his characters; and Spenſer in deſcribing her delightful ſcenes and rural beauties. His lines are moſt muſically ſweet, and his deſcriptions moſt delicately abundant, even to a wantonneſs of painting; but ſtill it is the muſic and painting of nature. We find no ambitious ornaments or epigrammatical turns in his writings, but a beautiful ſimplicity; which pleaſes far above the glitter of pointed wit. I endeavoured to avoid the affectation of the one, without any hopes of attaining the graces of the other kind of writing.

Te ſequor, O noſtræ gentis decus! inque tuis nunc
Fixa pedum pono preſſis veſtigia ſignis:
Non ità certandi cupidus, quam propter amorem
Quòd te imitari aveo: Quid enim contendat hirundo Cycnis?— Lucretius.

A modern writer has, I know, objected againſt running the verſe into alternate and ſtanza: But Mr. Prior's authority is ſufficient for me, who obſerves that it allows a greater variety, and ſtill preſerves the dignity of the verſe. As I profeſſed myſelf in this canto to take Spenſer for my model, I choſe the ſtanza; which I think adds both a ſweetneſs and ſolemnity at the ſame time, to ſubjects of this rural and flowery nature. The moſt deſcriptive of our old poets have always uſed it from Chaucer down to Fairfax, and even long after him. I followed Fletcher's meaſure in his Purple Iſland; a poem printed at Cambridge in twelve cantos in quarto, ſcarce heard of in this age, yet the beſt in the allegorical way (next to the Faery Queen) in the Engliſh language. The Alexandrine line, I think, is peculiarly graceful at the end, and is an improvement on Shakſpeare's Venus and Adonis. After all, Spenſer's hymns will excuſe me for uſing this meaſure; and Scaliger, in the third book of his Poetics, tells us (from Dydimus) that the hymns of the Athenians were ſung to the lyre, the pipe, or ſome muſical inſtrument: And this, of all other kinds of verſe, is certainly lyrical. But enough of the ſtanza: For (as Sir William Davenant obſerves in his admirable preface to Gondibert) numbers in verſe, like diſtinct kinds of muſic, are compoſed to the uncertain and different taſte of ſeveral ears. I hope I have no apology to make for deſcribing the beauties, the pleaſures, and the loves of the ſeaſon, in too tender or too florid a manner. The nature of the ſubject required a luxurioufneſs of verſification, and a ſoftneſs of ſentiment; but they are pure and chaſte at the ſame time, otherwiſe this canto had neither been ever written or offered to the public. If the ſentiments and verſe be florid and tender, I ſhall excuſe myſelf in the words of Virgil (though not in his ſenſe)

—— Nunc molliſſima fandi
Tempora!

THE ARGUMENT.

Subject propoſed. Invocation of May. Deſcription of her: Her operations on nature. Bounty recommended; in particular at this ſeaſon. Vernal apoſtrophe. Love the ruling paſſion in May. The celebration of Venus her birth-day in this month. Rural retirement in ſpring. Concluſion.

Ethereal daughter of the luſty Spring,
And ſweet Favonius, ever gentle May!
Shall I, unblam'd, preſume of thee to ſing,
And with thy living colours gild my lay?
Thy genial ſpirit mantles in my brain;
My numbers languiſh in a ſofter vein:
I pant, too emulous, to flow in Spenſer's ſtrain.

Say, mild Aurora of the blooming year,
With ſtorms when winter blackens nature's face;
When whirling winds the howling foreſt tear,
And ſhake the ſolid mountains from their baſe:
Say, what refulgent chambers of the ſky
Veil thy beloved glories from the eye,
For which the nations pine, and earth's fair children die?

Where * Leda's twins, forth from their diamond tow'r,
Alternate o'er the night their beams divide;
In light emboſom'd, happy, and ſecure
From winter rage, thou chooſeſt to abide.

* Caſtor and Pollux.

Bleſt reſidence! For, there, as poet's tell,
† The power's of poetry and wiſdom dwell;
Apollo wakes the arts; the muſes ſtrike the ſhell.

‡ Certes o'er Rhedicyna's laurell'd mead,
(For ever ſpread, ye laurels, green and new)!
The brother ſtars their gracious nurture ſhed,
And ſecret bleſſings of poetic dew.
They bathe their horſes in the learned flood,
With flame recruited for the ethereal road,
And deem fair Iſis' ſwans || fair as their fa
god.

No ſooner April, trimm'd with girlands § gay,
Rains fragrance o'er the world, and kindly ſhow'rs;
But, in the eaſtern pride of beauty, May,
To gladden earth, forſakes her heav'nly bow'rs,

Reſtoring nature from her palſy'd ſtate.
April, retire; ne * longer nature wait;
Soon may ſhe iſſue from the morning's golden gate.

Come, bounteous May! in fulneſs of thy might,
Lead briſkly on the mirth-infuſing hours,
All-recent from the boſom of delight,
With nectar nurtur'd; and involv'd in flow'rs:
By ſpring's ſweet bluſh, by nature's teeming womb;
By Hebe's dimply ſmile, by Flora's bloom;
By Venus' ſelf (for Venus' ſelf demands thee) come!

By the warm ſighs, in dewy even-tide,
Of melting maidens in the woodbine groves,
To pity looſen'd, ſoften'd down from pride;
By billing turtles, and by cooing doves;
By the youth's plainings ſtealing on the air,
(For youths will plain, though yielding be the fair)
Hither to bleſs the maidens and the youths repair.

With dew beſpangled, by the hawthorn buds,
With freſhneſs breathing, by the daiſy'd plains,
By the mix'd muſic of the warbling woods,
And jovial † roundelays of nymphs and ſwains;
In thy full energy, and rich array,
Delight of earth and heaven! O bleſſed May!
From heav'n deſcend to earth: on earth vouchſafe to ſtay.

She comes!—A ſilken ‡ camus, em'ral'd-green,
Gracefully looſe, adown her ſhoulders flows,
(Fit to enfold the limbs of Paphos' queen)
And with the labours of the needle glows,
|| Purfled by nature's hand! The amorous air
And muſky weſtern breezes faſt repair, [hair.
Her mantle proud to ſwell, and wanton with her

Her hair (but rather threads of light it ſeems)
With the gay honours of the ſpring entwin'd,
Copious, unbound, in nectar'd ringlets ſtreams,
Floats glitt'ring on the ſun, and ſcents the wind,
Love-ſick with odours!—Now to order roll'd,
It melts upon her boſom's dainty mould,
Or, curling round her waſte, diſparts its wavy gold.

Young circling roſes, bluſhing round them throw
The ſweet abundance of their purple rays,
And lilies, dipp'd in fragrance, freſhly blow,
With blended beauties in her angel face.
The humid radiance beaming from her eyes
The air and ſeas illumes, the earth and ſkies;
And open, where ſhe ſmiles, the ſweets of Paradiſe.

On zephyr's wing the laughing goddeſs view,
Diſtilling balm. She cleaves the buxom air,
Attended by the ſilver-footed dew,
The ravages of winter to repair.
She gives her naked boſom to the gales,
Her naked boſom down the ether ſails;
Her boſom breathes delight; her breath the ſpring exhales.

All as the Phœnix in Arabian ſkies,
New burniſh'd from his ſpicy funeral pyres,

* Nor. † Songs.
‡ A light gown. || Flouriſhed with a needle.

At large, in roſeal * undulation flies;
His plumage dazzles and the gazer tires:
Around their king the plumy nations wait,
Attend his triumph, and augment his ſtate:
He tow'ring, claps his wings, and wins th' ethereal height.

So round this phœnix of the gawdy year
A thouſand, nay, ten thouſand ſports and ſmiles,
Fluttering in gold, along the hemiſphere,
Her praiſes chaunt: her praiſes glad the iſles.
Conſcious of her approach (to deck her bow'rs)
Earth from her fruitful lap and boſom pours
A waſte of ſpringing ſweets, and voluntary flow'rs.

† Narciſſus fair, in ſnowy velvet gown'd;
Ah fooliſh! ſtill to love the fountain-brim:
‡ Sweet hyacinth, by Phœbus || erſt bemoan'd;
And tulip, flaring in her powder'd trim.
Whate'er, § Armida, in thy gardens blew;
Whate'er the ſun inhales, or ſips the dew;
Whate'er compoſe the chaplet on Ianthes' brow.

He who ¶ undaz'd can wander o'er her face,
May gain upon the ſolar blaze at noon!—
What more than female ſweetneſs and a grace
Peculiar! ſave, Ianthe, thine alone,
Ineffable effuſion of the day!
So very much the ſame, that lovers ſay,
May is Ianthe; or the dear Ianthe May.

So far as doth the harbinger of day
The leſſer lamps of night in  ſheen excel;
So far in ſweetneſs and in beauty May
Above all other months doth bear the bell
So far as May doth other months exceed,
So far in virtue and in †† goodlihead,
Above all other nymphs Ianthe bears the ‡‡ mead.

Welcome! as to a youthful poet, wine,
To fire his fancy and enlarge his ſoul:
He weaves the laurel-chaplet with the vine,
And grows immortal as he drains the bowl.
Welcome! as beauty to the loveſick ſwain,
For which he long had ſigh'd, but ſigh'd in vain;
He darts into her arms; quick vaniſhes his pain.

The drowzy elements, arouz'd by thee,
Roll to harmonious meaſures, active all!
Earth, water, air, and fire, with feeling glee,
Exult to celebrate thy feſtival.
Fire glows intenſer; ſofter blows the air;
More ſmooth the waters flow; earth ſmiles more fair:
Earth, water, air, and fire, thy glad'ning impulſe ſhare.

What boundleſs tides of ſplendour o'er the ſkies,
O'erflowing brightneſs! ſtream their golden rays!
Heav'ns azure kindles with the varying dies,
Reflects the glory, and returns the blaze.
Air whitens; wide the tracts of ether been
With colours damaſk'd rich, and goodly ſheen,
And all above is blue, and all below is green.

At thy approach, the wild waves' loud uproar
And foamy furges of the mad'ning main,
Forget to heave their mountains to the ſhore;
Diffus'd into the level of the plain.
For thee, the Halcyon builds her ſummer's neſt;
For thee, the ocean ſmooths her troubled breaſt,
Gay from thy placid ſmiles, in thy own purple dreſt.

Have ye not ſeen, in gentle even tide,
When Jupiter the earth hath richly ſhower'd,
Striding the clouds, a bow * diſpredden wide
As if with light inwove, and gayly flower'd
With bright variety of blending dies?
White, purple, yellow melt along the ſkies,
Alternate colours ſink, alternate colours riſe.

The earths embroidery then have ye ey'd,
And ſmile of bloſſoms, yellow, purple, white;
Their vernal-tinctur'd leaves, luxurious, dy'd
In Flora's liv'ry, painted by the light.
Lights' painted children in the breezes play,
Lay out their dewy boſoms to the ray,
Their ſoft enamel ſpread, and beautify the day.

From the wide altar of the foodful earth
The flow'rs, the herbs, the plants, their incenſe roll;
The orchards ſwell the ruby-tinctur'd birth;
The vermil gardens breathe the ſpicy ſoul.
Grateful to May, the nectar-ſpirit flies,
The wafted clouds of laviſh'd odours riſe,
The zephyr's balmy burthen, worthy of the ſkies.

The bee, the golden daughter of the ſpring,
From mead to mead, in wanton labour, roves,
And loads its little thigh, or gilds its wing
With all the eſſence of the flufhing groves:
Extracts the aromatic ſoul of flow'rs,
And, humming in delight, its waxen bow'rs
Fills with the luſcious ſpoils, and lives ambroſial hours.

Touch'd by thee, May, the flocks and luſty droves
That low in paſtures, or on mountains bleat,
Revive their frolics and renew their loves,
Stung to the marrow with a generous heat.

* Spread.

The ſtately courſer, bounding o'er the plain,
Shakes to the winds the honours of his mane,
(High-arch'd his neck) and, ſnuffing, hopes the dappled train.

The aëreal ſongſters ſooth the liſt'ning groves:
The mellow thruſh, the * ouzle ſweetly ſhrill,
And little linnet celebrate their loves
In hawthorn valley, or on tufted hill;
The ſoaring lark, the lowly nightingale,
A thorn her pillow, trills her doleful tale,
And melancholy muſic dies along the dale.

This gay exuberance of gorgeous ſpring,
The gilded mountain, and the herbag'd vale,
The woods that bloſſom, and the birds that ſing,
The murmuring fountain and the breathing dale:
The dale, the fountains, birds and woods delight,
The vales, the mountains and the ſpring invite,
Yet unadorn'd by May, no longer charm the ſight.

When nature laughs around, ſhall man alone,
Thy image, hang (ah me!) the ſickly head?
When nature ſings, ſhall nature's glory groan,
And languiſh for the pittance poor of bread!
O may the man that ſhall his image ſcorn,
Alive, be ground with hunger, moſt forlorn,
Die † unanell'd, and dead, by dogs and kites be torn.

Curs'd may he be (as if he were not ſo).
Nay doubly curs'd be ſuch a breaſt of ſteel,
Which never melted at another's woe,
Nor tenderneſs of bowels knew to feel.
His heart is black as hell, in flowing ſtore
Who hears the needy crying at his door,
Who hears them cry, ‡ ne recks; but ſuffers them be poor.

But bleſt, O more than doubly bleſt be he!
Let honour crown him and eternal reſt,
Whoſe boſom the ſweet fount of charity,
Flows out to § nourſle innocence diſtreſt.
His ear is open to the widow's cries,
His hand the orphan's cheek of ſorrow dries;
Like mercy's ſelf he looks on want with pity's eyes.

In this bleſt ſeaſon, pregnant with delight,
|| Ne may the boading owl with ſcreeches wound

Full lightly trip it, dapper Mab, around;
Full ‡ featly, Ob'ron, thou, o'er graſs-turf bound:
Mab bruſhes off no dew-drops, Ob'ron prints no ground.

§ Ne bloody rumours violate the ear,
Of city's ſack'd, and kingdoms deſolate,

Ne piteous tear from eye of ſorrow ſtart;
But plenty, pour thyſelf into the bowl
Of bounty-head; may never want controul
That good, good-honeſt man, who feeds the famiſh'd ſoul.

Now let the trumpet's martial thunders ſleep;
The viol wake alone, and tender flute:
The Phrygian lyre with ſprightly fingers ſweep,
And, Erato, diſſolve the Lydian lute.
Yet Clio frets, and burns, with honeſt pain,
To rouſe and animate the martial ſtrain, [plain.
While Britiſh banners flame o'er many a purpled

The trumpet ſleeps, but ſoon for thee ſhall wake,
Illuſtrious chief! to ſound thy mighty name,
(Snatch'd from the malice of Lethean lake)
Triumphant ſwelling from the mouth of fame.
Meanwhile, diſdain not (ſo the virgins pray)
This roſy crown, with myrtle wove and bay;
('Too humble crown I ween): the offering of May.

And while the virgins hail thee with their voice,
Heaping thy crowded way with greens and flow'rs,
And in the fondneſs of their heart rejoice
To ſooth, with dance and ſong, thy gentler hours;
Indulge the ſeaſon, and with ſweet repair
Embay thy limbs, the vernal beauties ſhare:
Then blaze in arms again, renew'd for future war

Britannia's happy iſle derives from May
The choiceſt bleſſings liberty beſtows:
When royal Charles (for ever hail the day)!
In mercy triumph'd o'er ignoble foes.
Reſtor'd with him, the arts the drooping head
Gaily again uprear'd; the muſes ſhade [array'd.
With freſher honours bloom'd, in greener trim

And thou, the goodlieſt bloſſom of our iſles!
Great Frederick's and his Auguſta's joy,
Thy native month approv'd with infant ſmiles,
Sweet as the ſmiling May, imperial boy!
Britannia hopes thee for her future lord,
Lov'd as thy parents, only not ador'd!
Whene'er a George is born, Charles is again reſtor'd.

O may his father's pant for finer fame,
And boundleſs bountyhead to humankind;
His grandſire's glory, and his uncle's name,
Renown'd in war! inflame his ardent mind:
So arts ſhall flouriſh 'neath his equal ſway,
So arms the hoſtile nations wide affray;
The laurel, victory; Apollo, wear the bay.

Through kind infuſion of celeſtial pow'r,
The dullard earth May quick'neth with delight:
Full ſuddenly the ſeeds of joy * recure
Elaſtic ſpring, and force within † empight.
If ſenſeleſs elements invigorate prove
By genial May and heavy matter move,
Shall ſhepherdeſſes ceaſe, ſhall ſhepherds fail to love?

Ye ſhepherdeſſes, in a goodly round,
Purpled with health, as in the greenwood ſhade,
Incontinent ye thump the echoing ground!
And ‡ deftly lead the dance along the glade;
(O may no ſhow'rs your merry-makes affray!)
Hail at the op'ning, at the cloſing day,
All hail, ye § bonnibels, to your own ſeaſon, May.

Nor ye abſent yourſelves, ye ſhepherd-ſwains,
But lend to dance and ſong the liberal May,
And while in jocund ranks you beat the plains,
Your flocks ſhall nibble and your lambkins play,
Friſking in glee. To May your girlands bring,
And ever and anon her praiſes ſing: [ring.
The woods ſhall echo May, with May the vallies

Your May-pole deck with flow'ry coronal;
Sprinkle the flow'ry coronal with wine;
And in the nimble-footed galliard, all,
Shepherds and ſhepherdeſſes, lively join.
Hither from village ſweet and Hamlet fair,
From bordering cot and diſtant ‖ glenne repair
Let youth indulge its ſport, to ¶ eld bequeath its care.

Ye wanton dryads and light-tripping fawns,
Ye jolly ſatyrs, full of  luſtyhead,
And ye that haunt the hills, the brooks, the lawns,
O come with rural chaplets gay diſpread:
With heel ſo nimble wear the ſpringing graſs,
To ſhrilling bagpipe, or to tinkling braſs;
Or foot it to the reed: Pan pipes himſelf apace.

In this ſoft ſeaſon, when creation ſmil'd,
A quivering ſplendor on the ocean hung,
And from the fruitful froth, his faireſt child,
The queen of bliſs and beauty, Venus ſprung.

* The Lemuria, or rites ſacred to the Lemures, were celebrated by the Romans in May. See Ovid, Faſt. l. 5. &c. They imagined the Lemures (in Engliſh, Fairies) to be like ghoſts of deceaſed perſons: but our traditional accounts are very different in reſpect to the nature of fairies. Shakſpeare's Midſummers Night's Dream, Drayton's Faery Tale and a celebrated Old Ballad, are maſter-pieces in their kind.

In honour of her natal-month the queen
Of bliss and beauty, consecrates her hours,
Fresh as her cheek, and as her brow serene,
To buxom ladies, and their paramours.
Love tips with golden alchemy his dart;

Here Venus revels, here maintains her court
In light festivity and gladsome game:
The young and gay, in frolic troops resort,
Without censure and without blame
In pleasure steep'd, and dancing in delight,
Night steals upon the day, the day on night:
Each knight, his lady loves; each lady loves her knight.

But did poor † Colin Clout o'er Rosalind prevail?

Howe'er that be; in ‡ Acidalian shade,
Embracing Julia, Ovid melts the day:
No dreams of banishment his loves invade;
Encircled in eternity of May.
Here Petrarch with his Laura, soft reclin'd
On violets, gives sorrow to the wind:
And Colin Clout pipes to the yielding Rosalind.

Pipe on, thou sweetest of th' Arcadian train,
That e'er with tuneful breath inform'd the quill:
Pipe on, of lovers the most loving swain!
Of bliss and melody O take thy fill.
Ne envy I, if dear Ianthe smile,
Though low my numbers, and though rude my style;
Ne quit for Acidale, fair Albion's happy isle.

Come then, Ianthe! milder than the spring,
And grateful as the rosy month of May,
O come; the birds the hymn of nature sing,
Inchanting wild, from every bush and spray:

* An old word for asserting any thing.

† Spenser.

‡ These three celebrated poets and lovers were all of them unhappy in their amours. Ovid was banished on account of his passion for Julia. Death deprived Petrarch of his beloved Laura very early; as he himself tells us in his account of his own life: These are his words, "Amore acerrimo, sed unico et honesto, in Adolescentia laboravi, et diutius laborassem, nisi jam tepescentem ignem mors acerba, sed utilis, extinxisset." See his works, Basil, Vol. Tom I. Yet others say, she married another person; which is scarce probable, since Petrarch lamented her death for ten years afterwards, as appears from Sonetto 313, with a most uncommon ardour of passion. Thomasinus in his curious book, called Petrarcha Redivivus, has given us two prints of Laura, with an account of her family, their loves, and his sweet retirement in Vaucluse. As for Spenser, we may conclude that his love for Rosalinda proved unsuccessful, from his pathetical complaints, in several of his poems, of her cruelty. The author, therefore thought it only a poetical kind of justice, to reward them in this imaginary retreat of lovers, for the misfortunes they really suffered here, on account of their passion.

Swell the green gems and teem along the vine,
A fragrant promiſe of the future wine,
The ſpirits to exalt, the genius to refine!

Let us our ſteps direct where Father Thames.
In ſilver windings draws his humid train,
And pours, where'er he rolls his naval ſtream,

Or chooſe you rather Theron's calm retreat,

And with ſweet herbs the liquid cryſtal ſtrew;

For on the liquid cryſtal gaily flew
A painted * gondelay, bedecked fair
With gold and purple, gorgeous to the view!
While loud approving ſhouts divide the air,
"Hail, happy future bride of Albion's worthy
"heir."

† Eſſoons the father of the ſilver flood,
The noble Thames, his azure head uprais'd,
And ſhook his dewy locks, worthy a God!
A lambent glory round his temples blaz'd,
On which the Naiads all with wonder gaz'd.
So ſparkle Thetis purple-trembling ſtreams,
When Phœbus, for his golden car yprais'd,
Strikes the calm ſurface with his morning beams,
And ſprinkles ſpangles round, and the wide blue inflames.

The wanton Naiads, Doris' daughters all,
Range in a ring: Pheruſa, blooming-fair,
Cymodoce dove-ey'd, with Florimal [hair,
Sweet-ſmelling flowrets deck'd their long green
And Erato, to love to Venus dear,
Galene dreſt in ſmiles and lily-white,
And Phao, with her ſnowy boſom bare,
All theſe, and more than theſe, a dainty ſight!
In daunce and merriment and ſweet ‡ belgards delight.

Around the bark they daunce, wherein their ſat
A lady freſh and fair, ah! ſuch a one,
So freſh and fair, ſo amiably great,
So goodly-gracious ſeem'd as never none.
And like thy ſweet-beam'd planet, Venus, ſhone.
They much admire, O very much her face,
Her ſhape, her breaſt, for love a downy throne!
Her beauty's glorious ſhine, her every grace;
An angel ſhe appear'd, at leaſt of angel race.

Her Thamis (on his golden urn he lean'd)
Saluted with this Hymeneal ſong,
And hail'd her ſafe. Full ſilent was the wind,
The river glided gently-ſoft along,
§ Ne whiſpered the breeze the leaves among,
Ne love-learn'd Philomel out-trill'd her lay;
A ſtillneſs on the waves attentive hung,
A brighter gladneſs bleſt the face of day,
All nature gan to ſmile, her ſmiles diffus'd the May.

"Ah ſacred ſhip, to Albion wafting gond,
Our wiſh, our hope, our joy! who ſafe convey'd
Through perilous ſea, from Ila's little flood,
This beauty's paragon, this royal maid,
Iſprung, iwiſt, of high empyreal ſeed;
The child of heaven, the daughter of delight,
Nurſt by a grace, with milk and honey fed!
Oh Frederick! oh, ‖ certes, bleſſed wight,
To whom the gods conſign the nymph Auguſta ¶

Ah ſacred ſhip! may favourable gales,
The kindeſt breath of heav'n attend thy way,
And ſwell the winged canvaſs of thy ſails:
May calmneſs be thy path, and pleaſaunce lay
On the ſoft boſom of the yielding ſea,
Where'er thou wind, or to the ſpicy ſhore
Of Araby the bleſt, or Indias bay,
Where diamonds kindle, and the golden ore
Flames into purity, to deck Auguſta more!

Auguſta, faireſt princeſs under ſky,
Welcome to Albion's renowned land,
Albion well known to thy great anceſtry,
Made dearer far to thee by Hymen's band,
The band of love, of honour and command!
Deign to receive the nation's public voice,
Of heartineſs unfeign'd, who gleeful ſtand
In meet array, and thus expreſs their joys
In peals of loud acclaim, and mirth's confuſed noiſe.

With warmer raptures, and more paſſionate,
Though hard to be! the Royal Youth, I trow
Shall thee embrace: him tenfold fires elate,
And ſacred paſſions in his boſom glow,
Which from thy picture erſt began to flow.
For thee he burns, for thee he ſighs and prays,
Pours out his ſoul to thee, nor reſt can know;
But dreams of thee long, livelong nights and days,
By beauty led through all love's roſy thorny ways.

To heal his pains ſoft muſic does divide
Moſt heavenly melody in ſoothing ſtrains;
Nor heavenly melody, nor aught beſide,
Save thee, ah deareſt dread can heal his pains;
Thy form too deeply in his breaſt remains.
So ever and anon he chides the gales,
That ſlowly ſeem to bruſh the liquid plains;
Oh! fly on all the wings of heav'n, ye ſails,
Oh fly! he cries; and lo! a lover's pray'r prevails

Now ceaſe thy ſighs. She comes, (oh bleſſed day)!
She comes, by all the loves and graces dreſt,
In proud humility - See, Hymen play,
With ſaffron robe and flame embroider'd veſt,
(Such colours * ſikerly ſuit Hymen beſt)
And Cupid catches roſy wafts of air
To ſtretch the ſails and fan the royal gueſt.
Nor chaſtity, meek ey'd, is wanting there,
For ſhe, and modeſty, ſweet bluſhing, guide the ſteer.

Not Venus, queen of beauty and of bliſs
So goodly ſhone, when * erſt the goddeſs ſprung
From ocean's ſparkling foam, ſweet nakedneſs!
A thouſand ſmiles and loves upon her hung,
And all the gods for joy and wonder ſung.
The waves ſo proud the beamy burden bore
Exulting, ſhe, around her odours flung,
And bade the billows laugh and ceaſe to roar;
They gladly her obey, and gently kiſs the ſhore.

So fair ſhe looks, nay fairer could it be;
Did never mortal man ſuch charms behold
In bow'r or hall Spring waits upon her eye;
Lo! Flora has her richeſt ſtores out-roll'd
Of variable flow'rs and blooming gold.

So Phœbus, luſty bridegroom of the ſky,
With native ſplendours ſhine on every part;

Here Themis ended. Now the goodly train
Of all the Naiads, in moſt comely wiſe,
A preſent make of myrtle-girland green,
Entrail'd with flow'rets and with rare device.
The graces eke, with laughter-ſwelling eyes,
A roſy chaplet, ſteep'd in nectar bring,
(The roſes gather'd in the morning ſkies)
Then, joining with the Naiads, form a ring,
And round them deftly daunce, and round them blithely ſing.

"As roſes and as myrtles kindly weave
Their ſweets in one, much ſweeter as they blend;
Emblem of marriage-love! So you receive
Sweets interchang'd, and to each other lend;
Then, in a bleſt perfume to heav'n, aſcend,
And mingle with the gods! While here below,
New myrtles, roſes new, withouten end,
From your luxurious ſtock, full plenteous grow,
And with their parent-ſweets, and parent beauty glow."

Next Albion's genius came, bedite in gold,
An oaken chaplet nodded on his head;
The crown he held was glorious to behold,
And royally he taught his feet to tread.
Soon as he ſpy'd the prince's goodlihead,
He pointed to the crown, and rais'd his voice
To hail the royal pair and bleſs their bed;

Echo the woods and vales, and heav'n and earth rejoice.

Next liberty, the faireſt nymph on ground;
The flowing plenty of her golden hair
Diffuſing laviſhly ambroſia round;
Her hands a flow'ry cornucopia bear,

Sweet to the earth, and fragrant to the ſky!
Her mantle of a many-colour'd hue,
Her rainbow-wings powder'd with many an eye,
And near her honour, pow'r, and courteſy:

Now teach the melancholy lute
In tender trills to melt the notes away,
Melodious in decay!—
But hark, ſhe louder, louder ſings,
Sink, boldly ſink into the ſtreams:

Fire the blood, the ſpirits fire
With muſical thunder and burning deſire!

AIR II.

Our ſouls divided with a fond ſurpriſe!
Diſſolve in woe;
With rapture glow;
Fall with her notes; or with her boſom riſe;
Rais'd with hopes; with fears depreſt;
Sweetly tortur'd ſweetly bleſt;
Sav'd by her voice, and vanquiſh'd by her eyes,

The raptures of a wond'ring deity!

AIR III.

Beauty, ſacred beauty ſing,
Flowing from the wond'rous ſpring
Of uncreated and primeval light!
Beauty, ſacred beauty ſing,
Spoke into being in his high abode,
And next his own eternal eſſence bright!

AIR IV.

With beauty muſic join,
The breath of heav'n
To mortals given
To ſwell their bliſs to bliſs divine!
With beauty muſic join.

CHORUS.

Beauty, ſilent harmony!
Softly ſtealing through the eye
Smiles into the breaſt a dart.
Muſic, fine-proportion'd ſounds!
Pours balm upon the lover's wounds
Through the ear into the heart.

RECITATIVE.

Thus once Cecilia (tuneful Dryden ſings),
To fire with ſacred rage her ſoul,
Touch'd into voice the ſprightly ſtrings,
And bade the ſilver tides of muſic roll,
An angel, liſt'ning to her lyre,
To lift the modulations higher,
Apply'd the aiding graces of his tongue;
And while the virgin play'd, the ſeraph ſung.

AIR V.

Sweeteſt mortal, to befriend thee,
Angels from their quires attend thee,
Angels leave their thrones to hear
Muſic with devotion glowing,
Muſic heavenly joys beſtowing,
Worthy a ſeraphic ear!

RECITATIVE.

Again ſhe trembles o'er the ſilver ſtrings,
The ſilver ſtrings, exulting to her hand,
Obey the ſweet command,
And thus again the angel ſings.
(While ſilence wav'd her downy wings around,
And gladneſs ſmil'd along the purple ſkies;
All nature ſoft'ned at their flows of ſound,
And bright'ned at the radiance of their eyes.)

AIR VI.

Harmony, the ſoul refining!
Beauty, ſenſe, and virtue, joining
In a form and mind like thine,
Nobly raiſe a mortal creature
To a more exalted nature;
We alone are more divine!

RECITATIVE.

Rapt'rous thus the angel ſung,
Manna melting from his tongue,
Attemper'd to Cecilia's golden lyre:
The blended pow'rs of harmony
Trembled up the willing ſky,
And mingled with the ſeraph's flaming quire.

CHORUS.

How ſweet the muſic, how divine,
When heaven and earth in conſort join!
O ſweet the muſic! O divine!

AIR VII.

Skill'd the ſofteſt notes to ſing,
Skill'd to wake the ſweeteſt ſtring,
Dear Ianthe both ſupplies:
Thee, Cecilia, thee we find
In her form and in her mind,
The angel in her voice and eyes!

CHORUS.

Happy, O beyond expreſſing!
He who taſtes th' immortal bleſſing
Dear Ianthe may beſtow!
Beauty, in its pride, poſſeſſing,
Ever loving and careſſing,
Muſic moving,
Bliſs improving!—
He'll enjoy a heav'n below!
Happy he, beyond expreſſing!

THE DESPAIRING MAIDEN.

WITHIN an unfrequented grove,
As late I laid alone,
A tender maid in deep diſtreſs,
At diſtance, made her moan.

She cropt the blue-ey'd violet,
Bedew'd with many a tear;
And ever and anon her ſighs
Stole ſadly on my ear.

" Ah faithleſs man! how could he leave
So fond and true a maid?
Can ſo much innocence and truth
Deſerve to be betray'd?

Alas, my mother! (if the dead
Can hear their children groan)
What ills your helpleſs orphan feels,
To ſorrow left alone.

To ſorrow left by him I lov'd;
Ah perjur'd and ingrate!—
Ye virgins, learn the wiles of men,
And learn to ſhun my fate.

For whom do I theſe flourets crop,
For whom this chaplet twine?
Say, ſhall they glow on Damon's brow,
Or fade away on mine?

But he the blooming wreath will ſcorn,
Who ſcorn'd my virgin-bloom:
And me—alas! they ſuit not me,
Unleſs to deck my tomb.

How oft the dear perfidious youth
Invok'd each pow'r above!
How oft he languiſh'd at my feet,
And vow'd eternal love!

How ſweet the minutes danc'd away,
All melted in delight!
With him each ſummer-day was ſhort,
And ſhort each winter-night.

'Twas more than bliſs I felt:—and now
Alas! 'tis more than pain.—
Ye ſoft, ye roſy hours of love,
Return—return again.

Ah no!—Let blackneſs ſhade the night,
When firſt he breath'd his vows:
The ſcene of pleaſure then—but, ah!
The ſource of all my woes.

How could I think ſo ſweet a tongue
Could e'er conſent to lie?—
'Twas eaſy to deceive a maid
So ſoft and young as I.

And yet he lays the fault on me
(Where none could e'er be laid,
Unleſs my loving him too well),
And calls me perjur'd maid.

The nymphs, who envious ſaw my charms,
Rejoice to ſee my woe,
And taunting cry, " why did you leave
The youth that lov'd you ſo?"

But oh, believe me, lovely youth,
Far dearer than my eye,
I love you ſtill, and ſtill will love,
Till oh, for you, I die!

Ev'n though you hate, I doat to death;
My death my truth ſhall prove.
My lateſt pray'rs are pray'rs for you,
And ſighs are ſighs of love."

She ceas'd:—(while pity from the clouds
Diſſolv'd in ſilent ſhow'rs:—)
Then faintly " Damon!" cry'd:—and breath'd
Her ſoul amid the flow'rs.

CORESUS AND CALLIRHOE; A TALE.

Veteres Renovamus Amores. CATULLUS.

ADVERTISEMENT.

THE following tale is related by Pauſanias, in Achaicis, Græciæ, Lib. 7.; but inſtead of giving the original, or the Latin verſion by Romulus Amaſæus (both which the learned reader may find in the edition publiſhed by Joach. Kuhnius in fol. Lipſiæ, 1696, p. 575.), I ſhall content myſelf with the tranſlation of the ſtory into Engliſh, as it is done from the Greek in the learned and ingenious travels of Sir G. Wheler: which book, upon many accounts, deſerves to be reprinted, and made more common.

" Coreſus, the prieſt of Bacchus, fell in love with a fair virgin of Calydon, called Callirhoe; who, the more ſhe was courted, the more ſhe deſpiſed the prieſt; ſo that neither his rich preſents, vows, nor tears, could move her to the leaſt compaſſion. This, at laſt, made the prieſt run in deſpair to the image of Bacchus for ſuccour, imploring vengeance from him. Bacchus made it appear that he heard his prayers, by a diſeaſe he ſent on the town; which ſeemed a kind of drunken madneſs; of which mad fit people died in abundance. Whereupon they ſent deputies from Calydon to the oracle of Jupiter of Dodona, to know what they ſhould do to be freed from that woeful malady. Anſwer was given, that Coreſus muſt ſacrifice Callirhoe, or ſome other perſon, that would dedicate himſelf in her ſtead, to appeaſe the anger of Bacchus. The virgin, when ſhe could no way obtain her life of her relations, was brought to the altar, adorned as victims uſed to be, to be ſacrificed by her lover Coreſus: Whoſe wonderful love, even at that preſent, ſo conquered all paſt thoughts of revenge, that inſtead of her he ſlew himſelf: The virgin alſo, relenting of her cruelty to him, went and ſlew herſelf at a fountain near the town; from thence called by her name, Callirhoe."

Thus far Sir George Wheler. See his Journey into Greece, fol. book 4th, p. 292.
I ſhall only add, that the ancient cuſtoms, particularly of the Orgia. or Rites of Bacchus, and of the ſacrifice, are alluded to, and carefully obſerved, in the ſeveral parts of this little poem.

High in Achaia, ſplendid from afar,
A city flouriſh'd; Calydon its name,
Waſh'd by Evenus' chalky flood; the ſeat
Of Meleager, from the ſlaughter'd boar
Glorious. A virgin here, amazing, ſhone,
Callirhoe the fair: her father's boaſt!
For, ah! ſhe never knew a mother's ſmile;
Nor learn'd what happineſs from marriage ſprings.
In flow'r of youth, and purer than the ſnow,
Which, with a ſilver circle, crown'd the head
Of the ſteep neighbour mountain; but averſe
To Hymen's rites, the lovely foe of man.
O why will beauty, cruel to itſelf,
No leſs than others, violate the laws
Which nature dictates, and itſelf inſpires!
A thouſand lovers from th' Olenian hill,
From rough Pylene, and from Pleuron's tow'rs,
Their paſſion pleaded. But Coreſus, chief,
The Calydonian prieſt of Bacchus, form'd
By Venus' ſelf for love; in beauty's pride;
Young, bounteous, affable. What tender arts,
What winning carriage, and reſpectful ſuit,
Almoſt to zealous adoration ſwell'd,
Did he not practiſe? But in vain. And now
Drew near the Orgial feſtival, and rites
Lyæan. Poor Coreſus, to approve
The wonders of his love and dear regard,
By ſcorn unquench'd, and growing by neglect
(In hopes to ſoften her, at leaſt adorn),
Preſented to this murdreſs of his peace
The ritual ornaments, by virgins worn
Upon the ſolemn feaſt. The ivy ſpear,
With winding green, and viny foliage gay,
Curl'd by his hand: a mitre for his head,
Curious aumail'd with imitated grapes,
Of bluſhing rubies form'd: the pall of lawn,
Flower'd with the conqueſts of the purple god:
The ciſta, ſilver; and the cymbals, gold:
And piny torch (O were it Hymen's) ting'd
With ſpicy gums, to feed the ready flame.
Open'd the feſtival---looſe to the winds,
Diſhevell'd, bare, the virgins give their necks
And wanton hair. Evœ! they mad'ning cry,
And ſhake their torches. Evœ! Io! rends
The air, and beats the echoing vault of heav'n.
The hills, the vales with Io Evœ! ring.
The temple opens to the ſacred throng;
When foremoſt enters, as in dreſs and charms,
Callirhoe, ſo in ſpeed. Their lovers wait,
With burning expectation, to enfold
His beauteous miſtreſs each. High on a throne
Coreſus blaz'd in jewels and in gold,
More charming in himſelf. Quick with his eye
He catch'd Callirhoe, and, deſcending, claſp'd
With eager tranſport her reluctant waiſt.
A thouſand vows he breath'd, and melting things
He ſpoke and look'd; but to the rocks and wind.
What cou'd he more? yes more he did: for what,
What can't a lover, like Coreſus, do?
Neglectful of his dignity he ſunk
(Still love diſdains what dignity demands,
O'er Jupiter himſelf ſupreme) he ſunk,
And trembled at her feet, with proſtrate zeal,
As to his God. He dy'd upon her hand
With ſighing languiſhment: he gaz'd his ſoul
At every ardent glance into her eyes;
Moſt eloquently ſilent! o'er his cheek
The guſhing tears, in big, round drops, diffus'd
The dews of paſſion, and the brain's ſoft ſhow'r,
Potent to warm the moſt obdurate breaſt,
Though cold as marble. Idle were his tears,
His glances, languiſhment, and proſtrate zeal.
Diſdainful---frowning: "Hence, (ſhe cry'd)
nor dare
To interrupt my progreſs in the rites
With thy capricious rudeneſs. Shall the prieſt
The myſteries of Bacchus thus profane,
In his own temple too? and rather pay
To Venus his devotion, than his God?"
Then, haughty as away ſhe turn'd, he graſp'd
Her knees; upon her garments flowing train
Shivering he hung: and with beſeeching eyes,
Thus, from th' abundance of his heart, complain'd.
"If pity be no ſtranger to thy breaſt,
(As ſure it ſhould not to a breaſt like thine,
Soft as the ſwanny down!) relenting, hear;
In feelingneſs of ſpirit, mildly lend
Attention to the language of my heart,
Sick with o'erflowing tenderneſs and love.
I love thee with that innocence of truth,
That purity of paſſion, and deſire
Unutterable, of bequeathing up
My heart, my life, my all into thy hands,
Into thy gentle cuſtody,---that all,
My heart, my life, are bitterneſs and weight
Of agony without thee. Since I firſt,
(By Bacchus' ſelf I ſwear), beheld that face,
And nameleſs magic of thoſe radiant eyes,
All the foundation of my peace gave way:
While hopes and fears roſe up in boſom-war
To deſolate the quiet of my days.
Thy dear idea was my fancy's dream;
It mingled with my blood; and in my veins
Throbb'd, undulating, as my life were ſtung.
I live but on the thought of thee; my breaſt
Bleeds in me, with diſtreſs to ſee thee frown.
O ſmile! by thy dead mother's reverend duſt,
By all thy bowels are moſt fond of, ſmile,
And chaſe theſe heavy clouds of grief away.
I beg by Bacchus; for his ſake be kind."
Here, interrupted by the ſwelling ſtorm
Of paſſion labouring in his breaſt, his words
Gave way for ſighs and tears to ſpeak the reſt.
She, in contempt'ous deriſion, ſmil'd,
To which her frowns were innocent: and thus:
"Thy ſtaggering pow'r, and thee I ſcorn alike;
Him I deſpiſe, for chooſing thee his prieſt;
Thee, for thy arrogance, and courtſhip vile."
Indignant he, in wrathful mood (alarm'd
More at his God revil'd, than ſcorn for him)
Firſt calling on the ground his mitred-crown,
With hands and eyes uplifted, ardent, pray'd.

" Offspring of Jove, Evœ Lyæus, hear!
If e'er theſe hands with ivy wreaths thy brow
Circled, and twining tendrils of the vine:
If e'er my grateful tongue, big with thy praiſe,
Evœ, Lyæus Io Bacchus ſung:
If e'er thy ſervant on thy altars pour'd,
Copious, the purple wave of offer'd wine,
And, buſy, fed the conſecrated fire
With fat of aſs, or hog, or mountain goat;
Devoutly laviſh in the ſacrifice:
Avenge thy prieſt: this curſed race deſtroy:
Thy honours violated thus, avow;
Till they confeſs this ſtaggering pow'r a God."
He pray'd.—Loud peals of thunder ſhook the fane:
The image, nodding, his petition ſeal'd;
And Bacchus gave the Caledonian race
To madneſs, and unutterable woes.
The frantic crowd, as if with wine poſſeſt,
And the ſtrong ſpirit of the flamiug grape,
To and fro' reel, and ſtagger to and fro',
In dithyrambic meaſures, wild, convolv'd.
They toſs their cymbals, and their torches ſhake,
Shrieking, and tear their hair, and gaſh their fleſh,
And howl, and foam, and wheel the rapid dance
In giddy maze: with fury then o'erborn,
Enthuſiaſtic, whirling in deſpair,
Flat, drop down dead; and heaps on heaps expire.
Amaz'd confounded at the raging peſt,
The venerable fathers, in debate,
To ſpeed inquiring deputies, reſolv'd,
To high Dodona's grove; with vocal oaks
Umbrageous, aged, vaſt, the ſtruggling day
Excluding: the prime oracle of Greece!
Obſequious, they haſte: inquire: return:
And thus the counſels of the god diſcloſe.
" The rage of Bacchus for his injur'd prieſt,
Coreſus, by Callirhoe's ſcorn repuls'd,
Your city waſtes: and with funereal fires
Your ſtreets ſhall redden, formidably bright,
Till by Coreſus' hand the cruel maid
A ſacrifice be offer'd up: or one,
Free, uncompell'd, embrace the deſtin'd ſteel,
Devoted in her ſtead; and bleed for her.
So you'll appeaſe the God; the plague be ſtay'd."
They ſaid. Staring affright, and dumb amaze
The fathers ſeize: but chief, Æneùs, thee,
Callirhoe's old miſerable ſire!
Tenfold affliction to the grave weighs down
Thy ſilver'd hairs. But fate and heav'n require.
Soon through the city ſpread the news, and ſoon
Wounded Callirhoe's ear. Her ſpindle drops
Neglected from her hand. Prone on the floor,
She falls, ſhe faints; her breath, her colour fled:
Pale, cold and pale. Till, by aſſiſting care,
The fragrant ſpirit hovers o'er her lips,
And life returning ſtreams in roſy gales;
Rekindled only to deſpair. She knew
The virgins envy'd; and the injur'd youth
Stung with her ſcorn, wou'd wanton in her wounds,
Nor one, one offer up the willing breaſt
A victim for her life. And now the crowd,
Impatient of their miſeries, beſiege
The marble portal; burſt the bolted gates;
Demand Callirhoe; furious to obey
The oracle, and pacify the god.
What pangs, unhappy maid, thy boſom tear,
Sleepleſs, and ſad? relenting now too late,
Thy ſtubborn cruelty. Coreſus' charms
Blaze on thy mind; his unexampled love,
His every virtue riſing to thy thought.
Juſt in his fury, ſee the pointed ſteel
Waves, circling o'er thy throbbing breaſt: He ſtrikes;
He riots in thy blood with dire delight;
Inſatiate! He gluts his heart of rage
With thy warm guſhing life; and death enjoys,
Redoubling wound on wound, and blow on blow.
Thus paſs'd her hours. And now the dewy morn
The mountains tip'd with gold, and threaten'd day.
Without the city gates, a fountain wells
Its living waters, clear as ſhining glaſs:
Haunt of the nymphs! A cypreſs' aged arms
Threw round a venerable gloom, and ſeem'd
Itſelf a grove. An altar on the brink
Convenient roſe: for holy cuſtom wills
Each victim to be ſprinkled with its ſtreams,
New from pollution, worthier of the god.
Fierce for the ſacrifice Coreſus here
Waited; and, ſtimulated with revenge,
He curs'd and chid the lazy-circling hours
Too ſlow, as if injurious to his hate.
But ſoon the gath'ring crowd and ſhouts proclaim
Callirhoe near. Her weeping damſels lead
The deſtin'd offering, lovely in diſtreſs,
And ſparkling through her tears. A myrtle crown
With roſes glowing, and ſelected green,
Th' ambroſial plenty of her golden hair
Entwine: in looks, a Venus; and a Grace
In motion. Scarce the flow'rs of ſixteen ſprings
The fields had painted, ſince Æneùs firſt
Fondled his babe, and bleſt her on his knee.
Ev'n mountain clowns, who never pity knew,
Relented, and the hardeſt heart wept blood,
Subdu'd by beauty, though the fatal ſource
Of all their miſery. What tumults then
Roll in thy breaſt, Coreſus! while thy hands
The purifying waters on her head
Pour'd trembling, and the ſacred knife unſheath'd!
Wiping the ſilver-ſtreaming tears away,
She with a look nor cheerful, nor diſmay'd,
But languiſhingly ſweet, her ruby lips
Soft op'ning, thus began: " Father and friends,
Wound me not doubly with your tender grief:
I was not born alone for you. My life
I gladly offer for my country's weal:
'Tis glory thus to die Receive my blood,
Dear native ſoil! O may it health reſtore
And peace; and Bacchus' wrath be now appeas'd!
And thou, Coreſus, whom I moſt have wrong'd,
Look not ſo fiercely on me, while the ſteel
My once-lov'd boſom lances; drop a tear;
One ſigh in mercy heave, and drop one tear,
And I will thank thee for thy blow. For oh,
I never hated thee! but female pride,
Our ſex's curſe! forbade me to comply;
Too eaſy won!—Then pity me, Coreſus;
O pity, and, if poſſible, forgive!"

He anſwer'd not: but, ardent, ſnatch'd the knife,
And running o'er her beauties, ſtrangely wild,
With eyes which witneſs'd huge diſmay and love,
"Thus, thus I ſatisfy the gods!" he cry'd,
And bury'd in his heart, in his own heart,
The guilty blade. Then, reeling to her arms,
He ſunk and groaning, "O Callirhoe!"—dy'd.
Heav'n rings with ſhouts, "Was ever love like this?"
Callirhoe ſhriek'd; and from the gaping wound,
Quick as the lightning's wing, the reeking knife
Wrench'd. In an agony of grief and love,
Her boſom piercing, on his boſom fell,
And ſigh'd upon his lips her life away.
Their blood uniting in a friendly ſtream,
With bubbling purple ſtain'd the ſilver flood,
Which to the fountain gave Callirhoe's name.

THE DESPAIRING LOVER.

When gloomy November, to nature unkind,
Both ſaddens the ſkies, and oppreſſes the mind,
By beauty undone, a diſconſolate ſwain
Thus ſigh'd his deſpair to the winds and the rain.

"In vain the wind blows, and in vain the rains beat,
They fan but my flame, without quenching the heat
For ſo fierce is the paſſion which Stella inſpires,
Not the ocean itſelf could extinguiſh its fires.

Why gaz'd ye, my eyes, with ſuch aching delight,
'Till paradiſe open'd and ſwam in my ſight:
Yes, paradiſe open'd, and, oh! to my coſt,
The ſerpent I found, but the paradiſe loſt.

Heav'n knows with what fondneſs her heart I addreſt,
What paſſionate tenderneſs bled in my breaſt:
Yet ſo far was my truth from engaging belief,
That ſhe frown'd at my vows, though ſhe ſmil'd at my grief.

Sure never was love ſo ill-fated as mine; reſign?—
If a friend ſhall demand her, what, muſt I re-
Yes, yes, O reſign her, be bravely diſtreſt;
And though I die unhappy, yet—may he be bleſt!

And how bleſt muſt he be?—O to live on her charms.— arms!—
At her wit while he wonders to ſink in her
But yet, O my ſoul, to his friendſhip be juſt:
Let him live on her charms;—I'll go down to the duſt.

To the chambers of darkneſs I gladly will go,
For the light without her is the colour of woe:
Come, death, then relieve me, my life I reſign,
Since the arrows of love are leſs friendly than thine.

Ye virgins of Iſis, the fair and the young,
Whoſe praiſes ſo often have ſweet'ned my tongue,
In pity, when of my ſad fate you ſhall hear,
Oh, honour my grave with a roſe and a tear!

Perhaps the dear beautiful cauſe of my doom
May ſteal, by the ſtar-light, and viſit my tomb:
My ghoſt, if one ſigh ſhall but heave in her breaſt,
Though reſtleſs without it, contented will reſt.

TO THE AUTHOR OF LEONIDAS: A POEM.

AN EPISTLE.

Warm'd with thy verſe, which liberty inſpires,
Which nature forms, and ſacred reaſon fires,
I pour a tributary lay. Receive
The honeſt praiſe a friend may dare to give.
Moſt of our poets chooſe their early theme
A flow'ry meadow, or a purling ſtream.
Thy genius took a flight above the groves,
The pipe neglected, and the rural loves;
To godlike Newton's praiſes ſwell'd thy lyre,
Play'd with the light, and graſp'd etherial fire.
So the young lyric-lark, on trembling wings,
O'er meadows warbles, and to ſhepherds ſings;
The youthful eagle, born to nobler ſway,
Enjoys the ſun, and boldly faces day.
Next brave Leonidas, with virtue warm'd,
The child of heav'n and thee! our wonder charm'd:
Our wonder and our ſilence beſt can tell
How much he lov'd his Greece, how great he fell.
His arm how dreadful, how compos'd his mien!
Fierce as a god, and as a god ſerene.
Horrid with gold, and formidably bright,
He lightens and he thunders through the fight;
With bleeding hills he heaps the groaning plain,
And crimſon torrents mingle with the main.
At laſt, collecting all his patriot-fires,
In the full blaze of liberty expires.
If bleſt immortals bend their thoughts below,
(And verſe like thine may lift'ning angels draw),
What new felt raptures through the hero roll,
To find his deeds immortal as his ſoul!
To ſhine above each patriot's honour'd name,
Thron'd in thy verſe, the temple of his fame!
Rich as the pillars which ſupport the ſkies,
And bright with wit as heav'n with ſtarry dyes:
As virtue, firm; as liberty, ſublime;
A monument to mock the rage of time.
Did Homer, ſay, thy glowing breaſt inſpire
To ſing the Spartan with Athenian fire?
Or Homer's ſelf revives again in thee:
For Grecian chiefs and Grecian wit I ſee.
His mighty ſpirit all thy genius guides,
And o'er thy boſom roll his golden tides.
Bleſt is thy fancy, which durſt firſt deſpiſe
Gods in machines, and bullies from the ſkies.
Nor Arioſto's fables fill thy page,
Nor Taſſo's points, but Virgil's ſober rage.
Pure-temper'd fires an equal light maintain,
To warm the reaſon, not to ſcorch the brain.
How ſoft, how ſtrong, thy varied numbers move,
Or ſwell'd to glory, or diſſolv'd to love.
Correct with eaſe, where all the Graces meet,
Nervouſly plain, majeſtically ſweet.
The muſes well thy ſacrifice repay,
Attendant warbling in each heavenly lay!
When Ariana graſps th' abhorred dart,
Each lover bleeds, and feels it in his heart.
Ah faithful pair! by miſery improv'd:
Who would not die to love as you have lov'd?
Like Teribazus gladly I could die,
To draw one tear from dear Ianthe's eye.

One sigh of hers would recompence my breath,
Would sweeten pain, and sanctify my death.
O might I, while her eyes inflict the wound,
Or her soft lute dissolves a plaintive sound,
Might I, while she inhales my lateſt breath,
Sink from her arms into the arms of death!
Then rise (so pure a wish may be forgiven),
O sweet transition, from her breast to heav'n!
Forgive this fond excursion of my woe;
Forgive these tears, that will, rebellious, flow;
Forgive these sighs, that will, unbidden, rise,
Till death for ever close her from my eyes.
But thou, bleſt youth, may thou for ever know
The chaste endearment, and paternal glow:
The still, the sacred, the melodious hour,
The morning closet, and the ev'ning bow'r.
There, when thy muse shall let her eagle fly,
And nobly lift a mortal to the sky,
When all th' inspiring god dilates thy soul,
And quick ideas kindle as they roll,
Let British valour thy brave care engage,
With British valour fire the glorious page.
Bid Henry's honours in thy poem glow,
On Edward's immortality bestow.
Let Agincourt, let Cressy's well-fought plain
Run purple in thy lines and bleed again;
Britannia then, no more her sons shall mourn,
Extinct, forgotten in the silent urn:
Borne on the wings of verse their names shall rise,
Dear to the earth and grateful to the skies.
Hail, poetry! whose life infusing lays
Bid time roll back, and sleeping atoms raise;
Dust into being wake, expand the tomb,
Dead glory quicken, and restore lost bloom:
As God, from mortals heighten to divine,
And give us through eternity to shine!
Glover! thy mind, in various virtue wise,
Each science claims, and makes each art thy prize.
With Newton soars, familiar to the sky,
Looks nature through, so keen thy mental eye,
Or down descending on the globe below,
Through humbler realms of knowledge loves to flow.
Promiscuous beauties dignify thy breast,
By nature happy, as by study bleſt,
Thou, wit's Columbus! from the epic throne
New worlds descry'd, and made them all our own:
Thou first through real nature dar'd explore,
And waft her sacred treasures to our shore.
The merchant thus, by heav'nly wisdom led (Each kingdom noted, and each law survey'd),
On Britain pours whate'er can serve mankind,
Adorn the body, or delight the mind.
Spices which blow'd in Araby the bleſt,
And breath'd a paradise around the east.
Unclouded sapphires show their azure sky,
Em'ralds with smiling green refresh the eye:
Here bleeds the ruby, diamonds sparkle there,
To tremble on the bosoms of our fair
Yet should the sun with tenfold lustre shine,
Exalt with deeper dyes the flaming mine,
Should softer breezes and more genial skies
Bid sweeter spice, in blooming order, rise,
Nor gems, nor spice, could nature know to name,
Bright as thy wit, or fragrant as thy fame.

THE NATIVITY.

A COLLEGE-EXERCISE. 1736.

'Twas morn! the fields were sprinkled o'er with light,
The folds unpent sent out their flocks to feed:
A shepherd boy (young Thomalin he * hight),
With flying fingers deftly tun'd his reed;
Where ancient Isis laves the muses' mead
(Forever smile the mead and flow the stream)!
He sung the birth of David's holy seed:
Though low his voice, full lofty was his theme;
† Wightly his senses all were rapt into a dream.

‡ Esrsoons he spy'd a grove, the season's pride,
All in the centre of a pleasant glade,
Where nature flourish'd like a virgin-bride;
Mantled with green, with hyacinths inlay'd,
And crystal rills o'er beds of lilies stray'd;
The blue-ey'd violet and king-cup gay,
And new blown roses, smiling sweetly red,
Outglow'd the blushing infancy of day,
While amorous west winds kist their fragrant souls away.

A rich pavilion rear'd within its height,
The capitals and freezes gold entire,
Glist'ning with carbuncles; a various light
Wav'd tremulous, and set the eye on fire.
A silken curtain, drawn on silver wire,
And ting'd with colours of the summer sky,
Flow'd round, and bade the ruder gales retire.
Four forms attendant at the portals lie,
The same Ezekiel saw with keen prophetic eye.

Unlike, O much unlike the strawy shed,
Where Mary, queen of Heaven, in humbleſs § lay,
Where ‖ erst the infant God repos'd his head,
And deign'd to dwell in tenement of clay;
The clouded tabernacle of the day!
The shepherd's dream was mystical, ¶ I ween,
Isaiah on his bosom pour'd a ray,
And painted to his eyes the gentle scene,
Where lions dandled lambs; O peace, thy golden reign!

High smiling in delight a lady sate.
Young as the dawning morn, on iv'ry throne;
Upon her looks the virgin-virtues wait,
The virgin-virtues wait on her alone!
Her sapphire eyes with gentle spirit shone:
Fair bountyhead was open'd in her face,
Of honour and of love the  paragon!
A sweet regard and most auspicious grace
Bespoke her lineage high: She was of David's race.

Upon her lap a lovely infant lay,
And ken'd the mother by her smiling grace.
His looks were radiant as the bloom of day,
And angel sweetness purpled in his face.

Oh! how the mother did the babe embrace
With tender blandiſhment and fondling care!

His cheeks, as roſes red, as lilies fair, [heir!
The holy day-ſpring hight, heav'ns everlaſting

Near him a goodly pers'nage mildly ſhone,
With looks of love, and ſhedding peace and joy:
Her looks were love, ſoft-ſtreaming from the throne
Of grace, and ſweetly melted on the boy: [cloy.
Her tongue dropp'd honey, which wou'd never
Mercy † yclep'd. All nature on her hung,

Young laughing angels "mercy, mercy," ſung;
Heav'n echo'd "mercy" back, the ſpheres with "mercy" rung.

Ten thouſand angels, fluttering in a band,

Now dulcet ſymphonies, and voices meet,
Mellifluous ſtole upon the ſhepherd's ear,

As they a train of goddeſſes had been,

Faith led the van, her mantle dipt in blue,
Steady her ken, and gaining on the ſkies;
Obedient miracles around her flew:
She pray'd, and heav'n burſt open on her eyes,
And golden valves roll'd back in wondrous wiſe:
And now ſome hill, with all its ſhaggy load
Of trees and flocks, unto the ocean  hies:
Now wings of cherubs, flaming all abroad,
Careering on the winds in ſight upbear their God.

Next hope, the gayeſt daughter of the ſky!
Her nectar-dewed locks with roſes bound;
An Eden flouriſh'd where ſhe caſt her eye,
And flocks of ſports and joys their temples crown'd,
Plum'd their bright wings, and thump'd the hollow ground.
Grief gladden'd, and forgot to drop a tear
At her approach; ne ſorrow * mote be found,

Then charity full zon'd, as her beſeems,
Her breaſts were ſofter ivory, her hair

And floated wanton on the buxom air;
As mercy kind, as hope divinely fair.
Her ſoul was flame, and with prolific rays
The nations warm'd, all bright withouten glare.
Both men and angels, as ſhe paſſes, gaze,
But chief the poor, the lame, the blind, the naked, praiſe.

The train of virtues next, a dainty train!
Advance their ſteps, ſweet daughters of delight,
Awfully ſweet majeſtically plain
Celeſtial love, as ey'n of ſeraphs bright,
And ſpotleſs as their robes of new-ſpun light.
Truth, ſimple as the loveſick village maid;
Health-blooming temperance, a comely ‡ wight;
Humility, in homely weeds array'd,
And by her, in a line, an aſſes colt ſhe led.

But hark, the jolly pipe, and rural lay!
And ſee, the ſhepherd clad in mantle blue,
And ſhepherdeſs in ruſſet kirtle gay,
Come dancing on the ſhepherd-lord to view,
And pay, in decent wiſe, obeyſance due.
Sweet ſmelling flow'rs the gentle votaries bring,
Primroſes, violets, wet with morning dew,
The ſweeteſt incenſe of the early ſpring;
A humble, yet ſweet, a grateful offering.

Jocund to lead the way, with ſparkling rays,
Danc'd a ſtar-errant up the orient ſky;
The new-born ſplendour ſtreaming o'er the place,
Where Jeſus lay in bright humility,

Then ope the veſes and preſent their ſtore,
Gold, frankincenſe, and myrrh; what could they more!
For gold and myrrh a dying king †† divine;
The frankincenſe, from Arab's ſpicy ſhore,

And laſt, triumphant on a purple cloud,
Fleecy with gold, a band of angels ride:
They boldly ſweep their lyres, and, hymning loud,
The richeſt notes of harmony divide;
Scarce Thomalin the rapture could abide:
And ever and anon the babe they eye,

THE BOWER.

Blow, blow, thou ſummer breeze,
O gently fan the trees,
That form yon fragrant bow'r;
Where Sylvia, loveliеſt maid!
On nature'e carpet laid,
Enjoys the ev'ning hour.

Hence, hence, ye objects foul,
The beetle bat, and owl,
The hag-worm, neute, and toad;
But fairy elves, unſeen,
May gambol o'er the green,
And circle her abode.

Breathe, breathe thy incenſe, May;
Ye flow'rs, your homage pay,
To one more fair and ſweet:
Ye op'ning roſe-buds, ſhade,
With fragrant twine, her head,
Ye lilies, kiſs her feet.

Shed, ſhed thy ſweeteſt beams,
In particolour'd ſtreams,
Thou fount of heat and light!
No, no, withdraw thy ray,
Her eyes effuſe a day,
As mild, as warm, as bright.

Flow, flow, thou cryſtal rill,
With tinkling gurgles fill
The mazes of the grove:
And if thy murmuring ſtream
Invite my love to dream,
O may ſhe dream of love!

Sing, ſing ye feather'd quires,
And melt to ſoft deſires
Her too obdurate breaſt:
Then, in that tender hour,
I'll ſteal into her bow'r,
And teach her—to be bleſt.

THE LOVER.

Since Stella's charms, divinely fair,
Firſt pour'd their luſtre on my heart,
Ten thouſand pangs my boſom tear,
And ev'ry fibre feels the ſmart.
If ſuch the mournful moments prove,
O who would give his heart to love!

I meet my boſom friends with pain,
Though friendſhip us'd to warm my ſoul;
Wine's generous ſpirit flames in vain,
I find no cordial in the bowl
If ſuch the mournful moments prove,
O who would give his heart to love!

Though nature's volume open lies,
Which once with wonder I have read,
No glories tremble from the ſkies,
No beauties o'er the earth are ſpread.
If ſuch the mournful moments prove,
O who would give his heart to love!

Ev'n poetry's ambroſial dews
With joy no longer feed my mind,
To beauty, muſic, and the muſe,
My ſoul is dumb, and deaf, and blind.
Though ſuch the mournful moments prove,
Alas! I give my heart to love.

But ſhould the yielding virgin ſmile,
Dreſt in the ſpotleſs marriage robe,
I'd look upon this world as vile,
The maſter of a richer globe.
If ſuch the rapt'rous moments prove,
O let me give my heart to love!

The buſineſs of my future days,
My every thought, my every pray'r,
Shall be employ'd to ſing her praiſe,
Or ſent to bounteous heav'n for her.
If ſuch the rapt'rous moments prove,
O let me give my heart ro love!

Poets ſhall wonder at my love,
Painters ſhall crowd her face to ſee,
And when they would the paſſions move,
Shall copy her, and think of me.
If ſuch the rapt'rous moments prove,
O let me give my heart to love.

Old age ſhall burn as bright as youth,
No reſpite to our bliſs be given:
Then mingled in one flame of truth,
We'll ſpurn at earth, and ſoar to heav'n.
Since ſuch the rapt'rous moments prove,
We both will give our hearts to love.

THE LOVER'S NIGHT.

Lull'd in the arms of him she lov'd
Ianthe sigh'd the kindest things:
Her fond surrender he approv'd
With smiles; and thus, enamour'd, sings.

"How sweet are lover's vows by night,
Lap'd in a honeysuckle grove!
When Venus sheds her gentle light,
And sooths the yielding soul to love.

Soft as the silent-footed dews
That steal upon the starlight-hours;
Warm as a love-sick poet's muse;
And fragrant as the breath of flow'rs.

To hear our vows the moon grows pale,
And pants Endymion's warmth to prove:
While, emulous, the nightingale,
Thick-warbling trills her lay of love.

The silver-sounding shining spheres,
That animate the glowing skies,
Nor charm so much, as thou, my ears,
Nor bless so much, as thou, my eyes.

Thus let me clasp thee to my heart,
Thus sink in softness on thy breast!
No cares, shall haunt us; danger, part,
For ever loving, ever blest.

Censorious envy dares not blame
The passion which thy truth inspires:
Ye stars, bear witness that my flame
Is chaste as your eternal fires."

Love saw them (hid among the boughs)
And heard him sing their mutual bliss:
"Enjoy, cry'd he, Ianthe's vows;
But, oh!—I envy thee her kiss."

TO A FRIEND ON HIS MARRIAGE.

AN ODE.

Auspicious sprung the morning into light,
By love selected from the golden tide
Of time, illustrious with peculiar white,
And mended from the blushes of the bride.

The muse observ'd the fond-approaching hour,
And thus her Philo's gentle ear addrest.
"Behold, descending from yon maiden tow'r
The beauteous object of thy eyes and breast.

Fair issuing, down the hill I see her move,
Like the sweet morn, in dews and blushes gay:
You, like the bridegroom sun, her charms approve;
And warm her dawning glories into day.

I own the radiant magic of her eyes,
But more the graces of her soul admire;
Those may lay traps for lovers, fops, and flies,
But these the husband and the muse inspire.

A husband is a venerable name!
O happy state, when heart is link'd to heart!
Nor less the honour of the wedded dame:
Sweet interchange! which only death can part.

O blest with gentle manners, graceful ease;
Gay, yet not trifling; serious, yet not grave;
Skillful, to charm the wits; the wise, to please;
Though beauteous, humble; and though tender, brave.

Riches and honours wait on either name:
But they in life are but the last desert:
Your richer happiness and fairer fame,
Shall be the good behaviour of the heart.

When such the wonders both of form and mind,
What rapture fancy'd, reason will approve;
By time your inclinations be refin'd;
And youth, be spent in passion; age in love?"

Thus far the muse. When Hymen, from the sky,
The lovers in the band of concord ty'd;
The Virtues and the Graces too were by,
And Venus left her cestus with the bride.

TO DR. LINDEN,

ON HIS TREATISE ON CHALYBEATE WATERS.

With healing wings, intent on doing good,
An angel visited Bethesda's flood;
Quick as the morning ray, or ev'ning beam,
Himself diffusing through the vital stream:
The sick who drink, the impotent who lave,
Dive from diseases, and deceive the grave.
Though miracles are ceas'd, yet all confess,
Your work, and you, are—only something less.
So much is to your worth and learning due,
Bath is Bethesda; the good angel, you.

PARADISE REGAINED:

TO A FRIEND.

Lord of himself, and sole of humankind,
In rectitude of reason Adam shone:
Till the still-voice infus'd into his mind,
"It is not good for man to be alone."

By God's own hand his Virgin-Eve was led.
Now Paradise with fresher beauties glows:
The conscious roses form a blushing bed:
Consenting nature sooths them to repose.

A single is an inconsistent life:
Completely blest, O friend! to thee is given,
A sweet, a fair, a wise, a modest wife,
The bloom of innocence, and blush of heav'n!

May Eden-life in bright succession flow,
When all was happiness, for love was all:
Her beauties will a Paradise bestow,
And both your virtues guard you from a fall.

TO MISS ADDISON.

ON SEEING MR. ROWE'S MONUMENT IN WESTMINSTER ABBEY.

Erected at the Expence of his Widow.

Late an applauding people rear'd the stone
To Shakspeare's honour, and alike, their own.
A perfect whole, where part consents to part;
The wonder he of nature, this of art.

And now a wife (ye wits, no more deſpiſe
The name of wife) bids Rowe in marble riſe.
Smiling, he views her conjugal regard;
A nation's coſt had been a leſs reward:
A nation's praiſe may vulgar ſpirits move,
Rowe more deſerv'd and gain'd,—a ſponſal love.

O Italy! thy injur'd marble keep
Deep in thy bowels, providently deep,
When fools wou'd force it over knaves to weep.
But when true wit and merit claim a ſhrine,
Pour forth thy ſtores and beggar every mine.
They claim them now: for virtue, ſenſe and wit
Have long been fled, and want thy ſuccours—yet:
They claim them now for one,---yes, one I ſee:---
Marble wou'd weep---if Addiſon be he.

O crown'd with all the glories of thy race,
The father's candour, and the mother's grace!
With Rowe, Charlotta! vie, in generous ſtriſe,
And let the daughter emulate the wife.
Be juſtly pious; raiſe the honour'd ſtone,
And ſo---deſerve a Rowe, or---Addiſon!

THE MILKMAID.

'Twas at the cool and fragrant hour,
When ev'ning ſteals upon the ſky,
That Lucy ſought a woodbine grove,
And Colin taught the grove to ſigh;
The ſweeteſt damſel ſhe, on all the plains;
The ſofteſt lover he, of all the ſwains.

He took her by the lily hand,
Which oft had made the milk look pale;
Her cheeks with modeſt roſes glow'd,
As thus he breath'd his tender tale:
The liſt'ning ſtreams awhile forgot to flow,
The doves to murmur, and the breeze to blow.

"O ſmile my love! thy dimply ſmiles
Shall lengthen on the ſetting ray:
Thus let us melt the hours in bliſs,
Thus ſweetly languiſh life away:
Thus ſigh our ſouls into each other's breaſt,
As true as turtles, and as turtles bleſt!

So may thy cows for ever crown
With floods of milk thy brimming pail;
So may thy cheeſe all cheeſe ſurpaſs,
So may thy butter never fail:
So may each village round this truth declare,
That Lucy is the faireſt of the fair.

Thy lips with ſtreams of honey flow,
And pouring ſwell with healing dews:
More ſweets are blended in thy breath,
Than all thy father's fields diffuſe:
Though thouſand flow'rs adorn each blooming field,
Thy lovely cheeks more blooming beauties yield.

Too long my erring eyes had rov'd
On city dames in ſcarlet dreſt;
And ſcorn'd the charmful village-maid,
With innocence and grogram bleſt:
Since Lucy's native graces fill'd my ſight,
The painted city dames no more delight.

The ſpeaking purple, when you bluſh,
Out-glows the ſcarlet's deepeſt dye;
No diamonds tremble on thy hair,
But brighter ſparkle in thy eye.
Truſt me, the ſmiling apples of thy eyes,
Are tempting as were thoſe in Paradiſe.

The tuneful linnet's warbling notes,
Are grateful to the ſhepherd-ſwain;
To drooping plants, and thirſty fields
The ſilver drops of kindly rain;
To bloſſoms, dews, as bloſſoms to the bee;
And thou, my Lucy! only art to me.

But mark, my love! yon weſtern clouds:
With liquid gold they ſeem to burn:
The ev'ning ſtar will ſoon appear,
And overflow his ſilver urn.
Soft ſtillneſs now, and falling dews invite
To taſte the balmy bleſſings of the night.

Yet e'er we part, one boon I crave,
One tender boon! nor this deny:
O promiſe that you ſtill will love,
O promiſe this! or elſe I die:
Death elſe my only remedy muſt prove;
I'll ceaſe to live, whene'er you ceaſe to love."

She ſigh'd and bluſh'd a ſweet conſent;
Joyous he thank'd her on his knee,
And warmly preſs'd her virgin-lip.—
Was ever youth ſo bleſt as he!—.
The moon, to light the lovers homeward, roſe,
And Philomela lull'd them to repoſe.

THE HAPPY LIFE.

A book, a friend, a ſong, a glaſs,
A chaſte, yet laughter-loving laſs
To mortals various joys impart,
Inform the ſenſe, and warm the heart.

Thrice happy they, who careleſs laid
Beneath a kind-embow'ring ſhade,
With roſy wreaths their temples crown,
In roſy wine their ſorrows drown.

Mean while the Muſes wake the lyre,
The Graces modeſt mirth inſpire,
Good natur'd humour, harmleſs wit;
Well temper'd joys, nor grave, nor light.

Let ſacred Venus with her heir,
And dear Ianthe too be there.
Muſic and wine in concert move
With beauty, and refining love.

There Peace ſhall ſpread her dove like wing,
And bid her olives round us ſpring.
There Truth ſhall reign, a ſacred gueſt!
And Innocence, to crown the reſt.

Begone, ambition, riches, toys,
And ſplendid cares, and guilty joys.---
Give me a book, a friend, a glaſs,
And a chaſte, laughter-loving laſs.

THE BEE.

Leave, wanton bee, thoſe bloſſoms leave,
Thou buzzing harbinger of ſpring,

To Stella fly, and sweeter spoils
Shall load thy thigh, and gild thy wing.

Her cheeks, her lips with roses swell,
Not Paphian roses deeper glow;
And lilies o'er her bosom spread
Their spotless sweets, and balmy snow.

Then, grateful for the sacred dews,
Invite her, humming round, to rest;
Soft dreams may tune her soul to love,
Though coldness arm her waking breast.

But if she still obdurate prove,
O shoot thy sting.---The little smart
May teach her then to pity me
Transfix'd with love's and beauty's dart.

Ah no, forbear, to sting forbear;
Go, fly into thy hive again.
Much rather let me die for her,
Than she endure the least of pain.

Go fly into thy hive again,
With more than Hybla honey blest:
For Pope's sweet lips prepare the dew,
Or else for love a nectar feast.

THE MORNING LARK.

ANACREONTIC.

Feather'd lyric! warbling high,
Sweetly gaining on the sky,
Op'ning with thy matin lay
(Nature's hymn)! the eye of day,
Teach my soul, on early wing,
Thus to soar, and thus to sing.

While the bloom of orient light
Gilds thee in thy tuneful flight,
May the day spring from on high,
Seen by faith's religious eye,
Cheer me with his vital ray,
Promise of eternal day!

ANNA MARIA WDFRD *!

" Go Anna! (nature said) to Oxford go:
(Anna! the fairest form and mind below,
Blest with each gift of nature and of art
To charm the reason, or to fix the heart.)
Go with a sprightly wit and easy mien,
To prove the Graces four, the Muses ten.
I see the wits adore, the wise approve,
Ev'n sops themselves have almost sense to love.
When poets would describe a lip or eye,
They'll look on thee and lay their Ovids by.
I see a love sick youth, with passion fir'd,
Hang on thy charms, and gaze to be inspir'd.
With asking eyes explain his silent woes,
Glow as he looks, yet tremble as he glows:
Then drunk with beauty, with a warmer rage,
Pour thy soft graces through the tragic page.
He sighs;—he bleeds;—to twilight shades he flies:
Shakspeare he drops, and with his Otway dies.

This pomp of charms you owe to me alone,
The charms which scarce six thousand years have known.
That face, illumin'd softly by the mind;
That body, almost to a soul refin'd;
That sweetness, only to an angel giv'n;
That blush of innocence, and smile of heav'n!
I bade thy cheeks with morning purple glow;
I bade thy lips with nectar spirit flow;
I bade the diamond point thy azure eyes,
Turn'd the fine waist, and taught the breast to rise.
Whether thy silver tides of music roll,
Or pencil on the canvas strikes a soul,
Or curious needle pricks a band or heart,
At once a needle, and at once a dart!
All own that nature is alone thy art.
Why thus I form'd thy body and thy mind
With sumless graces, prodigally kind:
The reason was,---but you in time will know it;---
One is, but that's the least---to make a poet.

THE MAGI.

A SACRED ECLOGUE.

No more in beauty's praise my numbers more,
Nor melt away in dying falls of love:
A Child on earth, yet heaven's Eternal King,
The manger'd God, the Virgin's Son I sing.
Thou Fountain-good, with light my soul o'erflow,
With hallow'd ardour bid my bosom glow!
Fir'd at the promise of thy dawning ray,
The eastern sages found celestial day.
Drawn by a leading flame, with sweet surprise,
The infant Deity salutes their eyes.
The Heir-elect of Love his mother prest,
Smil'd in her arms, and wanton'd on her breast.
No jewels sparkle here, nor India's stores
The portals brighten or emblaze the doors.
But young ey'd seraphims around him glow,
And Mercy spreads her many colour'd bow!
Her bow, compos'd of new created light,
How sweetly lambent and how softly bright!
The sacred circle of embodied rays
The cradle crowns, and round his temples plays.
So shines the rainbow round th' eternal throne
To shade the Holy, Holy, Holy One.
By turns the ruby bleeds a beam, by turns,
Smiles the green em'rald, and the topaz burns:
The various opal mingles every ray,
Fades into faintness, deepens into day:
Promiscuous lustre kindles half the skies,
Too slippery bright for keen seraphic eyes.
The venerable Three, low bending down,
Extend their offerings and the Godhead own.

MAG. I.

From eastern realms, where first the infant sight
Springs into day and streaks the fading night,
To thee we bend, before the morning rise;
A purer morning trembles from thy eyes.

MAG. II.

In vain the sun with light his orb arrays,
Our sense to dazzle, and as God to blaze;
Through his transparent fallacy we see,
And own the sun is but a star to Thee.

Gods fall to duſt and oracles are dumb.
Old ocean murmurs from his oozy bed,

O'er fountains weep, in twilight thickets mourn.
Long, hollow groans, deep ſobs, thick ſcreeches fills
Each dreary valley, and each ſhaded hill.

MAG. III.

No more ſhall Memphian timbrels wake the morn,
No more ſhall Hammon lift his gilded horn.
From hence in vain ſhall Belzebub rebel,
Anubis howls, and Moloch ſinks to hell.

MAG. I.

Here lows a bull; a golden gleam adorns
The circling honours of his beamy horns.
He ſafely lows, nor fears the holy knife,
No ſacrifice from hence ſhall drink his life.

MAG. II.

Ye gardens, bluſh with never fading flow'rs,
For ever ſmile ye meads, and blow ye bow'rs:
Bleat all ye hills, be whiten'd all ye plains;
O earth rejoice. th' Eternal Shepherd reigns.

MAG III.

Ye lilies, dip your leaves in falling ſnow,
Ye roſes, with the eaſtern ſcarlet glow,
To crown the God: ye angels haſte to pour

Receive our pray'rs, the incenſe of the ſoul!

MAG III. Offers Myrrh.

The weeping myrrh with balmy ſorrow flows,
Thy cup to ſweeten and to ſooth thy woes:
So prophets ſing; for (human and divine)
The Man was born to grieve, the God to ſhine.

MAG. I.

Smile, Sacred Infant, ſmile: thy roſy breaſt
Excels the odours of the ſpicy eaſt;
The burniſh'd gold is droſs before thy eye,
Thou God of ſweetneſs. God of purity!

MAG. II

Ye planets, unregarded walk the ſkies,
Your glories leſſen as his glories riſe,
His radiant word with gold the ſun attires,
The moon illumes, and lights the ſtarry fires.

MAG III.

Hail, Lord of Nature, hail! To thee belong
My ſong, my life,—I give my life, my ſong:
Walk in thy light, adore thy day alone,
Confeſs thy love, and pour out all my own.

ON MR. POPE'S WORKS.

WRITTEN SOON AFTER HIS DEATH.

Man not alone hath end: In meaſur'd time,
(So Heav'n has will'd) together with their ſnows,
The everlaſting hills ſhall melt away:
This ſolid globe diſſolve, as ductile wax
Before the breath of Vulcan; like a ſcroll
Shrivel th' unfolded curtains of the ſky;
Thy planets, Newton, tumble from their ſpheres,
That lead harmonious on their myſtic rounds:
The moon be periſh'd from her bloody orb;
The ſun himſelf in liquid ruin, ruſh
And deluge with deſtroying flames the globe—
Peace then, my ſoul nor grieve that Pope is dead.
If e'er the tuneful ſpirit, ſweetly-ſtrong,
Spontaneous numbers, teeming in my breaſt,
Enkindle; O, at that exalting name,
Be favourable, be propitious now,
While in the gratitude of praiſe, I ſing
The works and wonders of this man divine.
I tremble while I write.—His liſping muſe
Surmounts the loftieſt efforts of my age.
What wonder? when an infant, he apply'd
The loud * Papinian trumpet to his lips,
Fir'd by a ſacred fury, and inſpir'd
With all the god, in ſounding numbers ſung
" Fraternal rage, and guilty Thebes' alarms."
Sure at his birth (things not unknown of old)
The Graces round his cradle wove the dance,
And led the maze of harmony: the Nine,
Prophetic of his future honours, pour'd
Plenteous, upon his lips Caſtalian dews;
And Attic bees their golden ſtore diſtill'd.
The ſoul of Homer, ſliding from its ſtar,
Where, radiant, over the poetic world
It rules and ſheds its influence, for joy
Shouted, and bleſs'd the birth: the ſacred choir
Of poets, born in elder. better times,
Enraptur'd, catch'd the elevating ſound,
And roll'd the glad'ning news from ſphere to ſphere.
O liſten to † Alexis' tender plaint!
How gently rural! without coarſeneſs, plain;
How ſimple in his elegence of grief!
A ſhepherd, but no clown. His every lay
Sweet as the early pipe along the dale,
When hawthorns bud, or on the thymy brow
When all the mountains bleat, and vallies ſing.
Soft as the nightingle's harmonious woe,
In dewy even tide, when cowſlips drop
Their ſleepy heads, and languiſh in the breeze.
‡ Imperial Windſor! on thy brow auguſt,
Superbly gay, exalt thy tow'ry head;
(Much prouder of his verſe than of thy ſtars)
And bid thy foreſts dance, and nodding, wave
A verdant teſtimony of thy joy:
A native Orpheus warbling in thy ſhades.

* Next, in the critic chair ſurvey him thron'd,
Imperial in his art, preſcribing laws
Clear from the knitted brow, and ſquinted ſneer;
Learn'd, without pedantry; correctly bold,
And regularly eaſy. Gentle, now,
As riſing incenſe, or deſcending dews,
The variegated echo of his theme:
Now, animated flame commands the ſoul
To glow with ſacred wonder. Pointed wit
And keen diſcernment form the certain page.
Juſt, as the Stagyrite; as Horace, free;
As Fabian, clear; and as Petronius gay.
† But whence thoſe peals of laughter ſhake the ſides
Of decent mirth? Am I in Fairy-land?
Young, evaneſcent forms, before my eyes,
Or ſkim, or ſeem to ſkim; thin eſſences
Of fluid light, ſylphs, ſylphids, elves and gnomes;
Genii of Roſicruce, and ladies' gods!—
And lo, in ſhining trails, Belinda's hair,
Beſpangling with diſhevel'd beams the ſkies,
Flames o'er the night. Behind, a ſatyr grins
And, jocund, holds a glaſs, reflecting fair,
Hoops, croſſes, mattadores; beaux, ſhocks, and belles,
Promiſcuouſly whimſical and gay.
Taſſoni, hiding his diminiſh'd head, [ſkulks,
Droops o'er the laughing page: while Boileau
With bluſhes cover'd, low beneath the deſk.
‡ More mournful ſcenes invite. The milky vein
Of amorous grief devolves its placid wave
Soft ſtreaming o'er the ſoul, in weeping woe
And tenderneſs of anguiſh. While we read
Th' infectious page, we ſicken into love,
And languiſh with involuntary fires.
The zephyr, panting on the ſilken buds
Of breathing violets; the virgin's ſigh,
Roſy with youth, are turbulent and rude,
To Sappho's plaint, and Eloiſa's moan.
Heav'ns! what a flood of empyreal day
My aching eyes involves! a § temple ſoars,
Riſing like exhalations, on a mount,
And, wide, its adamantine valves expands.
Three monumental columns, bright in air,
Of figur'd gold, the centre of the quire
With luſtre fill. Pope on the midmoſt ſhines
Betwixt his Homer and his Horace plac'd,
Superior by the hand of juſtice. Fame,
With all her mouths th' eternal trumpet ſwells,
Exulting at his name; and, grateful, pours
The lofty notes of never-dying praiſe,
Triumphant, floating on the wings of wind,
Sweet o'er the world: th' ambroſial ſpirit flies
Diffuſive, in its progreſs wid'ning ſtill,
"Dear to the earth, and grateful to the ſky."
Fame owes him more than e'er ſhe can repay:
She owes her very temple to his hands;
Like Ilium built; by hands no leſs divine!
Attention, rouſe thyſelf! the maſter's hand,
(The maſter of our ſouls!) has chang'd the key,
And bids the thunder of the battle roar
Tumultuous *. Homer, Homer is our own!
And Grecian heroes flame in Britiſh lines.
What pomp of words! what nameleſs energy
Kindles the verſe; invigours every line;
Aſtoniſhes and overwhelms the ſoul
In tranſport toſt! When fierce Achilles raves,
And flaſhes, like a comet, o'er the field,
To wither armies with his martial frown;
I ſee the battle rage I hear the wheels
Careering with their brazen orbs! the ſhout
Of nations rolls (the labour of the winds)—
Full on my ear, and ſhakes my inmoſt ſoul.
Deſcription never could ſo well deceive:
'Tis real! Troy is here, or I at Troy
Enjoy the war. My ſpirits, all on fire,
With unextinguiſh'd violence are borne
Above the world, and mingle with the gods.
Olympus rings with arms! the firmament,
Beneath the light'ning of Minerva's ſhield,
Burns to the centre: rock the tow'rs of heav'n.
All nature trembles! ſave the throne of Jove!—
Have mercy, Pope, and kill me not with joy:
'Tis tenfold rage, an agony of bliſs!
Be leſs a god, nor force me to adore.
† To root exceſſes from the human breaſt,
Behold a beauteous pile of Ethic's riſe;
Senſe the foundation; harmony the walls
(The Doric grave, and gay Corinthian join'd)
Where Socrates and Horace jointly reign.
Beſt of philoſophers! of poets too
The beſt! He teaches thee thyſelf to know:
That Virtue is the nobleſt gift of heav'n:
"And vindicates the ways of God to man."
O hearken to the moraliſt polite!
Enter his ſchool of truth, where Plato's ſelf
Might preach, and Tully deign to lend an ear.
‡ Laſt ſee him waging with the fools of rhyme
A wanton, harmleſs war. Dunce after dunce,
Beaux, doctors, templars, courtiers, ſophs, and cits,
Condemn'd to ſuffer life The motley crew,
Emerging from oblivion's muddy pool,
Give the round face to view, and ſhameleſs front
Proudly expoſe, till laughter have her fill
Born to improve the age, and cheat mankind
Into the road of honour!—Vice again
The gilded chariot drives:—for he is dead!
I ſaw the ſable barge, along his Thames,
In ſlow ſolemnity beating the tide,
Convey his ſacred duſt!—Its ſwans expir'd,
Wither'd in Twit'nam bow'rs the laurel bough;
Silent the muſes broke their idle lyres:
Th' attendant graces check'd the ſprightly dance,
Their arms unlock'd, and catch'd the ſtarting tear,
And virtue for her loſt defender mourn'd!

A learned head, clear ſoul, and honeſt heart.
Each ſcience choſe his breaſt her favourite ſeat,
Each language, but the language of deceit.
Severe his virtues, yet his manners kind,
A manly form, and a ſeraphic mind.
So long he walk'd in virtue's even road,
In him at length, 'twas natural to do good.

EPITAPH ON MY † MOTHER.

In the Pariſh Church of Brough, Weſtmoreland.

Here reſts a pattern of the female life,
The woman, friend, the mother, and the wife.
A woman form'd by nature, more than art,
With ſmiling eaſe to gain upon the heart.
A friend as true as guardian-angels are,
Kindneſs her law, humanity her care.
A mother ſweetly tender, juſtly dear,
Oh! never to be nam'd without a tear.
A wife of every ſocial charm poſſeſt,
Bleſſing her ‡ huſbands—In her huſbands bleſt.
Love in her heart, compaſſion in her eye,
Her thoughts as humble, as her virtues high.
Her knowledge uſeful, nor too high, nor low,
To ſerve her maker, and herſelf to know.
Born to relieve the poor, the rich to pleaſe,
To live with honour, and to die in peace.
So full her hope, her wiſhes ſo reſign'd,
Her life ſo blameleſs, ſo unſtain'd her mind,
Heav'n ſmil'd to ſee, and gave the gracious nod,
Nor longer wou'd detain her from her God.

WRITTEN IN THE HOLY BIBLE.

Ye ſacred tomes, be my unerring guide,
Dove-hearted ſaints, and prophets eagle-ey'd!
I ſcorn the moral ſop, and ethic ſage,
But drink in truth from your illumin'd page:
Like Moſes-buſh each leaf divinely bright,
Where God inveſts himſelf in milder light!
Taught by your doctrines we devoutly riſe,
Faith points the way, and hope unbars the ſkies.
You tune our paſſions, teach them how to roll,
And ſink the body but to raiſe the ſoul;
To raiſe it, bear it to myſterious day,
Nor want an angel to direct the way!

ON A PRESENT OF THREE ROSES, FROM IANTHE.

Three roſes to her humble ſlave
The miſtreſs of the Graces gave:
Three roſes of an eaſtern hue,
Sweet-ſwelling with ambroſial dew.
How each, with glowing pride, diſplays
The riches of its circling rays!
How all, in ſweet abundance, ſhed
Perfumes, that might revive the dead!
Now tell me, fair one, if you know,
Whence theſe balmy ſpirits flow?
Whence ſprings this modeſt bluſh of light
Which charms at once and pains the ſight?
The fair one knew, but wou'd not ſay,
So bluſh'd and ſmiling went her way.
Impatient, next the muſe I call;
She comes, and thus wou'd anſwer all.
"Fool (and I ſure deſerv'd the name),
Mark well the beauties of the dame,
And can you wonder why ſo fair,
And why ſo ſweet the roſes are?
Her cheek with living purple glows
Which bluſh'd its rays on every roſe;
Her breath exhal'd a ſweeter ſmell
Than fragrant fields of aſphodel;
The ſparkling ſpirit in her eyes
A kindlier influence ſupplies
Than genial ſuns and ſummer ſkies.
Now can you wonder why ſo fair,
And why ſo ſweet the roſes are?"
"Hold, tuneful trifler, I reply'd,
The beauteous cauſe I now deſcry'd,
Hold, talk no more of ſummer ſkies,
Of genial ſuns and—ſplendid lies;
Of fragrant fields of aſphodel,
And brighteſt rays and ſweeteſt ſmell;
Whatever poetry can paint,
Or muſe can utter—all is faint:
Two words had better all expreſt;—
"She took the roſes from—her breaſt.

THE WEDDING MORN.

A DREAM.

'Twas morn: But Theron ſtill his pillow preſt;
(His Annabella's charms improv'd his reſt.)
An angel form, the daughter of the ſkies.
Deſcending bleſt; or ſeem'd to bleſs his eyes;
White from her breaſt a dazzling veſtment roll'd,
With ſtars beſpangled and celeſtial gold.
She mov'd; and odours, wide, the circuit fill'd;
She ſpake, and honey from her lips diſtill'd.
"Behold, illuſtrious comes, to bleſs thy arms,
Thy Annabella, breathing love and charms!
O melting mildneſs undiſſembled truth!
Fair flow'r of age, yet bluſhing bloom of youth!
Fair without art, without deſign admir'd,
Prais'd by the good, and by the wiſe deſir'd.
By art and nature taught and form'd to pleaſe,
With all the ſweet ſimplicity of eaſe.
In public courteous—for no private end;
At home—a ſervant; and abroad—a friend.

Her gentle manners, unaffected grace,
And animated sweetness of her face,
Her faultless form, by decency refin'd,
And bright, unsullied sanctity of mind,
The Christian graces breathing in her breast,
Her—whole shall teach thee to be more than blest.

'Tis virtue's ray that points her sparkling eyes,
Her face is beauteous for her soul is wise.
As from the sun refulgent glories roll,
Which feed the starry host and fire the pole,
So stream upon her face the beauties of her soul.
Though the dove's languish melts upon her eye,
And her cheeks mantle with the eastern sky,
When seventy on her temples sheds its snow,
Dim grow her eyes and cheeks forget to glow,
Good nature shall the purple lose supply,
Good sense shine brighter than the sparkling eye:
In beauteous order round and round shall move,
Love cool'd by reason, reason warm'd by love.

Receive Heav'n's kindest blessing! And regard
This blessing as thy virtue's best reward.
When beauty wakes her fairest forms to charm,
When music all her pow'rs of sound to warm,
Her golden floods when wanton freedom rolls,
And plenty pours herself into our bowls;
When with tumultuous throbs our pulses beat,
And dubious reason totters on her seat,
The youth how steady, how resolv'd the guide
Which stems the full luxuriant, pleasing tide!
For these, and virtues such as these is giv'n
Thy Annabella! O'belov'd of Heav'n!—
Hail marriage! everlasting be thy reign!
The chain of being is thy golden chain.
From hence mankind, a growing race depend,
Began with nature, shall with nature end.
The mists, which stain'd thy lustre, break away,
In glory lessen, and refine to day:
No more the jest of wits, of fools the scorn,
Which God made sacred, and which priests adorn.

Ascend the bed, while genial nature pours
Her balmy blessings round and nectar show'rs.
And lo! the future opens on my eyes,
I see soft buds and smiling flow'rs arise:
The human blossoms every charm display,
Unfold their sweets, and beautify the day.
The father's virtues in the sons combine;
The mother's graces in the daughters shine.
So where an angel spreads his dovelike wing,
Young laurels sprout, and tender myrtles spring;
Sweet dews descending consecrate the ground,
And opens a new Paradise around!
I see!' —But here the scenes which blaz'd behind
Her fancy dazzled, and dissolv'd his mind.
He woke: yet still he thinks he sees and hears;
Till real sounds salute his ravish'd ears:
" —Arise! the bride invites thee to be blest?"
He rose.—But silence only speaks the rest.

Anno 1794.

THE LIFE OF CAWTHORN.

JAMES CAWTHORN was born at or near Sheffield, in Yorkſhire, in 1721. Of the circumſtances and profeſſion of his father, there is no account. He received his education partly at Rotheram in Yorkſhire, and partly at Kirkby-Lonſdale in Weſtmoreland. Whether he was indebted to either of the univerſities for any part of the literature he poſſeſſed, is uncertain. His epitaph gives him the degree of Maſter of Arts; but his name does not appear in either of the liſts of graduates.

His firſt employment was that of Uſher, at the ſchool of one Mr. Clare, in the city of London, whoſe ſiſter he married. His wife died before him.

In 1743, he was choſen Maſter of Tunbridge School, by the Skinner's Company of London; of which the founder, Sir Andrew Judd, a native of Tunbridge, and Lord Mayor of London, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, was a freeman.

It muſt always afford ſatisfaction to ſee thoſe public eſtabliſhments, which the piety of former times has provided for the education of youth, conducted in ſuch a manner as to anſwer the intention of the donors.

In this reſpect, the Company of Skinners deſerve particular commendation; as a retroſpection for many years will ſhow, that their choice has generally fallen on men of very diſtinguiſhed and eminent abilities.

Cawthorn is very advantageouſly known to the world by his poetical compoſitions; and Dr. Knox, the preſent reſpectable Maſter of Tunbridge School, ranks as a writer of popular eſſays, moral and critical, ſerious and humorous, with Addiſon, Steele, Johnſon, Moore, Hawkeſworth, and Goldſmith.

It is equally honourable to Cawthorn, and to the Company of Skinners, that, in conjunction with his patrons, he founded a library, which is annexed to that ſeminary.

Before his appointment to the maſterſhip of Tunbridge School, he appears to have taken orders; but neither the time of his ordination, nor the place where he was beneficed, have been aſcertained.

He had an early turn for poetry; and as it was his cuſtom to affix to his juvenile pieces the place where, and the year, day, and age of his life when they were written, ſome of them are dated Kirkby-Lonſdale, in 1735.

In 1746, he wrote The Equality of Human Conditions, a poetical dialogue, ſpoken at the viſitation of Tunbridge School.

The ſame year, he publiſhed his poem of Abelard to Eloiſa, with ſome introductory verſes, addreſſed to a young lady; which, with two ſermons, was all that he printed in his life time.

In 1749, he addreſſed an ethic epiſtle, on the Vanity of Human Enjoyments, to Lyttleton, whoſe patronage he courted, with the other poets of that time.

Of the following twelve years of his life, little is known that can be related with certainty.

He was killed by a fall from his horſe, as he was going to beſpeak the muſic on ſome occaſion, from Tunbridge Wells, April 15. 1761, in the 40th year of his age; and was buried in Tunbridge Church.

Over his remains is the following inſcription:

Hic ſitus eſt
JACOBUS CAWTHORN, A. M.
Scholæ Tunbrigienſis magiſter
Qui juventuti tum moribus, tum literis inſtituenda;
Operam magno, non ſine honore dedit
Opibus, quas larga manu diſtribuit
Fruitur, & in æternum fruetur
Obiit, heu citius! Aprilis 15. 1761,
Ætatis 40.
Soror mœſta ex grato animo hoc poſuit.

His Poems were collected and published in one volume 4to, 1771; but, by an unpardonable neglect in the editor, without any information concerning his life, family connections, or even the times and places of his birth and death.

This indifference towards a person so respectable as an author, and so deserving as a man, is much to be lamented; and, for the sake of posterity as well as the present times, it is to be wished, that those who are acquainted with any particulars concerning him, would communicate them to some repository where they might be reserved for the use of future biographers.

An anonymous writer in the "St. James's Chronicle," of April 25. 1771, informed the public, that the first piece in this collection was not originally composed by Cawthorn, but by Pitt, the translator of Virgil; and is to be found at page 120, of the poems published by him in 1727.

To this charge of unfair dealing, the editor asserted, in his own vindication, that the poem was really selected from a number of Cawthorn's juvenile pieces in his possession, in his own handwriting. "So, I had not," say he, "the least reason to suppose that it was copied, especially as there are several others, in the same collection, which (if we may believe Mr. Cawthorn) can belong to no other author: For, at the close of one poem, which is called A Meditation, dated Kirkby-Lonsdale, January 30. 1735, he says, "this essay, as well as the other pieces of divine poetry, was composed in the hurry of imagination, without any regard to connection, which is excusable in a person whose judgment, by reason of his years, is deficient. I chose rather this kind of poetry, since the pens of the most celebrated writers have been employed in other matters. They were designed for my private amusement, and to unbend the mind when engaged in works of not so agreeable a nature."

According to this account, the editor does not positively deny the piece in question to be Pitt's; he only declares his having known nothing of the matter previously to the publication of Cawthorn's poems; and consequently, if the poem proved to be Pitt's, the insertion of it among Cawthorn's pieces, is a circumstance very different from intentional plagiarism.

The poems contained in that collection, have been reprinted, together with some pieces which had been omitted, in the edition of "The English Poets," 1790.

Cawthorn is said to have been in the general intercourse of life, generous and friendly; but, in the conduct of his school, singularly harsh and severe. He had some extraordinary foibles. With little skill in horsemanship, he was fond of hunting; and with no acquaintance with music, he was an admirer of concerts and operas. He has been known to ride to London from Tunbridge, in order to be present at a musical performance, though he was under the necessity of being back by seven o'clock the next morning.

As a poet, his compositions are characterised by energy, enthusiasm, and melody, more than ease, elegance, and correctness. He had a lively imagination; but his judgment was not equal to his fancy; and his most finished productions discover an incorrectness of taste. He formed himself upon Pope, as a model of heroic verse; and, it is saying much for him, that he frequently wrote like his master. He has copied his pauses, cadence, cast of diction, and the mechanism and construction of his verse, with a felicity of imitation that has few examples.

But he could not long maintain Pope's easy elegance, nor keep up to the free and unwearied spirit that he breathed. He has the faults of his master; but not all his sublime beauties, and more animated graces. His versification, though flowing and harmonious, is too artificial and uniform, and sometimes elaborated into obscurity. His pauses are anticipated by the ear; and the regular recurrence of the words every and all, especially the latter, in almost every line, produces a tiresome monotony.

His Epistle from Abelard to Eloisa, is the most popular of his productions. It is reckoned little inferior to Pattison's celebrated letter, or Pope's admirable "Eloisa." It certainly contains many strong lines, much passion, and animated expression; but the hand of the perfect master was wanting to dispose the colours and chastise the piece. A third "epistle from Abelard to Eloisa," was published by Mr. Warwick in 1782, which is not a mere copy; and could the exquisite "Epistle from Eloisa to Abelard," be for a while forgotten, it might be thought not a second-rate performance. His Lady Jane Grey to Lord Guilford Dudley, is another beautiful example of that species of writing epistles under feigned characters, which it is no small merit in Ovid to have invented. The subject is one of the moſt ſtriking in the Engliſh annals; and the circumſtances of diſtreſs, the various turns of paſſion, and the different ſentiments with which Lady Jane is agitated, are finely worked up, without any remarkable deviation from hiſtory.

The Elegy on Captain Hughes, is one of the moſt highly finiſhed, and certainly the moſt intereſting of his ſhorter pieces. It is exquiſitely animated and tender, but not without ſome pretty, rather than pathetic ſentiments, and ſome obſcure and ſome careleſs lines. The preſent writer thinks he has ſeen a more correct copy of this elegy, than that which is printed in the collection of "The Engliſh Poets," in ſome of the Miſcellanies; and has ventured, from memory, to mark the variations, which appear to him to be eſſential improvements. The ſixth line from the beginning, in particular, ſeems to him to be quite unintelligible.

Forgets the port before he graſps the lyre,

He thinks it ſhould be

Forgets the poet ere he graſps the lyre.

The apoſtrophe to Nature, in the line immediately following, he thinks ſhould be to Friendſhip. The ſubſequent alterations are too numerous to be ſpecified.

His Regulation of the Paſſions, a moral eſſay, has great merit in many places. The end of Suffolk ſtrongly reminds us of Pope's Buckingham. The idea of a moral economy from painting, exemplified in Rembrandt, is happily imagined. The concluding images are beautiful and juſt.

Let all thy paſſions like his colours play,
Strong without harſhneſs, without glaring, gay,
Contraſt them, curb them, ſpread them, or confine,
Ennoble theſe, and thoſe forbid to ſhine.
With cooler ſhades, ambition's fire allay,
And mildly melt the pomp of pride away:
Her rainbow robe from vanity remove,
And ſoften malice with the ſmile of love:
Bid o'er revenge, the charities prevail,
Nor let a grace be ſeen without a veil;
So ſhalt thou live as Heaven itſelf deſign'd,
Each pulſe congenial with th' informing mind;
Each action ſtation'd in its proper place,
Each virtue blooming with its native grace,
Each paſſion vig'rous to its juſt degree;
And the fair whole a perfect ſymmetry.

In his Eſſay on Taſte, many of our modern follies, particularly the Chineſe taſte in building and laying out grounds, are ridiculed with no leſs propriety than poetry. To avoid theſe follies, he adviſes us to follow nature in our improvements.

Examine nature with the eye of taſte,
Mark where ſhe ſpreads the lawn, or pours the rill,
Falls in the vale, or breaks upon the hill;
Plan as ſhe plans; and where her genius calls,
There ſink your grottos, and there raiſe your walls.

In his Life Unhappy, becauſe we uſe it improperly, a moral eſſay, he draws the idea of a moral economy, from muſic, as he had done before from painting, which is finely exemplified in Handel.

The Eſſay on Nobility, ſpoken at the viſitation of Tunbridge School, in 1752, is replete with manly ſentiments, and indignant ſatire. It is a pleaſure to find

"————————amidſt the titled crew, Unknown to all but Collins and the ſtew;"

the name of a late illuſtrious and lamented ſtateſman, who was more ennobled by his private virtues and conſtitutional principles, than by his hereditary titles. Twelve years of unfortunate political diſſenſion, ſince his death, have already written his eulogium.

"Admire how innocence can lend to truth,
Each grace of virtue, and each charm of youth;
And then enraptur'd bend the ſuppliant knee
To heav'n's high throne, O Rockingham! for thee."

His Epiſtle on the Vanity of Human Enjoyments, is written with his uſual flow of melodious verſification, and pleaſing illuſtration. The diſtinguiſhed names of Cudworth, Halley, and Deſaguliers, are produced as examples of the inutility of genius and ſcience to their poſſeſſors. The lines which record their glory, and their country's ſhame, are ſelected; becauſe the facts, particularly thoſe relating to Dr. Deſaguliers, are little known, and are equally intereſting to curioſity, learning, and benevolence.

" Aſk at yon tomb, where Cudworth's mighty name
Weeps o'er the ruins of his wit and fame;
Cudworth, whoſe ſpirit flew, with ſails unfurl'd,
Through each vaſt empire of th' ideal world,
Pierc'd through the myſtic ſhades o'er nature thrown,
And made the ſoul's immenſity his own.
Yet though his ſyſtem wit and ſcience fir'd,
Though Wilmot trembled, and though Hobbes expir'd,
Miſtaken zeal, mad bigotry conſpire,
All Turner's dullneſs, and all Oxford's fire,
All envy's poiſons, all a nation's rage,
And all hell's imps to blaſt th' unfiniſh'd page.
Much injur'd ſhade, to truth, to virtue dear,—
Be calm, ye witlings! and, ye zealots! hear:
And, while this bright intelligence pervades
Th' ideal world, and riſes o'er the ſhades,
His mines of wiſdom, if you can explore,
Then ſhut the volume, and be vain no more.—
Immortal Halley! thy unwearied ſoul
On wiſdom's pinion flew from pole to pole,
Th' uncertain compaſs to its taſk reſtor'd,
Each ocean fathom'd, and each wind explor'd,
Commanded trade with ev'ry breeze to fly,
And gave to Britain half the Zemblian ſky.
And ſee, he comes, diſtinguiſh'd, lov'd, careſt,
Mark'd by each eye, and hugg'd to ev'ry breaſt;
His godlike labours wit and ſcience fire,
All factions court him, and all ſects admire:
While Britain, with a gratitude unknown
To ev'ry age but Nero's and our own,
A gratitude that will for ever ſhame
The Spartan glory, and th' Athenian name—
Tell it, ye winds! that all the world may hear—
Bleſt his old age with—ninety pounds a year.
Are theſe our triumphs? theſe the ſums we give
To ripen genius, and to bid it live?
Can Britain in her fits of madneſs pour
One half her Indies on a Roman whore,
And ſtill permit the weeping muſe to tell
How poor neglected Deſaguliers fell?
How he, who taught two gracious kings to view
All Boyle ennobled, and all Bacon knew,
Died in a cell, without a friend to ſave,
Without a guinea, and without a grave?"

If the merit of this Epiſtle, and his Moral Eſſays, is to be eſtimated by the juſt information they contain, and the important truths they eſtabliſh, it is unqueſtionably very conſiderable. They abound alſo in beautiful imagery, and ſplendid poetical embelliſhments of many kinds; but they are fuller of delicate ſentiment, philoſophical reflection, and moral ſatire, than of imagery, figures, and poetry.

His Pruſſia is a ſpirited panegyrical poem, on the victories of the late King of Pruſſia, whoſe literary, legiſlative, and warlike accompliſhments, are the boaſt and admiration of the preſent age. His Tales have a conſiderable portion of the eaſe, humour, and familiarity which diſtinguiſh the productions of Prior; but do not add much to his reputation.

Cawthorn, it muſt be acknowledged, has beſtowed too much attention on inferior poetical ornaments; but, when every deduction is made which criticiſm requires, his compoſitions will be found to diſplay that pregnancy of invention, that exquiſite ſenſibility, and that genuine enthuſiaſm, which are the invaluable ſanctions beſtowed by nature on every real poet.

THE WORKS OF CAWTHORN.

TO MISS ————,

OF HORSEMANDEN, IN KENT.

When wit and ſcience trimm'd their wither'd bays,
At Petrarch's voice, and beam'd with half their rays,
Some heaven-born genius, panting to explore
The ſcenes oblivion wiſh'd to live no more,
Found Abelard in grief's ſad pomp array'd,
And call'd the melting mourner from the ſhade.
Touch'd by his woes, and kindling at his rage,
Admiring nations glow'd from age to age;
From age to age the ſoft infection ran,
Taught to lament the hermit in the man;
Pride dropt her creſt, ambition learn'd to ſigh,
And dove-like pity ſtream'd in ev'ry eye.
Sick of the world's applauſe, yet fond to warm
Each maid that knows with Eloiſe to charm,
He aſks of verſe to aid his native fire,
Refines and wildly lives along the lyre;
Bids all his various paſſions throb anew,
And hopes, my fair, to ſteal a tear from you.
O bleſt with temper, bleſt with ſkill to pour
Life's ev'ry comfort on each ſocial hour!
Chaſte as thy bluſhes, gentle as thy mien,
Too grave for folly, and too gay for ſpleen;
Indulg'd to win, to ſoften, to inſpire,
To melt with muſic, and with wit to fire;
To blend, as judgment tells thee how to pleaſe,
Wiſdom with ſmiles, and majeſty with eaſe;
Alike to virtue as the graces known,
And proud to love all merit but thy own!
Theſe are thy honours, theſe will charms ſupply,
When thoſe dear ſuns ſhall ſet in either eye;
While ſhe, who, fond of dreſs, of paint, and place,
Aims but to be a goddeſs in the face;
Born all thy ſex illumines to deſpiſe,
Too mad for thought, too pretty to be wiſe,
Haunts for a year fantaſtically vain,
With half our fribbles dying in her train;
Then ſinks, as beauty fades and paſſion cools,
The ſcorn of coxcombs, and the jeſt of fools.

ABELARD TO ELOISA.

FIRST PUBLISHED 1747.

ARGUMENT.

Abelard and Eloiſa flouriſhed in the twelfth century: they were two of the moſt diſtinguiſhed perſons of their age, in learning and beauty; but for nothing more famous than for their unfortunate paſſion. After a long courſe of calamities, they retired each to a ſeveral convent, and conſecrated the remainder of their days to religion. It was many years after this ſeparation, that a letter of Abelard's to a friend, which contained the hiſtory of his misfortunes, fell into the hands of Eloiſa: this occaſioned thoſe celebrated letters (out of which the following is partly extracted), which give ſo lively a picture of the ſtruggles of grace and nature, virtue and paſſion. POPE.

Ah! why this boding ſtart? this ſudden pain,
That wings my pulſe, and ſhoots from vein to vein!
What mean, regardleſs of yon midnight bell,
Theſe earth-born viſions ſaddening o'er my cell!
What ſtrange diſorder prompts theſe thoughts to glow,
Theſe ſighs to murmur, and theſe tears to flow?
'Tis ſhe, 'tis Eloiſa's form reſtor'd,
Once a pure ſaint, and more than ſaints ador'd:
She comes in all her killing charms confeſs'd,
Glares through the gloom, and pours upon my breaſt,
Bids heaven's bright guard from Paraclete remove,
And drags me back to miſery and love.
Enjoy thy triumphs, dear illuſion! ſee
This ſad apoſtate from his God to thee;
See, at thy call, my guilty warmths return,
Flame through my blood, and ſteal me from my urn.
Yet, yet, frail Abelard! one effort try,
Ere the laſt lingering ſpark of virtue die;
The deadly charming ſorcereſs controul,
And, ſpite of nature, tear her from thy ſoul.
Long has that ſoul, in theſe unſocial woods,
Where anguiſh muſes, and where ſorrow broods,
From love's wild viſionary wiſhes ſtray'd,
And ſought to loſe thy beauties in the ſhade.
Faith dropp'd a ſmile, devotion lent her fire,
Woke the keen pang, and ſanctified deſire;
Led me enraptur'd to the bleſt abode,
And taught my heart to glow with all its God.
But O, how weak fair faith and virtue prove,
When Eloiſa melts away in love!
When her fond ſoul, impaſſion'd, rapt, unveil'd,
No joy forgotten, and no wiſh conceal'd,
Flows through her pen as infant-ſoftneſs free,
And fiercely ſprings in ecſtacies to me!
Ye heavens! as walking in yon ſacred fane,
With every ſeraph warm in every vein,

Juſt as remorſe had rous'd an aching ſigh,
And my torn ſoul hung trembling in my eye,
In that kind hour thy fatal letter came,
I ſaw, I gaz'd I ſhiver'd at the name;
The conſcious lamps at once forgot to ſhine,
Prophetic tremors ſhook the hallow'd ſhrine;
Prieſts, cenſers, altars, from thy genius fled,
And heav'n itſelf ſhut on me while I read.
Dear ſmiling miſchief! art thou ſtill the ſame,
The ſtill pale victim of too ſoft a flame?
Warm as when firſt, with more than mortal ſhine,
Each melting eye-ball mix'd thy ſoul with mine?
Have not thy tears, for ever taught to flow,
The glooms of abſence, and the pangs of woe,
The pomp of ſacrifice, the whiſper'd tale,
The dreadful vow yet hov'ring o'er thy veil,
Drove this bewitching fondneſs from thy breaſt,
Curb'd the looſe wiſh, and form'd each pulſe to reſt?
And canſt thou ſtill, ſtill bend the ſuppliant knee
To love's dread ſhrine, and weep and ſigh for me?
Then take me, take me, lock me in thy arms,
Spring to my lips, and give me all thy charms.
No—fly me, fly me, ſpread th' impatient ſail,
Steal the lark's wing, and mount the ſwifteſt gale;
Skim the vaſt ocean, freeze beneath the pole,
Renounce me, curſe me, root me from thy ſoul;
Fly, fly, for juſtice bares the arm of God,
And the graſp'd vengeance only waits his nod.
Are theſe thy wiſhes? can they thus inſpire?
Does frenzy form them, or does grace aſpire?
Can Abelard, in hurricanes of zeal,
Betray his heart, and teach thee not to feel?
Teach thy enamour'd ſpirit to diſown
Each human warmth, and chill thee into ſtone?
Ah! rather let my tendereſt accents move
The laſt wild accents of unholy love;
On that dear boſom trembling let me lie,
Pour out my ſoul, and in fierce raptures die,
Rouſe all my paſſions, act my joys new.
Farewell, ye cells! ye martyr'd ſaints, adieu!
Sleep, conſcience! ſleep, each awful thought be drown'd,
And ſevenfold darkneſs veil the ſcene around.
What means this pauſe, this agonizing ſtart,
This glimpſe of heav'n quick ruſhing through my heart?
Methinks I ſee a radiant croſs diſplay'd——
A wounded Saviour bleeds along the ſhade:
Around th' expiring God bright angels fly,
Swell the loud hymn, and open all the ſky.
O ſave me, ſave me, ere the thunders roll,
And hell's black caverns ſwallow up my ſoul!
Return, ye hours! when, guiltleſs of a ſtain,
My ſtrong-plum'd genius throbb'd in every vein;
When, warm'd with all th' Egyptian fancs inſpir'd,
All Athens boaſted, and all Rome admir'd;
My merit in its full meridian ſhone,
Each rival bluſhing, and each heart my own.
Return, ye ſcenes!—Ah no! from fancy fly,
On time's ſtretch'd wing, till each idea die,
Eternal fly; ſince all that learning gave,
Too weak to conquer, and too fond to ſave,
To love's ſoft empire every wiſh betray'd,
And left my laurels with'ring in the ſhade.
Let me forget that, while deceitful fame
Graſp'd her ſhrill trump, and fill'd it with my name,
Thy ſtronger charms, empower'd by heaven to move
Each ſaint, each bleſt inſenſible to love,
At once my ſoul from bright ambition won,
I hugg'd the dart, I wiſh'd to be undone:
No more pale ſcience durſt my thoughts engage,
Inſipid dulneſs hung on every page;
The midnight-lamp no more enjoy'd its blaze,
No more my ſpirit flew from maze to maze:
Thy glances bade philoſophy reſign
Her throne to thee, and every ſenſe was thine.
But what could all the froſts of wiſdom do,
Oppos'd to beauty, when it melts in you?
Since theſe dark, cheerleſs, ſolitary caves,
Death-breathing woods, and daily-opening graves,
Miſhapen rocks, wild images of woe,
For ever howling to the deeps below;
Ungenial deſerts, where no vernal ſhow'r [flow'r;
Wakes the green herb, or paints th' unfolding
Th' embrowning glooms theſe holy manſions ſhed,
The night-born horrors brooding o'er my bed,
The diſmal ſcenes black melancholy pours
O'er the ſad viſions of enanguiſh'd hours;
Lean abſtinence, wan grief, low-thoughted care,
Diſtracting guilt, and, hell's worſt fiend, deſpair,
Conſpire in vain, with all the aids of art,
To blot thy dear idea from my heart.
Deluſive, ſightleſs God of warm deſire!
Why wouldſt thou wiſh to ſet a wretch on fire?
Why lives thy ſoft divinity where woe
Heaves the pale ſigh, and anguiſh loves to glow!
Fly to the mead, the daiſy-painted vale,
Breathe in its ſweets, and melt along the gale;
Fly where gay ſcenes luxurious youths employ,
Where ev'ry moment ſteals the wing of joy:
There may'ſt thou ſee, low proſtrate at thy throne,
Devoted ſlaves, and victims all thy own;
Each village-ſwain the turf-built ſhrine ſhall raiſe,
And kings command whole hecatombs to blaze.
O memory! ingenious to revive
Each fleeting hour, and teach the paſt to live,
Witneſs what conflicts this frail boſom tore!
What griefs I ſuffer'd! and what pangs I bore!
How long I ſtruggled, labour'd, ſtrove to ſave
An heart that panted to be ſtill a ſlave! [flame,
When youth, warmth, rapture, ſpirit, love, and
Seiz'd every ſenſe, and burnt through all my frame;
From youth, warmth, rapture, to theſe wilds I fled,
My food the herbage, and the rock my bed.
There, while theſe venerable cloiſters riſe
O'er the bleak ſurge, and gain upon the ſkies,
My wounded ſoul indulg'd the tear to flow
O'er all her ſad viciſſitudes of woe;
Proſuſe of life, and yet afraid to die,
Guilt in my heart, and horror in my eye,
With ceaſeleſs pray'rs, the whole artill'ry giv'n
To win the mercies of offended Heav'n,
Each hill, made vocal, echoed all around,
While my torn breaſt knock'd bleeding on the ground.
Yet, yet, alas! though all my moments fly,
Stain'd by a tear, and darken'd in a ſigh,

Though meagre fasts have on my cheeks display'd
The dusk of death, and sunk me to a shade,
Spite of myself the still-impoisoning dart
Shoots through my blood, and drinks up all my heart:
My vows and wishes wildly disagree,
And grace itself mistakes my God for thee.
Athwart the glooms that wrap the midnight-sky,
My Eloisa steals upon my eye;
For ever rises in the solar ray,
A phantom brighter than the blaze of day.
Where'er I go, the visionary guest
Pants on my lip, or sinks upon my breast;
Unfolds her sweets, and, throbbing to destroy,
Winds round my heart in luxury of joy;
While loud hosannas shake the shrines around,
I hear her softer accents in the sound;
Her idol-beauties on each altar glare,
And heav'n much injur'd has but half my pray'r:
No tears can drive her hence, no pangs controul,
For ev'ry object brings her to my soul.
Last night, reclining on yon airy steep,
My busy eyes hung brooding o'er the deep;
The breathless whirlwinds slept in ev'ry cave,
And the soft moon-beam danc'd from wave to wave;
Each former bliss in this bright mirror seen,
With all my glories, dawn'd upon the scene,
Recall'd the dear auspicious hour anew,
When my fond soul to Eloisa flew;
When, with keen speechless agonies oppress'd,
Thy frantic lover snatch'd thee to his breast,
Gaz'd on thy blushes, arm'd with ev'ry grace,
And saw the goddess beaming in thy face;
Saw thy wild, trembling, ardent wishes move
Each pulse to rapture, and each glance to love.
But lo! the winds descend, the billows roar,
Foam to the clouds, and burst upon the shore,
Vast peals of thunder o'er the ocean roll,
The flame-wing'd lightning gleams from pole to pole.
At once the pleasing images withdrew,
And more than horrors crowded on my view:
Thy uncle's form, in all his ire array'd,
Serenely dreadful, stalk'd along the shade:
Pierc'd by his sword I sunk upon the ground,
The spectre ghastly smil'd upon the wound;
A group of black infernals round me hung,
And toss'd my infamy from tongue to tongue.
Detested wretch! how impotent thy age!
How weak thy malice! and how kind thy rage!
Spite of thyself, inhuman as thou art,
Thy murdering hand has left me all my heart;
Left me each tender, fond affection warm,
A nerve to tremble, and an eye to charm.
No, cruel, cruel, exquisite in ill
Thou thought'st it dull barbarity to kill;
My death hath robb'd lost vengeance of her toil,
And scarcely warm'd a Scythian to a smile:
Sublimer furies taught thy soul to glow
With all their savage mysteries of woe;
Taught thy unfeeling pomard to destroy
The powers of nature and the source of joy;
To stretch me on the racks of vain desire,
Each passion throbbing, and each wish on fire;
Mad to enjoy, unable to be blest,
Fiends in my veins and hell within my breast.
Aid me, fair faith! assist me, grace divine!
Ye martyrs! bless me, and, ye saints! refine:
Ye sacred groves! ye heav'n-devoted walls!
Where folly sickens, and where virtue calls;
Ye vows! ye altars! from this bosom tear
Voluptuous love and leave no anguish there:
Oblivion! be thy blackest plume display'd
O'er all my griefs, and hide me in the shade;
And thou, too fondly idoliz'd! attend
While awful reason whispers in the friend.
Friend, did I say! Immortals! what a name!
Can dull, cold friendship own so wild a flame?
No; let thy lover, whose enkindling eye
Shot all his soul between thee and the sky,
Whose warmth bewitch'd thee, whose unhallow'd song
Call'd thy rapt ear to die upon his tongue,
Now strongly rouse, while heav'n his zeal inspires,
Diviner transports, and more holy fires;
Calm all thy passions, all thy peace restore,
And teach that snowy breast to heave no more.
Torn from the world, within dark cells immur'd,
By angels guarded, and by vows secur'd,
To all that once awoke thy fondness dead,
And hope, pale sorrow's last sad refuge, fled;
Why wilt thou weep, and sigh, and melt in vain,
Brood o'er false joys, and hug th' ideal chain?
Say, canst thou wish that madly wild to fly
From yon bright portal opening in the sky,
Thy Abelard should bid his God adieu,
Pant at thy feet, and taste thy charms anew?
Ye heav'ns! if, to this tender bosom woo'd,
Thy mere idea harrows up my blood;
If one faint glimpse of Eloise can move
The fiercest, mildest agonies of love;
What shall I be, when, dazzling as the light,
Thy whole effulgence flows upon my sight?
Look on thyself, consider who thou art,
And learn to be an abbess in thy heart.
See, while devotion's ever melting strain
Pours the loud organ through the trembling fane,
Yon pious maids each earthly wish disown,
Kiss the dread cross, and crowd upon the throne:
O let thy soul the sacred charge attend,
Their warmths inspirit, and their virtues mend:
Teach every breast from every hymn to steal
The cherub's meekness, and the seraph's zeal;
To rise to rapture, to dissolve away
In dreams of heav'n, and lead thyself the way;
Till all the glories of the blest abode
Blaze on the scene, and every thought is God.
While thus thy exemplary cares prevail,
And make each vestal spotless as her veil,
Th' eternal spirit o'er thy cell shall move
In the soft image of the mystic dove.
The longest gleams of heavenly comfort bring,
Peace in his smile, and healing on his wing;
At once remove affliction from thy breast,
Melt o'er thy soul, and hush her pangs to rest.
O that my soul, from love's curst bondage free,
Could catch the transports that I urge to thee!
O that some angel's more than magic art
Would kindly tear the hermit from his heart!

Extinguiſh every guilty ſenſe, and leave
No pulſe to riot, and no ſigh to heave.
Vain, fruitleſs wiſh! ſtill, ſtill the vig'rous flame
Burſts, like an earthquake, through my ſhatter'd frame;
Spite of the joys that truth and virtue prove,
I feel but thee, and breathe not but to love;
Repent in vain, ſcarce wiſh to be forgiv'n,
Thy form my idol, and thy charms my heav'n.
Yet, yet, my fair! thy nobler efforts try,
Lift me from earth and give me to the ſky;
Let my loſt ſoul thy brighter virtues feel,
Warm'd with thy hopes, and wing'd with all thy zeal.
And when, low-bending at the hallow'd ſhrine,
Thy contrite heart ſhall Abelard reſign;
When pitying Heav'n, impatient to forgive,
Unbars the gates of light and bids thee live;
Seize on th' auſpicious moment ere it flee,
And aſk the fame immortal boon for me.
Then when theſe black terrific ſcenes are o'er,
And rebel nature chills the ſoul no more;
When on thy cheek th' expiring roſes fade,
And thy laſt luſtres darken in the ſhade;
When arm'd with quick varieties of pain,
Or creeping dully flow from vein to vein,
Pale death ſhall ſet my kindred-ſpirit free,
And theſe dead orbs forget to doat on thee;
Some pious friend, whoſe wild affections glow
Like ours in ſad ſimilitude of woe,
Shall drop one tender, ſympathizing tear
Prepare the garland, and adorn the bier;
Our lifeleſs relics in one tomb enſhrine,
And teach thy genial duſt to mix with mine.
Meanwhile, divinely purg'd from every ſtain,
Our active ſouls ſhall climb th' ethereal plain,
To each bright cherub's purity aſpire,
Catch all his zeal, and pant with all his fire;
There, where no face the glooms of anguiſh wears,
No uncle murders, and no paſſion tears,
Enjoy with heav'n eternity of reſt,
For ever bleſſing, and for ever bleſt.

AN ELEGY

TO THE MEMORY OF CAPTAIN HUGHES,

A particular friend of the Author's.

VAIN were the taſk to give the ſoul to glow,
The nerve to kindle, and the verſe to flow;
When the fond mourner, hid from ev'ry eye,
Bleeds in the anguiſh of too keen a ſigh;
And, loſt to glory, loſt to all his fire,
Forgets the port before he graſps the lyre.
Nature! 'tis thine with manly warmth to mourn:
Expiring virtue, and the cloſing urn;
To teach, dear ſeraph! o'er the good and wiſe
The dirge to murmur, and the buſt to riſe.

VARIATIONS.

Ver. 6, 7.
Forgets the poet ere he graſps the lyre.
Friendſhip! 'tis thine with manly warmth to mourn:

Come then, O guileleſs of the tear of art!
Sprung from the ſky, and thron'd within the heart!
O come, in all the pomp of grief array'd,
And weep the warrior, whilſt I grace the ſhade.
'Tis o'er—the bright deluſive ſcene is o'er,
And war's proud viſions mock the ſoul no more;
The laurel fades, th' imperial car retires,
All youth ennobles, and all worth admires.
Alas! my Hughes! and muſt this mourning verſe
Reſign thy triumph to attend thy hearſe!
Was it for this that friendſhip's genial flame
Woke all my wiſhes from the trance of fame?
Was it for this I left the hallow'd page,
Where ev'ry ſcience beams of ev'ry age; [ſcene,
On thought's ſtrong pinion rang'd the martial
From Rome's firſt Cæſar to the great Eugene;
Explor'd th' embattled van, the deep'ning line,
Th' enambuſh'd phalanx, and the ſpringing mine;
Then, pale with horror, bent the ſuppliant knee,
And heav'd the ſigh, and dropp'd the tear for thee!
What bootsit now, that when, with hideous roar,
The gath'ring tempeſt howl'd from ev'ry ſhore,
Some pitying angel, vigilant to ſave, [wave?
Spread all his plumes, and ſnatch'd thee from the
Preſerv'd thee ſacred from the fell diſeaſe, [breeze?
When the blue plague had ſir'd th' autumnal
Ah! when my hero panted to engage
Where all the battle burſt in all its rage;
Where dreadful flew the miſſive deaths around,
And the mad faulchion bluſh'd from wound to wound;
Was he deny'd the privilege to bleed,
Sav'd on the main to fall upon the Tweed?
Ye Graces! tell with what addreſs he ſtole
The liſt'ning ear, and open'd all the ſoul. [riſe,
What though rough winter bade his whirlwinds
Hid his pale ſuns, and frown'd along his ſkies,
Pour'd the big deluge on the face of day,
My Hughes was here to ſmile the glooms away,
With all the luxuries of ſound to move
The pulſe of glory, or the ſigh of love,
And, ſpite of winter, laſſitude, or pain,
Taught life and joy to throb in ev'ry vein.
Fancy! dear artiſt of the mental pow'r!
Fly,—fetch my genius to the ſocial hour;
Give me again his glowing ſenſe to warm,
His ſong to warble, and his wit to charm.
Alas! alas! how impotently true
Th' aërial pencil forms the ſcene anew!
E'en now, when all the viſion beams around,
And my ear kindles with th' ideal ſound——
Juſt as the Smiles, the Graces live impreſt,
And all his image takes up all my breaſt——

My Hughes was here to ſmile the gloom away,
Ver. 61.
Juſt as the Smiles, the Graces are impreſt,

Some gloomy phantom brings the awful bier,
And the ſhort rapture melts into a tear.
Thus in the lake's clear cryſtal we deſcry
The bright diffuſion of a radiant ſky——
Reflected nature ſheds a milder green;
While half her foreſts float into the ſcene.
Ah! as we gaze the luckleſs zephyr flies,
The ſurface trembles, and the picture dies.
O bleſt with all that youth can give to pleaſe,
The form majeſtic, and the mien of eaſe,
Alike empower'd by nature, and by art,
To ſtorm the rampart. and to win the heart;
Correct of manners, delicate of mind,
With ſpirit humble, and with truth refin'd;
For public life's meridian ſunſhine made,
Yet known to ev'ry virtue of the ſhade;
In war while all the trumps of fame inſpire,
Each paſſion roving, and each wiſh on fire;
At home, without or vanity, or rage;
As ſoft as pity, and as cool as age.
Theſe were thy virtues—theſe will ſtill be juſt,
Light all their beams, and blaze upon thy duſt;
While pride in vain ſolemnity bequeaths
To pow'r her ſtatues, and to guilt her wreathes:
O, warm'd by faction, impudently flings
The price of nations on the urns of kings.

THE EQUALITY OF HUMAN CONDITIONS:

A POETICAL DIALOGUE:

Spoken at the Annual Viſitation of Tunbridge School, 1746,

BY MESSRS. M—— AND A——.

M—.

While airy Belville, guiltleſs of a ſchool,
Shines out a French edition of a fool,
Studies his learned tailor once a week,
But curſes ev'ry ſyllable of Greek;
I ſit, and think o'er all that Sparta fir'd,
That Athens boaſted, and that Rome admir'd.
Enraptur'd fancy, buſied with the theme,
Forms ev'ry bright idea to a dream,
Paints all the charming pageantry anew,
And brings at once each claſſic to my view.
Now, fondly wild, I thunder in the war,
Shake the keen ſpear, and mount th' imperial car;
With daring Regulus to Carthage run,
Or nobly bleed with Brutus in a ſon;
Seize, Caſca-like, on Cæſar's gorgeous veſt,
And boldly plant a dagger in his breaſt.
Now, ſoftly breathing all the Muſe's fire,
I drop the faulchion, and I graſp the lyre;
With Pindar's pinion ſkim the bleſt abode,
Or ſtrive to charm Auguſtus with an ode.
Come then, my Lelius! come, my joy and pride!
Whoſe friendſhip ſoothes me, while thy precepts guide;
Thou, whoſe quick eye has glanc'd through every age,
View'd ev'ry ſcene, and ſtudied ev'ry page;
Teach me, like thee, with ev'ry virtue bleſt,
To catch each eye, and ſteal to ev'ry breaſt;
To riſe to all that in each patriot ſhone,
And make each hero's happineſs my own.
Say, ſhall I, with a triumph in my view,
Fame's air-dreſs'd goddeſs through each ſcene purſue;
Ambitious court her in the pomp of war,
Aud number every trophy by a ſcar?
Shall I, with Solon, form the moral plan,
And aim to mould a ſavage to a man?
Or, pleas'd to rival every Grecian ſage,
Glean Plato's ſenſe, and copy Homer's rage.

A—.

You aſk me, Sir! what few would care to give,
Some grave inſtructions how you ought to live.
You wiſh that envied bliſsful ſcene to find,
That charms the taſte, and dignifies the mind;
That nobly mingles every art to pleaſe,
And joins the majeſty of life to eaſe.
Hear then, my friend! the doctrine I diſcloſe,
As true as if diſplay'd in pompous proſe;
As if Locke's ſacred hand the page had wrote,
And every doctor ſtamp'd it with a vote.
All lots are equal, and all ſtates the ſame,
Alike in merit, though unlike in name.
In reaſon's eye no difference lies between
Life's noon-day luſtres or her milder ſcene.
'Tis not the plate that dignifies the board,
Nor all the titles blazing round a lord;
'Tis not the ſplendid plume, th' embroider'd veſt,
The gorgeous ſword-knot, or the martial creſt,
That lends to life the ſmile. the jeſt, the glee,
Or makes his honour happier than me.
When Florio's acres ſtretch'd o'er half the land,
A gilded chariot roll'd him through the ſtrand:
Reduc'd at laſt with humbler ſcenes to mix,
He ſmok'd a ſpeculative pipe at Dick's.
The ſame great genius, in or out of pow'r—
Eaſe ſmooth'd his brow, and ſoften'd ev'ry hour;
Taught him to live as happy in a ſhed,
As when a ducheſs grac'd his nuptial bed.
Content's the port all mortals wiſh to hail:
She points the compaſs, and ſhe guides the ſail.
To her alone our leaky veſſels roll
Through all the ſeas that rage from pole to pole.
What boots it then, when gath'ring ſtorms behind
Riſe black in air, and howl in ev'ry wind,
That thy rich ſhip a pomp of pride diſplay'd,
Her maſts all cedar, and her ſails brocade!

Say, canſt thou think the tempeſt will diſcern
A ſilken cable, or a painted ſtern;
Huſh the wild tumult that tornados bring,
And kindly ſpare the yacht that holds a king?
No, no, my friend! if ſkilful pilots guide,
And Heav'n auſpicious calms the whirling tide,
No winds diſtreſs you, and no ſtorm deſtroys,
Whether you ſail in gondolas or hoys.

M—.

What, has juſt Heav'n no ſlight diſtinction made
Betwixt a life of ſunſhine and of ſhade?
Muſt I, in ſilence, this wild ſyſtem own,
And think a cottage equal to a throne?
Sure if I did, my friends would ſoon beſtow
A few ſtout cords, and ſend me to Monro.
Your tailor, ſkill'd in faſhion's ev'ry grace,
Decks you in all the pageantry of lace,
Lives in a cell, and eats from week to week,
An homely meal of cabbage and ox-cheek.
You walk majeſtic in a nobler ſcene,
Guiltleſs of ev'ry anguiſh, but the ſpleen;
With all the luxury of ſtateſmen dine
On daily feaſts of ortolans and wine.
Then tell me, ſir! if this deſcription's true,
Is not your tailor leſs at eaſe than you?
Hardwicke, great patriot! envy'd, lov'd, careſt,
Mark'd by each eye, and hugg'd to ev'ry breaſt;
Whoſe bright example learns us to admire
All Cowper's graces, and all Talbot's fire—
Firm to his truſt, whatever bribes aſſail,
Truth guides his ſword, and juſtice holds his ſcale.
Say, is not he more happy than the throng
Of beardleſs templars melting o'er a ſong?
Than him, who, buried in a country town,
Engroſſes half a folio for a crown.
Heroic glory in the martial ſcene
Spread ev'ry plume to dignify Eugene—
On Marlbro's helmet ſat, in all her pride,
And proudly frown'd at all the world beſide.
And ſure you'd think it a moſt ſad diſgrace
If enſigns liv'd as eaſy as his grace.

A—.

Dear Sir! reſtrain the prejudice of youth,
And calmly liſten to the voice of truth.
When firſt th' Almighty fire his work began,
And ſpoke the mingling atoms into man,
To all the race with gracious hand was giv'n
One common foreſt, and one equal heav'n;
They ſhar'd alike this univerſal ball,
The ſons of freedom, and the lords of all.
The poets too this ſacred truth diſplay'd,
From cloud-topt Pindus to the Latian ſhade.
They ſung that ere Pandora, fond of ſtrife,
Let looſe each embryo-miſery of life,
All nature brighten'd in one golden age,
Each ſire a monarch, and each ſon a ſage;
Eternal bleſſings flow'd to all the race,
Alike in riches, as alike in place.
Suppoſe then, Sir, that new diſtinctions ſince
Have plac'd a ſlave ſome leagues below a prince;
Yet eaſe and joy, diſpaſſion'd reaſon owns,
As often viſit cottages as thrones.
See! in yon valley, while the mellowing grain
Embrowns the ſlope, and nods along the plain,
A crowd of ruſtics doom'd to daily toil,
Diſarm the foreſt, or enrich the ſoil;
Not in that elegance of dreſs array'd
That charm'd Arcadia's hills, and Tempe's ſhade;
Where Thyrſis, ſhelter'd in ſome happier grove,
The lonely ſcene of ſolitude and love,
His breaſt all rapture, and his ſoul on fire,
Now wove the garland, and now ſwept the lyre:
No,—'tis plain Colin, Hobbinol, and Ned,
Unſkill'd in numbers as in books unread.
Who ſcorn the winter's deadly blaſt to ſhun,
But face the ſtorm, and drudge through ev'ry ſun;
Then ſeek the cottage, where the homely bowl
Smooths ev'ry brow, and opens ev'ry ſoul;
Speeds the ſame ſocial warmth from breaſt to breaſt,
And bids them laugh at Verres and his creſt.
When honeſt Colin ſees the ſhining all
That gilds the 'Change, and dignifies Whitehall,
Loſt in the ſcenes of turbulence and ſtrife,
The farce of grandeur, and the pomp of life,
He ſteals impatient to his native ſhade,
And longs to graſp his waggon and his ſpade;
Heedleſs of ev'ry charm, of ev'ry grace,
That forms the goddeſs in Fitzwalter's face,
That lends to Finch her majeſty of mien—
He would not change his Suſan for a queen.
Believe me, Sir! diſtinction, pomp, and noiſe,
Corrupt our tempers, as they cloud our joys:
And ſurely, when the ſocial ſpirit's broke,
A ſtar's a gewgaw, and a lord's a joke.
Without thoſe robes, thoſe gorgeous bagatelles,
That deck our nobles, and that charm our belles;
Without a crane-neck'd chariot's ſmooth career;
Without the wealth of Indus in your ear;
Without a group of pictures dearly bought,
Where Titian's colours vie with Guido's thought;
Without the fruits of Spain, the wines of France;
Without an opera, and without a dance;
You may live happy, as grave doctors tell,
At Rome, at Tunbridge, in a grot or cell.
From ſky to ſky th' imperial bird of Jove
Spreads his broad wing, and thund'ring graſps his love;
The mighty bull, by genial zephyr fway'd,
Enraptur'd courts his heifer to the ſhade;
The feather'd warblers pair on ev'ry ſpray,
The grove re-echoing with the ſprightly lay;
While the gay tribe of inſects bliſsful ſhare
The joys of love, and people all the air.
All, all that in the depths of ocean lie,
Graze on the plain, or ſkim along the ſky,
Fondly purſue the end by nature giv'n,
Life all their aim, and quiet all their heav'n.
If then no ſongſters grudge the bear his thigh,
The hound his noſtril, or the lynx his eye;
Nor feel a pang though Afric's ſhaggy brood
Majeſtic ſtalk the monarchs of the wood;
Why ſhould you think your ſolitude a tomb,
If Pulteney has a title and a plumb?

M—.

But ſoft—reſtrain this turbulence of war,
This mimic image of the wordy bar;
Leſt you ſhould ſeem to copy Henly's lore,
Who gravely kills objections by the ſcore.
Behold that wretch, by every woe diſtreſs'd,
Want in his eye, and horror in his breaſt;
A thouſand nameleſs agonies of pain
Rack ev'ry nerve, and burn through ev'ry vein;

He lives to ſuffer, and but ſpeaks to moan,
And numbers every minute by a groan.
Is he then happy? bleſt with every joy
That glows on Cecil's cheek, or Dorſet's eye?
Shall we proclaim him bleſt, without rebuke,
And rank a martyr'd beggar with a duke?

A—.

Believe me, Sir, each mortal has his ſear,
Each ſoul an anguiſh, and each eye a tear;
Aches, pains, and fevers, every breaſt aſſail,
And haunt alike the city and the vale.
What though in pomp your painted veſſels roll,
Fraught with the gems that glare from pole to pole,—
Though health auſpicious gilds your every grace,
Nerves the ſtrong limb, and bluſhes o'er the face;
Though grac'd with all that dignity of wit
That charm'd in Villars, and now charms in Pitt;
Poſſeſs'd of all the eloquence that hung
On Tully's lip, and drops from Murray's tongue;
Though all the titles, coronets, and ſtars,
That ſtateſmen aim at, and that Malton bears,
Enrich your ſcutcheon, dignify your creſt,
Beam on your coach, and blaze upon your breaſt;
Can they forbid the ſecret ill to glow,
The pang to torture, or the tear to flow?
Confeſs we then that all the ills of life,
Diſeaſes, grief, vexations, follies, ſtrife,
Without diſtinction every ſoul perplex,
Haunt ev'ry ſcene, and prey on all the ſex.
Yet let us own that every pleaſure too
That glads the active, and that wings the ſlow,
Alike indulgent to the rich and poor,
Glides through the land, and knocks at ev'ry door.
Hear then, without the ſpecious pride of art,
A truth that ſtrikes the moral to the heart;
A truth that liv'd in Cato's patriot breaſt,
And bade a dying Socrates be bleſt:
All, all but virtue is a ſchool boy's theme,
The air-dreſs'd phantom of a virgin's dream;
A gilded toy that homebred fools deſire,
That coxcombs boaſt of, and that mobs admire:
Her radiant graces every bliſs unfold,
And turn whate'er ſhe touches into gold.

THE BIRTH AND EDUCATION OF GENIUS.

A TALE.

Yes Harriet! ſay whate'er you can,
'Tis education makes the man:
Whate'er of genius we inherit,
Exalted ſenſe, and lively ſpirit,
Muſt all be diſciplin'd by rules,
And take their colour from the ſchools.
'Twas nature gave that cheek to glow,
That breaſt to riſe in hills of ſnow,
Thoſe ſweetly-temper'd eyes to ſhine
Above the ſapphires of the mine.
But all your more majeſtic charms,
Where grace preſides, where ſpirit warms;
That ſhape which falls by juſt degrees,
And flows into the pomp of eaſe;
That ſtep, whoſe motion ſeems to ſwim,
That melting harmony of limb,
Were form'd by Glover's ſkilful glance,
At Chelſea, when you learnt to dance.
'Tis ſo with man.—His talents reſt
Miſſhapen embryos in his breaſt;
Till education's eye explores
The ſleeping intellectual pow'rs,
Awakes the dawn of wit and ſenſe,
And lights them into excellence.
On this depends the patriot flame,
The fine ingenuous feel of fame,
The manly ſpirit, brave and bold,
Superior to the taint of gold,
The dread of infamy, the zeal
Of honour, and the public weal,
And all thoſe virtues which preſage
The glories of a riſing age.
But, leaving all theſe graver things
To ſtateſmen, moraliſts, and kings,
Whoſe buſineſs 'tis ſuch points to ſettle—
Ring—and bid Robin bring the kettle.
Meanwhile the muſe, whoſe ſportive ſtrain
Flows like her voluntary vein,
And impudently dares aſpire
To ſhare the wreath with Swift and Prior,
Shall tell an allegoric tale,
Where truth lies hid beneath the veil.
One April morn, as Phœbus play'd
His carols in the Delphic ſhade,
A nymph, call'd Fancy, blithe and free,
The fav'rite child of Liberty,
Heard, as ſhe rov'd about the plain,
The bold enthuſiaſtic ſtrain;
She heard, and led by warm deſire,
To know the artiſt of the lyre,
Crept ſoftly to a ſweet alcove,
Hid in the umbrage of the grove,
And, peeping through the myrtle, ſaw
A handſome, young, celeſtial beau,
On nature's ſopha ſtretch'd along,
Awaking harmony and ſong.
Struck with his fine majeſtic mien,
As certain to be lov'd as ſeen,
Long ere the melting air was o'er
She cry'd, in eceſtacy, Encore:
And, what a prude will think but odd,
Popp'd out, and curtſey'd to the god.
Phœbus, gallant, polite, and keen as
Each earth-born votary of Venus,
Roſe up, and with a graceful air
Addreſs'd the viſionary fair;
Excus'd his morning diſhabille,
Complain'd of late he had been ill.
In ſhort, he gaz'd, he bow'd, he ſigh'd,
He ſung, he flatter'd, preſs'd, and ly'd,
With ſuch a witchery of art,
That Fancy gave him all her heart,
Her catechiſm quite forgot,
And waited on him to his grot.
In length of time ſhe bore a ſon,
As brilliant as his ſire the Sun.
Pure ether was the vital ray
That lighted up his ſiner clay;
The nymphs, the roſy-finger'd hours,
The dryads of the woods and bow'rs,
The graces with their looſen'd zones,
The muſes with their harps and crowns,

Young zephyrs of the ſofteſt wing,
The loves that wait upon the ſpring,
Wit with his gay aſſociate mirth,
Attended at the infant's birth,
And ſaid, let Genius be his name,
And his the faireſt wreath of fame.
The goſſips gone, the chriſt'ning o'er,
And Genius now 'twixt three and four,
Phœbus, according to the rule,
Reſolv'd to ſend his ſon to ſchool:
And, knowing well the tricks of youth,
Reſign'd him to the matron Truth,
Whoſe hut, unknown to pride and pelf, was
Near his own oracle at Delphos.
The rev'rend dame, who found the child
A little miſchievous, and wild,
Taught him at firſt to ſpell and read,
To ſay his prayers, and get his creed—
Would often tell him of the ſky,
And what a crime it is to lie.
She chid him when he did amiſs,
When well, ſhe bleſs'd him with a kiſs.
Her ſiſter temp'rance, ſage, and quiet,
Preſided at his meals and diet:
She watch'd him with religious care,
And fed him with the ſimpleſt fare;
Would never let the urchin eat
Of pickled pork, or butcher's meat.
But what of aliment earth yields
In gardens, orchards, woods, and fields;
Whate'er of vegetable wealth
Was cultur'd by the hand of health,
She cropp'd and dreſs'd it, as ſhe knew well,
In many a meſs of ſoup and gruel;
And now and then, to cheer his heart,
Indulg'd him with a Sunday's tart.
A luſty peaſant chanc'd to dwell
Hard by the ſolitary cell:
His name was Labour.—Ere the dawn
Had broke upon the upland lawn,
He hied him to his daily toil,
To turn the glebe, or mend the ſoil.
With him young Genius oft would go
O'er dreary waſtes of ice and ſnow,
With rapture climb the cloud-topt hill,
Or wade acroſs the ſhallow rill;
Or through th' entangled wood purſue
The footſteps of a ſtraggling ewe.
By theſe fatigues he got at length
Robuſtneſs, and athletic ſtrength,
Spirits as light as flies the gale
Along the lily-ſilver'd vale.
The cherub health, of dimple ſleek,
Sat radiant on his roſy cheek,
And gave each nerve's elaſtic ſpring
The vigour of an eaglet's wing.
Time now had roll'd, with ſmooth career,
Our hero through his ſeventh year.
Though in a ruſtic cottage bred,
The buſy imp had thought and read:
He knew th' adventures, one by one,
Of Robin Hood and Little John;
Could ſing with ſpirit, warmth, and grace,
The woeful hunt of Chevy Chace;
And how St. George, his fiery nag on,
Deſtroy'd the vaſt Egyptian dragon.
Chief he admir'd that learned piece
Wrote by the fabuliſt of Greece,
Where wiſdom ſpeaks in crows and cocks,
And cunning ſneaks into a fox.
In ſhort, as now his op'ning parts,
Ripe for the culture of the arts,
Became in ev'ry hour acuter,
Apollo look'd out for a tutor;
But had a world of pains to find
This artiſt of the human mind.
For, in good truth, full many an aſs was
Among the doctors of Parnaſſus,
Who ſcarce had ſkill enough to teach
Old Lilly's elements of ſpeech;
And knew as much of men and morals
As doctor Rock of ores and corals.
At length, with much of thought and care,
He found a maſter for his heir;
A learned man, adroit to ſpeak
Pure Latin, and your attic Greek;
Well known in all the courts of fame,
And Criticiſm was his name.
Beneath a tutor keen and fine as
Or Ariſtotle, or Longinus,
Beneath a lynx's eye that ſaw
The ſlighteſt literary flaw,
Young Genius trod the path of knowledge,
And grew the wonder of the college.
Old authors were his boſom friends—
He had them at his finger's-ends—
Became an acc'rate imitator
Of truth, propriety, and nature;
Diſplay'd in every juſt remark
The ſtrong ſagacity of Clark;
And pointed out the falſe and true
With all the ſun beams of Boſſu.
But though this critic ſage refin'd
His pupil's intellectual mind,
And gave him all that keen diſcerning
Which marks the character of learning;
Yet, as he read with much of glee
The triſles of antiquity,
And, Bentley like, would write epiſtles
About the origin of whiſtles;
The ſcholar took his maſter's trim,
And grew identically him;
Employ'd a world of pains to teach us
What nation firſt invented breeches;
Aſſerted that the Roman ſocks
Were broider'd with a pair of clocks;
That Capua ſerv'd up with her victuals
An olio of Venafran pickles;
That Sifygambis dreſs'd in blue,
And wore her treſſes in a queue.
In ſhort, he knew what Paulus Jovius,
Salmaſius, Grævius, and Gronovius,
Have ſaid in fifty folio volumes,
Printed by Elzevir in columns.
Apollo ſaw, with pride and joy,
The vaſt improvement of his boy;
But yet had more than ſlight ſuſpicion,
That all this load of erudition
Might overlay his parts at once,
And turn him out a letter'd dunce.
He ſaw the lad had fill'd his ſenſe
With things of little conſequence;

That though he read, with application,
The wits of every age and nation,
And could, with nice preciſion, reach
The boldeſt metaphors of ſpeech;
Yet warp'd too much, in truth's defiance,
From real to fictitious ſcience,
He was, with all his pride and parts,
A mere mechanic in the arts,
That meaſures with a rule and line
What nature meant for great and fine.
Phœbus, who ſaw it right and wiſe was,
To counteract this fatal bias,
Took home his ſon with mighty haſte,
And ſent him to the ſchool of taſte.
This ſchool was built by wealth and peace,
Some ages ſince, in elder Greece,
Juſt when the Stagyrite had writ
His lectures on the pow'rs of wit.
Here, fluſh'd in all the bloom of youth,
Sat beauty in the ſhrine of truth.
Here, all the finer arts were ſeen
Aſſembled round their virgin queen.
Here, ſculpture on a bolder plan
Ennobled marble into man.
Here, muſic, with a ſoul on fire,
Impaſſion'd, breath'd along the lyre;
And here, the painter muſe diſplay'd
Diviner forms of light and ſhade.
But, ſuch the fate, as Heſiod ſings,
Of all our ſublunary things,
When now the Turk, with ſword and halters,
Had drove religion from her altars,
And delug'd with a ſea of blood
The academic dome and wood;
Affrighted taſte, with wings unfurl'd,
Took refuge in the weſtern world;
And ſettled on the Tuſcan main,
With all the muſes in his train.
In this calm ſcene, where taſte withdrew,
And ſcience trimm'd her lamp anew;
Young Genius rang'd in every part
The viſionary worlds of art,
And from their finiſh'd forms refin'd
His own congenial warmth of mind,
And learn'd with happy ſkill to trace
The magic powers of eaſe and grace:
His ſtyle grew delicately fine,
His numbers flow'd along his line,
His periods manly, full. and ſtrong,
Had all the harmony of ſong.
Whene'er his images betray'd
Too ſtrong a light, too weak a ſhade,
Or in the graceful and the grand
Confeſs'd inelegance of hand,
His noble maſter, who could ſpy
The ſlighteſt fault with half an eye,
Set right by one ethereal touch,
What ſeem'd too little or too much;
Till every attitude and air
Aroſe ſupremely full and fair.
Genius was now among his betters
Diſtinguiſh'd as a man of letters.
There wanted ſtill, to make him pleaſe,
The ſplendour of addreſs and eaſe,
The ſoul-enchanting mien and air,
Such as we ſee in Groſvenor-Square
When Lady Charlotte ſpeaks and moves,
Attended by a ſwarm of loves.
Genius had got, to ſay the truth,
A manner awkward and uncouth;
Sure fare of all who love to dwell
In wiſdom's ſolitary cell:
So much a clown in gait, and laugh,
He wanted but a ſcrip and ſtaff;
And ſuch a beard as hung in candles
Down to Diogenes's ſandals,
And planted all his chin thick,
To be like him a dirty cynic.
Apollo, who, to do him right,
Was always perfectly polite,
Chagrin'd to ſee his ſon and heir
Diſhonour'd by his gape and ſtare,
Reſolv'd to ſend him to Verſailles,
To learn a minuet of Marſeilles:
But Venus, who had deeper reading
In all the myſteries of breeding,
Obſerv'd to Phœbus, that the name
Of ſop and Frenchman was the ſame.
French manners were, ſhe ſaid, a thing which
Thoſe grave miſguided fools, the Engliſh,
Had, in deſpite of common ſenſe,
Miſtook for manly excellence;
By which their nation ſtrangely ſunk is,
And half their nobles turn'd to monkeys.
She thought it better, as the caſe was,
To ſend young Genius to the graces:
Thoſe ſweet divinities, ſhe ſaid,
Would form him in the myrtle ſhade;
And teach him more, in half an hour,
Than Lewis or his pompadour.
Phœbus agreed—the graces took
Their noble pupil from his book,
Allow'd him at their ſide to rove
Along their own domeſtic grove,
Amidſt the ſound of melting lyres,
Soft-wreathing ſmiles, and young deſires:
And when confin'd by winds or ſhow'rs,
Within their amaranthine how'rs,
They taught him with addreſs and ſkill
To ſhine at ombre and quadrille;
Or let him read an ode or play,
To wing the gloomy hour away.
Genius was charm'd---divinely plac'd
'Midſt beauty, wit, politeneſs, taſte;
And, having every hour before him
The fineſt models of decorum,
His manners took a fairer ply,
Expreſſion kindled in his eye:
His geſture diſengag'd, and clean,
Set off a fine majeſtic mien;
And gave his happy pow'r to pleaſe
The nobleſt elegance of eaſe.
Thus, by the diſcipline of art,
Genius ſhone out in head and heart.
Form'd from his firſt fair bloom in youth,
By Temp'rance and her ſiſter Truth,
He knew the ſcientific page
Of every clime and every age;
Had learnt with critic ſkill to rein
The wildneſs of his native vein;
That critic-ſkill, though cool and chaſte,
Refin'd beneath the eye of Taſte;

His unforbidding mien and air,
His awkward gait, his haughty ſtare,
And every ſtain that wit debaſes,
Were melted off among the Graces;
And Genius roſe, in form and mind,
The firſt, the greateſt of mankind.

A LETTER TO A CLERGYMAN,

Occaſioned by a report of his Patron's being made one of the Lords Commiſſioners of the Great Seal, 1756.

If fame, dear Mun! the truth reveals,
Your friend, the baron, has the ſeals,
With two compeers, his reverend brothers,---
Willes and Sir Eardly, are the others.
Juſtice, who long had ſeen impreſt
Her faireſt image on his breaſt,
Plac'd him her ſubſtitute, to awe
The nation on her bench of law!
And now, to make her work complete,
Has thron'd him on her mercy-ſeat.
I'll hold you, Mun! an honeſt guinea,
That peſt ambition's buſy in you;
You mind no more your little crops,
Nor ever aſk the price of hops;
Nor grieve about ſuch idle things
As half the trumps, and all the kings:
But, bleſt each night with objects brighter,
Behold a viſionary mitre;
And ſee the verger near you ſtand
Majeſtic with his ſilver wand.
Well---if, as matters now foretel it,
It is your fate to be a prelate;
Though loth to loſe the comic ſtrain,
The ſong, and ev'ry mirthful vein,
Which oft have made me full of glee,
And kept my ſpirits up till three;
Yet, fond to ſee, when pray'rs begin,
E——d, thy heteroclite chin,
With all that venerable buſh on,
Repoſing on a velvet cuſhion;
I would the man of humour quit,
And think the biſhop worth the wit.
But, hark you, L——r! as you mean
To be a biſhop, or a dean,
And muſt, of courſe, look grave, and big,
I'd have you get a better wig:
You know full well, when cheek by jole,
We waited on his Grace at Knowl;
Though that trim artiſt, barber Jackſon,
Spent a whole hour about your caxon,
With irons hot, and fingers plaſtic,
To make it look eccleſiaſtic;
With all his pains, and combs, and care,
He ſcarce could curl a ſingle hair.
It would be right too, let me tell you,
To buy a gown of new prunella;
And bid your maid, the art who knows,
Repair your caſſoc at the elbows.
Lord! what a ſudden alteration
Will wait on your exalted ſtation!
Cawthorn, too proud a prince to flatter,
Who calls thee nought but Mun and L——r,
Will now put on a ſofter mien,
And learn to liſp out Mr. Dean;
Or, if you're made a mitred peer,
Humbly entreat your grace's ear.
Poor Adams too, will ſunk and ſtare,
And trembling ſteal behind your chair;
Or elſe, with holy zeal addreſſing,
Drop on his knees, and aſk your bleſſing.
And now, my worthy friend! ere yet
We read it in the next Gazette,
That Tueſday laſt a royal writ
Was ſent by Secretary Pitt
To all and ſingular the ſtalls
Prebendal in the church of Paul's,
Commanding them to chooſe and name
A biſhop of unſpotted fame:
And warmly recommending thee
As prelate of the vacant ſee;
It will not be amiſs to know
Beforehand what you have to do.
Firſt, as you'll want a grave divine
To wait upon you when you dine,
To guard your kitchen from diſorders,
And ſchool the youths who come for orders;
Take not an academic ſaplin,
But, for your life, make S——n chaplain.
He's tall, and ſolemn, ſoft, and ſleek,
Well read in Latin, and in Greek;
A proper man to tell the clerum
About Euſebius, and St. Jerom;
And would as ſoon a fiend embrace as
Give up a jot of Athanaſius.
Then, as to what a biſhop fleeces,
In procurations, fines, and leaſes,
And hoarding up a world of pelf,
You'll want no ſteward but yourſelf:
For, faith! your lordſhip has great ſkill in
The virtues of a ſplendid ſhilling;
And know, as well as Child and Hoare *,
That two and two will make up four.

THE REGULATION OF THE PASSIONS

THE SOURCE OF HUMAN HAPPINESS.

A Moral Eſſay.

Dunque ne l' Uſo per cui fur conceſſe
L' impieghi il foggio Duce, e le governi:
Et a ſuo Senno or tepide, or ardenti,
Le faccia: et or le affretti, et or le allenti.
TASSO.

Yes, yes, dear Stoic! hide it as you can,
The ſphere of pleaſure is the ſphere of man:
This warms our wiſhes, animates our toil,
And forms alike a Newton, or an Hoyle;
Gives all the ſoul to all the ſoul regards,
Whether ſhe deal in planets, or in cards.
In every human breaſt there lives enſhrin'd
Some atom pregnant with th' ethereal mind;
Some plaſtic pow'r, ſome intellectual ray,
Some genial ſun-beam from the ſource of day;
Something that, warm and reſtleſs to aſpire,
Works the young heart, and ſets the ſoul on fire,
And bids us all our inborn pow'rs employ
To catch the phantom of ideal joy.

* Two bankers.

Were it not ſo, the ſoul, all dead and loſt,
Like the tall cliff beneath th' impaſſive froſt,
Form'd for no end, and impotent to pleaſe,
Would lie inactive on the couch of eaſe:
And, heedleſs of proud fame's immortal key,
Sleep all her dull divinity away.

And yet, let but a zephyr's breath begin
To ſtir the latent excellence within---
Wak'd in that moment's elemental ſtrife,
Impaſſion'd genius feels the breath of life;
Th' expanding heart delights to leap and glow,
The pulſe to kindle, and the tear to flow:
Strong and more ſtrong the light celeſtial ſhines,
Each thought ennobles, and each ſenſe refines,
Till all the ſoul, full op'ning to the flame,
Exalts to virtue what ſhe felt for fame.
Hence, juſt as nature points the kindred fire,
One plies the pencil, one awakes the lyre;
This, with an Halley's luxury of ſoul,
Calls the wild needle back upon the pole,
Maps half the winds, and gives the ſail to fly
In ev'ry ocean of the arctic ſky;
While he whoſe vaſt capacious mind explores
All nature's ſcenes, and nature's God adores,
Skill'd in each drug the varying world provides,
All earth emboſoms, and all ocean hides;
Expels, like Heberden, the young diſeaſe,
And ſoftens anguiſh to the ſmile of eaſe.

The paſſions then all human virtue give,
Fill up the ſoul, and lend her ſtrength to live.
To them we owe fair truth's unſpotted page,
The gen'rous patriot, and the moral ſage;
The hand that forms the geometric line,
The eye that pierces through th' unbow'll'd mine,
The tongue that thunders eloquence along,
And the fine ear that melts it into ſong.

And yet theſe paſſions which, on nature's plan,
Call out the hero while they form the man,
Warp'd from the ſacred line that nature gave,
As meanly ruin as they nobly ſave.
Th' ethereal ſoul that heav'n itſelf inſpires
With all its virtues, and with all its fires,
Led by theſe ſyrens to ſome wild extreme,
Sets in a vapour when it ought to beam;
Like a Dutch ſun that in the autumnal ſky
Looks through a fog, and riſes but to die.
But he whoſe active, unencumber'd mind
Leaves this low earth, and all its miſts behind,
Fond in a pure unclouded ſky to glow,
Like the bright orb that riſes on the Po,
O'er half the globe with ſteady ſplendour ſhines,
And ripens virtues as it ripens mines.

Whoever thinks, muſt ſee that man was made
To face the ſtorm, not languiſh in the ſhade:
Action's his ſphere, and, for that ſphere deſign'd,
Eternal pleaſures open on his mind.
For this, fair hope leads on th' impaſſion'd ſoul
Through life's wild labyrinths to her diſtant goal;
Paints in each dream, to fan the genial fame,
The pomp of riches, and the pride of fame;
Or fondly gives reflection's cooler eye
A glance, an image of a future ſky.

Yet, though kind Heav'n points out th' unerring road,
That leads through nature up to bliſs and God;
Spite of that God, and all his voice divine,
Speaks in the heart, or teaches from the ſhrine,
Man, feebly vain, and impotently wiſe,
Diſdains the manna ſent him from the ſkies;
Taſteleſs of all that virtue gives to pleaſe,
For thought too active, and too mad for eaſe,
From wiſh to wiſh in life's mad vortex toſt,
For ever ſtruggling, and for ever loſt;
He ſcorns religion, though her ſeraphs call,
And lives in rapture, or not lives at all.

And now, let looſe to all our hopes and fears,
As pride inſpirits, or ambition tears,
From ev'ry tie, from ev'ry duty freed,
Without a balance, and without a creed,
Dead ev'ry ſenſe, each particle divine,
And all the man embruted in the ſwine;
Theſe drench in luxury's ambroſial bowl
Reaſon's laſt ſpark, and drain off all the ſoul.
Thoſe for vain wealth fly on from pole to pole,
Where winds can waft them, and where ſeas can roll.
While others, wearied with the farce of pow'r,
Or mad with riot in the midnight hour,
With Spain's proud monarch to a cell retire,
Or, Nero like, ſet half the globe on fire.

Stretch'd on high-tow'ring Dover's ſandy bed,
Without a coffin, and without a head;
A dirty ſail-cloth o'er his body thrown,
By marks of miſery almoſt unknown,
Without a friend to pity, or to ſave,
Without a dirge to conſecrate the grave,
Great Suffolk lies——he who for years had ſhone,
England's ſixth Henry! neareſt to thy throne.
What boots it now, that liſt'ning ſenates hung
All ear, all rapture on his angel tongue?
Ah! what avails th' enormous blaze between
His dawn of glory, and his cloſing ſcene!
When haughty France his heav'n-born pow'rs ador'd,
And Anjou's princeſs ſheath'd Britannia's ſword!
Aſk ye what bold conſpiracy oppreſt
A chief ſo honour'd, and a chief ſo bleſt?
Why, luſt of power, that wreck'd his riſing fame
On courts' vain ſhallows, and the gulf of ſhame:
A Glo'ſter's murder, and a nation's wrongs,
Call'd loud for vengeance with ten thouſand tongues;
And haſten'd death, on Albion's chalky ſtrand,
To end the exile by a pirate's hand.

Pleaſure, my friend! on this ſide folly lies;
It may be vig'rous, but it muſt be wiſe:
And when our organs once that end attain,
Each ſtep beyond it is a ſtep to pain.
For aſk the man whoſe appetites purſue
Each looſe Roxana of the ſtew;
Who cannot eat till luxury refine
His taſte, and teach him how to dine;
Who cannot drink till Spain's rich vintage flow,
Mix'd with the coolneſs of December's ſnow:
Aſk him, if all thoſe ecſtaſies that move
The pulſe of rapture, and the rage of love,
When wine, wit, woman, all their pow'rs employ,
And ev'ry ſenſe is loſt in ev'ry joy,
E'er fill'd his heart, and beam'd upon his breaſt
Content's full ſunſhine, with the calm of reſt?

No——virtue only gives fair peace to ſhine
And health, O ſacred temperance! is thine.
Hence the poor peaſant, whoſe laborious ſpade
Rids the rough crag of half its heath and ſhade,
Feels in the quiet of his genial nights
A bliſs more genuine than the club at White's:
And has in full exchange for fame and wealth,
Herculean vigour, and eternal health.
Of blooming genius, judgment, wit, poſſeſs'd,
By poets envied, and by peers careſs'd;
By royal mercy ſav'd from legal doom,
With royal favour crown'd for years to come,
O hadſt thou, Savage! known thy lot to prize,
And ſacred held fair friendſhip's gen'rous ties;
Hadſt thou, ſincere to wiſdom, virtue, truth,
Curb'd the wild ſallies of impetuous youth;
Had but thy life been equal to thy lays,
In vain had envy ſtrove to blaſt thy bays;
In vain thy mother's unrelenting pride
Had ſtrove to puſh thee helpleſs from her ſide;
Fair competence had lent her genial dow'r,
And ſmiling peace adorn'd thy evening-hour;
True pleaſure would have led thee to her ſhrine,
And every friend to merit had been thine.
Bleſs'd with the choiceſt boon that heav'n can give,
Thou then hadſt learnt with dignity to live;
The ſcorn of wealth, the threats of want to brave,
Nor ſought from priſon a refuge in the grave.
Th' immortal Rembrandt all his pictures made
Soft as their union into light and ſhade:
Whene'er his colours wore too bright an air,
A kindred ſhadow took off all the glare;
Whene'er that ſhadow, careleſsly embrown'd,
Stole on the tints, and breath'd a gloom around,
Th' attentive artiſt threw a warmer dye,
Or call'd a glory from a pict'ur'd ſky;
Till both th' oppoſing powers mix'd in one,
Cool as the night, and brilliant as the ſun.
Paſſions, like colours, have their ſtrength and eaſe,
Thoſe too inſipid, and too gaudy theſe:
Some on the heart, like Spagnoletti's, throw
Fictitious horrors, and a weight of woe;
Some, like Albano's, catch from ev'ry ray
Too ſtrong a ſunſhine, and too rich a day;
Others, with Carlo's Magdalens, require
A quicker ſpirit, and a touch of fire;
Or want, perhaps, though of celeſtial race,
Corregio's ſoftneſs, and a Guido's grace.
Wou'dſt thou then reach what Rembrandt's genius knew,
And live the model that his pencil drew,
Form all thy life with all his warmth divine,
Great as his plan, and faultleſs as his line;
Let all thy paſſions, like his colours, play,
Strong without harſhneſs, without glaring gay:
Contraſt them, curb them, ſpread them, or confine,
Ennoble theſe, and thoſe forbid to ſhine;
With cooler ſhades ambition's fire allay,
And mildly melt the pomp of pride away;
Her rainbow-robe from vanity remove,
And ſoften malice with the ſmile of love;
Bid o'er revenge the charities prevail,
Nor let a grace be ſeen without a vail:
So ſhalt thou live as heav'n itſelf deſign'd,
Each pulſe congenial with th' informing mind,
Each action ſtation'd in its proper place,
Each virtue blooming with its native grace,
Each paſſion vig'rous to its juſt degree,
And the fair whole a perfect ſymmetry.

THE LOTTERY.

INSCRIBED TO MISS H——.

Cawthorn had once a mind to fix
His carcaſe in a coach and ſix,
And live, if his eſtate would bear it,
On turtle, ortolans, and claret:
For this he went, at fortune's call,
To wait upon her at Guildhall;
That is, like many other thick wits,
He bought a ſcore of lottery tickets,
And ſaw them riſe in dreadful ranks
Converted to a ſcore of blanks.
Amaz'd, and vex'd to find his ſcheme
Deluſive as a midnight dream,
He curs'd the goddeſs o'er and o'er,
Call'd her a mercenary whore;
Swore that her dull capricious ſenſe
Was always dup'd by impudence,
That men of wit were but her tools,
And all her favours were for fools.
He ſaid, and with an angry gripe
Snatch'd up his ſpeculative pipe;
And, that he might his grief allay,
Read half a page in Seneca.
When, lo! a phantom, tall, and thin,
Knock'd at the door, and enter'd in:
She wore a party-colour'd robe,
And ſeem'd to tread upon a globe—
Whiſk'd round the room with haughty air,
And toſs'd into an elbow chair.
Then with a bold terrific look,
Which made the doctor drop his book,
Addreſs'd him thus: Thou wicked varlet!
Art not aſham'd to call me harlot?
Why, what's thy conſequence and parts,
Thy ſkill in letters, or in arts,
That I, poor fortune! muſt be lectur'd,
Kick'd, bully'd, curs'd, abus'd, and hector'd,
Becauſe, forſooth—a fever roaſt thee,—
Thou'rt not ſo wealthy as Da Coſta?
However, as thou haſt ſome virtues,
And know'ſt my fav'rite Tom Curteis,
I'll point thee out a way to be
Almoſt as rich a man as he.
Send to the bank this day and buy
Ten tickets in the lottery;
And bid your honeſt friend, the broker,
Endorſe the name of M— H——;
The ſacred numbers then conſign
Devoutly to the fair-one's ſhrine:
That is, in humbler rhetoric,
Preſent them by your footman Dick,
And tell her, in a billet-doux,
" My dear, theſe tickets are for you,
" An offering from an heart that's ſplit
" Aſunder by your ſenſe and wit,

" Yet has the grace, to tell you true,
" To keep its own dear ends in view,
" And therefore hopes you'll not forget
" To give me half of what you get."
My life on't, Jemmy, thou'lt be great—
Five thousand pounds! a good estate:
For be assur'd, that though the poets,
The small philosophers, and no-wits,
Pretend that I'm to worth unkind,
And impudently paint me blind,
I yet can see thy charmer's merit,
Her taste, her dignity, and spirit;
Have often listen'd to her song,
And stole persuasion from her tongue;
And am resolv'd, though all the shrews,
Stock-jobbers, brokers, pimps, and Jews,
Frown, curse, expostulate, and rally,
With all the tongues of all the alley,
To give her, out of love and zeal,
The richest number in the wheel.

LADY JANE GREY TO LORD GUILFORD DUDLEY.

AN EPISTLE.

In the Manner of Ovid.

FROM these dark cells, in sable pomp array'd,
Where night's black horrors breathe a deeper shade,
Where ev'ry hour some awful vision brings
Of pale assassins and the shrouds of kings,
What comforts can a wretched wife afford
The last sad moments of her dying lord?
With what fond tear, what love-impassion'd sigh,
Sooth the dear mourner ere he reach the sky?
Ye pow'rs of song that ev'ry chord inspire
When Rome's soft Ovid weeps along his lyre;
Ye angel-sounds that Troy's great Hector mourn,
When his lost consort bleeds upon his urn!
Teach me, ye warblers! teach this strain of woe
Like you to kindle, and like you to flow.
Alas! in vain ye bid your warmths divine
Wake all the string, and live through all the line.
Spite of those warmths, th' immortal numbers roll
Cool from my hand, and faithless to my soul;
Too faint a wish, too calm a sigh impart,
Hide half my grief, and tell but half my heart;
Lose the fond anguish of this flowing tear,
And the keen pang that tears and tortures there.
'Tis said that souls, to love's soft union wrought,
Converse by silent sympathy of thought:
O! then with that mysterious art divine
The fierce impatience of my breast be thine:
And when some tender, recollecting sigh
Pours the big passion from each weeping eye,
When wrapt, and wild, thy fond ideas roll,
And all my image takes up all thy soul;
Think that my breast the same dear tumults move,
As keen an anguish, and as soft a love;
Think that I hear thy pray'rs, explore thy fears,
Sigh to thy sighs, and weep with all thy tears;
From all thy wishes, all thy phrenzies see,
And feel for Guilford all he feels for me,
Ah! where are now the joys my fancy drew
For ever blooming, and for ever new!
Where the dear scenes that meditation aid,
The rill's soft murmur, and th' embow'ring shade;
Where all the heartfelt charities that move
The warmths of rapture in the pulse of love!
Lost, lost for ever, like th' ethereal fire
Shot through the sky to glitter and expire.
Hide it, ye pow'rs! the sad, the solemn day
That gave a Dudley to the house of Grey:
For, O! when to the altar's foot we came,
And each fond eye confess'd the kindling flame;
Just as the priest had join'd my hand to thine
An awful tremor shook the hallow'd shrine,
A sudden gloom the sacred walls array'd,
And round the tapers threw an azure shade:
The winds blew hollow with the voice of pain,
Aërial echoes sigh'd through all the fane:
'Twas God himself, that from th' empyreal sky,
Look'd unauspicious on the nuptial tie,
And pitying taught, as prophecies of woe,
The shrines to tremble, and the wind to blow.
O! had thy blood drunk in some fell disease,
From each chill pinion of th' autumnal breeze,
Had yon keen sun, with all the rage of pain,
Wing'd every pulse, and scorch'd up every vein,
Extinguish'd Guilford ere he liv'd his span,
It had been nature and the fate of man.
Heav'ns! had my cares but ceas'd thy parting breath,
In life's last moment, and the gasp of death,
Explor'd the dear imperfect sounds that hung
Loose on each fibre of the fault'ring tongue,
Cool'd the fond phrenzies of thy parting sigh,
Wip'd the warm drop from each expiring eye;
I had but known what many a virtuous pair
Are doom'd to suffer, and are doom'd to bear:
But, O! in thought's wild images to see
My glories fall, proud infamy! like thee;
See, 'midst the murmur of a million sighs,
The fabre glitter, and the scaffold rise;
To see my Guilford moving sadly slow
Through ranks of warriors, and the pomps of woe;
See him, while bending o'er his awful bier,
Shed the keen anguish of too warm a tear,
A tear that from the warmths of love proceeds,
And melts the husband, while the hero bleeds—
Bleed, did I say!—Tear, tear, ye pow'rs of art!
Sense, nature, memory, from my tortur'd heart:
And thou,—beneath the pole's black umbrage laid,
Oblivion! daughter of the midnight shade!
With all thy glooms, and all thy mists, remove
Each sweet idea of connubial love:
Hide the dear man whose virtues first impress
Too fond an image on my virgin breast;
From all the softness of my soul efface
His every beauty, and his every grace;
And force that soul with patience to resign
All the dear ties that bound her fast to thine.
Alas! vain effort of misguided zeal!
What pow'r can force affliction not to feel?
What saint forbid this throbbing breast to glow,
This sigh to murmur, and this tear to flow?
Still honest nature lives her anguish o'er,
Still the fond woman bleeds at every pore.

Ah! when my soul, all panting to aspire,
Each sense enrapture'd, and each wish on fire,
On all the wings of heav'n-born virtue flies
To yon bright sunshine, yon unclouded skies;
Spite of the joys that heav'n and bliss impart,
A softer image heaves within my heart;
Impassions nature in the springs of life,
And calls the seraph back into the wife.
Yet say, my Guilford! say, why wilt thou move
These idle visions of despairing love?
Why wilt thou still, with every grace and art,
Spread through my veins, and kindle in my heart?
O let my soul far other transports feel,
Wing'd with thy hopes, and warm'd with all thy zeal,
And thou, in yon imperial heav'n enshrin'd,
Eternal effluence of th' eternal mind!
O grace divine! on this frail bosom ray
One gleam of comfort from the source of day—
She comes, and all my opening breast inspires
With holy ardours, and seraphic fires:
Rapt, and sublime, my kindling wishes roll,
A brighter sunshine breaks upon my soul;
Strong, and more strong the light celestial shines,
Each thought ennobles, and each sense refines:
Each human pang, each human bliss retires,
All earth-born wishes, and all low desires,
The pomps of empire, grandeur, wealth decay,
And all the world's vain phantoms fade away.
Rise, ye sad scenes! ye black ideas rise,
Rise, and dispute the empire of the skies:
Ye horrors! come, and o'er my senses throw
Terrific visions and a pomp of woe;
Call up the scaffold in its dread parade,
Bid the knell echo through the midnight shade;
Full in my sight the robe funereal wave,
Swell the loud dirge, and open all my grave;
Yet shall my soul, all-conscious of her God,
Resign'd and sainted for the blest abode,
The last sad horrors of her exit eye,
Without a tremor, and without a sigh.
Ah! no—while heav'n shall leave one pulse of life
I still am woman, and am still a wife;
My hov'ring soul, though rais'd to heav'n by pray'r,
Still bends to earth, and finds one sorrow there:
There, there, alas! the voice of nature calls,
A nation trembles, and a husband falls.
O! would to Heav'n I could like Zeno boast
A breast of marble, and a soul of frost,
Calm as old Chaos, ere his waves begun
To know a zephyr, or to feel a sun.
Romantic wish! for O, ye pow'rs divine!
Was ever misery, ever grief like mine?
For ever round me glares a tragic scene,
And now the woman bleeds, and now the queen:
Now back to Edward's recent grave convey'd,
Talk with fond phrenzy to his spotless shade;
Now wildly image all his sister's rage,
The baleful fury of the rising age;
Behold her sanguinary banners fly
Loose to the breezes of a British sky;
See England's genius quit th' imperial dome
To Spain's proud tyrant, and the slaves of Rome;
See all the land the last sad horrors feel
Of cruel creeds, and visionary zeal.
Mad bigotry her every son inspires,
Breathes all her plagues, and blows up all her fires,
Points the keen faulchion, waves th' avenging rod,
And murders virtue in the name of God.
May He, who first the light of heav'n display'd,
The dear Redeemer of a world in shade,
He who to man the bliss of angels gave,
Who bled to triumph, and who died to save,
Beam all his gospel, sacred and divine,
On ev'ry bosom, and on ev'ry shrine;
Relieve th' expiring eye, and gasping breath,
And rescue nature from the arm of death.
And now resign'd, my bosom lighter grows,
And hope soft-beaming brightens all my woes,
Hark! or delusion charms, a seraph sings,
And choirs to waft us spread their silver wings:
Th' immortals call, heav'n opens at the sound,
And glories blaze, and mercy streams around.
Away—ere nature wake her pangs anew,
Friend, father, lover, husband, saint, adieu!
Yet when thy spirit, taught from earth to fly,
Spreads her full plume, and gains upon the sky,
One moment pause till these dead orbs resign
Their last faint beam, and speed my soul to thine:
Then, while the priest, in hallow'd robes array'd,
Pays the last honours to each parting shade;
While o'er our ashes weeps th' attending train,
And the sad requiem flows along the fane;
Our kindred souls shall wing th' ethereal way,
From earth and anguish to the source of day——
To all the bliss of all the skies aspire,
And add new raptures to th' angelic choir.
And, O! if aught we knew, or left behind,
Can wake one image in the fainted mind;
If yet a friend, a parent, child, can move
Departed spirits to a sense of love;
Still shall our souls a kind connection feel
With England's fenate, and with England's weal;
And drive from all its shores, with watchful care,
The flame of discord, and the rage of war.
Perhaps, when these sad scenes of blood are o'er,
And Rome's proud tyrant awes the soul no more;
When anguish throws off all the veils of art,
Bares all her wounds, and opens all her heart;
Our hapless loves shall grace th' historic page,
And charm the nations of a future age!
Perhaps some bard, whose tears have learnt to flow
For injur'd nature, and to feel for woe,
Shall tell the tender melancholy tale,
To the soft zephyrs of the western vale;
Fair truth shall bless him, virtue guard his cause,
And every widow'd matron weep applause.

OF TASTE.

AN ESSAY.

Well—though our passions riot, fret, and rave,
Wild and capricious as the wind and wave,

One common folly, ſay whate'er we can,
Has fix'd at laſt the mercury of man;
And rules, as ſacred as his father's creed,
O'er every native of the Thames and Tweed.
Aſk ye what pow'r it is that dares to claim
So vaſt an empire, and ſo wide a fame?
What God unſhrin'd in all the ages paſt?
I'll tell you, friend! in one ſhort word—'tis Taſte;
Taſte that, without or head, or ear, or heart,
One gift of nature, or one grace of art,
Ennobles riches, ſanctifies expence,
And takes the place of ſpirit, worth, and ſenſe.
In elder time, ere yet our fathers knew
Rome's idle arts, or panted for Virtù,
Or ſat whole nights Italian ſongs to hear,
Without a genius, and without an ear;
Exalted ſenſe, to warmer climes unknown,
And manly wit, was nature's and our own.
But when our virtues, warp'd by wealth and peace,
Began to ſlumber in the lap of eaſe—
When Charles return'd to his paternal reign,
With more than fifty tailors in his train,
We felt for Taſte—for then obliging France
Taught the rough Briton how to dreſs and dance;
Politely told him all were brutes and fools,
But the gay coxcombs of her happier ſchools;
That all perfection in her language lay,
And the beſt author was her own Rabelais.
Hence, by ſome ſtrange malignity of fate,
We take our faſhions from the land we hate:
Still ſlaves to her, howe'er her taſte inclines,
We wear her ribbands, and we drink her wines;
Eat as ſhe eats, no matter which or what,
A roaſted lobſter, or a roaſted cat;
And fill our houſes with an hungry train
Of more than half the ſcoundrels of the Seine.
Time was, a wealthy Engliſhman would join
A rich plumb-pudding to a fat ſirloin;
Or bake a paſty, whoſe enormous wall
Took up almoſt the area of his hall:
But now, as art improves, and life refines,
The demon Taſte attends him when he dines;
Serves on his board an elegant regale,
Where three ſtew'd muſhrooms flank a larded quail;
Where infant turkeys, half a month reſign'd
To the ſoft breathings of a ſouthern wind,
And ſmother'd in a rich ragout of ſnails,
Out-ſtink a lenten ſupper at Verſailles.
Is there a ſaint that would not laugh to ſee
The good man piddling with his fricaſſee;
Forc'd by the luxury of taſte to drain
A flaſk of poiſon, which he calls champagne!
While he, poor idiot! though he dare not ſpeak,
Pines all the while for porter and ox-cheek.
Sure 'tis enough to ſtarve for pomp and ſhow,
To drink, and curſe the clarets of Bourdeaux:
Yet ſuch our humour, ſuch our ſkill to hit
Exceſs of folly through exceſs of wit,
We plant the garden, and we build the ſeat,
Juſt as abſurdly as we drink and eat.
For is there aught that nature's hand has ſown
To bloom and ripen in her hotteſt zone?
Is there a ſhrub which, ere its verdures blow,
Aſks all the ſuns that beam upon the Po?
Is there a flowret whoſe vermillion hue
Can only catch its beauty in Peru?
Is there a portal, colonnade, or dome,
The pride of Naples, or the boaſt of Rome?
We raiſe it here, in ſtorms of wind and hail,
On the bleak boſom of a ſunleſs vale;
Careleſs alike of climate, ſoil, and place,
The caſt of nature, and the ſmiles of grace.
Hence all our ſtucco'd walls, Moſaic floors,
Palladian windows, and Venetian doors;
Our Gothic fronts, whoſe Attic wings unfold
Fluted pilaſters tipp'd with leaves of gold;
Our moſſy cielings, grac'd with gay feſtoons,
The weeping marbles of our damp ſaloons,
Lawns fring'd with citrons, amaranthine bow'rs,
Expiring myrtles, and unop'ning flow'rs.
Hence the good Scotſman bids th' anana blow
In rocks of cryſtal, or in Alps of ſnow;
On Orcus' ſteep extends his wide arcade,
And kills his ſcanty ſunſhine in a ſhade.
One might expect a ſanctity of ſtyle
Auguſt and manly in an holy pile,
And think an architect extremely odd
To build a playhouſe for the church of God;
Yet half our churches, ſuch the mode that reigns,
Are Roman theatres, or Grecian ſanes;
Where broad-arch'd windows to the eye convey
The keen diffuſion of too ſtrong a day;
Where, in the luxury of wanton pride,
Corinthian columns languiſh ſide by ſide,
Clos'd by an altar exquiſitely fine,
Looſe and laſcivious as a Cyprian ſhrine.
Of late, 'tis true, quite ſick of Rome and Greece,
We fetch our models from the wiſe Chineſe:
European artiſts are too cold and chaſte,
For Mand'rin only is the man of taſte;
Whoſe holder genius, fondly wild to ſee
His grove a foreſt, and his pond a ſea,
Breaks out —— and, whimſically great, deſigns
Without the ſhackles or of rules or lines.
Form'd on his plans, our farms and ſeats begin
To match the boaſted villas of Pekin.
On every hill a ſpire-crown'd temple ſwells,
Hung round with ſerpents, and a fringe of bells:
Junks and balons along our waters ſail,
With each a gilded cock-boat at his tail;
Our choice exotics to the breeze exhale
Within th' encloſure of a zig-zag rail;
In Tartar huts our cows and horſes lie,
Our hogs are fatted in an Indian ſtye;
On ev'ry ſhelf a joſs divinely ſtares,
Nymphs laid on chintzes ſprawl upon our chairs;
While o'er our cabinets Confucius nods,
'Midſt porcelain elephants, and China gods.
Peace to all ſuch—but you whoſe chaſter fires
True greatneſs kindles, and true ſenſe inſpires,
Or ere you lay a ſtone, or plant a ſhade,
Bend the proud arch, or roll the broad caſcade,
Ere all your wealth in mean profuſion waſte,
Examine nature with the eye of taſte; [rill,
Mark where ſhe ſpreads the lawn, or pours the
Falls in the vale, or breaks upon the hill;
Plan as ſhe plans, and where her genius calls,
There ſink your grottos, and there raiſe your walls.

Without this taſte, beneath whoſe magic wand
Truth and correctneſs guide the artiſt's hand,
Woods, lakes, and palaces, are idle things,
The ſhame of nations, and the bluſh of kings.
Expence and Vanbrugh, vanity and ſhow,
May build a Blenheim, but not make a Stowe.
But what is Taſte, you aſk, this heav'n-born fire
We all pretend to, and we all admire?
Is it a caſual grace? or lucky hit?
Or the cool effort of reflecting wit?
Has it no law but mere miſguided will?
No juſt criterion fix'd to good and ill?
It has——True taſte, when delicately fine,
Is the pure ſunſhine of a ſoul divine,
The full perfection of each mental pow'r—
'Tis ſenſe, 'tis nature, and 'tis ſomething more.
Twin-born with genius, of one common bed,
One parent bore them, and one maſter bred.
It gives the lyre with happier ſounds to flow,
With purer bluſhes bids fair beauty glow;
From Raphael's pencil calls a nobler line,
And warms, Corregio! every touch of thine.
And yet, though ſprung from one paternal flame,
Genius and Taſte are different as their name:
Genius, all ſunbeam, where he throws a ſmile,
Impregnates nature faſter than the Nile;
Wild and impetuous, high as heav'n aſpires,
All ſcience animates, all virtue fires;
Creates ideal worlds, and there convenes
Aërial forms and viſionary ſcenes.
But taſte corrects, by one etherial touch,
What ſeems too little, and what ſeems too much;
Marks the fine point where each conſenting part
Slides into beauty with the eaſe of art;
This bids to riſe, and that with grace to fall,
And bounds, unites, refines, and heightens all.

LIFE UNHAPPY, BECAUSE WE USE IT IMPROPERLY.

A MORAL ESSAY.

I own it, Belmour! ſay whate'er we can,
The lot of ſorrow ſeems the lot of man;
Affliction feeds with all her keeneſt rage
On youth's fair bloſſoms, and the fruits of age;
And wraps alike beneath her harpy wings
The cells of peaſants, and the courts of kings.
Yet ſure unjuſtly we aſcribe to fate
Thoſe ills, thoſe miſchiefs, we ourſelves create;
Vainly lament that all the joys we know
Are more than number'd by the pangs of woe;
And yet thoſe joys in mean profuſion waſte,
Without reflection, and without a taſte:
Careleſs of all that virtue gives to pleaſe,
For thought too active, and too mad for eaſe,
We give each appetite too looſe a rein,
Puſh ev'ry pleaſure to the verge of pain;
Impetuous follow where the paſſions call,
And live in rapture, or not live at all.
Hence half the plagues that fill with pain and [ſtrife
Each ſofter moment of domeſtic life;
The palſied hand, the viſionary brain,
Th' infected fluid, and the torpid vein;
The ruin'd appetite, that loathing ſlights
The richeſt olio of the cook at White's;
The aching impotence of looſe deſire,
A nerveleſs body, with a ſoul on fire;
Th' eternal bluſh that lights the cheek of ſhame
For waſted riches, and unheeded fame;
Unhallow'd reveries, low-thoughted cares,
The wiſh that riots, and the pang that tears;
Each awful tear that weeps the night away,
Each heartfelt ſigh of each reflecting day;
All that around the low'ring eye of ſpleen
Throws the pale phantom, and terrific ſcene;
Or, direr ſtill, calls from th' abyſs below
Deſpair's dread genius to the couch of woe,
Where, loſt to health, and hope's all cheering ray,
As the dead eye-ball to the orb of day,
Pale riot bleeds for all his mad expence
In each rack'd organ, or acuter ſenſe;
Where ſad remorſe beholds in every ſhade
The murder'd friend, or violated maid;
And ſtung to madneſs in his inmoſt ſoul,
Graſps the keen dagger, or empoiſon'd bowl.
Impious it were to think th' Eternal Mind
Is but the ſcourge and tyrant of mankind.
Sure he who gives us ſunſhine, dew, and ſhow'r,
The vine ambroſial, and the blooming flow'r,
Whoſe own bright image lives on man impreſt,
Meant that that being ſhould be wiſe and bleſt,
And taught each inſtinct in his heart enſhrin'd
To feel for bliſs, to ſearch it, and to find.
But where's this bliſs, you aſk, this heav'n-born fire
We all pretend to, and we all admire?
Breathes it in Ceylon's aromatic iſle?
Flows it along the waters of the Nile?
Lives it in India's animated mould,
In rocks of cryſtal, or in veins of gold?
Not there alone, but, boundleſs, unconfin'd,
Spreads through all life, and flows to all mankind;
Waits on the winds that blow, the waves that roll,
And warms alike the Equator and the Pole.
For as kind nature through the globe inſpires
Her parent warmths, and elemental fires,
Forms the bright gem in earth's unfathom'd caves,
Bids the rich coral bluſh beneath the waves,
And with the ſame prolific virtue glows
In the rough bramble, as the damaſk roſe;
So, in the union of her moral plan,
The ray of bliſs ſhines on from man to man,
Whether in purples or in ſkins arry'd,
He wields the ſceptre, or he plies the ſpade,
Slaves on the Ganges, triumphs on the Rhone,
Hides in a cell, or beams upon a throne.
In vain the men whoſe foul ambition fires,
Whom birth ennobles, and whom wealth inſpires,
Inſiſts that happineſs for courts was made,
And laughs at every genius of the ſhade.
As much miſtakes the ſage, who fain would prove
Fair pleaſure lives but in his grot and grove.
Each ſcene of life, or open or confin'd,
Alike congenial to its kindred mind.
Alike ordain'd by heav'n to charm or pleaſe
The man of ſpirit and the man of eaſe;
Juſt as our taſte is better or is worſe,
Becomes a bleſſing, or becomes a curſe.
When luſt and envy ſhare the ſoul by turns,
When fear unnerves her, or mad vengeance burns;

When luxury brutes her in the wanton bow'r,
And guilt's black phantoms haunt her midnight hour;
Not all the wealth each warmer ſun provides,
All earth emboſoms, and all ocean hides,
Not all the pomps that round proud greatneſs ſhine.
When ſuppliant nations bow before her ſhrine,
Can eaſe the heart, or ray upon the breaſt
Content's full ſunſhine, and the calm of reſt.
No—all the bliſs that nature feels, or knows,
Of heartfelt rapture, or of cool repoſe,
Howe'er improv'd by wiſdom, and by art,
Lives in ourſelves, and beams but from the heart.
Quite independent of thoſe alien things,
Applauding ſenates, and the ſmiles of kings,
Of empty purſes, or of wealthy bags,
A robe of ermines, or a coat in rags,
Conclude we then that Heav'n's ſupreme decree
Gives eaſe and joy to monarchs and to me:
Yet, ſuch the fate of all that man obtains,
Our pleaſures muſt be purchas'd by our pains,
And coſt us every hour ſome ſmall expence,
A little labour, and a little ſenſe.
That heav'n-born bliſs, that ſoul-illumin'd joy,
Which madmen ſquander, and which fools deſtroy,
To half the nations of the globe unknown,
Reflecting wiſdom makes it all her own;
Coolly explores, in every ſcene and ſphere,
What nature wants, what life inherits there;
What lenient arts can teach the ſoul to know
A purer rapture, and a ſofter woe;
What melt her idle vanities away,
And make to-morrow happier than to-day.
Without this cheap, this economic art,
This cool philoſophy of head and heart,
A peer's proud boſom, rack'd by pangs and cares,
Feels not the ſplendor of the ſtar he wears:
With it the wretch whom want has forc'd to dwell
In the laſt corner of her cheerleſs cell,
In ſpite of hunger, labour, cold, diſeaſe,
Lies, laughs, and ſlumbers on the couch of eaſe.
A coxcomb once in Handel's parlour found
A Grecian lyre, and try'd to make it ſound;
O'er the fine ſtops his awkward fiſt he flings,
And rudely preſſes on th' elaſtic ſtrings:
Awaken'd diſcord ſhrieks, and ſcolds, and raves,
Wild as the diſſonance of winds and waves,
Loud as a Wapping mob at midnight bawls,
Harſh as ten chariots rolling round St. Paul's,
And hoarſer far than all th' eceſtatic race
Whoſe drunken orgies ſtunn'd the wilds of Thrace.
Friend! quoth the ſage, that fine machine contains
Exacter numbers, and diviner ſtrains;
Strains ſuch as once could build the Theban wall,
And ſtop the mountain torrent in its fall:
But yet, to wake them, rouſe them, and inſpire,
Aſks a fine finger, and a touch of fire,
A feeling ſoul, whoſe all expreſſive pow'rs
Can copy nature as ſhe ſinks or ſoars;
And, juſt alike to paſſion, time, and place,
Refine correctneſs into eaſe and grace.
He ſaid—and, flying o'er each quiv'ring wire,
Spread his light hand, and ſwept it on the lyre.
Quick to his touch the lyre began to glow,
The ſound to kindle, and the air to flow,
Deep as the murmurs of the falling floods,
Sweet as the warbles of the vocal woods:
The liſt'ning paſſions hear, and ſink, and riſe,
As the rich harmony or ſwells or dies;
The pulſe of avarice forgets to move,
A purer rapture fills the breaſt of love;
Devotion lifts to heav'n a holier eye,
And bleeding pity heaves a ſofter ſigh.
Life has its eaſe, amuſement, joy, and fire,
Hid in itſelf, as muſic in the lyre,
And, like the lyre, with all its pow'rs impart,
When touch'd and manag'd by the hand of art.
But half mankind, like Handel's fool, deſtroy,
Through rage and ignorance, the ſtrain of joy;
Irregularly will their paſſions roll
Through nature's fineſt inſtrument, the ſoul:
While men of ſenſe, with Handel's happier ſkill,
Correct the taſte, and harmonize the will;
Teach their affections like his notes to flow,
Not rais'd too high, nor ever ſunk too low;
Till every virtue, meaſur'd and refin'd,
As fits the concert of the maſter-mind,
Melts in its kindred ſounds, and pours along
Th' according muſic of the moral ſong.

PRUSSIA: A POEM.

Awake, Voltaire! with warmth, with rapture raiſe
Th' applauding pœan, and the ſong of praiſe:
Again thy Fred'ric mounts the victor's car,
Again he thunders in the front of war;
Back to the deſert flies the routed Gaul,
And proud Vienna ſhakes from wall to wall.
He hears me not—thy genius, France! prevails,
The poet feels but for his own Verſailles;
With ſecret curſes eyes the hero's ſword,
And hates that virtue which he once ador'd.
And ſhall a king whoſe triumphs far exceed
The boaſted glories of the Greek and Swede;
Who more than Cæſar, with a brighter ray
Aſcends, and ſhines imperial Rome away—
Shall he through ages ſpread his mighty name
Without a verſe to wait upon his fame?
Has Britain loſt her ſpirit, ſoul, and fire?
Has ſhe no patriot who dare touch the lyre?
Yes———while I live, thy virtues, prince! ſhall be
For ever ſacred to the muſe, and me.
What though I herd but with the vulgar throng,
The laſt, the loweſt of the ſons of ſong,
Thy bold exploits ſhall give my ſoul to glow,
My pulſe to kindle, and my vein to flow;
Exalt my ſpirit, animate my line,
And lend my numbers all the ſtrength of thine.
Now had pale fury drove her iron car
From fields of ſlaughter, and from waſtes of war;
Returning peace led on the vernal year,
Sheath'd the keen ſword, and broke the lifted ſpear,
Wide o'er the world her olive branch diſplay'd,
And call'd the nations to its hallow'd ſhade.
And now the arts, inflam'd with gen'rous ſtrife,
Roſe in the ſoftneſs of domeſtic life;

Exulting labour tam'd the ſtubborn plain,
The ſail of commerce took up all the main,
With bolder wings th' immortal Muſes flew,
And ſcience trimm'd her faded wreath anew.
Ambition ſigh'd—for now ſhe heard no more
The war's loud thunder break from ſhore to ſhore;
No more beheld proud monarchs, meanly vain,
Rank'd in her files, or number'd in her train;
Loſt to the glare of life, ſhe lay unbleſt
In the lone cell of ſolitary reſt,
Where ſpleen's pale viſions round her ſlumbers throw
Eternal ſadneſs, and a pomp of woe.
In vain kind nature pours upon her eye
A ſofter ſunſhine, and a richer ſky,
Spreads the wild foreſt, heaves the cloud-topt hill,
Waves in the wood, and flows along the rill:
Woods, wilds, and waters, to her ſenſe decay,
The warblers languiſh on the vocal ſpray;
Unclouded ſuns in heav'n's clear azure fade,
And night's black horrors wear a deeper ſhade.
At length arous'd ſhe feels her wonted flame,
Revives, and opens to the voice of fame:
See ſees new triumphs riſing to her view,
And wing'd by rapture, to Vienna flew.
'Twas night—lull'd ſoftly by the weſtern breeze,
Fair Auſtria ſlumber'd on the couch of eaſe:
When as of old the firſt infernal pow'r
Stole on the ſweets of Eden's nuptial bow'r,
And ſkill'd alike to flatter and deceive,
Crept in a reptile to the ear of Eve
So now ambition, with a nobler mien,
Approach'd, and whiſper'd thus the ſleeping queen.
"Canſt thou, O princeſs! thou, whoſe glory ſprings
From heav'n-born heroes, and a race of kings,
Reſign'd, and cool, to yonder Pruſſian yield
Sileſia's ſceptre, and her fruitful field?
Riſe to thy wrongs, aſſert thy injur'd reign,
And bid the ſword of vengeance rage again;
Tear from his hand the empire he hath won,
This moment cruſh him, or thou art undone.
Secret and ſtrong, beneath his native fires,
The haughty genius of his ſoul aſpires;
His realms enlarge, his ſails begin to fly
O'er ev'ry ocean of the polar ſky.
Rich harveſts riſe upon his barren waſte,
His crowded cities are the ſeats of taſte;
Another year's autumnal ſun ſhall ſee
His broad dominions ſtretch from ſea to ſea;
Perhaps ſhall ſee him on th' imperial throne,
Europe enſlav'd, and half the world his own."
Thus ſpoke the fiend, and, with deluſive art,
Breath'd her black ſpirit through Tereſa's heart:
Rapt into future ſcenes ſhe minds no more
The faith ſhe plighted, and the oath ſhe ſwore;
Strong, and more ſtrong, the viſion lives impreſt,
Conqueſt's dread genius takes up all her breaſt;
Paints on her ſoul, in luxury of thought,
Th' ideal glories of a war unfought,
The laurel wreath, the military ſhow,
The car of triumph, and the captive foe.
And now the queen, unfeeling, falſe, and vain,
Plans the wide ruin of a bold campaign;
Through all the north with all her ſpirit raves,
And wakes the nations in their huts, and caves;
With wild barbarians crowds her wanton war,
The ſavage Croat, and the fierce huſſar;
Fires the proud Saxon's ſanguinary vein,
And rouſes all the dæmon of the Seine;
Leagues kings with kings, fills Europe with alarms,
Shakes heav'n and earth, and ſets the world in arms.
O curſt ambition! to each vice allied,
Begot by miſchief in the womb of pride,
What ills, dread fury! from thy genius flow!
What awful ſcenes of unimagin'd woe!
Before thy footſteps, wrapp'd in flames of fire,
Sinks the tall column, and majeſtic ſpire.
Cloſe at thy ſide her ſword fell ſlaughter waves,
'Midſt bleeding piles, and ever-op'ning graves;
The plague behind thee, with her tainted breath,
Sweeps through the nations on the wing of death;
Neglected genius in his cell expires,
To other worlds fair liberty retires;
The patriot muſe forgets her voice divine,
Religion leaves her violated ſhrine;
And ev'ry meek ey'd virtue pines and mourns,
'Midſt falling temples, and ſepulchral urns.
The Pruſſian ſaw at one keen glance from far
The gath'ring tempeſt, and impending war:
He ſaw, and inſtant bids his armies form,
Heads the bold march, and bears upon the ſtorm;
In vain the foreſt big with death extends,
The rampant thunders, and the flood deſcends;
In vain the foe each open field declines,
Hides in the trench, or lurks within his lines;
He ſtorms the rampart, fords the rapid flood,
Leaps the broad trench, and clears th' enambuſh'd wood;
Now preſſes on, now reins his dread career,
Pours on the van, or ſteals upon the rear;
Marks ev'ry criſis, ſhines in ev'ry ſcene,
And is at once a Marlbro', and Eugene.
At length, in all the pomp of war, advance
Th' imperial eagles with the arms of France;
A mighty hoſt, whoſe awful files contain
The vet'ran warriors of the Marne and Maine.
And will he yet, when nations round him cloſe,
And his thin ranks ſcarce number half his foes;
Will he, ye heav'ns! th' unequal conflict try,
And brave his fate when glory bids him fly?
Ah! aught avails it that immortal fame
Fill'd her fond clarion with her Fred'ric's name?
Avails it aught that juſtice learn'd to awe
Miſguided nature from his code of law?
That warm'd, and foſter'd by his genial eye,
Tranſplanted ſcience own'd the polar ſky?
That Greece and taſte upon the Baltic ſmil'd,
And new Lyceums open'd in the wild?
Alas! one moment—the bright ſcene is o'er—
He falls—he dies—and Pruſſia is no more.
Yet ſhall not France, in this her bliſsful hour,
Her dream of empire, and her pride of pow'r,
An eaſy, cheap, unbleeding conqueſt know,
Or rear her trophies o'er a flying foe:
For now the monarch, ere he gives the ſign,
Serenely dreadful moves along the line;

The legions, far as each keen glance can fly,
Mark his firm ſtep, and hang upon his eye;
That eye whoſe lightning terror round him flings;
That ſtep which ſeems to tread on thrones, and kings.
At every look through all th' embattled van
The pulſe of glory beats from man to man:
The ſoldier kindling at his prince aſpires,
Swells with his hopes, and burns with all his fires;
Yet, 'midſt his ardours, owns a ſofter flame,
And feels for Fred'ric while he feels for fame.
And now the ſun, whoſe orb ſhall ſet in blood,
Faints on the umbrage of the weſtern wood;
The diſtant hills in each horizon fade,
And night comes on in all her gloom and ſhade:
And now the trumpet's animating ſound
Peals on the ear, and ſhakes the field around.
When, as the whirlwind tears its rapid way,
Roots up the rock, and ſweeps the plain away;
Fierce on his foe th' intrepid Pruſſian ſprings,
Drives through his van, and breaks into his wings;
Wraps his whole war in one tremendous fire,
And ſees the proweſs of his hoſt expire.
Th' imperial chiefs no more the ſhock ſuſtain,
